71955

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

71955

VOLUME CXLVIII

DECEMBER 31, 1938, to JUNE 24, 1939

THE NATION, Inc.
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK
495

71955

INDEX TO VOLUME CXLVIII

DECEMBER 31, 1938, to JUNE 24, 1939

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 20	December 31, 1938	361-388	April 1
21- 48	January 7, 1939	389-416	April 8
49- 76	January 14	417-452	April 15
77-104	January 21	453-480	April 22
105-132	January 28	481-512	April 29
133-160	February 4	513-544	May 6
161-188	February 11	545-572	May 13
189-216	February 18	573-600	May 20
217-248	February 25	601-628	May 27
249-276	March 4	629-656	June 3
277-304	March 11	657-684	June 10
305-332	March 18	685-712	June 17
333-360	March 25	713-740	June 24

A

A. F. L. See American federation of labor
A. and P. company and the National consumers tax commission. E. Kellers; C............332; see also......... 203
Abend, Hallet. See New York Times
Abortions and the law. B. B. Tolnai; S... 424
Academic freedom; Professor Childs and the New York teachers' union; C........ 76
  Teachers college and The Nation; E... 193
Ackerberg, Robert, junior
  Chicago liberals; C......332; see also.. 223
Adless paper, coming. B. Garnett; S...... 464
Advertising; censorship; H. Woodward; S 203; correction, 266; see also C...332, 359
  False curb on. H. Woodward; S...... 671
  Gelatin. H. Woodward; S............ 498
  Self-advertising automobile. H. Woodward; S 614
Aeronautics. See Aviation
Agriculture
  Farm-parity payments, bill for; EP.... 361
  Marginal farmer, problem of. E. Janeway; S 314
  Southern farm labor's plight; EP...... 79
Air corps expansion bill. See Armaments
Airplanes. See Armaments; Aviation
Alabama, "freedom" in; M. Linsley; C..... 187
  See also Negroes—Scottsboro case
Alaska for the refugees. E. Greensfelder; C 628
Albania; heroes. A. Kuh; C............... 511
  Seizure by Mussolini; E............... 419
Alexander Graham Bell. F. Hoellering; MP. 478
Alexander Nevsky. F. Hoellering; MP..... 413
Aliens. See Deportation
Allen, Robert S.
  WPA—or the dole; S.................. 111
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938.... 27
America. See United States
American bar association, committee upholds civil liberties in Jersey City; EP..3; E 26
American civil liberties union; one-act play contest; C 304
American federation of labor
  Attitude toward Wagner act amendment; E............ 138
  Into G. O. P. By K. G. Crawford; S... 283
  Leaders' opposition to union with C. I. O.; EP 307
  Organizes Chicago editorial association; EP 134
American Friends service committee, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938......... 27
American medical association. See Medicine
American red cross, the, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938............ 27
American volunteers, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938............ 27
American way, the. J. W. Krutch; D...... 157
Americans on England. R. Dell; S......... 227
Americas. See Latin America; Pan-American conference
Ameringer, Oscar, on the New deal. M. Marshall; S 617
Amlie, Thomas R., nomination for Interstate commerce commission; EP...134, 190
Anderson, Marian, barring in Washington; EP 251
Anderson, Paul Y., on The Nation's honor roll for 1938............ 27
Anti-semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Appeasement of business impossible. K. G. Crawford; S 339
Appropriations. See Finance, public
Arabs, Nazi overtures to. M. Marshall; S... 617
  Nazis turn toward Mecca. I. Ibn Jast; S 176
    See also Palestine
Argentina, appointment of N. Armour as ambassador to. F. Kirchwey; S........ 550
  Fascism checked; EP................. 419
Armaments
  Aerial, fantastic plans for the United States; EP 22
  Air corps expansion bill, Barkley amendment killed; EP 334
  Airplane sales to France; EP........... 217
  America arms its rivals. E. Janeway; S 139
  Bathrooms and munitions. M. Marshall; S 351
  Companies, and the conscientious investor. K. Hutchison; S............ 645
  Defense, national, rests on democracy and economic power; E............ 136
  Enlarged program gains headway in Washington; E 280
  Guam fortification, Japanese opposition; EP 78
  Holiday of the arms makers. F. C. Hanighen; S 199
  Roosevelt and national defense. O. G. Villard; S 178
  Roosevelt proposal for 3,000 additional planes; EP 78
  Traffic, a costly lesson. S. T. Byington; C 213
Armour, Norman, appointment as ambassador to Argentina. F. Kirchwey; S........ 550
Arrest Bulldog Drummond. F. Hoellering; MP 102
Art and expression. A. K. Coomaraswamy; C............187; see also............ 98
  Artists and scholars—careful or cavalier? J. Hastings; C 48
  New York world's fair. D. Haskell; S.. 594
  Projects, federal; EP.................. 602
Asia for the Japanese. E. O. Hauser; S.... 90
Assembly, right of. See Civil rights
Automobile workers. See United automobile workers of America
Automobiles; buying and selling. H. Woodward; S 376
  Self-advertising car. H. Woodward; S.. 614
Aviation; research, restricted appropriation; EP 362
Awake and sing. J. W. Krutch; D......... 328
Axis powers. See Italo-German alliance

B

Baldwin, Roger N., and others
  Hallowell, Robert, death of; C......... 248
Balfour declaration. See Palestine
Balkans; axis activities; EP............... 481
  Doomed? A. Viton; S.................. 340
Ballet caravan. V. Mishnun; S............ 707
Baltic states; in case of war. J. Josten; S... 719
  Vulnerable. H. C. Wolfe; S............ 607
Baltimore, anti-semitism in junior high school; EP 714
Baltimore Sun, decline. W. R. Espy; S...... 143
Bargain sales. H. Woodward; S............ 35
Bartlett, Mary
  Press, the, and the NLRB; S......... 64
Barzun, Jacques
  "Scientific humanism"; S............... 502
Baseball, controlled in Jersey City by Hague; EP 687
Bathrooms and munitions. M. Marshall; S... 351
Beachcomber, the. F. Hoellering; MP...... 44
Belgium; election results; EP.............. 391
Belloc definition of a "gentleman." M. Marshall; S 351
Bendiner, Robert, and J. Wechsler
  Scripps-Howard newspapers; S.....553, 580; see also EP............ 546
Bennett, attorney general John J.; and the Whitney case. I. F. Stone; S......55; see also EP............ 49
Bernstein, Rabbi Philip S., refutes charges against Jews. O. G. Villard; S....... 470
Bill of rights. See Constitution, United States
Biology, teaching of. K. P. Schmidt; C..215; see also 96
Birth control and public health. J. F.; C.... 332
Birth control federation of America, exhibit at San Francisco fair censored by Catholic church; EP................ 687
Black, Hugo L., on The Nation's honor roll for 1938............ 27
Black Tom and Kingsland disasters, verdict for the United States; EP............ 714
Block, Harry
  Mexico, what next? S................ 257
Blood and geography. F. Kirchwey; S..... 365
Bloom bill. See Neutrality
Board of higher education, New York, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938...... 27
Bogan, Louise
  "Come, sleep . . ."; P............... 379
  Cutting of an agate, the; W. B. Yeats; S 234
Bohemia, mailed fist in; E................. 688
Bone bill for war-time income tax; EP...... 362
Books; British, duties on. W. Foyle; C..... 248
  Literature of escape. M. Marshall; S.... 564
Borgese, G. A.
  Pius XII and the axis; S.........285; correction 332
Bowers, Claude G., appointed ambassador to Chile; EP 658
Boy slaves. F. Hoellering; MP............ 158
Boyer, Sophie A.
  Protection for labor; C............359; see also 203
Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; homage to. M. Lerner; S 222
  Resignation; EP 189
Brazil, trade and credit agreement with United States; EP 306
Breakfast food prices. H. Woodward; S..... 614
Bridges, Harry, deportation case, Perkins statement; E 192
Britain. See Great Britain
Britt, George
  Poison in the melting pot; S........... 374
Brookings institution, "recovery" program; EP 482
Brophy, John
  CIO and the cannery workers' union; C.........479; see also EP......... 307
Brown, Stan
  New England power and flood-control projects; C.........451; see also 317, 543
Budget, government. See Finance, public
Bullock, Marie
  Contest for world's fair poem; C...... 160
Burchell, Henry
  Italy America society, the; C, with editorial comment 48
Burkitt, Jeff, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
Business
  Appeasing; E 252
  Appeasement impossible. K. G. Crawford; S 339
  Profits. K. Hutchison................ 587
  Recovery, prospects for; E 24
  Recovery, prospects for. K. Hutchison; S 348
  "Recovery" programs, Brookings institution and Republican national committee; EP 482
  Small, Mead bill for federal insurance of loans; EP 686
Butler, Nicholas Murray, social ambassador for Italian fascists; EP............ 80
Byington, Steven J.
  Armament traffic, a costly lesson; C.... 215
Byrnes bill. See Social security

C

C., C.
  Good news; freeing of Mooney; C...... 131
C., E. J.
  Palestine impressions; C.............. 247
CCC. See Civilian conservation corps
CIO. See Congress of industrial organizations
Campell, Wallace
  Names consumers' cooperative movement for honor roll; C............ 103
Canada; support of Great Britain in case of war. O. G. Villard; S............ 616
  Visit of King George. D. Martin; S.288; see also C............ 511
Canby, Henry S.
  Need of Catalonian writers; C......... 48
Canned goods, labels in the United States and in Canada. H. Woodward; S...... 614
Cannery workers' union, and the CIO. Letter by J. Brophy; see also EP......... 307
Cantarella, M., and M. Salvadori
  Suicide of A. F. Formiggini; C........ 131
Capek, Karel, last conversation with. E. Mann; S 68
Careful or cavalier? J. Hastings; C....... 48
Carlisle, Helen Grace
  World's fair, New York; C.........682; see also EP............ 546
Catalonia. See Spain
Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
Censorship, advertising. H. Woodward; S.....203; correction, 266; see also C, 332; C............ 359
Central America. See Latin America

Chain stores; Patman bill, aimed at national chains. H. Woodward; S............. 92
Chamberlain, Neville. See Great Britain
Champs Elysées. F. Hoellering; MP........ 301
Chase, Stuart
  Living philosophy: Seven true stories; S 369
Chaves, Agustin Rivero
  Puerto Rican economic conditions; C 598; see also EP.................... 335
Chestnut, Isabel
  Suggests use of cartoons by The Nation; C.........188; see also 69
Chiang Kai-shek. See China
Chicago; liberals, difficulties of. M. S. Mayer; S.........223; see also C.......... 332
Chicago editorial association and Chicago newspaper guild. See Newspapers
Child labor. See Labor, child
Children, refugee. See Refugees
Childs, John L.; and the New York college teachers' union; C...76; see also... 132
Chile
  Earthquake may be followed by political upheaval; EP 163
  Reform government at work; EP......... 80
  Victory of democracy. F. Kirchwey; S.... 62
China; sabotage against Chiang Kai-shek; E 53
  Wang Ching-wei combatted by Chiang Kai-shek; EP 22
Chinese-Japanese war
  Asia for the Japanese. E. O. Hauser; S 90
  Check for Japanese at hands of western powers; EP 602
  China's fifty-fifty chance; H. Hanson; S 400
  Chinese take offensive; EP..455; EP.. 514
  Chungking bombing; EP................ 546
  Fighting still goes on; E.............. 281
  Further and deeper. Low; Ct.......... 668
  Hainan, occupation by Japanese; EP... 189
  Japan begins spring drives; EP........ 363
  Japan turns south; EP................. 390
  Japanese aims on Asiatic mainland; EP 2
  Japanese failures; E.................. 632
  Japanese "order" in China. H. Talbot; C 103
  Shanghai, attempt by Japanese to seize international settlement; EP......... 251
  Stalemate. J. Gunther; S............. 667
  Tientsin, Japanese blockade of concessions; E 715
Citizen of the world of tomorrow, a
  World's fair, New York; C........682; see also EP......................... 546
Citizens' conservation committee
  Forest conservation; C................ 388
City, the. F. Hoellering; MP............... 653
Civil rights
  Assembly, right of; E................. 26
  Peril from "friends"; E............... 365
  Upheld by bar association committee in Jersey City case; EP............... 3
Civilian conservation corps; complaints; C 248; see also C 387
Clark, Mrs. Edward G., junior
  Wilson, E., review of books by Hemingway; C 76
Cliffe, F. B.
  Job-insurance amendments; C, with editorial comment, 303; see also E....... 110
Close quarters. J. W. Krutch; D........... 328
Coal
  Deadlock between operators and union; EP 545
  Harlan county troubles; EP............ 573
  Unions, controversy between, and threatened shortage; EP.................. 454
Coleman, McAlister
  Dewey, Tom; S....................... 520
  Letter to Frank Hague, junior; C..... 304
  On "Pacifism means suicide," by A. Kolnai; C......248; see also 86
  Study in relief; the Scutellaro case; S... 119
Collier, Margaret
  Criticizes Robert Dell; C.............. 451
Colorado, Antonio J.
  Praise for The Nation for its attitude toward Spain; C.................... 215
Columbia broadcasting system, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938............ 27
Columbia university; Teachers college and The Nation; closing of New college; E 193
Committee for cultural freedom, statement of. S. Hook and others; C.........626; see also 605, 710, 711, 712
Committee of fifty-six, declaration of democratic independence; EP 164
Commonweal, The; the Catholic church, and The Nation. M. Williams; C, with editorial reply, 82; see also.......... 160
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938.... 27
Commonwealth and Southern, agreement with TVA; EP 162
Communist party; membership, and possible deportation; E......192; EP........ 454
  Tactics in Tampa. M. E. Edson; C..711; see also 605, 626
Concentration camp. F. Hoellering; MP..... 413
Concerts. See Music
Confederated Spanish societies to aid Spain; named for honor roll. J. Loeb; C.... 103
Confessions of a nazi spy. F. Hoellering; MP 595
Congress; new, prospects of legislation. K. G. Crawford; S 6
  See also Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
Congress of industrial organizations
  And the cannery workers' union. J. Brophy; C...479; see also EP...... 307
  Girdler suit for damages; EP......... 630
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938... 27
  Southern tenant farmers' union affiliation; EP.....307; see also C....... 479
  Threat against, in Martin action; EP.. 107
  Union with A. F. of L.; opposition of leaders of latter; EP............... 307
Conscription, and Canadian objections. O. G. Villard; S 432
  See also Great Britain
Constitution, United States; bill of rights still needed. R. L. Wise; S......... 291
Consumers
  Conferences; the Consumers union and A. Lane. H. Woodward; S.......... 726
  Cooperatives. See Cooperatives
  Evidence before Temporary national economic committee; EP............ 574
  Pocket guide. See Pocket guide
Consumers union and the League for industrial democracy. A. Kallet; C..628; see also 560
Coolidge, Calvin. O. G. Villard; S......... 122
Coomaraswamy, Ananda K.
  On art and expression; C.........187; see also 98
Cooperatives
  And common sense. H. Woodward; S.. 150
  List of. H. Woodward; S..........203; correction, 266; see also C.......332, 359
  Movement, named for honor roll. W. Campell; C........................ 103
  Not dealing with Nazis. H. Woodward; S 430
Cosmetics and face creams. H. Woodward; S 614
Cotton, problem of; E.................... 392
Coughlin, Father
  And the church; E.................. 25
  Anti-semitism; EP.................. 21
  Anti-semitism, and the church; E...... 26
  Kernan, opponent of Coughlin, a progressive veteran. S. Robbins; C...... 47
Countryman, The. M. Marshall; S.......... 405
Counts, Doctor George S., differs with The Nation on Teachers college; E....... 193
Crane, Richard W.
  Excitement in Vermont over flood-control project; C.....132; see also E...... 108
Crawford, Kenneth G.
  Clean-up of federal bench; S.......... 459
  Congress, new, prospects of legislation; S 6
  Goodby neutrality; S.................. 423
  Ganging up on the labor act; S........ 395
  Garner boom hurt by canard about drinking; S 459
  Moseley loses his horse; S............. 662
  Open season on reds; S................ 519
  Plot, General Johnson's; S............ 718
  Pump-priming to pumping; S.......606; see also C......................... 684
  Roosevelt foreign policy, and 1940; S.. 459
  Wagner act amendments, fight over; S. 283
  "War plots" and politics; S........... 167
Cripps, Sir Stafford, expelled from national executive of British labor party; EP.. 162
"Crisis" (moving picture). A. L. Mayer; C......543; see also 398
Crisis—made in Germany. F. Hoellering; MP 301
Cultural freedom, committee for, statement of. S. Hook and others; C........626; see also 605, 710, 711, 712
Curley, Bishop Michael J., refusal to visit loyalist Spain; EP................. 51
Cycle of seventy films. F. Hoellering; MP.. 540
Czechoslovakia
  Capek, K., last conversation with. E. Mann; S 68
  Crisis, new; EP...................... 305
  March against culture. A. Kuh; C.... 47
  Seizure by Hitler; E.................. 335
  Seizure by Hitler; the grand disillusion in Great Britain. A. Vallance; S...... 396
  United States condemnation of Hitler; F. Kirchwey; S 337
  See also Bohemia; Jews—Anti-semitism

D

Dancing; ballet Caravan. V. Mishnun; S.. 707
Daniels, Jonathan, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
Dark victory. F. Hoellering; MP.......... 539
Dates of meetings, movement to avoid conflict. D. Fontaine and others; C..... 600
Daughters of the American revolution; barring of Marian Anderson; EP....... 251
Daumier needed. I. Chestnut; C........188; see also 69
Davies, Donald M.
  Letter on sabotage against Chinese government; E 53
Day off. F. Kirchwey; S.................. 634
Dear octopus. J. W. Krutch; D............ 128
Defense. See Armaments
Dell, Robert
  Americans on England; S.............. 227
  Criticized by British-American reader; C 451
  France loses its head; S................ 367
  La Follette, P. F., speech on United States and Europe; S............... 487
  Mussolini in desperate straits; S....... 367
Democracy
  In peril from its "friends"; E......... 365
  Must it use force?
    I. Pacifism means suicide. A. Kolnai; S ....86; see also C,...... 248
    II. Peace and the liberal illusion. R. Niebuhr; S 117
    III. Munich rather than war. B. Russell; S.......173; see also........ 187
  Work for. Mrs. W. Jacobs and Mrs. D. Males; C 188
  Work in saving; EP.................. 135
Dempsey bill against civil rights; E...... 365
Denmark, in case of war. J. Joesten; S.... 719
Deportation
  Aliens, deportable, O'Day bill for concentration camps; EP............... 546
  Menace; E 192
  Strecker case; EP.................... 454
Depression. See Business
Devany bill. See New York State
Dewey, Thomas E. McA. Coleman; S... 520
  Failure in the Whitney case. I. F. Stone; S.........55; see also EP......... 49
  Presidential campaign begins with conviction of Hines; EP............... 250
Diaz, A. Garcia
  M. Williams' defense of the Catholic church; C......160; see also........ 82
Dictators, economic defense against; E...... 518
Dies bill against civil rights; E............ 365
Dies committee
  Accounting for funds needed; EP...... 50
  And the press; E 631
  "Exposure" of fascism and anti-semitism; E, 603; EP.................. 630
Disney, Walt, honor by Harvard causes trouble; EP 191
Dixie—U. S. A., March of time. F. Hoellering; MP 595
Doctors. See Medicine
Dodge, Stanley M.
  New England power; C.........543; see also 451
Dodge City. F. Hoellering; MP............ 478
Dole, the, or the WPA. By R. S. Allen; S.. 111
Dominion support of Great Britain in case of war. O. G. Villard; S............... 616
Douglas, William O.; mentioned for supreme court; liberalism questioned; EP..... 278
"Dow theory" of stock-market analysis. K. Hutchison; S 468
Drama. See Krutch, J. W.; M., M. (for reviews); Theatre, the Dreamland faces the situation. Low; Ct... 608
Drugs, for headache, dangerous. H. Woodward; S 377
Duties. See Tariff

E

Eccles, Marriner S.; statement on balancing of budget; EP.................. 361
Economic conditions. See Business
Economic defense against dictators; E...... 518
Economy, government. See Finance, public
Edson, M. E.
  Communist tactics in Tampa; C...711; see also 605, 626, 712
Eire. See Ireland
Ellis, Havelock
  Living philosophy: Harmony in conflict; S 463
Elvehjem, Professor C. A., on The Nation's honor roll for 1938.................. 27
Embargo, Spanish. See Spain
England. See Great Britain
Escape, literature of. M. Marshall; S..... 564
Espy, Willard R.
  Baltimore Sun, decline of; S.......... 143
Estonia, vulnerable. H. C. Wolfe; S....... 607
Europe
  And the United States, speech by P. L. La Follette. R. Dell; S............. 487
  Appeasement, lull before. F. Kirchwey; S 717
  Appeasement policy, temporary lull; EP 278
  Balkans, doomed? A Viton; S.......... 340
  Baltic, vulnerable. H. C. Wolfe; S..... 607
  Blood and geography. F. Kirchwey; S.. 365
  Camps, armed, forming; EP.......... 601
  Chamberlain's choice. L. Fischer; S... 490
  Combinations of powers, opposing; E... 419
  Dreamland faces the situation. Low; Ct 608
  Fisherman's tales. Low; Ct........... 9
  Germany versus Russia in the north. J. Joesten; S 719
  In turmoil; E 419
  Moves and counter-moves for peace or war; E 457
  "Peace" moves by Chamberlain and the Vatican; EP 685
  Roosevelt message to Hitler and Mussolini. O. G. Villard; S............... 561
  Situation after seizure of Czechoslovakia by Hitler; E 335
  Soviet Russia considers three-power alliance; EP 629

  - Soviet terms for alliance with Great Britain and France; E 659
  - Stiffer stand against fascist powers; E... 280
  - Tension increasing; E.................. 547
- Everybody's business. K. Hutchison; S.,293, 348, 402, 468, 530, 587, 645, 700
- Everywhere I roam. J. W. Krutch; D...... 73
- Ezekiel, Mordecai
  - On review of his book, "Jobs for all"; C.........544; see also............. 407

F

- F., J.
  - Birth control and public health; C...... 332
- Face creams and cosmetics. H. Woodward; S 614
- Fads, medicinal. H. Woodward; S.......... 498
- Fansteel case; decision of supreme court against sitdown strikes; E.......280; see also C......................... 451
- Farming. See Agriculture
- Farrington, Francis C., appointment as WPA administrator; EP................... 3
- Fascism and nazism
  - Advance, means of checking; EP....... 22
  - American; Madison square garden meeting in New York city; E.........253; see also C......................... 359
  - America's power of resistance. E. Janeway; S......112; see also EP....... 107
  - And the Versailles treaty. A. Kolnai; S.. 427
  - Butler, N. M., as social ambassador for Italian fascism; EP................ 80
  - Catholic church attitude; E............ 25
  - Challenge to democracies, Roosevelt message on; E........................ 51
  - Culture of Italy destroyed; editorial comment on letter by H. Burchell........ 48
  - Dies committee "exposure"; EP...... 630
  - Dies investigation; E.....603; EP..... 630
  - Latin American, meets checks; EP...... 419
  - Opposition, American; EP............. 1
  - Overtures to Moslems. M. Marshall; S. 617
  - Peruvian; EP 21
  - Quebec; EP 163
  - "Stopping." F. Kirchwey; S.......421; see also C......................... 542
  - Turn toward Mecca. I. Ibn Jast; S.... 176
- Fechner, Robert
  - Defense of Civilian conservation corps; C.........387; see also 248
- Federal art projects; EP.................. 602
- Feild, Doctor Robert Durant, dismissal by Harvard; EP....................... 191
- Field, S. S.
  - On "stopping" fascism, C..........542; see also 421
- Films. See Moving pictures; Hoellering, F. (for reviews)
- Finance, public
  - Appropriations by congress; EP........ 306
  - Cost of war. E. G. Talbott; C......... 598
  - Demand for economy; EP............. 361
  - Demand for economy always opposed; EP 277
  - Dollar devaluation; EP 278
  - Gold, future of. K. Hutchison; S...... 700
  - Gold, too much. K. Hutchison; S...293; see also EP....................... 278
  - Government economy and prospects for business recovery. K. Hutchison; S... 348
  - Government economy not wanted. K. G. Crawford; S 339
  - Inflation, proposal for; EP............ 713
  - Pump-priming to pumping. K. G. Crawford; S......606; see also C......... 684
  - Roosevelt message on budget; E........ 51
  - Stabilization fund explained by Morgenthau; EP 278
  - State income taxes on federal employees upheld by supreme court; EP......... 362
  - Tax reduction, campaign for; EP...... 545
  - Tax revision; E..................... 576
  - Tax revision, paper victory of reaction; EP 630
  - Taxation, American and British, and unemployment. K. Hutchison; S........ 530
  - Taxation, ending of exemption on government bonds and salaries; EP...... 106
  - Taxes, truth about. S. O. Lesser; S.... 609
  - War-time income-tax bill proposed in Bone bill; EP 362
  - Wealth, new, proposal for creation; EP. 713
- Fingerprinting workers. W. Levner; C...... 103
- "Fink" racket, the; E..................... 165
- Finland, vulnerable. H. C. Wolfe; S...... 607
- Fish, rotten. H. Woodward; S.............. 376
- Fischer, Louis
  - Chamberlain's choice; S............... 490
  - Hitler's new threat; S................ 310
  - Struggle in Madrid; S............310; see also EP....................... 305
  - Thirty months of war in Spain; S..... 28
- Fisheries agreement between Japan and Soviet Russia; EP 390
- Fisherman's tales. Low; Ct................ 9
- Flashing stream, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 476
- Flood-control and power projects, New England. S. Brown; C.........451; see also 317, 543
- Fontaine, Dorothy, I. W. Soule and M. L. Lamont
  - Meeting dates, movement to avoid conflict; C 600
- Foolish virgin, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 44
- Foreign loans. See Latin America
- Foreign policy, United States. See United States
- Forest conservation. Citizens' conservation committee; C 388
- Formiggini, A. F.; suicide. M. Cantarella and M. Salvadori; C 131
- Fort Wayne housing plan. B. Gilman; S... 489
- 400,000,000, the. F. Hoellering; MP....... 357
- Foyle, William
  - Duties on British books; C............ 248
- France
  - And Spain. F. G. Smith, junior; C.... 216
  - And Spain; nervousness in Paris; A. Werth; S 168
  - Enemy of Germany, as seen by Hitler in "Mein kampf"................... 263
  - Labor, decrees for restriction; EP...... 546
  - Pact with Soviet Russia. G. Tabouis; S. 115
  - Politics:
    - Attempts to discredit Great Britain and the Soviets; EP 482
    - Constitution suspended; EP.......... 333
    - France loses its head. R. Dell; S.... 367
    - Lebrun reelected president; EP...... 418
    - Sentiment in Paris on Germany. J. Stevens; C 543
    - See also Franco-Italian relations
- Franco, General. See Spain
- Franco-Italian relations; Daladier returns negative to Italian demands; EP.... 50
- Franco-Soviet pact. G. Tabouis; S.......... 115
- Frank, Jerome
  - Monopoly, views on; C, with editorial comment...415; see also E, 308, E, 337, C, 415, E, 420, C, 451
- Frank, Jerome, appointment as chairman of Securities and exchange commission; EP 602
- Frank, Waldo
  - Death of Antonio Machado; S....... 433
- Frankfurter, Felix; appointment to the supreme court; O. G. Villard; S.....94; see also E........................ 52
- Freedom, academic. See Academic freedom
- Freedom, cultural, committee for; statement. S. Hook and others; C......626; see also 605, 710, 711, 712
- Freedom pavilion, death of. F. Kirchwey; S......485; L. Z. Hobson; S....... 492
- French concentration camp. W. M.; C..... 542
- Frost, Robert, on artists and scholars. J. Hastings; C....................... 48

G

- Gale, Zona, death; EP.................... 23
- Galenson, Walter
  - Sands manufacturing company decision; C.........451; see also E.......... 280
- Gandhi, M. K.; fast as protest against autocracy; EP 279
  - Victory. M. Marshall; S................ 617
- Garner, John Nance; presidential prospects harmed by canard about drinking. K. G. Crawford; S 459
- Garnett, Burt
  - Coming: The adless paper; S.......... 464
- Gedye, G. E. R.; dispatches, danger in. M. Marshall; S.................... 351
  - Forerunner of trouble................. 352
- Gelatin; advertising. H. Woodward; S...... 498
  - And muscles. H. Woodward; S........ 376
- General committee on Americanism and neutrality, use of armory; E........ 309
- Gentle people. M. M.; D.................. 212
- "Gentleman," Belloc definition. M. Marshall; S 351
- George, King, visit to Canada. D. Martin; S.........288; see also C.......... 511
  - Visit to Canada, and Canadian support in case of war. O. G. Villard; S... 616
  - Visit to the United States. F. Kirchwey; S ....661; S............. 689
- Germany
  - Activity. O. G. Villard; S............ 322
  - And Russia, in the north. J. Joesten; S. 719
  - And the United States; Ickes views on nazis upheld by state department; EP. 1
  - Christmas celebrated with pagan rites; EP 3
  - Civil disobedience urged. O. G. Villard; S 647
  - Discontent over foreign and domestic policies; EP 513
  - Disintegration, moral, under nazism. O. G. Villard; S..................... 532
  - Doctors; C 304
  - Economic crisis; EP.................. 249
  - Economic measures against Hitler. O. G. Villard; S 350
  - Economic slow-down; EP.............. 629
  - Economic tension; E.................. 108
  - Economics, pogrom; E................. 219
  - Finances; end of Hitler miracles. A. Sturmthal; S...................... 460
  - Finances, plight of; EP............... 278
  - France as enemy, as seen in "Mein kampf" 263
  - Germans abroad, nazi claim to, and propaganda. M. Marshall; S......... 351
  - Germans in the mirror. Low; Ct...... 345
  - Hitler, Adolf:
    - And Napoleon, A. Kuh on difference. M. Marshall; S 351
    - Foreign policy; winning loot without war. W. Schlamm; S.............. 524
    - "Mein kampf," extracts from........ 263
    - New threat. L. Fischer; S........... 310
    - Reply to Roosevelt. F. Kirchwey; S.. 516
    - Speech to the reichstag; EP......... 134
  - Horrors, no silence on! O. G. Villard; S 37
  - Opposition, underground, to Hitler. K. and E. Mann; S.................... 343
  - Propaganda, nazi. M. Marshall; S...... 351
  - Questionnaire to small nations. F. Kirchwey; S 485
  - Railway material shortage; EP......... 483
  - Scandinavian reply to Hitler non-aggression proposal; EP 574
  - Science, nazi. M. Goran; S............ 641
  - Sentiment in Paris. J. Stevens; C.... 543
  - Trade agreement with Soviet union, negotiations; EP 219
  - Trade agreements and railway material shortage; EP 483
  - "When Germany awakes," a prophecy of 1855. A. Kuh; C.................. 303
    - See also Italo-German alliance
- Giannini, Amadeo Peter, and the SEC. By P. H. Noyes; S.................... 638
- Gilman, Beryl
  - Trailers without wheels; S............ 488
- Girdler, Tom, subversive influence; EP.... 630
- Glycine, fad. H. Woodward; S............. 498
- Gold. See Finance, public
- Golden Gate exposition. O. G. Villard; S.. 589
- Goodbye, Mr. Chips. F. Hoellering; MP... 653
- Goran, Morris
  - Swastika science; S.................. 641
- Graves, Bibb. See Negroes—Scottsboro case
- Great Britain
  - Americans on England. R. Dell; S..... 227
  - As seen in "Mein kampf"............. 263
  - Bewildered by post-Munich conditions. A. Vallance; S..................... 141
  - Chamberlain conference with Mussolini produces nothing; E................ 81
  - Chamberlain washes his hands. Low; Ct. 198
  - Chamberlain's choice. L. Fischer; S.... 490
  - Chamberlain's gesture of peace toward Hitler; EP......................... 481
  - Chamberlain's visit to Rome; EP....... 50
  - Conscription. A. Vallance; S........... 578
  - Conscription bill introduced; EP....... 514
  - Cooperatives. H. Woodward; S........ 150
  - Dominion support in case of war. O. G. Villard; S 616
  - Foreign policy stiffens; E............. 391
  - Foreign policy; the grand disillusion. A. Vallance; S 396
  - Pledges support to Poland; E.......... 391
  - Politics:
    - Anti-fascists strive for coalition; EP.. 162
    - Chamberlain by default. K. Hutchison; S 724
    - Cripps expelled from labor party national executive; EP.............. 162
  - Taxation, and American, and unemployment. K. Hutchison; S.............. 530
  - Unemployment, and taxation. K. Hutchison; S 530
  - Wins in Spain. G. Salvemini; S....... 197
- Great man votes, the. F. Hoellering; MP... 158
- Greensfelder, Elmer
  - Alaska for the refugees; C............ 628
- Group health insurance. See Medicine
- Guam, fortification, Japanese opposition; EP. 78
- Guérard, Albert
  - War as a last resort; C............... 216
- Gumberg, Alex, death; E.................. 660
- Gunga Din. F. Hoellering; MP............ 158
- Gunther, John
  - Stalemate in China; S 667

H

- H., C.
  - CCC complaint; C......248; see also C 387
- H., T.
  - Syria and French rule; persecution of the Jews of Rhodes; C................. 598
- Haggin, B. H.
  - Books, three, on jazz; M.............. 653
  - Concerts, shortcomings; M............ 412
  - Hofmann, Josef, programs; M......... 330
  - Jazz; M 680
  - More Haggin wanted. J. J. Spector; C.. 104
  - Mozart, life and works; S............. 570
  - Music, recorded; S.........46, 74, 129, 186, 245, 302, 356, 386, 449, 476, 508, 596, 624, 708
  - Schnabel, A., recital; M............... 330
- Hague, Frank. See Jersey City
- Hague, Frank, junior; letter to. McA. Coleman; C 304
- Hainan, occupation by Japanese; EP........ 189
- Hallowell, Robert, death of. R. N. Baldwin, and others; C 248

Hanighen, Frank C.
  Arms-makers' holiday; S 199
Hansen, Alvin H.
  Balancing the budget; C...684; see also 606
  On Temporary national economic committee; S 606
Hanson, Haldore
  China's fifty-fifty chance; S.............. 400
Happiest days, the. J. W. Krutch; D...... 476
Harlan county troubles; EP.............. 573
Hart, Willie Joe, sentence for union activity. M. Linsley; C 187
Harvard university, honor to W. Disney causes trouble; EP 191
Haskell, Douglas
  New York world's fair art; A......... 594
  Shaving; C......542; see also......... 430
Hastings, John
  Artists and scholars—careful or cavalier? C 48
Hats, ashcan. H. Woodward; S............ 430
Hauser, Ernest O.
  Asia for the Japanese; S.............. 90
Health insurance. See Medicine
Health, public. See Medicine
Hearst newspapers. See Newspapers
Heart of Paris. F. Hoellering; MP........ 102
Hemingway, Ernest; review of books by E. Wilson censured. Mrs. E. G. Clark, junior; C 76
Henderson, Leon, appointment to Securities and exchange commission; EP 482; EP 602
  On monopolies; E 337
Henry IV, part I.; review by J. W. Krutch; D 184
Herring, Hubert
  What happened at Lima; S........94; see also EP 79
Hines, James J., conviction; EP............ 250
Hitler, Adolf; "Mein kampf," extracts from 263
  See also Czechoslovakia; Germany
Hobson, Laura Z.
  Death of Freedom pavilion; S......492; see also 485
Hoellering, Franz
  Alexander Graham Bell; MP........... 478
  Alexander Nevsky; MP............... 413
  Arrest Bulldog Drummond; MP........ 102
  Beachcomber, the; MP 44
  Boy slaves; MP.................... 158
  Champs Elysées; MP 301
  City, the; MP.................... 654
  Concentration camp; MP............. 413
  Confessions of a nazi spy; MP........ 595
  Crisis—made in Germany; MP......... 301
  Cycle of seventy films; MP........... 539
  Dark victory; MP.................. 539
  Dodge City; MP.................... 478
  Foolish virgin, the; MP.............. 44
  400,000,000, the; MP................ 357
  Goodbye, Mr. Chips; MP.............. 563
  Great man votes, the; MP............ 159
  Gunga Din; MP 158
  Heart of Paris; MP 102
  House of fear, the; MP.............. 708
  Idiot's delight; MP 213
  Juarez; MP 539
  Lady vanishes, the; MP.............. 44
  Lonely ghosts; MP.................. 102
  Man of conquest; MP 595
  March of time, Dixie—U. S. A.,; MP.. 595
  March of time, War, peace, and propaganda; MP 708
  Midnight; MP 478
  Mikado, the; MP 708
  Mystery of the white room, the; MP... 708
  One-third of a nation; MP............ 213
  Oppenheim family, the; MP............ 653
  Puritan, the; MP.................... 357
  Stagecoach; MP 301
  Three smart girls grow up; MP........ 478
  Trade winds; MP.................... 102
  Union Pacific; MP 653
  Wuthering heights; MP 478
Hofmann, Josef, programs. B. H. Haggin; M 330
Hogben, Lancelot, on "scientific humanism." J. Barzun; S.............. 502
Hollywood. See Moving pictures
Honor roll, The Nation's, for 1938.......27; see also C 103
Hook, Sidney
  Fetishism of power; S 562
Hook, Sidney, and others
  Committee for cultural freedom; C..626; see also 605, 710
Hoover, Herbert; speaks for German refugee children; EP 80
Hopkins, Harry L., appointment. O. G. Villard; S......94; see also EP.... 3
  Opposition to confirmation in senate; EP 106
  Speech at Milwaukee; E.............. 252
Hosiery workers, "cheap labor" at Kingsport, Tennessee. O. W. Huddle; C.....387; see also 656
Hospital-insurance. See Medicine, socialized
"Hot mikado, the"; J. W. Krutch; D...... 410
House of fear, the. F. Hoellering; MP..... 708
Housing; Fort Wayne plan for trailers without wheels. B. Gilman; S.............. 487
  Wagner bill in danger; EP............ 250
Howard, Roy, and opposition to WPA; EP 546; see also 553, 580
Huddle, O. W.
  "Cheap labor" at Kingsport; C....387; see also 656
"Humanism, scientific." J. Barzun; S..... 502
Humor, American, threatened. O. M. Marshall. S......351; see also......... 656
Hungary
  German penetration seen in election of nazis; EP 659
  Joins "anti-comintern" group; EP...... 106
  Vassalage to Germany; EP............ 250
Huntsville, Alabama. W. Whitman; S...... 31
Hutchison, Keith
  Armament companies and the conscientious investor; S 645
  Chamberlain by default; S............ 724
  "Dow theory" of stock-market analysis; S 468
  Everybody's business; S...293, 348, 402, 468, 530, 587, 645, 700
  Gold, too much; S...293; see also EP.. 278
  Margarine; restrictions on trade; S.... 402
  New deal, new life; S.............. 195
  Profits, industrial; S 587
  Recovery; government economy; S...... 348
  Restrictions on trade among the states; S 402
  Washington letters. See Washington letters

I

Ickes, Harold L.; on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
  Views on nazis upheld by state department; EP 1
Idiot's delight. F. Hoellering; MP.......... 213
Importance of being earnest, the. J. W. Krutch; D 128
In the wind......14, 36, 66, 93, 121, 152, 177, 234, 266, 294, 321, 349, 377, 403, 431, 469, 499, 531, 560 (see also C, 628); 588, 615, 646, 672, 701, 727
Income tax. See Finance, public
India; Gandhi fast as protest against autocracy; EP 279
  Gandhi victory. M. Marshall; S........ 617
Industries, profits. K. Hutchison; S......... 587
Inflation. See Finance, public
Insurance, health. See Medicine
Insurance, hospital. See Medicine
Insurance, life, companies. See Life insurance companies
Insurance, old-age. See Old-age pensions
Insurance, unemployment. See Unemployment insurance
International ladies' garment workers' union, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938.. 27
Interstate commerce commission; nomination of Amlie; EP.......134; EP........ 190
Investors, conscientious, and armament companies. K. Hutchison; S.............. 645
Ireland; bombings and incendiarism, by extremists; EP 191
Isaacs, Stanley M., on The Nation's honor roll for 1937 27
Islam. See Arabs
Isolation. See United States
Italo-German alliance
  Alliance, military, and check to axis; E. 575
  Axis powers' activities; E.............. 363
  Economic defense against; E........... 518
  Germany and Italy, relations. G. Salvemini; S 197
  Mutual distrust; EP 513
Italy
  And France; nervousness in Paris. A. Werth; S 168
  And Germany, relations. G. Salvemini; S 197
  As seen in "Mein kampf"............. 263
  Culture destroyed by fascism; editorial comment on letter by H. Burchell..... 48
  Hospitality; good old. Low; Ct......... 170
  Mussolini in desperate straits. R. Dell; S 367
  Mussolini on race. F. Jonas; C.......... 215
  Mussolini stands pat after conference with Chamberlain; E 81
  Trade agreement with Soviet union; EP 219
  Under Hitler. A. Viton; S 7
    See also Franco-Italian relations
Italy America society, the. H. Burchell; C, with editorial comment 48

J

Jacobs, Mrs. Walter, and Mrs. D. Males
  Democracy, work for; C................ 188
Janeway, Eliot
  America in the post-Munich world:
    I. Power of America to resist fascism; S........112; see also EP......... 107
    II. America arms its rivals; S....... 139
    III. Alternative to war; S.......260; see also E 254
    IV. Mobilize for democracy; S...... 314
  Marginal farmer, problem of; S....... 314
Japan
  Asia for the Japanese; S.............. 90
  Extremists take over government; EP.. 51
  Fisheries agreement with Soviet Russia; EP 390
  Opposition to fortification of Guam; EP 78
  Refuses to enter military alliance with the axis powers; EP.................... 363
    See also Chinese-Japanese war; Russo-Japanese relations
Jast, Ibrahim Ibn
  Nazis turn toward Mecca; S......... 176
Jazz. See Music
Jeremiah. J. W. Krutch; D................ 212
Jersey City
  American bar association's committee stand for right of assembly; E....... 26
  Baseball controlled by Hague; EP..... 687
  Civil rights upheld by committee of American bar association; EP.............. 3
  Hague not the law in New Jersey; E.. 137
  Hague case, delay in decision; EP...... 362
  Ordinances held unconstitutional; defeat for Hague; EP 657
Jews
  And refugees. F. Kirchwey; S......... 577
  Anti-semitism:
    Czechoslovakian. A. Kuh; C.......... 47
    Germany. See Jews—Germany
    Italian; laws; A. Viton; S........... 11
    United States. G. Britt; S........... 374
      Baltimore high-school incident; EP. 714
      Coughlin activities; EP............ 21
      Coughlin and the church; E........ 25
      Dies investigation; E.............. 603
      Dies committee "exposure"; EP..... 630
      Jewish "plot" against the United States, as headlined in the press; E 631
      Mosley testimony, K. G. Crawford; S 662
      Need for fighting libels. E. L. Platkowsky; C 76
      Rhodes. T. H.; C................ 598
  As seen in "Mein kampf"............. 263
  Charges against. O. G. Villard; S..... 470
  Germany:
    Pogrom economics; E............... 219
    Pogroms for profit. V. Pozner; S.... 33
    Ransom plan meets difficulties; EP... 51
    Refugees held for ransom, in nazi export scheme; EP 2
  Italy; Mussolini on race. F. Jonas; C.. 213
  Life and literature. C. A. Madison; C, 512; see also 326
  Refugees on steamships; EP........... 659
  Rhodes, persecution. T. H.; C.......... 598
  Spoliation planned in various European countries; EP 51
    See also Palestine
Job insurance. See Unemployment insurance
Joesten, Joachim
  Germany versus Russia in the north; S. 719
Johnson, Hugh S., "plot." K. G. Crawford; S 718
Jonas, Florence
  Mussolini on race; C.................. 215
Juarez. F. Hoellering; MP................ 539
Judges; cleanup bench. K. G. Crawford; S.. 459
  Conviction of M. T. Manton; EP...... 686
  Roosevelt appointments; EP............ 189

K

Kallet, Arthur
  Consumers union and the League for industrial democracy; C...........628; see also 560
  Interpretation of Roosevelt's "good morning"; S 558
Keating, Fred
  Defense of humor; C...656; see also... 351
Kellers, Elizabeth
  National consumers tax commission and the A. and P. company; C.......332; see also 203
Kennedy, Ambassador Joseph P. See Refugees
Kernan, the reverend William C., progressive veteran; C.................... 47
Kingsland and Black Tom disasters, verdict for the United States; EP.......... 714
Kingsport, Tennessee, a planned town. W. Whitman; S 88
  "Cheap labor" at. O. W. Huddle; C............387; see also......... 656
  Housing at. W. Whitman; C......656; see also 387
Kirchwey, Freda
  Appointments of Lovett and Armour; S 550
  Blood and geography; S............... 365
  Day off; S........................ 634
  Democracy wins in Chile; S......... 62
  Freedom pavilion, death of; S......... 485
  George, king, and queen Elizabeth, visit to the United States; S......... 661; see also 689
  Hitler says no to Roosevelt; S......... 516
  Jews and the refugee problem; S...... 577
  Loving Hitler less; S................ 337
  Lull before appeasement; S............ 717
  MacLeish, A., appointment as Librarian of congress; S.................... 689
  Nazi questionnaire to small nations; S 485
  Neutrality, American; S...........421; see also C.................... 542

  Panda, baby giant, at the fair; S...... 689
  "Peace" in Spain; S.................. 393
  "Red totalitarianism"; S..........604; see also 626, 710, 711, 712
  Roosevelt, peace monger; S............ 456
  Taft's "war scare" charge against Roosevelt; S 485
Kluckhohn, Frank L. See New York Times
Knox gelatine, advertising. H. Woodward; S 498
Kolnai, Aurel
  Ghost of Versailles; S................. 427
  Pacifism means suicide; S...........86; see also C........................ 248
Kringen, Olav
  Scandinavian view of the United States and the dictators; C................. 738
Krutch, Joseph Wood
  American way, the; D................ 157
  Awake and sing; D.................... 328
  Close quarters; D..................... 328
  Dear octopus; D....................... 128
  Everywhere I roam; D................ 73
  Flashing stream, the; D.............. 476
  Happiest days, the; D................ 476
  Henry IV, part I; review............ 184
  Importance of being earnest, the; D... 128
  Jeremiah; D 212
  Lillie, B; in "Set to music"; D........ 157
  Little foxes, the; D.................. 244
  Mexicana; D 538
  Mikado, the; D....................... 100
  Mikado, the, swing; D................ 328
  Mikados, "swing" and "hot"; D...... 411
  Mrs. O'Brien entertains; D............ 244
  My heart's in the highlands; D....476, 538
  New York world's fair; S............ 722
  No time for comedy; D............... 509
  Outward bound; D..................... 44
  Personalities of a week; S............ 689
  Philadelphia story, the; D............ 510
  Pins and needles; D.................. 509
  Primrose path, the; D................ 100
  Set to music; D...................... 157
  Spring meeting; D.................... 44
  Stars in your eyes; D................ 244
  White steed, the; D.................. 100
Kuh, Anton
  Albanian heroes; C................... 511
  March against culture in Czechoslovakia; C 47
  "When Germany awakes," a prophecy of 1855; C.......................... 303
Kuh, Anton, on Hitler and Napoleon. M. Marshall; S 351
Kuhn, Fritz, arrest; EP................. 631
Kuhn, R.
  Doctors in Germany; C............... 304
Kürnberger, Ferdinand, a prophecy of 1855 on Germany; C...................... 303

L

Labor
  "Cheap," at Kingsport. O. W. Huddle; C...........387; see also........... 656
  Profit-sharing and wages; EP.......... 713
  See also Strikes
Labor, child; time for ending; E........484; see also C, with editorial comment.... 682
Labor act. See National labor relations board
Labor party, British. See Great Britain
Labor relations board. See National labor relations board
Labor unions
  Alabama, "freedom" in. M. Linsley; C. 187
  Girdler, T., subversive influence; EP... 630
  Pennsylvania's new laws, anti-union; EP 658
  State laws; new; EP................. 658
Lady vanishes, the. F. Hoellering; MP.... 44
LaFollette, Philip F., speech on the United States and Europe. R. Dell; S....... 487
Lamont, Margaret L. See Fontaine, D.
Lane, Albert, and the Consumers union. H. Woodward; S.................... 726
Langford, Howard D.
  On J. L. Childs and the Teachers' union; C...........132; see also........... 76
Laski, Harold J.
  Living philosophy: Why I am a Marxist; S.........59; see also EP.......... 279
Laski, Harold J.; lecture at university of Washington; EP 279
Latin America; loans from the United States, need for; EP........................ 2
  Trade; E........254; see also......... 260
Latvia, vulnerable. H. C. Wolfe; S........ 607
Laughlin, Irwin, spoke at meeting on keeping Spanish embargo................ 188
League for industrial democracy, and the Consumers union. A. Kallet; C......628; see also 560
League of nations; silence. Low; Ct........ 429
Leahy, Admiral, appointment as governor of Puerto Rico; EP................... 573
Leavitt, Edward
  Nazi meeting in New York, and treatment of I. Greenbaum; C, with editorial comment ...359; see also E.... 253
Lebrun, Albert. See France
Lehman, Governor, open letter to, on use of armory for political purposes; E..... 309
Lerner, Max
  Homage to Brandeis; S............... 222
Lesser, Simon O.
  Truth about taxes; S................. 609
Levner, William
  Fingerprinting workers; C............. 103
Liberals in Chicago. M. S. Mayer; S....223; see also C......................... 332
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights
"Library, woman's," lost; information sought. M. White; C..................... 388
Life insurance; evils of business, uncorrected; E.........221; see also C.......... 387
  Octopus. R. L. Strout; S............... 255
Lillie, Beatrice, in "Set to Music." J. W. Krutch; D 157
Lima conference. See Pan-American conference
Linsley, Mildred
  "Freedom" in Alabama; C............ 187
Lippmann, Walter, lauds Roosevelt message; EP 80
Literature of escape. M. Marshall; S...... 564
Little foxes, the. J. W. Krutch; D......... 244
Living philosophies:
  VIII. Why I am a Marxist. H. J. Laski; S.........59; see also EP.......... 279
  IX. Only symbols matter. E. Ludwig; S 147
  X. Pleasure be your guide. R. West; S. 229
  XI. The pursuit of freedom. J. Maritain; S 319
  XII. Seven true stories. S. Chase; S.. 369
  XIII. Harmony in conflict. H. Ellis; S.. 463
  XIV. Faith of a cynic. L. Yutang; S.. 526
  XV. Reason and experience. J. Romains; S 584
Loans, foreign. See Latin America
Loeb, James
  Names Confederated Spanish societies to aid Spain, for honor roll; C......... 103
Lonely ghosts. F. Hoellering; MP.......... 102
Long, Huey, nazi charges of Roosevelt complicity in murder; EP............... 631
Longo, John, gets reading matter in jail; M. Marshall; S.................... 351
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938.... 27
Lothian, Lord, appointment as ambassador; EP 515
Lovett, Robert Morss, appointment as secretary for the Virgin islands. F. Kirchwey; S 550
Low
  Chamberlain washes his hands; Ct..... 198
  Chinese-Japanese war; further and deeper; Ct 668
  Coming events in Spain; Ct........... 30
  Dreamland faces the situation; Ct...... 608
  Fisherman's tales; Ct................. 9
  Germans in the mirror; Ct............ 345
  Good old Italian hospitality; Ct........ 170
  Propaganda, nazi and democratic; Ct... 225
  Roosevelt, "war monger"; Ct........... 525
  Silence, on League of nations; Ct...... 429
Lowe, Theo
  Refugee artist group theater; C...... 76
Ludwig, Emil
  Living philosophy: Only symbols matter; S 147
Lundberg, Ferdinand
  Insurance, life, easy transition to government ownership; C..387; see also E.. 221

M

M., M.
  Gentle people; D..................... 212
M., W.
  French concentration camp; C......... 542
Machado, Antonio, death. W. Frank; S..... 433
MacLeish, Archibald, appointment [illegible] Librarian of congress. F. Kirchwey; S.. 689
Madison, Charles A.
  Jewish life and literature; C.......512; see also 326
  "Red totalitarianism"; C..........712; see also 605, 626, 710, 711
Males, Mrs. Daniel, and Mrs. W. Jacobs
  Democracy, work for; C............... 188
Man of conquest. F. Hoellering; MP...... 595
Mann, Erika
  Capek, K., last conversation with; S.... 66
Mann, Erika, misstatement by Senator Reynolds on her interview; EP.......... 335
Mann, Klaus and Erika
  Germany, underground opposition to Hitler; S 343
Mann, Thomas
  On artists and scholars. J. Hastings; C. 48
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938... 27
Manton, Martin T., conviction; EP........ 686
March of time, Dixie—U. S. A. By F. Hoellering; MP 595
March of time, War, peace, and propaganda. F. Hoellering; MP.................. 708
Margarine, restrictions on trade. K. Hutchison; S 402
Marginal farmer. See Agriculture
Maritain, Jacques
  Living philosophy: The pursuit of freedom; S 319
Marmola. H. Woodward; S............... 559
Marshall, Margaret
  Ameringer, O., on the New deal; S.... 617
  Bathrooms and munitions; S........... 351
  Belloc definition of a "gentleman"; S... 351
  Countryman, The; S.................. 405
  Gandhi victory; S.................... 617
  Gedye dispatches, danger in; S........ 351
  Hitler and Napoleon, difference between, A. Kuh on; S...................... 351
  Humor, and jokes about the WPA; S...........351; see also........... 656
  Longo, J., gets reading matter in jail; S 351
  Moving mountain; S.................. 351
  Nazi overtures to Moslems; S......... 617
  Nazi propaganda among German-Americans; S 351
  Notes by the way; S...............69; (see also 188)...................... 564
  Radio voices; S...................... 564
  Remember Chicago! S................. 643
Martin, David
  Visit to King George to Canada; S..288; see also C........................ 511
Martin, Homer, accusation against; EP...... 107
  See also United automobile workers of America
Martin, Ysobel
  Radio scripts wanted; C.............. 600
Materials, raw, for war; EP............... 454
Mattson, Herman, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938....................... 27
Maverick, Maury, election as mayor of San Antonio; EP 574
Mayer, Arthur L.
  "Crisis" (moving picture); C.......543; see also 398
Mayer, Milton S.
  Chicago liberals; S................223; see also C......................... 332
McConnell, Beatrice
  Child labor; C, with editorial comment........682; see also E......... 484
McDonald, Eric A. M.
  South Africa speaks; C.............. 415
Mead bill. See Business
Medical bureau, the, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938....................... 27
Medicine
  American medical association indicted on charge of violating anti-trust laws; E
  Doctors in Germany. R. Kuhn; C...... 304
  Refugee doctors; EP.................. 391
  Socialized:
    American medical association and group health insurance. D. Pearson; S.... 171
    American medical association opposition to Wagner public health bill; EP 602
    Cooperative. H. Woodward; S....... 430
Meeting dates, movement to avoid conflict. D. Fontaine and others; C.......... 600
Memphis power and light company, agreement to sell to city; EP............. 218
Meserole, Darwin J., and others
  Lift the embargo; C................. 47
Message to congress. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
Mexicana. J. W. Krutch; D............... 538
Mexico
  Fascism checked; EP.................. 419
  Future. H. Block; S.................. 257
  Kluckhohn expulsion and the oil barter arrangement; E 109
Middle west drifts to the right. W. L. White; S.........635; see also EP......... 631
Midnight. F. Hoellering; MP.............. 478
Mikado, the. J. W. Krutch; D.............. 100
Mikado, the. F. Hoellering; MP.......... 708
Mikado, "swing." J. W. Krutch; D........ 328
Mikados, "swing" and "hot." J. W. Krutch; D 411
Milk
  Grade A and others. H. Woodward; S.. 614
  Regulation racket; E.................. 517
  Restrictions on trade. K. Hutchison; S 402
Minkoff law upheld by supreme court; EP.. 362
Minority needs. H. Woodward; S......... 92
Mishnun, Virginia
  Ballet, Caravan; S.................... 707
Missouri. See South, the Mitchell, H. L.
  Southern tenant farmers' union, and the CIO; C......479; see also EP...... 307
Mohammedans. See Arabs
Monopolies
  American medical association indicted; E 4
  Government ownership; E.............. 337
  Investigations; E....308; see also C.... 415
  New national recovery act; E.......337; see also C.......................... 415
  Remedies for; E...................... 420
Montana; reasons for defeat of J. O'Connell. J. W. Nelson; C.................... 47
Mooney, Tom; freeing; EP................ 49
  Freeing—good news. C. C.; letter...... 131
Moral rearmament week; EP............. 575

Morgan, Dwight C.; death, and memorial fund. M. Villard; C................ 512
Morgan, house of; first article. R. Phillips; S..........663; second, S.......... 696
Morris, Lee, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
Moseley, Major general George Van Horn; fascism; EP 456
  Loses his horse. K. G. Crawford; S... 662
Moslems. See Arabs
Mountain, moving. M. Marshall; S........ 351
Moving pictures
  Cycle of seventy films. F. Hoellering; S 539
  Hollywood peace drive; EP............ 164
  Hollywood waves the flag. F. S. Nugent; S.........398; see also C.......... 543
  Supreme court condemns monopoly; EP. 218
  See also Hoellering, F. (for reviews)
Mozart, and the G minor symphony. B. H. Haggin; M 540
  Life and works. B. H. Haggin; S...... 570
Mrs. O'Brien entertains. J. W. Krutch; D.. 244
Muggeridge, Eric G.
  Spanish children in concentration camps; C 416
Munitions. See Armaments
Murder case, New York; five condemned to death; EP 79
Murphy, Frank, appointment. O. G. Villard; S.........94; see also EP......... 22
Music
  Books on jazz, three. B. H. Haggin; S. 653
  Concerts, shortcomings. B. H. Haggin... 412
  Hofmann, Josef, programs. B. H. Haggin 330
  Jazz. B. H. Haggin; S................ 680
  Mozart and the G minor symphony. B. H. Haggin 540
  Mozart, life and works. B. H. Haggin; S 570
  Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
  Schnabel, A., recital. B. H. Haggin...... 330
  Signora, Sarfatti, friend and biographer, to visit the United States; EP...... 80
Mussolini, Benito. See Italy
My heart's in the highlands. J. W. Krutch; D 476, 538
Mystery of the white room, the. F. Hoellering; MP 708

N

NLRB. See National labor relations board
Napoleon and Hitler. A. Kuh on difference between. M. Marshall; S........... 351 Nation, The
  And Teachers college; E.............. 193
  Attitude toward Catholic church condemned by M. Williams; C, with editorial reply......C, 82; see also..... 160
  Attitude toward Spain praised. A. J. Colorado; C 215
  Cartoons, use of, suggested. I. Chestnut; C...........188; see also........... 69
  Credited with big part in freeing of Mooney. C. C.; letter............... 131
  Delay in issue of April 29. M. Marshall; S 564
  Honor roll for 1938...27; see also C... 103
  Thanked for ambulance in Spain; J. Puche Alvarez; C.................. 160
  Winchell, W., controversy with; EP..190, 191
National consumers tax commission, incorporated. H. Woodward; S.......203; correction ....266; see also C....332, 359
  And the A. and P. company. E. Kellers; C........332; see also........ 203
National emergency council, the, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938......... 27
National labor relations board
  Amendment, movement for; A. F. of L. attitude; E 138
  Ganging up on the labor act. K. G. Crawford; S 395
  Press, the, and the NLRB. M. Bartlett; S 64
  Wagner Act:
    "Amendments" by the supreme court; E...........280; see also C........ 451
    Amendments, fight over. K. G. Crawford; S 283
    Amendments, support of; EP........ 515
    Decision; supreme court the greatest strike-breaker; I. F. Stone; S....... 346
    Onesided. I. F. Stone; S........... 500
    Proposed amendments, and attack on act; E 458
    Violation proposed as bar to national-defense contracts; EP............ 334
National recovery act, new; E........... 337
National youth administration, appointment of A. Williams as head; EP........... 3
Nazism. See Fascism and Nazism; Germany
Negroes; barring of M. Anderson in Washington; EP 251
  Scottsboro case; Governor Graves of Alabama changes his mind on release; EP 23
Nelson, Frank
  On Wordsworth's "Indignation of a high-minded Spaniard"; C............... 544
Nelson, John W.
  O'Connell, Jerry, defeat of; C......... 47
Neuberger, Richard L.
  Power dams and politics; S.........317; see also C.......................451, 543
Neutrality, American. F. Kirchwey; S...421; see also C.......................... 542
  Act:
    Amendment not probable; EP......... 658
    Amendments discussed. K. G. Crawford; S 423
    Bloom bill for revision; EP......... 685
    Bloom bill, opposition to; EP....... 714
    Hearings on; E......392; EP....... 453
    Pressure for revision; EP........... 515
    Proposals for changes. O. G. Villard; S 673
    Proposed amendment; EP............ 218
    Revision, hope for; EP.............. 630
  Showdown on; E..................... 548
Neville, Helen
  M. Williams' defense of the Catholic church; C.......160; see also........ 82
New college, Columbia university, closing; E 193
New deal. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
New England power and flood-control projects. S. Brown; C...451; see also 317, 543
New Jersey "gangster statute" held unconstitutional; EP 362
New year, hope for; E.................. 5
New York city; Hines conviction; EP...... 250
  Schools hit by economy; EP.......... 659
New York college teachers union versus Professor Childs; C...76; see also... 132
New York Post; named for honor roll. J. Weinstein; C 103
  Tied up by Stern with politicians. O. G. Villard; S 233
New York state
  Devany bill against civil rights; E...365; EP 483
  Devany bill signed by governor; EP..... 659
  Job insurance in peril; E...........110; see also C......................... 303
  Murder case; five condemned to death; EP 79
New York stock exchange; fraternization with SEC; Whitney case; EP........49; see also 55
  "Reform"; EP 334
New York Times
  Abend letters from China. H. Talbot; C 103
  Kluckhohn expulsion from Mexico; E... 109
  Philip correspondence from Paris; EP.. 513
  White, John W., dispatch on Lima conference; EP 21
New York world's fair. J. W. Krutch; S... 722
  Art. D. Haskell; S.................... 594
  "Days" and exhibits; EP.........546; see also C.......................... 682
  Freedom pavilion, death of. F. Kirchwey; S........485; L. Z. Hobson........ 492
  Panda, baby giant. F. Kirchwey; S..... 689
  Poem, contest for. M. Bullock; C....... 160
Newsboys under the wages and hours law; EP 455
Newspaper guild. See Newspapers
Newspapers
  Adless paper, coming. B. Garnett; S... 464
  American newspaper guild; Chicago editorial association, anti-guild, organized by Hearst; EP..................... 134
  And the NLRB. M. Bartlett; S........ 64
  Debasement. O. G. Villard; S......... 233
  Dies committee and the press; E...... 631
  Scripps-Howard newspapers. R. Bendiner and J. Wechsler; S.........553, 580; see also EP........................ 546
  See also names of newspapers
Niebuhr, Reinhold
  Munich agreement; C...187; see also... 173
  Peace and the liberal illusion; S...... 117
Nineteen hundred and thirty-nine, hope for; E 5
Nitcher, John
  Protection, tariff; C.................. 543
No time for comedy. J. W. Krutch; D..... 509
Norman, Montagu, visit to Berlin; EP..... 51
North American committee to aid Spanish democracy, the, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938....................... 27
North central states. A. Schaleben; S...... 690
Norway, in case of war. J. Joesten; S..... 719
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S......69; (see also 188)...................... 564
Notes from Paris, J. Stevens; C.......... 543
Noyes, Peter H.
  Giannini and the SEC; S.............. 638
Nugent, Frank S.
  Hollywood waves the flag; S........398; see also C......................... 543

O

O'Connell, Jerry; defeat, reasons for. J. W. Nelson; C 47
O'Day bill. See Deportation
Odets, Clifford, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
Oil; soviet, for Italy and Germany in next war; EP 219
  Trust, light on; E.................... 633
  See also Mexico
O'Keefe, Ruth E.
  Duty of Catholics; S..612; see also C.. 682
Old-age pensions; provisions in social security act liberalization; EP......... 657
  Social security, fight for. M. S. Stewart; S 201
One-third of a nation. F. Hoellering; MP... 213
Oppenheim family, the. F. Hoellering; MP.. 653
Outward bound. J. W. Krutch; D......... 44

P

Pacifism; means suicide. A. Kolnai; S....86; see also C......................... 248
  War as a last resort. A. Guérard; C.... 216
  See also Peace
Paine, Webber and company, suspension of partners; EP 390
Palestine
  Arab-Jewish conference in London; EP. 162
  British plan for "solution" of problem; EP............251; EP............. 574
  British white paper on proposal to repudiate Balfour declaration; E......... 604
  Impressions. J. E. C.; C.............. 247
  Need for a Gandhi. O. G. Villard; S... 647
Pan-American conference
  Ground gained at Lima for Pan-American solidarity; EP 2
  Nazi influence at Lima; EP........... 21
  What happened at Lima. H. Herring; S.........84; see also EP.......... 79
Panda, baby giant, at world's fair; F. Kirchwey; S 689
Paris, notes from. J. Stevens; C.......... 543
Patman bill. See Chain stores
Patriotism, true. S. Poladian; C.......... 104
Peace
  And the liberal illusion. R. Niebuhr; S.. 117
  Hollywood drive; EP.................. 164
  III. Munich rather than war. B. Russell; S.........173; see also......... 187
Pearl, Raymond, on smoking and health.... 215
Pearson, Dorothy
  American medical association and group health insurance; S................ 171
Pearson, Drew, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
Pecan workers aided by election of M. Maverick; EP 574
Pennsylvania; labor law changes; anti-union; EP 658
Pensions, old-age. See Old-age pensions
Perkins, Frances; statement on Bridges deportation case; E.................... 192
Peru, nazi influence; EP................ 21
Petroleum. See Oil
Philadelphia story, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 410
Philip, P. J.; correspondence from Paris; EP 513
Phillips, Randolph
  House of Morgan, first article; S...663; second 696
Philosophies, living. See Living philosophies
Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.
Physicians. See Medicine
Pins and needles. J. W. Krutch; D........ 509
Pius XI, death of; E.................... 194
Pius XII, election of. See Roman catholic church
Platkowsky, Elihu H.
  Jews, need for fighting libels; C....... 76
Plays. See Krutch, J. W., M. M., (for reviews); Theater, the Pocket guide. H. Woodward; S......35, 92, 150, 203 (correction, 266); 265, 376, 430 (see also C, 542, 543), 498, 559, 614, 671, 726
Poems
  "Come, sleep . . .". L. Bogan.......... 379
  Long-legged fly. W. B. Yeats.......... 436
  Statues, the W. B. Yeats.............. 437
Poetry; contest for official poem for New York world's fair. M. Bullock; C.... 160
Poladian, Sirvart
  True patriotism; C.................... 104
Poland
  Anti-German demonstrations; EP...... 250
  British support pledged; E............. 391
  Hesitation in entering anti-German pact; E 363
  Readiness for defense. A. Viton; S..... 551
  Resistance to Hitler, and French and British reaction; EP................ 513
Political activity, Sheppard committee report; EP 50
Pope. See Roman catholic church; Pius XI; Pius XII
Portner, Stuart
  Seeks biographical material relating to L. F. Post; C..................... 76
Post, Louis Freeland; biographical material sought. S. Portner; C............. 76
Post, New York. See New York Post
Power, fetishism of. S. Hook; S............ 562
Power and flood-control projects, New England. S. Brown; C.............451; see also 317, 543
Power and power industry; dams and politics. R. L. Neuberger; S.........317; see also C.......................451, 543
Pozner, Vladimir
  Pogroms for profit; S................ 33

Preparations for war. O. G. Villard; S.... 404
Presidential campaign of 1940
  Dewey campaign opens with conviction of Hines; EP.......... 250
  Garner harmed by canard about drinking. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 459
  Roosevelt foreign policy, and 1940. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 459
  Third term, pro and con arguments; EP. 714
Press, the. See Newspapers
Prices, fooling the consumer. H. Woodward; S.......... 614
Primrose path, the. J. W. Krutch; D...... 100
Profit-sharing and wages; EP.......... 713
Profits, industrial. K. Hutchison; S....... 587
Propaganda, nazi. M. Marshall; S........ 351
  Nazi and democratic. Low; Ct......... 225
Protection, tariff. See Tariff
Public finance. See Finance, public
Public health. See Medicine
Public utilities
  Memphis power and light, agreement to sell to city; EP.......... 218
  Private utilities in TVA area, supreme court decision on; EP.......... 133
  Spending not affected by threat of government competition; EP.......... 218
Publicity stunts. H. Woodward; S......... 265
Puche, Alvarez J.
  Thanks The Nation for ambulance; C... 160
Puerto Rico
  Appointment of Admiral Leahy as governor; EP.......... 573
  Bad economic condition; move for statehood or independence; EP........335; see also C.......... 598
  Conditions. O. G. Villard; S.......... 205
  S. O. S. By O. G. Villard; S.......... 728
Pump-priming to pumping. K. G. Crawford; S...........606; see also C......... 684
Puritan, the. F. Hoellering; MP.......... 357

Q

Quebec; fascist proceedings; EP.......... 163

R

Racism. See Italy
Radicals, open season on. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 519
  "Plot" as seen by General Johnson. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 718
  See also New York state (for Devany bill)
Radio; scripts wanted. Y. Martin; C...... 600
  Swing, R. G., broadcasts by. F. Kirchwey; S ....365, 394; see also C.......... 656
  Voices. M. Marshall; S.......... 564
Railroads; fares, round-trip, cut; EP....... 658
Raw materials. See Materials, raw
Records, phonograph. See Haggin, B. H.
Recovery, business. See Business
"Red totalitarianism." F. Kirchwey; S..605; see also 626, 710, 711, 712
"Reds." See Radicals
Refugees
  Alaska as a refuge. E. Greensfelder; C. 628
  Artist group theater. T. Lowe; C...... 76
  Children, admission to the United States; EP.......... 483
  Children, German, should be received in America; EP........80; EP........ 191
  Doctors; EP.......... 391
  Kennedy, ambassador, apathetic toward refugees; EP 136, 190, 191
  See also Jews
Relief, unemployment. See Unemployment relief
Remember Chicago. M. Marshall; S........ 643
Reorganization, government. See United States
Republic steel strike. M. Marshall; S...... 643
Republican party; Dewey, glamor man. McA. Coleman; S.......... 520
  National committee, "recovery" program; EP.......... 482
Reynolds, Senator, pro-nazi activities; EP... 335
Rhodes, persecution of Jews. T. H.; C.... 598
Rights, civil, See Civil rights
Right of assembly; E.......... 26
Robbins, Samuel
  Kernan, progressive veteran; C......... 47
Roberts, Floyd H., rejection by senate; EP.. 189
Roll of honor, The Nation's, for 1938....27; see also C.......... 103
Romains, Jules
  Living philosophy: Reason and experience; S.......... 584
Roman catholic church
  Attitude of The Nation condemned by M. Williams; C, with editorial reply 82; see also.......... 160
  Attitude toward fascism; E.......... 25
  Catholicism, best sort. E. R. Barrow; C.........682; see also.......... 612
  Censors birth-control exhibit at San Francisco fair; EP.......... 687
  Coughlin, father, and the church; E... 25
  Favors retention of arms embargo; EP. 105
  Duty of Catholics. R. E. O'Keefe; S 612; see also C.......... 682
  History. G. A. Borgese; S.........285; correction.......... 332
  Interest of hierarchy in Spanish rebel cause; EP.......... 51
  Pius XI, death; E.......... 194
  Pius XII and the axis. G. A. Borgese; S.........285; correction.......... 332
  Pope Pius XII, election of, and the outlook; EP.......... 279
  Pope, new, attempt of nazis to influence election; EP.......... 219
  Support of embargo on arms for loyalist Spain; EP......77; correction....... 188
  Vatican and fascism; peace impossible. A. Viton; S.......... 11
  Vatican opposition to British-French-Soviet pact; EP.......... 685
  Tablet's attack on Roosevelt; EP...... 107
Romer, Samuel
  Lift the embargo; C.......... 131
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  Administration:
    Accomplishments and failures. O. G. Villard; S.......... 322
    Appeasing business; E.......... 252
    Congress attack on New deal fails; E. 549
    Foreign policy, and 1940. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 459
    Foreign policy, Roosevelt indecision; E.......... 164
    Foreign policy "war plots" and politics. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 167
    Judiciary, appointments to; EP....... 189
    Leadership wobbling. O. G. Villard; S 151
    Message lauded by W. Lippmann and D. Thompson; EP.......... 80
    Message on challenge of fascism; EP. 51
    Message on finances; E.......... 51
    Message to congress. O. G. Villard; S 67
    New deal, Ameringer description. M. Marshall; S.......... 617
    New deal, new life. K. Hutchison; S.. 195
    New dealers in Washington depressed. O. G. Villard; S.......... 151
    No third term. O. G. Villard; S..... 702
    President and national defense. O. G. Villard; S.......... 178
    Third term argument, pro and con; EP.......... 714
    Third-term hysteria; E.......... 687
    "War scare" charge by Senator Taft. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 485
    Works progress administration. See Works progress administration
  "Good morning," interpretation of. G. S. Kaufman; S.......... 558
  Message to Hitler and Mussolini on peace. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 456
  Message, Hitler's reply; E.......... 516
  Message, and third-term talk. O. G. Villard; S.......... 561
  Nazi charges of complicity in murder of Huey Long; EP.......... 631
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938.. 27
  Peace monger. F. Kirchwey; S......... 456
  War, opinion on, as voiced in message to congress. O. G. Villard; S......... 67
  "War monger." Low; Ct.......... 525
Roosevelt family activities. O. G. Villard; S. 15
Rosenblum, Herbert
  Soviet foreign trade; C.......... 104
Rosenbaum, Ida A.
  Swing, R. G., broadcasts; C.......... 656
Rosselli brothers' murder, and propaganda. G. Salvemini; C.......... 738
Rublee, George, invited to Berlin; EP..... 2
Russell, Bertrand
  Munich rather than war; S.......173; see also.......... 187
Russell, Dean, defended by G. S. Counts; E. 193
Russo-Japanese relations; border incidents; EP.......... 189
  Provocations by Japan; E.......... 220
Rust, John and Mack, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938.......... 27

S

SEC. See Securities and exchange commission
Sales; bargain. H. Woodward; S.......... 35
  Spring. H. Woodward; S.......... 559
Salvadori, Max, and M. Cantarella
  Suicide of A. F. Formiggini; C......... 131
Salvemini, Gaetano
  Britain wins in Spain; S.......... 197
  Murder and propaganda in the deaths of the Rossellis; C.......... 738
San Francisco exposition. O. G. Villard; S.. 589
Sands manufacturing company decision. W. Galenson; C.....451; see also E..... 280
Sarfatti, Signora Margherita; impending visit to the United States; EP.......... 80
Scandinavian countries, in case of war. J. Josten; S.......... 719
  Reply to Hitler's non-aggression proposal; EP.......... 574
  View of the United States and the dictators. O. Kringen; C.......... 738
Schaleben, Arville
  North central states; S.......... 690
Schlamm, Willi
  Hitler foreign policy; winning loot without war; S.......... 525
Schmidt, Karl P.
  On review of Animals without backbones; C...........215; see also.......... 96
Schnabel, A., recital. B. H. Haggin; M..... 330
Scholars and artists—careful or cavalier? J. Hastings; C.......... 48
Schurz, Carl. O. G. Villard; S.......... 267
Science, nazi. M. Goran; S.......... 641
"Scientific humanism." J. Barzun; S....... 502
Scottsboro case. See Negroes
Scripps-Howard newspapers. R. Bendiner and J. Wechsler; S.............553, 580; see also EP.......... 546
Scripts, radio, wanted. Y. Martin; C....... 600
Scutellaro, Joseph; a study in relief. McA. Coleman; S.......... 119
  Conviction of manslaughter; EP........ 79
Securities and exchange act. See Stocks
Securities and exchange commission
  And the New York stock exchange, fraternization; EP....49; see also...... 55
  Appointment of A. Henderson; EP..... 482
  Appointments of Frank and Henderson; EP.......... 602
  Giannini and the SEC. By P. H. Noyes; S.......... 638
Security, social. See Social security
Seldes, George
  Finds fault with review of his "Lords of the Press" by O. G. Villard; C... 131
Set to music. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 157
Shanghai. See Chinese-Japanese war
Shaving cream business. H. Woodward; S 430; see also C..........542, 543
Shemin, H.
  Smoking and health; C, with editorial comment.......... 215
Sheppard committee; report on political activity; EP.......... 50
Silence on League of nations. Low; Ct..... 429
Sitdown strikes. See National labor relations board; Strikes
Smith, Francis G., junior
  Paris and Barcelona; C.......... 216
  Spaniards in exile; S.......... 556
Smith, Howard W., bill against radicals. K. G. Crawford; S.......... 519
Smoking and health. H. Shemin; C, with editorial comment.......... 215
Social security act
  Amendments, proposed; EP.......... 657
  Byrnes bill provisions; EP.......... 454
  Extension of coverage, opposition to; EP 334
  Fight for. M. S. Stewart; S.......... 201
  No full reserve to be set up; EP....... 362
Socialized medicine. See Medicine
Soule, Isobel Walker. See Fontaine. D.
South, the; farm labor, plight; Missouri demonstration; EP.......... 79
  Three towns; I., Tupelo, Mississippi; II., Huntsville, Alabama; III., Kingsport, Tennessee. W. Whitman; S...12, 31, [illegible]
South Africa speaks. E. A. M. McDonald; C 415
South America. See Latin America
Southern conference, for human welfare, the, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938.. 27
Southern tenant farmers' union, affiliation with C.I.O. union; EP........307; see also C.......... 479
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Spain
  Barcelona falls; E.......... 135
  Catalonia; writers in need. H. S. Canby; C.......... 48
  Catholic hierarchy, American, interest in rebel cause; EP.......... 51
  Children in concentration camps. E. G. Muggeridge; C.......... 416
  Collapse of loyalists in Catalonia; EP.. 161
  Coming events. Low; Ct.......... 30
  Conditions after Franco victory; EP... 514
  Critical situation of loyalists; EP...... 105
  Dissatisfaction behind Franco's lines; E. 3
  Drives, loyalist and rebel; EP......... 50
  Embargo, demand for lifting; EP...77; correction.......... 188
  Embargo; lifting—or else. S. Romer; C 131
  Embargo, must be lifted. D. J. Meserole; C.......... 47
  Embargo not lifted; EP.......... 105
  End of loyalist resistance in sight; EP 217, 278
  Fascism spreads; EP.......... 161
  Fascist aid to Franco revealed; E...... 688
  Food rationing and labor conscription decreed by Franco; EP.......... 601
  France and Great Britain fail; E...... 191
  France and Spain. F. G. Smith, junior; C 216
  Franco upheld in meeting in New York armory; E.......... 309
  Franco's "final" drive; E.......... 23
  French concentration camp for interned fighters. W. M.; C.......... 542
  Great Britain wins in Spain. G. Salvemini; S.......... 197
  Haste in recognizing Franco; EP...... 279

  "Indignation of a high-minded Spaniard," by Wordsworth." F. Nelson; C...... 544
  Loyalist cause in desperate straits; E... 81
  Loyalists menaced by Franco triumph; EP 306
  Madrid, surrender of, and threatened reprisals on loyalists; EP............ 362
  Massacre impending. O. G. Villard; S.. 378
  Nation, The, attitude praised. A. J. Colorado; C 215
  Nation, The, thanked for ambulance. J. Puche Alvarez; C................ 160
  Nervousness in Paris. A. Werth; S.... 168
  Organizations to help, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938............... 27
  "Peace" in. F. Kirchwey; S........... 393
  Persecution follows Franco victory; EP. 418
  Recognition of insurgents by France and Great Britain; EP.................. 249
  Refugees, treatment by France; EP.... 251
  Review by E. Wilson of E. Hemingway's books censured. Mrs. E. G. Clark, junior; C 76
  Spaniards in exile in France. F. G. Smith, junior; S.................... 556
  Struggle in Madrid; EP.......... 305; see also 310
  War goes on; E....................... 191
  War, thirty months of. L. Fischer; S.. 28
  Weddell, ambassador, greets Franco; EP 658
  "Will of a people, the," film; EP...... 252
Spector, Julius J.
  More Haggin wanted; C............... 104
Spring meeting. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 44
Spring sales. H. Woodward; S............ 559
Stabilization fund. See Finance, public
Stacey, C. P.
  Canada's loyalty; letter, with reply by D. Martin.......511; see also....... 288
Stagecoach. F. Hoellering; MP............. 301
Stars in your eyes. J. W. Krutch; D...... 244
States; barriers, economic; EP............ 106
  Restrictions on trade. K. Hutchison; S 402
  Rights; Vermont prefers floods; E..108; see also C........................ 132
Steel strike, Republic company, at Chicago. M. Marshall; S..................... 643
Stern, David. See New York Post
Sternberg, Fritz
  Russia's war strength; S............. 693
Stevens, John
  Notes from Paris; C.................. 543
Stewart, Maxwell S.
  Fight for social security, the; S........ 201
Stimson, Henry L., presents case for affirmative foreign policy; E............... 307
Stock exchange, New York. See New York stock exchange
Stocks
  Armament company, and the conscientious investor. K. Hutchison; S...... 645
  Market analysis, and "Dow theory." K. Hutchison; S 468
  Securities and exchange act, revisions proposed; EP 334
Stokes, Thomas L., work; EP............ 546
Stone, I. F.
  One-sided labor act; S............... 500
  Questions on the Whitney case; S....55; see also EP......................... 49
Stores, chain. See Chain stores
Strecker deportation case; E..........192; EP 454
  Delay in decision; EP................ 362
Strikebreaker, greatest (the supreme court). I. F. Stone; S.................. 346
Strikebreakers, racket; E................. 165
Strikebreaking, gangsterism of industrialists; EP 390
Strikes
  Sitdown; anti-trust laws invoked to impose fines on strikers; EP.......... 418
  Steel, Republic company, at Chicago. M. Marshall; S 643
  See also National labor relations board
Strout, Richard Lee
  Insurance octopus; S................. 255
Sturmthal, Adolf
  End of Hitler's money miracles; S..... 460
Sugar, corn and others. H. Woodward; S.... 559
Sun, Baltimore. See Baltimore Sun
Supreme court, United States
  Brandeis resignation; EP............. 189
  Brandeis, successor to, names mentioned; EP 277
  Decisions in state income-tax cases, and others; EP 362
  Douglas, W. O., nomination; EP...... 334
  Frankfurter appointment; E........... 52
  Reversion to reaction; decisions in labor cases; E ......280; see also C....... 451
  Strike-breaker, greatest. I. F. Stone; S 346
Survey Graphic, issue on "Calling America"; EP 135
Swastika science. M. Goran; S............ 641
Sweden, in case of war. J. Josten; S....... 719
Swing, Raymond Gram, broadcasts. F. Kirchwey; S.....365, 394; see also C..... 656
"Swing mikado, the". J. W. Krutch; D... 410
Syria and French rule, and persecution of the Jews of Rhodes. T. H.; C...... 598

T

T., H.
  Refugee children, without hope; C...... 359
TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
Tablet, Brooklyn, attack on Roosevelt; EP.. 107
Tabouis, Genevieve
  Franco-soviet pact; S 115
Taft, Senator Robert A., "war scare" charge against Roosevelt; S............... 485
Talbot, H.
  Japanese "order" in China; C......... 103
Talbott, E. Guy
  Cost of war; C...................... 598
Tampa, communist tactics in. M. E. Edson; C 711
Tariff; books, British, duties on. W. Foyle; C 248
  Protection. J. Nitcher; C............. 543
Tax, income. See Finance, public
Taxation. See Finance, public
Teachers; Devany bill to bar "enemies" of the government, EP............483; see also EP........................... 659
Teachers college and The Nation; E........ 193
Temporary national economic committee, educational project. K. G. Crawford; S... 606
  Hearings; EP 574
Tenement-law violators forbidden to raise rents, law upheld; EP............. 363
Tennessee valley authority
  Agreement with Commonwealth and Southern; EP 162
  Report on committee clears commission; EP 389
  Supreme court decision on local franchises; EP 133
  Three southern towns, by W. Whitman: I. Tupelo, Mississippi; II. Huntsville, Alabama; III. Kingsport, Tennessee; S 12, 31, 88
  Willkie, Wendell L.; agreement with TVA.; EP 162
  Willkie suggestions on his properties; EP 23
Theatre, the
  One-act play contest. American civil liberties union; C.................... 304
  Radical. C. R. Walker; S............ 730
  Refugee artist group. T. Lowe; C...... 76
  See also M., M.; Krutch, J. W. (for reviews)
Third term. See Roosevelt, F. D.—Administration
Thomas, Norman, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938 27
Thompson, Dorothy, lauds Roosevelt message; EP 80
  On The Nation's honor roll for 1938..... 27
Three smart girls grow up. F. Hoellering; MP 478
Three southern towns. See South, the Tientsin. See Chinese-Japanese war
Times, New York. See New York Times
Toller, Ernst, suicide; EP................ 603
Tolnai, B. B.
  Abortions and the law; S............ 424
"Totalitarianism, red." F. Kirchwey; E..605; see also 626, 710, 711, 712
Townsend plan rejected by congress; EP.... 657
Trade among the states, restrictions on. K. Hutchison; S 402
Trade winds. F. Hoellering; MP........... 102
Trade with Latin America; E...........254; See also 260
Trailers without wheels. B. Gilman; S..... 488
Tschuppik, Walter, in hands of the nazis; EP 715
Tupelo, Mississippi, "the TVA city." W. Whitman; S 12

U

USSR. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Ukrainia, greater. E. Wiskemann; S....224; correction 388
Unemployment, British, and taxation. K. Hutchison; S 530
Unemployment insurance, in peril in New York state; E..................110; see also C........................... 303
Unemployment relief
  Bill, new; E........................ 716
  Byrnes bill provisions; EP........... 454
  Curtailment, movement for; EP........ 50
  Cut threatened by proposed reduction in administrative expenses; EP........ 455
  Scutellaro case, New Jersey; EP...... 79
  Study in relief; the Scutellaro case. McA. Coleman; S.................. 119
Union of soviet socialist republics
  And Germany, in the north. J. Joesten; S 719
  Considers British bid for three-power alliance; EP 629
  Fisheries agreement with Japan; EP... 390
  Foreign trade. H. Rosenblum; C....... 104
  Pact with France. G. Tabouis; S...... 115
  Rediscovery as European power; E..... 364
  Terms for alliance with Great Britain and France; E....................... 659
  Third five-year plan; EP.............. 163
  Trade agreement with Germany, negotiations; EP 219
  Trade agreement with Italy; EP........ 219
  War strength. F. Sternberg; S......... 693
Union Pacific. F. Hoellering; MP......... 653
United automobile workers of America
  Cleveland convention results; EP...... 419
  Martin, H., accusation against; EP.... 107
  Martin, H., decline of; E............. 166
United cannery, agricultural, packing and allied workers of America, and the CIO. Letter by J. Brophy; C..........479; see also EP......................... 307
United States
  And Europe, speech by P. F. LaFollette. R. Dell; S.......................... 487
  And Germany: Ickes views on nazis upheld by state department; EP........ 1
  And the dictators; a Scandinavian view. O. Kringen; C..................... 738
  Economic defense against dictators; E.. 518
  Foreign policy; case against isolation; E 307
  Foreign policy, Roosevelt indecision; E. 164
  Foreign policy; opposition to Hitler. F. Kirchwey; S 337
  Government reorganization plan; EP.... 514
  In the post-Munich world; articles by E. Janeway:
    I. Power to resist fascism........212; see also EP.................... 107
    II. America arms its rivals.......... 139
    III. Alternative to war..........260; see also E.......................... 254
    IV. Mobilize for democracy; S...... 314
  Neutrality. See Neutrality
  State barriers, tendency toward; EP... 106
  States' rights; Vermont prefers floods; E..........108; see also C............ 132
  Taxation, and British, and unemployment. K. Hutchison; S.............. 530
  This is America:
    I. Middle west drifts to the right. W. L. White; S..............635; see also EP........................ 631
    II. The north central states. A. Schaleben; S 690
  Trade and credit agreement with Brazil; EP 306
United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States

V

Vallance, Aylmer
  Bewildered Britain; S................. 141
  British foreign policy; the grand illusion; S 396
  Conscription, British; S.............. 578
Vaporizers, dangerous. H. Woodward; S.... 430
Vatican. See Roman catholic church
Vermont prefers floods; E..............108; see also C.......................... 132
Versailles, treaty of. See World war
Villard, Mariquita
  Death of D. C. Morgan, and memorial fund; C 512
Villard, Oswald Garrison
  His review of "Lords of the Press," by G. Seldes, is criticized by Seldes; C...131; defended by Mr. Villard.... 233
  Issues and men:
    Conscription, and Canadian objections; S 432
    Coolidge, Calvin; S.................. 122
    Economic measures against Hitler; S 350
    Frankfurter, Murphy and Hopkins appointments; S 94
    German activity; S.................. 322
    German horrors, no silence on! S.. . 37
    German moral disintegration under nazism; S 532
    Germany; civil disobedience urged; S 647
    Golden Gate exposition; S............ 589
    Jews, charges against; S............ 470
    Keeping out of war is possible; S..... 501
    Neutrality act proposals; S.......... 673
    New deal accomplishments and failures; S 322
    New dealers in Washington depressed; S 151
    "New western front," by S. Chase; S. 295
    No third term; S.................... 702
    Palestine needs a Gandhi; S......... 647
    Preparations for war; S............. 404
    Puerto Rico; S...................... 205
    Puerto Rico S.O.S.; S............... 728
    Roosevelt and national defense; S... 178
    Roosevelt family activities; S........ 15
    Roosevelt message to Hitler and Mussolini and third-term talk; S......... 561
    Roosevelt message to congress; S...... 67
    Schurz, Carl; S..................... 267
    Spain, massacre impending; S....... 378
    Stern, D., and the New York Post; S 233
    Visit of King George and Queen to Canada, and support of Great Britain in case of war; S............. 616
  War under no circumstances; reply to A. Guérard; C....................... 216

Virgin islands, appointment of R. M. Lovett as secretary. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 550
Viton, Albert
  Balkans, doomed? S.................... 340
  Italy under Hitler; S................ 7
  Poland's readiness for defense; S...... 551
Vladeck, B. Charney, on The Nation's honor roll for 1938........................ 27

W

WPA. See Works progress administration
Wages. See Labor
Wagner act. See National labor relations board
Wagner bill. See Housing
Wagner public-health bill. See Medicine
Walker, Charles R.
  Theater on the left; S................ 730
Wall street. See Stocks
Walsh, Frank P., death; EP............... 547
Wang Ching-wei. See China
War
  As a last resort. A. Guérard; C........ 216
  Cost of. E. G. Talbott; C............. 598
  Financial difficulties in the United States; EP 453
  Keeping out is possible. O. G. Villard; S 501
  Measures short of use of force; E...... 483
  Must democracy use force?
   I. Pacifism means suicide. A. Kolnai; S.........86; see also C......... 248
   II. Peace and the liberal illusion. R. Niebuhr; S 117
   III. Munich rather than war. B. Russell; S ....173; see also....... 187
  "Plots" and politics. K. G. Crawford; S 167
  Preparations for. O. G. Villard; S..... 404
  Raw-material supplies; EP............. 454
  Roosevelt opinion on. O. G. Villard; S.. 67
  Under no circumstances. O. G. Villard; reply to A. Guérard; C............... 216
  War-time income tax proposed in Bone bill; EP 362
Washington letters..........6, 167, 195, 255, 283, 339, 395, 423, 459, 519, 606 (see also C 684); 662, 718
Wealth, public. See Finance, public
Wechsler, James, article on Teachers College; E 193
Wechsler, James, and R. Bendiner
  Scripps-Howard newspapers; S.....553; 580; see also EP.................... 546
Weddell, ambassador, greets Franco; EP.... 658
Weinstein, J.
  Names the New York Post for honor roll; C 103
Werth, Alexander
  Dope for French nerves; S............ 168
West. Rebecca
  Living philosophy: Pleasure be your guide; S 229
White, John W. See New York Times
White, Marjorie
  "Woman's library," lost; C........... 388
White, William L.
  Middle west drifts to the right; C.. 635; see also EP......................... 631
"White goods" sales. H. Woodward; S...... 35
White steed, the. J. W. Krutch; D....... 100
Whitman, Willson
  Housing at Kingsport, Tennessee; C.........656; see also............ 387
  Kingsport: They planned it; S......... 88
  Three southern towns. I. Tupelo, Mississippi; II. Huntsville, Alabama; III. Kingsport, Tennessee; S........12, 31, 88
Whitney case, questions on. I. F. Stone; S.........55; see also EP.......... 49
"Will of the people, the," Spanish war film; EP 252
Williams, Aubrey, appointment as head of National youth administration; EP... 3
Williams, Michael
  Condemns attitude of The Nation toward the Catholic church; C, with editorial reply..........82; see also.......... 160
Willkie, Wendell L. See Tennessee valley authority
Wilson, Edmund, review of books by E. Hemingway censured; C............. 76
Winchell, Walter; difference with, over ambassador Kennedy; EP..135; EP..190, 191
Winship, Governor. O. G. Villard; S...... 205
Wise, Raymond L.
  Bill of rights still needed; S.......... 291
Wiskemann, Elizabeth
  "Greater Ukrainia"; S............224; correction 388
Wolfe, Henry C.
  Baltic, vulnerable; S.................. 607
"Woman's library lost"; information sought. M. White; C.......................... 388
Woodward, Helen
  Advertising, false, curb of; S......... 671
  Automobile, self-advertising; S......... 614
  Automobiles, buying and selling; S.... 376
  Breakfast food prices; S............... 614
  Canned goods labels in the United States and in Canada; S...................... 614
  Censorship of advertising; S.......203; correction......266; see also C...332, 359
  Consumers' organizations; S......203; correction.....266; see also C.....332, 359
  Consumers' conferences; the Consumers' union and A. Lane; H. Woodward; S. 726
  Cooperative hospital-insurance; S....... 430
  Cooperatives not dealing with nazis; S... 430
  Drugs for headaches, dangerous; S..... 376
  Face creams and cosmetics; S.......... 614
  Fish, rotten; S........................ 376
  Gelatin and muscles; S................ 376
  Hats, ashcan; S....................... 430
  Marmola; S 559
  Milk, grade A and others; S.......... 614
  Pocket guide; S................35, 92, 150, 203 (correction, 266; see also C, 332, C, 359); 265, 376, 430 (see also C, 542, 543); 498, 559, 614, 671, 726
  Publicity stunts; S.................... 265
  Shaving cream; S.................430; see also C......................542, 543
  Spring sales; S........................ 559
  Sugar, corn and others; S............ 559
  Vaporizers, dangerous; S.............. 430
Woodward, William E., on review of his "Lafayette"; C.................388; see also ....
Wordsworth, William, "Indignation of a high-minded Spaniard." F. Nelson; C..... 544
Works progress administration
  Appointment of F. C. Harrington as head; EP 3
  Appropriation:
   Congress reduces appropriation; E... 81
  Cut threatened, with dropping of workers; EP 389, 417
   Cut upheld by senate; EP............ 133
   President and congress at odds; E.... 51
   Roosevelt request for more money; EP 190
  Art projects; EP...................... 602
  Attack on; Sheppard committee report used; EP 50
  Changes in act proposed by reactionaries; EP 657
  Fingerprinting workers. W. Levner; C... 103
  Howard, R., opposition; EP......546; see also 553, 580
  Investigation; EP 417, 686
  Jokes, objection to. M. Marshall; S..351; see also 656
  Or the dole. R. S. Allen; S........... 111
World war; Versailles treaty, ghost of. A. Kolnai; S 427
World's fairs. See New York world's fair; San Francisco exposition
Wuthering heights. F. Hoellering; MP..... 478

Y

Year, new, hope for; E..................... 5
Yeats, William Butler
  Long-legged fly; P.................... 437
  Statues, the; P....................... 436
Yeats, William Butler; death; EP........ 135
  Cutting of an agate. L. Bogan; S...... 234
Yugoslavia; gets closer to fascist bloc; EP.. 106
  Politics and international relations; EP. 162
Yutang, Lin
  Living philosophy: Faith of a cynic; S.. 526

Z

Zworykin, Vladimir K. on The Nation's honor roll for 1938........................ 27

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Adams, Mildred; R........................ 98
Adventures of a young man. J. Dos Passos; B 648
Adventures of America, 1857-1900. J. A. Kouwenhoven; B 69
Age of reform, the, 1815-1870. E. L. Woodward; B 208
Age of the fish, the. O. von Horvath; B.... 537
All this, and heaven too. R. Field; AN.... 41
America in midpassage. C. A. and M. R. Beard; B 674
America—look at Spain. M. K. Hart; B... 677
American jazz music. W. Hobson; B...... 653
American labor. H. Harris; B............ 155
American medicine mobilizes. J. Rorty; B.. 622
American saga. M. B. Greenbie; B........ 408
Animals without backbones. R. Buchsbaum; B ....96; see also C.......... 215
Antonius, George
  Arab awakening, the: The story of the Arab national movement; B......... 239
Apostles of revolution. N. Nomad; B....... 270
Arab awakening, the: The story of the Arab national movement. G. Antonius; B... 239
Aragon, Louis
  Residential quarter; B................ 99
Armstrong, Hamilton Fish
  When there is no peace; B............ 268
Arnold, Matthew, biography. L. Trilling; B. 297
Art of Cézanne, the. A. C. Barnes and V. de Mazia; B........................... 240
Aubry, Octave
  Napoleon: Soldier and emperor. A. Livingston, translator; B............... 41
Auden, W. H.; R.......................... 352
Autobiography of a German rebel, the. T. Sender; B 568
Autobiography of William Butler Yeats; B. 153
Autobiography with letters. W. L. Phelps; B. 474

B

Bach, Julian, junior; R..................... 620
Baker, Ray Stannard
  Woodrow Wilson: Life and letters. Volume VII; R........................ 405
Barnes, Albert C., and V. de Mazia
  Art of Cézanne, the; B............... 240
Barnes, Harry Elmer, and H. Becker
  Social thought from lore to science. With the assistance of E. Benoit-Smullyan and others; B...................... 70
Barzun, Jacques; R........................ 16
Bates, Ralph
  Sirocco, and other stories; B........... 235
Beard, Charles A., and Mary R.
  America in midpassage; B............. 674
Beatty, Richmond Croom
  Lord Macaulay: Victorian liberal; B...... 179
Becker, Howard, and H. E. Barnes
  Social thought from lore to science. With the assistance of E. Benoit-Smullyan and others; B...................... 70
Béhaine, René
  Survivors, the; AN.................. 43
Behind the label. M. Dana; B............. 17
Belitt, Ben
  Five-fold mesh, the; B................ 156
Ben-Shalom, Avraham
  Deep furrows. F. Burnce, translator; B 72
Berlioz. J. H. Elliot; B.................. 210
Bernanos, Georges
  Diary of my times, a; B............. 98
Bernstein, Philip S.; R.................... 72
Bertram, James
  Unconquered; B 237
Betrayal in central Europe. G. E. R. Gedye; B 324
Beware of pity. S. Zweig. Translated by P. and T. Blewitt; B................ 381
Binns, Archie
  Land is bright, the; AN................ 409
Bisson, T. A.; R......................237, 703
Bitter creek. J. Boyd; B.................. 650
Blair, John
  Seeds of destruction; B................. 124
Blair, John M.; R.......................... 536
Block, Anita
  Changing world in plays and theater, the; B 590
Block, Harry; R.......................... 180
Bogan, Louise; R...............38, 123, 504, 533
Book of miracles, a. B. Hecht; B.......... 733
Boult, Norah; R.......................... 538
Boveri, Marget
  Mediterranean cross-currents. L. M. Sieveking, translator; B.................. 354
Bowen, Elizabeth
  Death of the heart, the; B............ 123
Boyd, James
  Bitter creek; B....................... 650
Boyd, Madeleine
  Life makes advances; AN.............. 276
Brandeis way, the. A. T. Mason; B........ 592
Bridegroom cometh, the. W. Frank; B..... 590
Brindenbaugh, Carl
  Cities in the wilderness: The first century of urban life in America, 1625-1742; B 535
Briffault, Robert
  Decline and fall of the British empire, the; B 40
Brindze, Ruth
  Johnny get your money's worth; B.... 17
Brontës, biography. W. B. White; B....... 299
Brooks, Robert R. R.
  Unions of their own choosing; B...... 183
Brooks, Robert R. R.; R..............383, 734
Brown, Sterling
  Negro, the, in American fiction; B...... 296
  Negro poetry and drama; B............ 296
Buchsbaum, Ralph
  Animals without backbones; B.......96; see also C......................... 215
Buck, Pearl S.
  Patriot, the; B....................... 269
Buell, Raymond Leslie
  Poland: Key to Europe; B............ 731

C

Caldwell, Erskine
  North of the Danube; B........ 405
Campbell, E. G.
  Reorganization of the American railroad system. 1893-1900; B........ 19
Canfield, Dorothy
  Seasoned timber; B........ 272
Capitalism in crisis. J. H. Rogers; B........ 180
Captains and the kings depart, the: Journals and letters of Reginald, Viscount Esher; B........ 154
Carnival, the. F. Prokosch; AN........ 127
Cézanne, art of. A. C. Barnes and V. de Mazia; B........ 240
Chamberlain, John; R........ 566
Chamberlain, Neville; two books on; B........ 241
Chamberlain tradition, the. Sir C. Petrie; B. 241
Chambers, E. K.
  Samuel Taylor Coleridge: A biographical study; B........ 705
Changing New York. Photographs by B. Abbott; explanatory text by E. McCausland; B........ 506
Changing world in plays and theater, the. A. Block; B........ 590
Chase, Stuart
  New western front, the; B........ 295
Children of Guernica, the. H. Kesten; B... 505
China, three books on; B........ 237
Church, Albert Cook
  Whale ships and whaling; B........ 96
Cities in the wilderness: The first century of urban life in America, 1625-1742. C. Bridenbaugh; B........ 535
Clark, Mrs. Edward G., junior, censures Wilson review of books by Hemingway; C 76
Clark, Eunice; R........ 300
Colcord, Joanna
  Songs of American sailormen; B........ 96
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor: A biographical study. E. K. Chambers; B........ 705
Collingwood, R. G.
  Principles of art, the; B........98; see also........ 187
Conrad, Sherman; R........ 651
Consumers' cooperation in Great Britain; B.. 150
Coolidge, Calvin, biography, by W. A. White; B........ 122
Coon, Horace
  Money to burn; B........ 126
Cooperatives, two books on........ 150
Cooperatives in America. E. Cowling; B.... 150
Cornell, Katherine
  I want to be an actress; B........ 537
Cowboy songs and other frontier ballads. Collected by J. A. Lomax and A. Lomax; B........ 96
Cowling, Ellis
  Cooperatives in America; B........ 150
Culture. E. Pound; B........ 504
Curtiss, Mina; R........384, 507, 537

D

Dana, Margaret
  Behind the label; B........ 17
Daniels, Jonathan; R........ 438
Darby, Hugh H.; R........96; (see also C, 215)........593, 622
da Vinci, Leonardo
  Notebooks; B........ 446
Davis, Hassoldt; R........39, 269, 650
Davis, Michael M.; R........ 124
Dead Ned. J. Masefield; AN........ 43
Dean, Vera Micheles
  Europe in retreat; B........ 324
Death of a Yale man. M. Ross; B........ 471
Death of the heart, the. E. Bowen; B........ 123
Decline and fall of the British empire, the. R. Briffault; B........ 40
Deep furrows. A. Ben-Shalom. Translated by F. Burnce; B........ 72
Dell, Robert; R........441, 474
de Mazia, Violette, and A. C. Barnes
  Art of Cézanne, the; B........ 240
Democracy and socialism. A. Rosenberg; B. 648
Democracy works. A. G. Hays; B........ 566
Denby, Elizabeth
  Europe rehoused; AN........ 41
Deutsch, Babette; R........210, 618
Diary of my times, a. G. Bernanos; B........ 98
Diego Rivera, his life and times. B. D. Wolfe; B........ 504
Doctor Addams. I. Fineman; B........ 324
Doctor for the people, a. M. A. Shadid, M.D.; B........ 535
Dodd, Martha
  Through embassy eyes; B........ 298
Dodd, Paul A., and E. F. Penrose
  Economic aspects of medical services, with special reference to conditions in California; B........ 622
Dos Passos, John
  Adventures of a young man; B........ 648
Douglas, Paul
  Social security in the United States; B. 383
Douglas, Paul H.; R........ 20
Dragon wakes, the. E. A. Mowrer; B........ 237
Drury, Horace B., and E. G. Nourse
  Industrial price policies and economic progress; B........ 180
du Gard, Roger Martin
  Thibaults, the; B........ 380

E

East of Eden. I. J. Singer. Translated by M. Samuel; B....326; see also C.... 512
Economic aspects of medical services, with special reference to conditions in California. P. A. Dodd and E. F. Penrose; B........ 622
Economic problems in a changing world. W. L. Thorp and others; B........ 536
Edman, Irwin; R........ 591
Eliot, George Fielding
  Ramparts we watch, the; B........ 95
Eliot, T. S.
  Family reunion, the; B........676; price correction........ 709
Elliot, J. H.
  Berlioz; B........ 210
England's years of danger. P. Frischauer; B. 41
Epstein, Abraham
  Insecurity. Second revised edition; B.. 20
Escape to life. K. and E. Mann; B........ 619
Esher, Reginald, Viscount
  Captains and the kings depart, the: Journals and letters; B........ 154
Europe in retreat. V. M. Dean; B........ 324
Europe on the eve. F. L. Schuman; B........ 441
Europe rehoused. E. Denby; AN........ 41
Experience and prediction. An analysis of the foundations and the structure of knowledge. H. Reichenbach; B........ 40
Ezekiel, Mordecai
  Jobs for all; B....407; see also C..... 544

F

F. O. B. Detroit. W. Smitter; B........ 18
Fallada, Hans
  Wolf among the wolves; B........ 97
Family reunion, the. T. S. Eliot; B.....676; price correction........ 709
Fante, John
  Wait until spring, Bandini; B........ 72
Farewell the banner. F. Winwar; B........ 18
Faulkner, William
  Wild palms, the; B........ 153
Feller, Alexander, and J. E. Hurwitz
  How to deal with organized labor; B.... 734
Field, Rachel
  All this, and heaven too; AN........ 41
Fifth column and the first forty-nine stories. E. Hemingway; criticism by E. Wilson censured. Mrs. E. G. Clark, junior; C 76
Fighting years. O. G. Villard; B........ 437
Fineman, Irving
  Doctor Addams; B........ 324
Finnegans wake. J. Joyce; B........ 533
Five-fold mesh, the. B. Belitt; B........ 156
Forever wilt thou love. L. Lewisohn; B........ 538
Forgotten peace, the. Brest-Litovsk, March, 1918. J. W. Wheeler-Bennett; B........ 273
Frank, Waldo
  Bridegroom cometh, the; B........ 590
Frischauer, Paul
  England's years of danger; B........ 41
Frost, Frances
  Yoke of stars; B........ 242
Frost flowers. H. Hull; B........ 242
Fuchs, Martin
  Showdown in Vienna; B........ 446

G

Gandhi triumphant! The inside story of the historic fast. H. T. Muzumdar; B........ 617
Gedye, G. E. R.
  Betrayal in central Europe; B........ 324
Geismar, Maxwell; R........299, 381, 474
George Santayana. G. W. Howgate; B........ 591
Gilbert, Mort and E. A.
  Life insurance: Investing in disaster; B 592
Giono, Jean
  Harvest. H. Fluchère and G. Myers, translators; B........ 652
Gladstone and the Irish nation. J. L. Hammond; B........ 208
God's valley—People and power along the Tennessee river. W. Whitman; B.... 438
Good home with nice people, a. J. Lawrence; B........ 182
Goodbye to Berlin. C. Isherwood; B........ 473
Goodman, Benny, and I. Kolodin
  Kingdom of swing, the; B........ 653
Gorki, Maxim
  Short stories. Edited by A. Yarmolinsky and Baroness M. Budberg; B........ 704
Grapes of wrath, the. J. Steinbeck; B........ 440
Greenbie, Marjorie Barston
  American saga; B........ 408
Greenman, Russell L.
  Worker, the foreman, and the Wagner act, the. A. Feller and J. E. Hurwitz; B........ 734
Gregory, Horace; R........ 153
Griffin, Jonathan; R........618, 731
Grzesinski, Albert C.
  Inside Germany; B........ 707
Guérard, Albert; R........242; (see also C, 388)........ 380
Gunther, John
  Inside Asia; B........ 703

H

Haggin, B. H.
  Music on records; B........ 16
Haggin, B. H.; R........539, 653
Haiti, two books on; B........ 385
Haldane, J. B. S.
  Marxist philosophy, the, and the sciences; B........ 448
Hale, William Harlan
  Hannibal Hooker; B........ 300
Hammond, J. L.
  Gladstone and the Irish nation; B........ 208
Hannes Schneider ski technique, the. B. Rybizka; AN........ 276
Hannibal Hooker. W. H. Hale; B........ 300
Harris, Bernice Kelly
  Purslane; B........ 650
Harris, Herbert
  American labor; B........ 155
Hart, Liddell
  Through the fog of war; AN........ 276
Hart, Merwin K.
  America—look at Spain; B........ 677
Harvest. J. Giono. Translated by H. Fluchère and G. Myers; B........ 652
Haskell, Douglas; R........ 506
Hawk among the sparrows. D. Hawkins; AN 680
Hawkins, Desmond
  Hawk among the sparrows; AN........ 680
Haynes, George H.
  Senate of the United States, the; B.... 384
Hays, Arthur Garfield
  Democracy works; B........ 566
Health insurance with medical care: The British experience. D. W. Orr and J. W. Orr; B........ 124
Hecht, Ben
  Book of miracles, a; B........ 733
Heiden, Konrad
  New inquisition, the. Introduction by H. W. Van Loon; B........ 567
Hemingway, Ernest; review by E. Wilson of his books censured. Mrs. E. G. Clark, junior; C........ 76
Herbst, Josephine
  Rope of gold; B........ 272
Here comes a candle. S. Jameson; B........ 275
Herskovits, Melville J.; R........ 385
Hertz, Emanuel; R........ 181
Hindus, Maurice
  We shall live again; B........ 620
History of American graphic humor. W. Murrell; B.......69; see also........ 188
History of Mexico, a. H. B. Parkes; B........ 180
Hitler, Adolf
  Mein kampf; B........ 322
Hobbs, William H.; R........ 568
Hobson, Wilder
  American jazz music; B........ 653
Hodgson, Stuart
  Man who made the peace, the: Neville Chamberlain; B........ 241
Hoellering, Franz; R........270, 324, 446, 567
Hollis, E. V.
  Philanthropic foundations and higher education; B........ 16
Hook, Sidney; R........40, 562
Horvath, Odon von
  Age of the fish, the; B........ 537
Hoult, Norah; R........18, 71, 275
How to deal with organized labor. A. Feller and J. E. Hurwitz; B........ 734
Howgate, George W.
  George Santayana; B........ 591
Hull, Helen
  Forest flowers; B........ 242
Huntsman, what quarry? E. St. V. Millay; B 618
Hurston, Zora Neale
  Tell my horse; B........ 385
Hurwitz, Jacob E., and A. Feller
  How to deal with organized labor; B... 734
Hutchison, Keith; R.......95, 180, 268, 382, 471
Hutton, Graham
  Survey after Munich; B........ 268

I

I wanted to be an actress. K. Cornell; B.... 537
In dreams begin responsibilities. D. Schwartz; B........ 353
Industrial price policies and economic progress. E. G. Nourse and H. B. Drury; B........ 180
Insecurity; Second revised edition. A. Epstein; B........ 20
Inside Asia. J. Gunther; B........ 703
Inside Germany. A. C. Grzesinski; B........ 706
Inside red China. N. Wales; B........ 237
Isherwood, Christopher
  Goodbye to Berlin; B........ 473

J

Jameson, Storm
  Here comes a candle; B........ 275
Janeway, Eliot; R........19, 407; (see also C, 544)
Jazz, three books on; B........ 653
Jazz: Hot and hybrid. W. Sargeant; B........ 653
Jeffers, Robinson
  Selected poetry; B........ 651
Jobs for all. M. Ezekiel; B........407; see also C........ 544

Joesten, Joachim
  Rats in the larder; B 382
Johnny get your money's worth. R. Brindze; B 17
Johnston, Myrtle
  Rising, the; AN 680
Joyce, James
  Finnegans wake; B 533

K

Kane, John Autobiography; Sky hooks; B 125
Kesten, Herman
  Children of Guernica, the; B 505
Kingdom of swing, the. B. Goodman and I. Kolodin; B 653
Klapper, Paul; R 71
Kohn, Hans; R 208, 405
Kolodin, Irving, and B. Goodman
  Kingdom of swing, the; B 653
Kouwenhoven, John A.
  Adventures of America, 1857-1900; B... 69
Kramer, Horace
  Marginal land; AN 409
Kranz, Henry B.; R 354
Krause, Herbert
  Wind without rain; B 208
Kronenberger, Louis; R 179, 235, 440, 648

L

Lafayette, W. E. Woodward; B...... 242; (see also C, 388)
Land is bright, the. A. Binns; AN 409
Lanham, Edwin
  Stricklands, the; B 355
Laski, Harold J.; R 16, 124, 384
Lawrence, Josephine
  Good home with nice people, a; B..... 182
Lerner, Max; R 70
Letters of Mozart and his family, the; B.... 540
Lewisohn, Ludwig
  Forever wilt thou love; B 538
Libaire, George; R 41
Life insurance: Investing in disaster. M. and E. A. Gilbert; B 592
Like makes advances. M. Boyd; AN 276
Lindeman, Eduard C.; R 126
Lloyd George, David
  Memoirs of the peace conference; B.... 405
Loewenstein, Karl; R 706
Long, Dwight
  Seven seas on a shoestring; B 593
Lord Macaulay: Victorian liberal. R. C. Beatty; B 179
Lords of the press. G. Seldes; B .... 39; see also 131, 233
Lovett, Robert Morss; R 153, 297, 437, 674
Lumkin, Grace
  Wedding, the; B 301

M

Macaulay, Lord, biography. R. C. Beatty; B. 179
Mack, Gerstle; R 472
Mahan. Captain W. D. Puleston, United States navy; B 618
Man who killed Lincoln, the. P. Van D. Stern; B 181
Man who made the peace, the: Neville Chamberlain. S. Hodgson; B 241
Mann, Erika; R 298, 379
Mann, Klaus; R 473, 505
Mann, Klaus and Erika
  Escape to life; B 619
Marginal land. H. Kramer; AN 409
Marquand, John P.
  Wickford Point; B 384
Marshall, Margaret; R .... 69; (see also 188); 296, 405, 564, 617
Marxist philosophy, the, and the sciences. J. B. S. Haldane; B 448
Masefield, John
  Dead Ned; AN 43
Mason, Alpheus Thomas
  Brandeis way, the; B 592
Matthew Arnold. L. Trilling; B 297
Medicine, socialized, two books on; B...... 622
Mein kampf. A. Hitler; B 323
Mediterranean cross-currents. M. Boveri. Translated by L. M. Sieveking; B.... 354
Mediterranean in politics, the. E. Monroe; B 354
Mellquist, Jerome; R 125, 736
Memoirs of the peace conference. D. Lloyd George; B 405
Men must act. L. Mumford; B 206
Meriam, Lewis, and L. F. Schmeckebier
  Reorganization of the national government. What does it involve? B...... 620
Millay, Edna St. Vincent
  Huntsman, what quarry? B 618
Miracle of Haworth, the. A Brontë study. W. B. White; B 299
Mizener, Arthur; R 471
Money to burn. H. Coon; B 126
Monroe, Elizabeth
  Mediterranean in politics, the; B...... 354
Morton, A. L.
  People's history of England, a; B...... 125
Mosca, Gaetana
  Ruling classes, the; B 562
Mowrer, Edgar Ansel
  Dragon wakes, the; B 237
Mozart and his family, letters of. B. H. Haggin; B 539
Muhlen, Norbert
  Schacht: Hitler's magician; B 471
Mumford, Lewis
  Men must eat; B 206
Murrell, William
  History of American graphic humor; B .... 69; see also 188
Music on records. B. H. Haggin; B 16
Muzumdar, Haridas T.
  Gandhi triumphant! The inside story of the historic fast; B 617
My life and history. B. Szeps; B 356
My memoir. E. B. Wilson; B 442

N

Nagel, Ernest; R 448
Napoleon, two books on; B 41
Napoleon: Soldier and emperor. O. Aubry. Translated by A. Livingston; B..... 41
Negro in American fiction, the. S. Brown; B 296
Negro poetry and drama. S. Brown; B...... 296
Neuberger, Richard
  Our promised land; B 678
New inquisition, the. K. Heiden. Introduction by H. W. Van Loon; B 567
New western front, the. S. Chase; B...... 295
New writing. New series. Fall, 1938. Edited by John Lehmann; B 71
Night rider. R. P. Warren; B 507
Nomad, Max
  Apostles of revolution; B 270
North of the Danube. E. Caldwell; B....... 405
Norton, M. D. Herter
  Translations from the poetry of Rainer Maria Rilke; B 182
Notebooks of Leonardo da Vinci; B 446
Nourse, Edwin G., and H. B. Drury
  Industrial price policies and economic progress; B 180
Noyes, Alfred
  Voltaire; B 352

O

O'Brien, Justin; R 99, 652
O'Connell, Jerry; R 678
O'Faoláin, Seán
  Silver branch, the; AN 128
Old century, the. And seven more years. S. Sassoon; AN 127
Orr, Douglass W., and Jean Walker Orr
  Health insurance with medical care: The British experience; B 124
Our battle. H. W. Van Loon; B 71
Our promised land. R. Neuberger; B....... 678

P

Pach, Walter
  Queer thing, painting; B 736
Pale horse, pale rider. K. A. Porter; B.... 442
Parkes, H. B.; R 125
Parkes, Henry Bamford
  History of Mexico, a; B 180
Patriot, the. P. S. Buck; B 269
Peace it's wonderful, and twenty-six other stories. W. Saroyan; B 679
Penrose, E. F., and P. A. Dodd
  Economic aspects of medical services, with special reference to conditions in California; B 622
People's history of England, a. A. L. Morton; B 125
Petrie, Sir Charles
  Chamberlain tradition, the; B 241
Phelps, William Lyon
  Autobiography with letters; B 474
Philanthropic foundations and higher education. E. V. Hollis; B 16
Picasso. G. Stein; AN 508
Pilgrimage. D. Richardson; B 210
Poland: Key to Europe. R. L. Buell; B.... 731
Porter, Katherine Anne
  Pale horse, pale rider; B 442
Pound, Ezra
  Culture; R 504
Principles of art, the. R. G. Collingwood; B .... 98; see also 187
Professor, the. R. Warner; B 238
Prokosch, Frederic
  Carnival, the; AN 127
Puleston, Captain W. D., United States navy
  Mahan; B 618
Puritan in Babylon, a: The story of Calvin Coolidge; B 122
Puritan in voodoo land, a. E. Taft; B...... 385
Purslane. B. K. Harris; B 650

Q

Queer thing, painting. W. Pach; B 736

R

Rame, David
  Wine of good hope; AN 508
Ramparts we watch, the. G. F. Eliot; B..... 95
Rats in the larder. J. Joesten; B 382
Reaching for the stars. N. Waln; B 379
Rebels of art. Manet to Matisse. G. Slocombe; B 472
Reichenbach, Hans
  Experience and prediction. An analysis of the foundations and the structure of knowledge; B 40
Reorganization of the American railroad system, 1893-1900. E. G. Campbell; B... 19
Reorganization of the national government. What does it involve? L. Meriam and L. F. Schmeckebier; B 620
Residential quarter. L. Aragon; B 99
Rice, Philip Blair; R 442
Richardson, Dorothy
  Pilgrimage; B 210
Richardson, Henry Handel
  Young Cosima, the; B 408
Rilke, Rainer Maria
  Translations from poetry. M. D. Herter Norton; B 182
Rising, the. M. Johnston; AN 680
Rivera, Diego, his life and times. B. D. Wolfe; B...... 504; see also C...... 738
Rogers, James Harvey
  Capitalism in crisis; B 180
Rogers, Lindsay; R 620
Romer, Samuel; R 355
Rope of gold. J. Herbst; B 272
Rorty, James
  American medicine mobilizes; B....... 622
Rorty, James; R 535
Rosenberg, Arthur
  Democracy and socialism; B 648
Rosenberg, Arthur; R 40, 241
Rosenfeld, Paul; R 182, 240, 590, 619
Ross, Malcolm
  Death of a Yale man; B 471
Rourke, Constance; R 96, 206, 535
Ruling classes, the. G. Mosca; B 562
Rybizka, Benno
  Hannes Schneider ski technique, the; AN 276

S

Salomon, Louis B; R...... 18, 182, 208, 301, 408, 679, 704, 733
Samuel Taylor Coleridge: A biographical study. E. K. Chambers; B 705
Salter, Sir Arthur
  Security—can we retrieve it? B........ 704
Santayana, George. G. W. Howgate; B..... 591
Sargeant, Winthrop
  Jazz: Hot and hybrid; B 653
Saroyan, William
  Peace it's wonderful, and twenty-six other stories; B 679
Sassoon, Siegfried
  Old century, the. And seven more years; AN 127
Schacht: Hitler's magician. N. Muhlen; B.. 471
Schapiro, Meyer; R 446
Schmeckebier, Laurence F., and L. Meriam
  Reorganization of the national government. What does it involve? B..... 620
Schuman, Frederick L.
  Europe on the eve; B 441
Schuman, Frederick L.; R 323, 704
Schwartz, Delmore
  In dreams begin responsibilities; B..... 353
Schwartz, Delmore; R 676
Seasoned timber. D. Canfield; B 272
Security—can we retrieve it? Sir A. Salter; B 704
Seeds of destruction. J. Blair; B 124
Seldes, George
  Lords of the press; B..39; see also..131, 233
Selected poetry of Robinson Jeffers; B..... 651
Senate of the United States, the. G. H. Haynes; B 384
Sender, Toni
  Autobiography of a German rebel, the; B 568
Seven seas on a shoestring. D. Long; B..... 593
Shadid, Michael A., M. D.
  Doctor for the people, a; B 535
Shepard, Odell; R 238
Showdown in Vienna. M. Fuchs; B 446
Silver branch, the. S. O'Faoláin; AN....... 128
Singer, I. J.
  East of Eden. M. Samuel, translator; B 326; see also C 512
Sirocco, and other stories. R. Bates; B..... 235
Sky hooks. The autobiography of John Kane; B 125
Slocombe, George
  Rebels of art. Manet to Matisse; B..... 472
Smith, Logan Pearsall
  Unforgotten years; B 238
Smitter, Wessel
  F. O. B. Detroit; B 18
Social security. M. S. Stewart; B 383
Social security in the United States. P. Douglas; B 383
Social thought from lore to science. H. E. Barnes and H. Becker. With the assistance of E. Benoit-Smullyan and others; B 70
Son of old man hat: A Navajo autobiography: Recorded by W. Dyk; B 100
Songs of American sailormen. J. Colcord; B. 96
Southworth, H. Rutledge; R 677

Soviets in the arctic. T. A. Taracouzio; B.. 568
Spanish war, the. E. W. Hemingway; criticism by E. Wilson censured. Mrs. E. G. Clark, junior; C.................. 76
Spirit of Voltaire, the. N. L. Torrey; B.... 352
Stein, Gertrude
    Picasso; AN 508
Steinbeck, John
    Grapes of wrath, the; B............... 440
Stern, Philip Van Doren
    Man who killed Lincoln, the; B........ 181
Stewart, Maxwell S.
    Social security; B..................... 383
Stone, I. F.; R.......................... 592
Strauss, Harold; R....326; see also C..... 512
Streit, C. K.
    Union now; B.......................... 474
Stricklands, the. E. Lanham; B............ 355
Sturmthal, Adolf; R....................... 558
Survey after Munich. G. Hutton; B........ 268
Survey of international affairs, 1937. A. J. Toynbee; B 405
Survivors, the. R. Béhaine; AN............ 43
Sword in the stone, the. T. H. White; B.... 39
Szeps, Berta
    My life and history; B................ 356

T

Taft, Edna
    Puritan in voodoo land, a; B.......... 385
Taft, Philip; R........................... 155
Taracouzio, T. A.
    Soviets in the arctic; B.............. 568
Tell my horse. Z. N. Hurston; B........... 385
Thibaults, the. R. M. du Gard; B.......... 380
Thorp, Willard L., and others
    Economic problems in a changing world; B 536
Through embassy eyes. M. Dodd; B........ 298
Through the fog of war. L. Hart; AN....... 276
Torrey, Norman L.
    Spirit of Voltaire, the; B............. 352
Toynbee, Arnold J.
    Survey of international affairs, 1937; B 405
Translations from the poetry of Rainer Maria Rilke. M. D. Herter Norton; B...... 182
Trilling, Lionel
    Matthew Arnold; B................... 297

U

Unconquered. J. Bertram; B............... 237
Unforgotten years. L. P. Smith; B......... 238
Union now. C. K. Streit; B................ 474
Unions of their own choosing. R. R. R. Brooks; B 183
Unveiling of Timbuctoo, the. G. Welch; B.. 564

V

Valéry, Paul
    Variety: Second series. W. A. Bradley, translator; B 38
Vambery, Rustem; R......97, 154, 356, 590, 648
Van Doren, Dorothy; R.......242, 272, 324, 650
Van Loon, Hendrik Willem
    Our battle; B......................... 71
Variety: Second series. P. Valéry. Translated by W. A. Bradley; B........... 38
Villard, Oswald Garrison
    Fighting years; B..................... 437
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R............39 (see also 131); 122, 295, 233, 442
Viton, Albert; R.......................... 239
Vivas, Eliseo; R........98; see also....... 187
Voltaire. A. Noyes; B.................... 352
Voltaire, two books on; B................ 352

W

Wagner act, two books on; B.............. 734
Wait until spring, Bandini. J. Fante; B..... 72
Wales, Nym
    Inside red China; B.................. 237
Waln, Nora
    Reaching for the stars; B............ 379
Walton, Eda Lou; R.....................72, 100
Warner, Rex
    Professor, the; B..................... 238
Warren, Robert Penn
    Night rider; B....................... 507
We shall live again. M. Hindus; B......... 620
Wedding, the. G. Lumpkin; B.............. 301
Welch, Galbraith
    Unveiling of Timbuctoo, the; B........ 564
Whale ships and whaling. A. C. Church; B. 96
Wheeler-Bennett, John W.
    Forgotten peace, the. Brest-Litovsk, March, 1918; B..................... 273
When there is no peace. H. F. Armstrong; B 268
White, T. H.
    Sword in the stone, the; B............ 39
White, W. Bertram
    Miracle of Haworth, the. A. Brontë study; B 299
White, William Allen
    Puritan in Babylon, a: The story of Calvin Coolidge; B.................. 122
Whitman, Willson
    God's valley—people and power along the Tennessee river; B................. 438
Wickford Point. J. P. Marquand; B........ 384
Wild palms, the. W. Faulkner; B.......... 153
Wilson, Edith Bolling
    My memoir; B........................ 442
Wilson, Edmund; review of books by E. Hemingway censured. Mrs. E. G. Clark, junior; C 76
Wind without rain. H. Krause; B.......... 208
Wine of good hope. D. Rame; AN.......... 508
Winwar, Frances
    Farewell the banner; B................ 18
Wolf, Benedict; R........................ 183
Wolf among the wolves. H. Fallada; B..... 97
Wolfe, Bertram D.
    Diego Rivera, his life and times; B..504; see also C......................... 738
Woodrow Wilson: Life and letters. Volume VII. R. S. Baker; B................ 405
Woodward, E. L.
    Age of reform, the, 1815-1870; B...... 208
Woodward, Helen; R...................17, 150
Woodward, W. E.
    Lafayette; B.....242; see also C...... 388
Worker, the foreman, and the Wagner act, the. R. L. Greenman; B............. 734

Y

Yeats, William Butler
    Autobiography; B 153
Yoke of stars. F. Frost; B................ 242
Young Cosima, the. H. H. Richardson; B.. 408

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R.............156, 408
Zigrosser, Carl; R......504; see also C.... 738
Zweig, Stefan
    Beware of pity. P. and T. Blewitt, translators; B 381

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • DECEMBER 31, 1938 NUMBER 1

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1
EDITORIALS:
BEHIND THE FRANCO LINES 3
THE A. M. A. ON TRIAL 4
HOPE FOR 1939 5
WASHINGTON'S BIG SHOW by Kenneth G. Crawford 6
ITALY UNDER HITLER by Albert Viton 7
THREE SOUTHERN TOWNS. I. TUPELO: FEUDALISM AND TVA by Willson Whitman 12
IN THE WIND 14
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 15
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
PHILANTHROPY AND EDUCATION by Harold J. Laski 16
A MUSIC CRITIC TO THE RESCUE by Jacques Barzun 16
YOUNG SHOPPERS by Helen Woodward 17
WORDSWORTH AND COLERIDGE by Louis B. Salomon 18
THE MACHINE WINS by Norah Hoult 18
THE RAILROADS IN THE NINETIES by Eliot Janeway 19
CRITIQUE OF THE SECURITY ACT by Paul H. Douglas 20

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

WHEN THE STATE DEPARTMENT STOOD UP on its hind legs last week and told the Nazi chargé d'affaires that the United States government agrees with the opinions of the Nazi dictatorship expressed by Secretary Ickes, it spoke directly for the American people for the first time in many a month. The incomparable impudence of the Nazis in asking for apologies from officials whom their parrot press has slandered in the vilest terms has at last been countered with an expression of the anger and disgust that every decent American feels for a regime which lives by cruelty and terror. As for Secretary Ickes, who has carried on a one-man anti-Nazi campaign for months, he deserves a Congressional medal. The Nazis, in the manner of bullies, have dropped the issue as if it were a hot potato, out of deference, they say, to the "Christmas spirit"! And they have been very careful to hide from the German people the true significance of the incident.

IN ADDITION TO THE SATISFACTION OF having the Nazis officially rebuked, the action of the State Department has of course far more important implications, which the statements of Senators Pittman and King, hinting at economic sanctions, serve to underline. A recent Fortune poll revealed that public opinion favors our joining with other democratic nations to prevent further expansion by Hitler and Mussolini. We hope this opinion, however, will not remain in the passive stage—resigning itself to an inevitable war inevitably involving this country. Anti-fascist emotions need to be harnessed to a program of checking the dictators here and now, of short-circuiting their ability to make war. America has the economic weapons and can use them without serious risk. The first steps must be the lifting of the embargo against shipments to Spain and the cutting off of supplies to Japan. There is no question that a victory of the Spanish Republic and a check to Japan in China would turn the tide of fascist triumph; they would also offset the pessimistic resignation to a tragic conflict which now apparently prevails.

Published weekly and copyright, 1938, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

AFTER COOLING HIS HEELS IN LONDON FOR several months, vainly attempting to get into touch with the German government, George Rublee, director of the Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees, has received an invitation to Berlin. The Nazis' sudden politeness springs from their hope of obtaining his cooperation in putting over their scheme for using the plight of the Jews to extort trade concessions. In its last issue The Nation exposed this plan as a thinly disguised ransom demand. An elaborate outline which has since been cabled from Berlin by Otto D. Tolischus to the New York Times more than justifies this description. We now learn that the Nazis will not be content with permitting the refugees to exchange the meager remnants of their wealth for additional exports of German goods. Such exports, it is planned, will be paid for by blocked refugee marks to the extent of only 50 to 60 per cent; the balance is to be met in free foreign exchange, thus replenishing Germany's gravely diminished resources. As Mr. Tolischus says: "In that way not only German Jews but the world's entire Jewry, which is expected to put up the money, would be impressed into Germany's export drive. They would thus subsidize German exports, help break down any boycott against German goods, help parry any such counter trade drives as the British have suggested, and indirectly finance Germany's imports of raw materials essential for her armaments." This brazen attempt to cash in on persecution must not be allowed to succeed. We hope that refugee organizations the world over will make known to Mr. Rublee and their governments their unshakable opposition to any proposals serving to underwrite Nazi aggression.

*

THE ABILITY OF THE AMERICAN NATIONS TO agree on a declaration of solidarity involving provision for consultation in case of a threat to American liberties marks the outstanding achievement of the Lima conference. Although the "Declaration of Lima" is disappointing in its failure to make specific reference to the threatened penetration of ideas and dogmas, it provides machinery for consultation in case any country is prepared to utilize it. Whether it will be used depends, as does the value of Hull's declaration of American principles, on the degree of real solidarity that was achieved behind the conference scenes. That this was less than had been hoped for is evident from Argentina's refusal to assent to a more vigorous declaration, and the consequent failure of the conference to provide for periodic consultations between the American governments. It is evident that suspicion of American policy has not been wholly allayed by the Good Neighbor doctrine. As long as this suspicion remains, Latin America will be fertile ground for fascist penetration regardless of declarations of continental solidarity. But while we should not fool ourselves into overestimating the achievements at Lima, neither should they be discounted altogether. New territory has been won in the struggle to safeguard democracy in the Western Hemisphere. Whether this ground can be held will depend on the concrete manifestations of the Good Neighbor policy in the months to come.

*

STIMULATION OF LATIN AMERICAN TRADE through a revival of foreign lending under federal auspices is reported to be the subject of study in Washington. The proposed instrument is the Export-Import Bank, through which $25,000,000 was recently made available to China. This, however, is an "emergency" institution whose charter expires next June. According to plans now being discussed, Congress will be asked to authorize the reorganization of this bank on a permanent basis. We hope that prejudice against foreign loans will not be allowed to stand in the way of this proposal. A strong case can be made out, on both political and economic grounds, for carefully directing a stream of capital to Latin America. The continent to the south of us cries out for capital and offers enormous opportunities for wise development. We, on the other hand, are plagued with the problem of finding an outlet for surplus capital. We have piled up in Kentucky a fantastic amount of gold—60 per cent of the world's monetary supply—which is far beyond the requirements of our internal credit system. If even a small part of this gold could be siphoned into Latin American economy it would do much to assist recovery there and lead to an important demand for capital goods which this country alone is in a position to supply. Financial interests will probably object that new loans ought not to be granted while old ones made by private investors remain in default. But that condition is much more likely to be remedied if constructive steps are taken to revive trade.

*

FOR THE FIRST TIME JAPAN HAS SET FORTH officially its immediate aims on the Asiatic mainland. The "conditions for peace" as announced by Premier Konoye parallel almost exactly the conditions imposed on the puppet state of Manchoukuo. Tokyo asks that Japanese troops be stationed at various points throughout China "as an anti-Communist measure"; that Japanese merchants be given the rights of freedom of residence and trade which have traditionally been denied other foreigners; that Japan receive a free hand in the economic exploitation of China; and that the puppet government of China align itself politically with the Berlin-Rome-Tokyo axis. At the same time the Japanese press has launched a campaign for the "return"—to the Japanese puppet state—of all concessions held by the Western powers, together with the British crown colony of Hongkong. There are reports that Wang Ching-wei, leader of the former pro-Japanese wing of the Kuomintang, has flown to Hongkong to enter into negotiations with the Japanese. The likelihood that the Chinese government would discuss peace on the terms laid down by Konoye remains, however, extremely slight—particularly at a moment when the United States and Great Britain are showing signs of awakening from their long sleep. Recent confidential reports from China indicate that morale is higher than ever, and the forty-mile Chinese advance to the gates of Yochow represents one of the most spectacular military successes of the war. A China which has endured a year and a half of reverses without the least sign of weakening is not going to give way now when the tide is turning.

* * *

HARRY L. HOPKINS SEEMS TO HAVE BEEN chosen as the heir apparent of the New Deal for 1940. His appointment as Secretary of Commerce is regarded as an attempt to groom him for the nomination by giving him a chance to show business that he is no "radical." The Department of Commerce's gain is WPA's loss, for Mr. Hopkins proved both his administrative ability and his liberalism in handling the huge job of relief. It is to be regretted that the President passed over Hopkins's courageous and efficient assistant, Aubrey Williams, in picking a successor as WPA Administrator. Colonel Francis C. Harrington's principal recommendation is his long and useful association with Mr. Hopkins as Chief Engineer of WPA. Mr. Williams is to be consoled with a position as head of an enlarged National Youth Administration. It is hard to resist the suspicion that Mr. Williams, in addition to making himself persona non grata with Southern Bourbons by his attitude toward the Negro, also got under the President's skin by his insistence on greater WPA appropriations. Mr. Williams ended his services on WPA with an appeal to Congress for an immediate emergency appropriation, warning that otherwise funds will be exhausted by February 7, and WPA will have to be suspended. That must be Congress's first move, for the ending of WPA would be a human calamity and economically disastrous.

* * *

WE RISE TO APPLAUD THE COMMITTEE ON the Bill of Rights of the American Bar Association for the splendid action it has taken in the Hague case. The committee, formed last August, made Jersey City its first order of business and has now filed a brief amicus curiae in the Third Circuit Court of Appeals, Philadelphia, in defense of the C. I. O.'s right to hold street meetings in Jersey City. Frank J. Hogan, president of the Bar Association, said that the committee would defend the civil liberties "of rich and poor alike," and it has made good that pledge. The committee's stand is made the more striking and effective by the character of its membership. Only one of the men on it, Zechariah Chafee, Jr., is identified with liberal causes. Grenville Clark, the chairman, is an outstanding corporation lawyer, a partner in the firm of the late Elihu Root. Joseph A. Padway, of Wisconsin, appeared against the C. I. O. as counsel for the A. F. of L. only a few weeks ago when the Consolidated Edison case was before the Supreme Court. John Francis Neylan is a Hearst lawyer; Osmer C. Fitts is a partner of Coolidge's Attorney General, John G. Sargent. Two, Douglas Arant of Alabama and Monte M. Lemann of New Orleans, are Southern conservatives. The position they have taken is encouraging indication of an awakening on the right to the menace that Hagueism represents in American life.

* * *

THE NAZIS CELEBRATED CHRISTMAS BY reviving the rites of the early barbarians who lived and killed by barbarian rules. "This night [sic]," yelled the German press, "belongs to us." They forgot to mention that according to the laws of nature, which the Nazis have invoked in all their most brutal acts, day always follows night. We give you "Der Tag!"

Behind the Franco Lines

THE Franco authorities officially admit arresting several hundred conspiring army officers. Outside sources put the figure at over a thousand and add that many of the rebels against the rebels have been shot. The recent disturbances in insurgent Spain are a momentary flash lighting up the increasing dissatisfaction in Franco territory.

The Catholics are dissatisfied. Gil Robles, leader of the Catholic Action and former War Minister, returned to Franco territory last summer. The fascist Falange attacked him and threatened him. He went back into exile after forty-eight hours. The pro-Loyalist Catholic daily of Paris, La Croix, said recently: "The influence of Hitlerism gains ground every day in the entourage of Generalissimo Franco. While the Supreme Pontiff's condemnations of racism have passed almost entirely unnoticed in Spain [the Franco censor prohibited them.—Editors The Nation], the writings of Hitler, Rosenberg, and Streicher are translated into Spanish and widely circulated." Cardinal Goma has been having trouble with Queipo de Llano, the drunken broadcasting general of Seville.

The Monarchists are dissatisfied. The Carlist Requettes and the rich peasant Navarrese, Franco's best Spanish soldiers, have complained that they are being used too much at the front while the Falangists stay at home. In fact, the Navarrese bore the brunt of the fighting in the Ebro battle, and their officers apparently have no desire to engage in another offensive which will certainly be bloody and almost as certainly indecisive, especially since the Falangists have ignored three appeals from Franco to go to the front. Their reply was printed in an early edition, immediately confiscated, of the San Sebastian daily Unidad of October 2. "The Caudillo [Franco] should know," it said, "that Spain will not become the cemetery of patriots." The Falangists of course are such good patriots that they must not die.

The Falangists are dissatisfied. First, they resent the pressure on them to leave their offices and safe staff positions behind the front in order to fight. Secondly, they object to Franco's Monarchist leanings. The difficulty among the Franco officers came immediately after his declaration that Alfonso's citizenship and property had been restored. Probably also the Germans did not like that. Alfonso has been living in Rome.

The business men are dissatisfied. Regularly the rebel press prints official announcements of numerous industrial and trade contracts let to German and sometimes to Italian firms. The economic system of the insurgent zone is permeated with foreign fascist influence.

The people are dissatisfied with thirty months of unfruitful war fought, as they now see, in the interests of foreign powers. They are not happy about the impending third winter of that war.

But the terror is murderous, and the people cannot express their displeasure. Army officers can, now and then, for a moment. Franco can suppress them; he cannot eradicate the causes of their disaffection. It is known that rebel officers abroad have tried to establish contacts with Loyalists. The Franco offensive has at the present writing made little real progress, and if it fails to extend its gains very sensationally, the discontent with Franco will run deeper and perhaps even explode.

The A. M. A. on Trial

AT LONG last the times have caught up with the American Medical Association. Last week's indictment of it, together with the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, the Washington Academy of Surgery, and twenty-one physicians of Chicago and Washington, by a District of Columbia grand jury on the charge of violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act marks the end of an era. For years the medical profession, as represented by the A. M. A., has been above the law. It has assumed that it had the right to decide for itself not only matters directly affecting medical care but the economic arrangements under which such care is given.

That these arrangements, however satisfactory they may be to physicians, do not provide adequate medical service to the American people has become increasingly evident. The recent National Health Survey showed that one-fourth of the 8,000,000 cases of illness which are disabling for a week or longer each year receive no care from a physician. Among families on relief 30 per cent of cases of this character are untended. For families with incomes of less than $1,000, the proportion is 28 per cent. Cases of illness, disabling for a week or more, in families with incomes of over $3,000 receive, on the average, 46 per cent more medical attention than similar cases in families on relief.

When several doctors in Washington, D. C., agreed a year ago to provide full medical care to a group of goverment employees, on a prepayment plan, such care to be based on health requirements rather than income, the Medical Society of the District instituted a virtual boycott against these doctors. In the past it would have doubtless succeeded, as other A. M. A. branches have succeeded in ruining many enlightened physicians. But in this case the employees of a government agency were involved, and the Department of Justice has taken the position that the A. M. A., when it enters the economic field, is no more sacred than any other organization of profit-makers. If a combination of steel-makers for the restraint of trade is against the interest of society, what about a combination of physicians which threatens the health of the community?

Signs that the times are catching up with the A. M. A. may be found within the organization as well as without. The first important break within the ranks occurred in mid-December when the California Medical Association approved a plan for prepaid medical care on a voluntary insurance basis. The plan is similar, except in minor detail, to the Washington plan: California residents will be able to have full medical, surgical, and hospital services for approximately $2.50 a month for each person. Some type of voluntary prepaid medical service is expected to be offered in New York State within the next few months, probably as a supplement to the present 3-cents-a-day hospital insurance.

All these moves are hopeful ones. None of them, however, meet the fundamental problem. Few, if any, families whose incomes are less than $1,100 a year—half the total number of American families—will be attracted by a voluntary plan necessitating payments of $10 to $36 a year per person. Yet this is the group which the National Health Survey shows to be sick the most frequently and to have the least medical care. Their needs can be met only by compulsory health insurance or the development of a system of state medicine. Toward either plan the A. M. A. remains unalterably opposed. Doubtless it will continue its opposition as long as the small clique headed by Dr. Fishbein dominates A. M. A. policies. But conviction of Fishbein and his associates by the courts should put an end to their influence, and the government's action must add fuel to the revolt against the A. M. A. politicians already under way within the medical profession.

NGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
ingame, Cal.

Hope for 1939

DEMOCRACY must needs look back on 1938 as a year of defeat; nor can it look forward with confidence to 1939. In the past year fascism has made immense gains and reinforced its power for evil. Hitler and Mussolini have perhaps won their victories by bluffing on weak cards; now they appear to hold all the aces. The Nazification of Central Europe is going on apace, and such flimsy and disconnected barriers as are being erected against it look like tissue paper in comparison with Nazi might. England and France, divided, their morale shaken, lacking in leadership, seem to have resigned both as great powers and as champions of democracy; to have no mission left save to smooth the fascist path to world domination.

This is the kind of picture which unbending realists are apt to present to us. Some of them, abandoning Europe in disgust, would have us withdraw into strict isolation—a new Byzantium in a new and drearier Dark Age. Others, still more despondent, see this country, too, fatally infected with the fascist virus and assert, almost with resignation, that nothing can stop its happening here.

We should be the last to deny the necessity for cool realism, for refusing to run away from unpleasant facts. But is there not some danger that democrats, in their anxiety to steer clear of the Scylla of wish-fulfilment, will wreck themselves on the Charybdis of defeatism? If so, it may be well, while giving full weight to the difficulties ahead to consider also the existing grounds for hope.

There is one front in Europe where democracy has not broken in 1938. Despite constant battering, despite fascist intervention and British "non-intervention," despite hunger and hardship, the Spanish Loyalists have stood firm. In the spring, when Chamberlain made his infamous pact with Mussolini, the assumption of reactionaries the world over was that Franco's victory was a mere matter of weeks. The Loyalists lost ground but not their spirit, and by their counter-offensive on the Ebro they ruined the fascist time-table. Still more heartening is the fact that despite the exigencies of a war fought against terrific odds, the Spanish government has not turned to totalitarianism. On the contrary, democracy is more alive in Spain than at the beginning of the war, and from it springs a unity which regimentation can never rival. While the Spanish front holds, how can we say that democracy is doomed in Europe? And while we have the opportunity to strengthen that front by lifting the embargo, how can we say there is nothing we can do to check the fascist tide?

Let us turn from Europe's brightest hope to its darkest spots—to Germany and Italy, where another year of triumphs may appear to have established dictatorial power on an unshakable foundation. Hitler and Mussolini would have us believe that their regimes are solidly backed by their whole nations, that they have completed the conquest of the minds of their peoples. Yet if we scratch beneath the surface we find indications that neither country has really become a satisfactory fascist anthill. On another page of this issue Albert Viton writes of the disillusion and discontent he found in Italy and the ever more drastic repression needed to keep it under. He warns us against assumption that this underground ferment may lead to early revolt. Yet its existence is important. On the one hand it drives Mussolini into more and more desperate expedients to maintain his power; on the other, it makes such adventures more and more dangerous, a fact that would speedily become apparent were the democracies to call his bluffs.

In Italy the September crisis revealed a widespread fear of war and an overwhelming dislike for the German alliance. In Germany also there is criticism and distrust of Italy coupled with a strong revulsion against war. Reliable observers recently in Germany report that the spontaneous emotion evoked by Munich was thankfulness for peace. Relief at the bloodless victory was accompanied by doubts about the value of the victory itself, and by fears that it must drive Germany forward to some new impasse from which there could be no peaceful exit.

Again, the reaction of the German public to the pogrom showed that the Nazis have not yet succeeded in lowering Germany to their own level. It is true there were no organized protests, but there were scattered, gallant attempts to intervene, there were Aryans who took risks to help or shelter Jews, and, above all, there were innumerable expressions of disgust and pathetic attempts to convince foreigners that Nazi brutality did not represent "the real Germany." Too much significance must not be attached to these manifestations. They do not mean we can count on internal upheaval; but they do suggest that behind the imposing Nazi façade there is a growing lack of morale. Add to this mounting economic difficulties, accentuated rather than moderated by the Anschluss and the capture of Sudetenland, and we get a picture of a Third Reich which is by no means a happy and united nation.

What of democratic morale? It is not to be gainsaid that it has wavered badly in the past year. But there are signs of recovery. In America we are beginning to grasp what the spread of fascism must mean. We are beginning to realize that we cannot stay aloof from the battle. Our task for 1939 is to shake off defeatism, to take our part in the active defense of democracy. What was true of the union in 1860 is true of the world today: it cannot permanently endure half fascist and half free. Can we evade our responsibility for insuring that it is liberty which will ultimately triumph?

Washington's Big Show

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, December 23

NOW that advance agents of the Seventy-sixth Congress have arrived in Washington to distribute the annual blurbs on the big show, it is possible to tell something about the kind of acts the winter and spring will bring forth under the big dome. There will be more freaks than usual. About half of the newly elected Republicans, for example, will be for the Townsend plan but at the same time devoted to rugged individualism, the traditional American way, low taxes, and government economy. The hookworm Democrats will be more savage than ever after the attempted purge. Dependable New Dealers will be definitely reduced to minority status in both branches.

It is not a pretty prospect. The final Congressional session of every two-term Administration has been a futile affair. This one, judging from advance billings, will be even more so. Already the returning members have made it clear that hopes for some sort of Democratic unity, based on the assumption that an enlarged Republican minority would distract the majority from family fights, were engendered by wishful analysis of the election returns.

Harry Byrd, spokesman for the arch-reactionaries, has denounced the Administration as the most extravagant in the nation's history and demanded reduction of relief spending. Burt Wheeler, back from the wars with Jerry O'Connell's scalp, has joined in the clamor for state administration of relief. King, of Utah, has demanded, with a straight face, that the WPA be turned over to the states "to keep politics out of relief." Rush Holt, the boy blunder, has a no-third-term resolution. Edward Burke, who divested himself of liberalism at the close of his 1934 campaign, is demanding mutilation of the Wagner Act to make it fair to business. Pat Harrison, always the little brother of big business, is running around promising no tax increases, and "indulging the hope" that the budget will be balanced by economy.

These Senate Democrats are already off the reservation. Whatever program President Roosevelt produces, they will oppose it. They are back where they were when they scuttled the Supreme Court reform plan in the last Congress. If anything they are more intransigent, it having been proved to their satisfaction since then that the President can't hurt them. Garner and a group of less violently reactionary Democrats will go along with the President if he trims his sails to suit their listless wind. He will perforce do some trimming. There will be no reforms or advancements of the social frontier at this session. Roosevelt will have his hands full saving the WPA, the Labor Board, and what is left of his tax structure. His emphasis will be on reinforced national defense, the one policy on which reasonable unanimity can be expected. The blundering of Germany and Japan will keep the international stew bubbling to prove a continued incentive for preparedness. Modification of the Neutrality Act to permit more flexibility may possibly slip through as a national-defense measure, but the Corcoran plan of lump-sum defense appropriations has been abandoned. The government-reorganization bill would seem to have no chance if the President insists, as he says he will, on retaining the principle of executive freedom to transfer bureaus. The new anti-trust legislation will not be ready until 1940.

In the Senate first blood will be drawn on the President's nominations. These will be bold. Compromises on policy will not be carried over into Cabinet personnel. Harry Hopkins, anti-Christ to the economy bloc, has already been nominated for Secretary of Commerce to replace Dan Roper. Garner has warned the President that this will mean a fight, but apparently the Vice-President is willing to help confirm Hopkins and it seems reasonably certain that he will be confirmed. Donald Wakefield Smith, NLRB member nominated for reappointment, will be bitterly opposed by the combined forces of the right and the stooges of the A. F. of L. His chances are slim. It now appears that Robert Jackson will be advanced to fill the vacancy left by the retirement of Attorney General Homer Cummings and that Governor Frank Murphy of Michigan will get some important federal appointment, but probably not Justice Cardozo's place on the Supreme Court.

The new House defies prediction or classification. Its Democratic membership includes most of the old pests, like Martin Dies, who has been bloated into a national figure with the publicity generated by his $25,000 investigation of "un-American activities." Dies at first demanded $1,000,000 to continue his investigation but now has decided to settle for $150,000. On the basis of the Gallup poll, showing that a substantial majority of voters want Communists and fascists investigated, he probably can't be stopped from getting $50,000. He may do wonders with it in 1940.

But the biggest issue in the House will be joined by proposals to liberalize the Social Security Act. Most Republicans, committed to Dr. Townsend's $100 a month, now in the process of being reduced to $80, are hoping against hope that they will be spared the necessity of voting their campaign convictions. But the Democratic leadership will insist upon putting them on record. The ultimate outcome probably will be the adoption of the moderate liberalization program of the President's Federal Social Security Board, which would extend benefits to 2,600,000 persons not now covered, start payments in 1940 instead of 1942, and hold down reserve-fund accumulation. It will be interesting to see how the Townsend Republicans, who regard themselves as products of the reaction from Roosevelt on all issues except "something for the old folks," will vote on this issue.

Inconceivable as it seems, there may be a majority in Congress for curtailing WPA relief appropriations sharply, if not for adopting such an absurd plan as King's. The result of such curtailment would, of course, be as disastrous to business generally as to the unemployed. This was proved by the 1937 relief-economy wave. A deficiency appropriation of at least $1,000,000,000 is necessary, but it will be hard to get. Aside from relief, threatened mutilation of the Wagner Act presents the most alarming immediate prospect. The Smith nomination will throw a straw to the wind on this. If Smith is defeated, Senator Wagner may present some modifying amendments to stave off attack by the Burke crowd. If not, he will probably stand with the C. I. O. against any weakening.

The President's only check-rein on the incoming Congress is his continued personal popularity, coupled with the third-term threat. So long as there is a chance that he will be President again after 1940 there is a possibility of further Roosevelt patronage. So long as there is a chance that he will name his successor, Secretary of Commerce Hopkins, for example, there is also that possibility. But if he loses in an early battle, the war of the Seventy-sixth Congress will be lost. The Republicans, holding the balance of power, will, if they get the chance, let the people eat economy.

Italy Under Hitler

BY ALBERT VITON

Rome, December 13

IT IS a new Italy that I find after an absence of more than three years. The basis of this Italy was laid when I was there in 1935; the superstructure has developed in the interim. It is an Italy with an insatiable thirst for power and for expansion, an Italy with a nationalism that, probably for the first time since the establishment of the regime, has become definitely and visibly pernicious, an Italy for which the earth is just too small. On the other hand, it is a hungry Italy, an Italy in which the standard of living has visibly declined, in which there is more restlessness, more criticism of the regime, and more fear than I ever saw before.

In 1935 I found military men very skeptical of Italy's ability to carry on a major war; now they have a tremendous self-confidence which may yet lead them to wild adventures. The victories in Spain and Ethiopia seem to have turned their heads. On the other hand, the middle classes and especially the laborers, while partaking fully of the offensive nationalism, are much more critical of the regime and its policies, both internal and foreign, than I ever found them before. A young Italian who had been a member of the party from 1922 to 1931 assured me that not less than 80 per cent of the population was opposed to the regime. I disputed his figure, suggesting that he was living under an illusion. As a traveling salesman, however, he insisted that he knew his Italy and that foreign observers meet only the official and upper classes, who naturally support the regime. "If you want to know the truth, talk to people singly," he said; "when three or four get together each one is afraid of the other."

In the spring of this year the country was engulfed by a wave of dissatisfaction with the deterioration in the quality of bread. Fearing a shortage of wheat, the government had ordered bakers to use a high percentage of other flour. After the outcry the government rescinded the order. Certainly the situation in the northern part of the country is by no means satisfactory. That Mussolini recently canceled a planned visit to Turin because the police chief would not guarantee his safety is common knowledge. What brought about the situation is not exactly known. Some say that troops back from Spain, considering themselves privileged, had taken to highway robbery and terrorized the population; others think that there had been some labor unrest. A usually reliable observer claims that "Down with the Regime" had been found painted on buildings in the center of Turin. The king was forced by an extraordinarily cold reception from the populace to curtail his visit in Turin, and Mussolini has had to cancel planned visits to a whole group of industrial towns around Trieste.

Without question Mussolini is more popular than the regime. I have heard people denouncing the government and all it stands for but expressing great admiration for the personality of the Duce. Count Ciano, Mussolini's son-in-law; Starace, the secretary of the party; Alfieri, and many other high Fascist dignitaries are detested almost universally, and all unpopular measures are generally attributed to them. Ciano, for example, is supposed to be the author and chief advocate of the pro-German policy; Starace is alleged to have championed the intervention in Spain; Graziani is the one who led Mussolini into the Ethiopian adventure.

No recent act of Mussolini's has been more genuinely popular than his recall of 10,000 volunteers from Spain. And Mussolini knew it would be popular. One can say without qualification that the whole population, with the exception perhaps of the military, regards the Spanish adventure as a huge mistake and is thoroughly tired of it. Assured a thousand times of an immediate Franco victory, people are disappointed to find the struggle dragging on interminably. Italians wonder what Mussolini expects to get out of Spain except friendship and prestige. The rise in the price of foodstuffs is popularly attributed to the Spanish war.

The Ethiopian adventure has also won much less favor than was anticipated. As one observer put it, "People agree that both Spain and Ethiopia are bones in the throat; it is, however, difficult to extract them." To swallow them appears to be no less difficult. The official press talks constantly of the infinite mineral wealth of the new empire, but most people see in Ethiopia only a drain on Italy's financial, material, and human resources. Only the military and to a certain extent the university youth really support the Ethiopian business. The latter see in the creation of a colonial empire new openings for jobs. Many students are specializing in colonial administration—and wondering how they will look in sun helmets.

WAR-TIME ECONOMY

Italy's financial condition has certainly deteriorated during the past three years. The two wars and the preparations for a third have fallen heavily on the shoulders of the people. Italian economic life is now practically conducted on a war basis. Public finance is shrouded by a veil which no observer that I spoke to had succeeded in penetrating—and that includes many commercial attachés. In 1935 the Bank of Issue still published fortnightly statements of its reserves of gold and foreign currency; no such statements have been published during the past two years. On December 31, 1930, the bank had a reserve in gold and foreign currency of 9,625 million lire; by June, 1936, this had fallen to 2,266 million.

Budgetary deficits have grown steadily. The fiscal year 1934-35 closed with a deficit of 2,030,000,000 lire; at the end of the following fiscal year the deficit had grown to 12,686,000,000; during 1936-37 it amounted to 16,230,000,000 lire. How large the deficit was during the past fiscal year is not yet known. Inevitably the public debt has grown. On September 30, 1935, it amounted to 107,078,000,000 lire; but no one that I spoke to could tell me how large it is by now. The government has ceased publishing even doctored statistics. These budgetary deficits have grown in spite of the increased taxes for war needs and in spite of the various capital levies. In October, 1936, a levy was imposed on all real-estate owners to the value of 5 per cent of the property. The levy took the form of a forced loan redeemable in twenty years; but unless the owners preferred to pay the levy outright, their taxes were increased not only to redeem the loan but to cover the cost of the service. On October 23 of the following year another levy was imposed on all corporations. As modified after discussion in the Chamber, this levy took between 7 and 8 per cent of the capital and reserves of joint-stock companies and partnerships, and yielded about 5,000 million lire. The turn of small businesses came a few weeks ago, when a new capital levy of 7½ per cent on private shops was enacted. People now wonder who will be next.

Taxes have caused much dissatisfaction among the masses. Wages and salaries, no matter how small, are now subject to a tax of 8 per cent, for which the employer is responsible. This tax is therefore subtracted before the employee sees his pay envelope. Taxes on articles of consumption have grown. Gasoline is three times its original price—a gallon costs now about 75 cents. Sugar, tobacco, matches, salt, and so forth are also expected to bring more revenue than before. I have checked with a number of business men and office workers and it appears that the former now have to pay about 40 per cent of their income, however small, to the state; the latter, if they are married and have at least two children, pay somewhat more than 20 per cent.

The clothes people wear are old and shabby. The price has gone up and the quality down. The retail price of clothing—taking January, 1936, as 100, when prices had already gone up considerably—stood at 140 in July, 1937, and at 134 in July last. The cost of living as a whole has advanced from 74 in September, 1934, to 99 in September of this year, and the cost of food has gone up from 68 to 92. But these figures do not tell the whole story. The rise in price of essential articles—bread, spaghetti, cheese, olive oil—has been much greater than indicated in these figures. Yet wages, even taking the most optimistic figures I have heard, have not increased more than 20 per cent. According to the last Annuaro Statistico, published by the Institute of Statistics, the wages of white-collar workers increased only 14 per cent between 1935 and the end of 1937.

The great catchword at the moment is "autarchy." On November 17 I was present when Mussolini opened a great exhibition called "Our Autarchy of Italian Minerals." A tremendous amount of money and labor is being spent on working mineral deposits of no economic value. An official publication, for example, announces that "attention is now directed toward the extraction of the high percentage of iron, 20 to 25 per cent, contained in the sand of certain sections of the seacoast." Coal veins of no value are being worked; large sums are being put into the development of Albanian oil with a high sulphur content and filled with extraneous matter. The use of home-grown fiber for the textile industry is increasing. At the order of the government the ratio of imported to inferior native wool in the manufacture of clothing has fallen from six-to-one to fifty-fifty.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

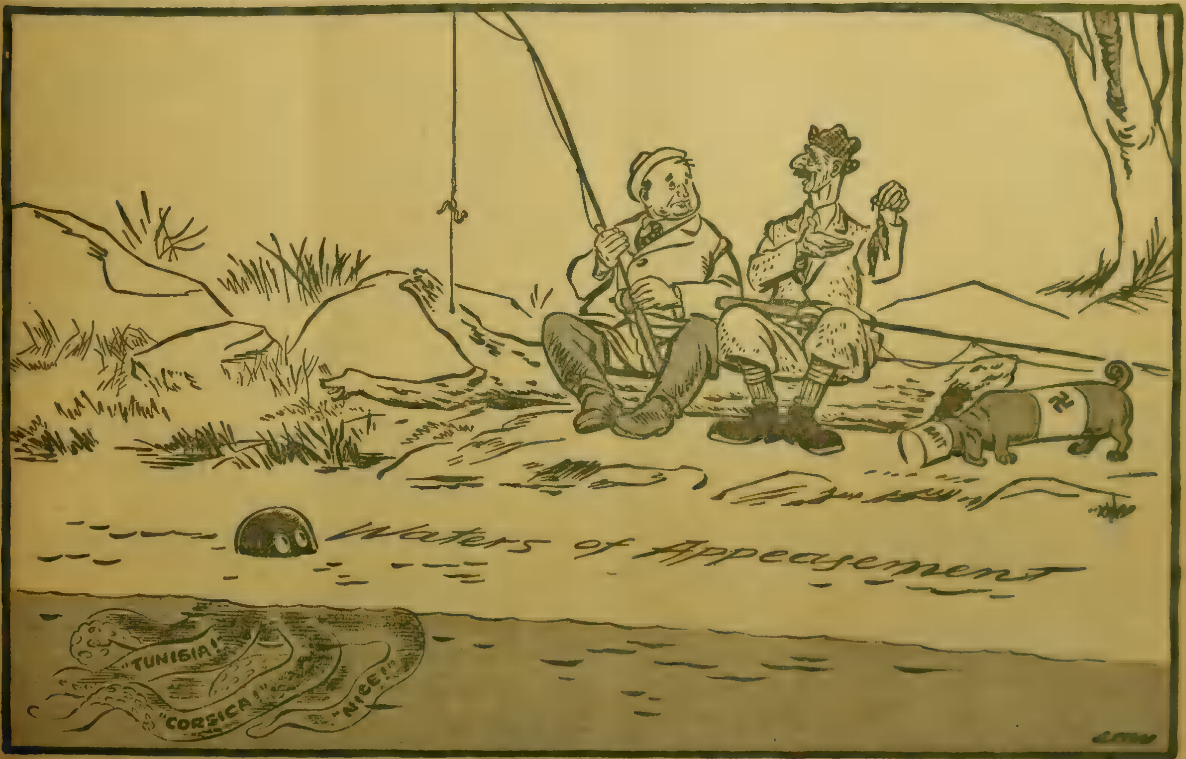
The home population can be compelled to purchase goods of any quality if foreign competition is eliminated, but all economic observers are now asking how, given the movement toward autarchy, Italy can expect to compete on the world market. For one thing the best goods are, of course, sent abroad, and the government is heavily subsidizing the export trade. But in the end the Italian people have to pay with a lower standard of living. The 1937 "Yearbook of the Fascist Confederation of Industrialists" contains the following highly illuminating statistical table: taking 1929 as 100, industrial employment at the end of 1936 had reached 94.90, but the amount paid in wages stood at 73.81.

TERROR AND "CAPILLARITY"

Because of the discontent the secret police are much more active than in previous years. In 1935 I heard comparatively little about them; now, however they make their presence felt. A friend told me that at a fireworks show a man standing near him said, "For this there is money, but there is none for feeding our starving children." He had hardly finished the sentence when someone tapped him on the shoulder and took him off. The number of plain-clothes men on the Piazza Venezia has noticeably increased. Telephone tapping has been systematized to a high degree. The material thus obtained is summarized every day in every city and passed on to the district authorities. They in turn pass it on to Rome, where it is boiled down for Mussolini's perusal. According to an absolutely reliable source, the first thing Mussolini does in the morning is to read this report.

A word now heard frequently in Fascist circles is "capillarity." According to this doctrine only fascism provides real democracy since the government is in constant touch with the broad masses of the people. Fascists will tell you that the hundred and one organizations with which nearly the whole population comes in contact—the various guilds, the social-service organizations, the party, and the recreation units—serve as tribunes for public opinion, which is gradually transmitted, through constantly narrowing channels as it moves upward, to the head of the state. Much is now being made of this doctrine. Of course, it really works the other way around. The Fascist state is "capillary" in the sense that through these various organizations but especially through the extensive network of police espionage the head of the state is in constant touch with every particle in the body politic. But instead of the will of the people reaching upward and affecting policy, the will of Mussolini reaches downward. Only occasionally, when in a comparatively unimportant matter popular dissatisfaction



BAIT
Waters of Appeasement
TUNISIA!
CORSICA!
NICE!
LOW

FISHERMAN'S TALES (Copyright in All Countries.)

reaches a high pitch—as in the bread situation—does the head of the state find it advisable to give in to the popular will. During the war crisis of last September public opinion went to great lengths to express opposition to the German connection; Mussolini, however, refused to budge, and assured his critics in a public speech that they would "be dealt with."

ANTI-GERMANISM AND THE AXIS

Whoever thinks that the Rome-Berlin axis will snap tomorrow—or if not tomorrow, the day after—is sadly mistaken. The axis is a functioning organism. It works. I know of no way to emphasize sufficiently this overwhelming fact, pregnant with immeasurable consequences. Next in importance comes the Berlin-Rome-Tokyo triangle. The axis and the triangle—these are the foundation stones of Italian foreign policy; and the chances of the cornerstones being undermined in the near future are very slight indeed.

A joke now current in Rome states that for Germany the colonial question has been settled. It has obtained Italy. The Germans certainly make their presence felt to an extraordinary degree. There is a constant influx of German experts of one sort or another. Much of the present autarchy campaign is directed by Germans. It is not impossible that the recent anti-Jewish laws were actually written by Germans. Many German officials are reputed to be working in the Ministry of the Interior. Italian foreign trade is coming to depend more and more on the Reich; it is expected that during this year more than a third of it will be with Germany.

To make the triangle more tangible an intense propaganda campaign is spreading a certain kind of knowledge about Japan. Publications devoted to the glorification of the Aryan race and to exposing the wicked designs of other races never mention the "yellow peril" except to refer to Chinese communism. The Japanese invasion of China is of course a great crusade of Western civilization against Asiatic bolshevism. There is much propaganda for better trade relations within the triangle; some writers even advocate a customs union to counterbalance the British imperial system. Obviously the immediate concrete value of the triangle cannot be compared with that of the axis, but it is often said here that the triangle will come into its own in the event of a world war or a war against Soviet Russia.

Without doubt no other single policy of Mussolini's has evoked so much general opposition, without distinction of rank or station, as his German policy. The Germans are almost universally detested, especially among the common people. The showing of a newsreel in a Roman movie house was interrupted not long ago by exclamations of "Enough" when shots of the Führer were thrown on the screen. Older people, to whom a buffer state on the northern frontier has been a dogma, are dismayed by the menace which the might of Germany constitutes, and wonder what possessed Mussolini to permit the occupation of Austria. A Fascist official confessed to me that "Mussolini might have carried us into a war on the side of Germany, but not for long." During the September crisis many adopted the unique method of speaking their thoughts into telephones during conversations with friends, in the hope that their opinion would be overheard. To make sure of their views being brought to the attention of the authorities many expressed themselves to persons whose telephones are always tapped.

Mussolini is not ignorant of the unpopularity of his foreign policy, but he is determined to stick to the alliance and to strengthen it. Since Hitler has so far reaped greater benefits from the axis than his partner, most observers here feel that the hour of payment will have to come. This view, let me add, is not shared by everybody; some diplomatic observers who claim to have pipelines to the Duce maintain that Mussolini does not insist on immediate payment. Most persons, however, are convinced that if only to maintain his prestige Mussolini will have to show some concrete profits from the axis—and show them soon. Many point to the feverish activity in armament factories as proof that preparations for a crisis are continuing.

The main question at the moment is where and when the axis will strike. Speculation is rife about Tunis and French Somaliland. The latter is especially important because of Djibouti harbor and the Addis Ababa railroad. The thought of an offensive against British interests at the outset seems to have been given up. Instead, more and more attention is being devoted to the French colonial empire, the dismemberment of which, some Italians think, the British would not seriously oppose. Yet it is difficult to see how Italy could obtain either Somaliland or Tunis without violating the agreement just signed with England. A move against Tunis would of course seriously upset the status quo in the Mediterranean, which is the basis of the agreement, while a change on the Red Sea could not but affect British interests profoundly. Mussolini will not risk lightly a violation of the agreement which might lead to its renunciation by England, for no other measure, except perhaps the recall of the soldiers from Spain, has been so genuinely popular as the English pact. Possibly it is too much to say, as some do, that it has saved the regime; certain it is, however, that more than anything else it has bolstered up Mussolini's prestige among all sections of the population.

In his foreign policy as in internal affairs Mussolini has been impaled on a dilemma from which escape is likely to prove impossible. He needs England to counterbalance somewhat the growing German influence; yet the agreement rules out any imperial expansion which might be his reward for service to the axis. Moreover, it is not so certain that Hitler is anxious to pay. Yet to break away from the axis would be suicide. A democratic Italy, by aligning itself with France and other democratic powers, might conceivably overcome the German menace in the north, but such a course would spell the collapse of the regime at no distant date.

ANTI-SEMITISM AND THE VATICAN

Only in the light of internal and external difficulties can the Jewish situation in Italy be understood. Sufficient for a prison sentence in Italy is to be overheard saying that Mussolini is aping Hitler in his anti-Jewish legislation; he is aping Hitler because he has to. It is probable that Hitler demanded a common Jewish policy during his recent visit to Rome. Today the Jewish problem, which has been badly mishandled by the world press, is at least as serious in Italy as in Germany—possibly more so.

Yet during my stay in Rome and other cities in 1935 I went out of my way to search for a Jewish problem and found none. No cloud hung over the sky for years; when the storm broke it took the political weather forecasters by complete surprise. No anti-Jewish propaganda which had taken root had prepared the Italian people—or the Jews. But the storm has been as ferocious and devastating as it was sudden. The Italian government has not provided any of those ameliorating measures which, certainly during the first four years, left avenues of escape open to German Jews.

The anti-Jewish decrees have followed one another with the rapidity of machine-gun firing, and with worse effects. In less than three months they have achieved the following: no Jewish student, Italian or foreign, is allowed to begin studies in a university; all Jewish students have been expelled from high schools; special classes have been opened in the elementary schools for Jewish children, who must enter the building through a special door; all Jews who entered Italy since the World War, whether naturalized or not, must get out before March 1, 1939; Italian Jews cannot own urban real estate which produces an income of more than $1,000 annually or more than about fifty acres of rural property; they cannot own factories employing more than 300 workers; "Aryan" maids must not serve in Jewish homes; all Jews in the service of the state, whether in the civil service or the armed forces or semi-state institutions, have been dismissed; all Jewish teachers, university professors, journalists, writers, and artists have been dismissed; a Jew may not appear on the stage, nor may the work of a Jewish writer, Italian or foreign, be published; banks, insurance companies, and other financial institutions may not be directed by Jews and must dismiss their Jewish employees; the Jewish owner of a shop or any business may not leave his property to his children; no new Jewish employees may be taken on by any organization. This list is by no means complete, but it gives a fair idea of the thoroughness with which the work has been done.

What is the role of the Italian people in this tragedy? Is it staging anti-Jewish riots and demonstrations, is it smashing windows, are mobs attacking Jews? Have the Italian masses all of a sudden become conscious of their exalted Aryan origin and begun to despise the lowly Jew? Nothing of the sort. Anybody who knows anything at all about Italy will agree with me that 90 per cent of the population does not like these laws. Most people, the vast majority of the population, do not understand what it is all about. In Germany the movement began, at least superficially, in the lower classes and hardly ever reached the upper strata; here it began at the very top. Italians have confessed to me that, coming on top of his other recent mistakes, the anti-Jewish laws have convinced them that Mussolini has lost his head.

It would be a grave injustice not to mention the courageous attitude shown by the Vatican. The Vatican was the first to speak out against the new racial dogmas, terming them "excessive nationalism." It had no legal means of implementing its opposition to the anti-Jewish laws, but it never left any doubt about where it stood. Only when Mussolini prohibited marriage between Aryan and non-Aryan Christians was it given an opportunity for official intervention. In very polite letters addressed to the King and to Mussolini the Vatican pointed out that the prohibition of such marriages was a clear violation of the Concordat, by which the state agreed to confirm marriages solemnized by the church. The Vatican has also gone out of its way to extend aid to baptized Jews.

Events have driven the Vatican more and more to the conclusion that peace between the church and the Fascist state is impossible. This conclusion has been unwelcome to the papacy; for years it struggled against it. A liberal French journalist who for years has asserted publicly and privately that fascism and Christianity are fundamentally irreconcilable told me of a high church dignitary who used to grant the basic incompatibility between the two but argue that a modus vivendi might yet be found. About a month ago, however, this prelate said to him, "I have been mistaken. I now see the impossibility of finding even a temporary modus vivendi with this monster. It must be crushed." One priest said to me, "The greatest battle in the history of the Catholic church is looming on the horizon."

Unfortunately, the chances of the church winning this battle are extremely small. It might still win on the international front, but in Italy the church has ceased to be a power. In the official Fascist trinity of loyalties the church comes only third and last, and that is its position in the heart of the Italian youth. In Rome the Vatican has no longer any influence whatever, and churchmen make no denial of this fact. Meanwhile, Mussolini is ceaselessly trying to capture the church and make it the handmaid of his policies. The next struggle will probably be fought within the church itself.

Three Southern Towns

I. TUPELO: FEUDALISM AND TVA

BY WILLSON WHITMAN

THE Tennessee Valley has no big cities but a hundred county seats. These valley towns differ, as the seven valley states differ, in history and character; but more interesting than their local color is the fact that arrested Southern economy has preserved intact various stages of economic progress, each of which may be almost perfectly exemplified in some one town. To consider in turn Tupelo, Mississippi, Huntsville, Alabama, and Kingsport, Tennessee, is to range all the way from rugged individualism through decadent capitalism to streamlined industrial planning, or from feudalism to fascism in three hard lessons.

Tupelo, Mississippi, is called "the TVA city" by the local chamber of commerce. In 1933 Congressman John E. Rankin persuaded his home town to plug in government power, and now it is known throughout the country as the satisfied first customer of TVA current.

Mr. Rankin admits that it took some argument, but argument in Tupelo is simple because you can do most of it with one man. Suppose you wanted to talk to the vice-president of the Tupelo Cotton Mills, or the president of the Tupelo Garment Company, or the president of the Citizens' Bank of Tupelo; or suppose you had business with the Tupelo Brick and Tile Company, or with R. D. Reed and Company, the Main Street department store—in each case you would ask for Mr. Rex Reed. Or you might be interested in the local hospital, or the Red Cross, or the Tupelo Rotary Club, or have an inquiry for the state board of public welfare; again the best man to see would be Mr. Rex Reed. Of course there are other business men in Tupelo, a town with a population of some 6,000, and others who believe with Mr. Reed that the road to success is service, but there is not much business, public or private, that is not somehow connected with the Reed enterprises.

It was rumored that the Tupelo Cotton Mills saved $18,000 on their power bills the first year they had TVA power. Norman Thomas wondered out loud if companies which saved money by the use of government power would pass on their savings to their workers. The answer was given at Tupelo: just about the time the cotton mill counted its savings, the Supreme Court invalidated the NRA; so wages instead of being raised were lowered. This was hard, because the workers in the cotton mills lost money in another way when TVA power was plugged in. They lived in company houses, and since their lights were on the company line, they had paid at the industrial rate—50 cents a month. For TVA power they paid the regular residential rate, with a 75-cent minimum. Electricity was cheaper now for everybody else in the town but two bits higher for them. The two bits counted. With a $4,000 weekly pay roll, the mill had 400 employees; you can figure the average wage for a forty-six-hour week.

In the spring of 1937, when everybody was doing it, the mill workers had the spunk to start a sitdown strike. Jimmy Cox, a machinist in the mill for seven years, was the leader. Jimmy had a wife and two small children to worry about, but he was young and hopeful. They asked for a 15 per cent raise in wages and a forty-hour week. Of course they didn't stand a chance to get it. The mill offered to compromise on 10 per cent, but it wasn't to be a raise; it would have to be a bonus at Christmas. And the management wouldn't reduce hours at all. As the strike started in April, Christmas seemed a long way off; so Jimmy Cox, with a two-to-one vote to back him, stood pat.

The management said that if the workers were going to be ugly about it, they would have to shut down the mill. Last summer the mill building, with a square tower like a feudal fort, was still shut. Southern workers do not break windows, and the glass was therefore still intact. But scarlet trumpet vines were holding the fort, and on the door a card read, "This property is now in the hands of the receiver appointed by the Chancery Court of Lee County, Mississippi." The mill cottages on the streets between the railroad tracks and the cotton fields bore the same placards. When evictions were tried during the strike, Jimmy Cox asked the Red Cross for tents because the mill workers had joined the Red Cross by a pay-roll checkoff, but Mrs. Rex Reed, the Lee County chairman, had no tents available. Nobody could say what the people lived on, for there is no "home relief," as Northerners know it, in Mississippi.

Congressman Rankin, in Washington, charged that the National Labor Relations Board was "conspiring with communistic influences to destroy Southern industries," and that "the ruthless manner in which they helped to destroy and forced the liquidation of the cotton mill in Tupelo, throwing all the employees out of work, and the brutal manner in which they are now trying to destroy the garment factories in that city is enough to stir the people of my state to revolt."

After the cotton-mill strike a loud-speaker was put in the garment factory to tell the girls how well off they were and that unions were not to be trusted. But wages were as low as $5 a week, and some of the girls were discontented enough to listen to Tupelo's first outside organizer. Ida Sledge came from one of the best families in Memphis, but she had been corrupted by Wellesley and social work. So Miss Sledge was asked to leave Tupelo by a committee of loyalists from Reed Brothers, and actually escorted out of town by a group of local business men. It may be embarrassing for Southern gentlemen to have to treat a lady in this fashion, but Southern papers, discussing Tupelo's trouble, had referred to the Wellesley girl as "an influx of C. I. O. agitators."

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

When the girls who had joined the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union lost their jobs, they appealed to the Labor Board—and Tupelo got busy organizing company unions. Members of the Chamber of Commerce, the City Council, and the Kiwanis formed a Citizens' Committee, which entertained loyal workers with patriotic speeches, a dinner at the Hotel Tupelo, and a barbecue at the Legion hut; the mayor issued a statement against agitators; and the sheriff announced his determination to "protect Tupelo's industries from outsiders." City ordinances sought to discourage distribution of union circulars, and both papers refused union advertising; the Tupelo News gritted its teeth over the need to keep "the virgin Southland free from a communistic organization," and dared the Labor Board to invade Dixie. Both papers printed the page advertisements of the Tupelo Garment Company urging industrial "co-operation" by all "true, red-blooded Americans." The citizens telegraphed Congressman Rankin and Senator Pat Harrison demanding defeat of the wage-hour law and congratulated Congressman Rankin when he warned Washington that the streets of Southern towns might be "stained with the blood of innocent people as a result of the activities of these irresponsible representatives of the so-called Labor Relations Board."

The nearest thing to bloodshed in Tupelo was the experience of Jimmy Cox. Tupelo was Jimmy's home town, just as it was Congressman Rankin's and Mr. Rex Reed's; he had taken civil-service examinations and was first on the list of eligible substitutes at the Tupelo post office. The cotton mill had been in receivership for a year. One day as he was walking along the streets a car drove up and a man told him to get in. Since another car was behind, with twelve men in the two, there was no use arguing. They took Jimmy twenty miles out into the country, tied a rope around his neck, and started to tie the other end to the rear axle of the first car. He talked them out of that, or maybe they were just trying to scare him; at any rate they stretched him over a log instead and beat him with their belts. The people who took care of him afterward said he was pretty badly hurt—it was feared he might lose an arm. He had to go for treatment to the new hospital, dedicated shortly before by Mr. Rex Reed.

That was last spring. Last summer Tupelo industry faced its crisis. All three factories had company unions, and more than twenty girls had been fired for membership in the I. L. G. W. U. Or so the union was prepared to prove by depositions taken in the Holiness Church. Since the Tupelo courthouse was not available for the NLRB hearing—"Tupelo don't want no riffraff in its courthouse," explained the farmer husband of one of the witnesses—lawyers and examiner moved over to Aberdeen, the next county seat, a smaller, older town peacefully asleep under its magnolia trees. Everybody expected the hearing to last for weeks, but it was over in two days. First two, then all of the girls discharged were ordered reinstated with back pay. Company unions were ordered dissolved, with a word about unfair practices.

The Labor Board works quickly in such cases because it is dealing with a familiar condition. Except for its TVA power, Tupelo resembles other little Southern towns as one houn' dawg resembles another; and in such little towns all over the South industrial feudalism is making its last stand. Of course the "loyal" girls who had saved on Coca-Colas to pay for the company union were surprised. The Tupelo Journal, announcing the result of the hearing, headlined its story "NLRB Turns Down Garment Workers' Plea," and quoted local opinion that the board was "under the thumb of John L. Lewis and his C. I. O. unions and it was useless to expect any just verdict." The News managed to make the decision sound favorable to the factories.

During the Civil War a Yankee general who had won a little engagement near Tupelo was persuaded to retreat and leave his wounded behind. Now, after the NLRB examiner had gone back to New York, there were casualties to be counted and a similar confusion as to which side had won. The union girls had their wages and a chance to sew more TVA-brand shirts, but one garment factory and the cotton mill would stay shut. And what good does reinstatement in a job do you if the big boss and the foreladies and right-thinking people in the town are still against you? The board may say "without prejudice" but it can't enforce it. It isn't as if there were jobs enough to go round.

There is no doubt about what the best people think. To learn their views you have only to attend Sunday school at Mr. Rex Reed's church. There, the week of the hearing, the teacher of an adult class departed from the regular lesson to say what a great mistake it was to think we could substitute social service for true faith. Some churches made that mistake and some modern schools, and our President made it when he planned to regulate wages and hours of work.

Tupelo is typical of that large section of the South which is willing to accept New Deal benefits, unwilling to undertake New Deal reforms. Right now, with a new reduction in rates and a profit of $40,000 on TVA power last year, it might be unsafe for anti-Administration forces to ask Tupelo to vote on a clear-cut choice between TVA plus NLRB or neither. What Tupelo wants is feudalism with electric fans.

In the state that inveigled WPA into subsidizing school manufacture of hosiery, TVA is not the only agency to be made an unwilling accessory to unfair enterprise. But the Tupelo labor case could have, for TVA, a greater significance than the Congressional hearings at Knoxville. The government as a manufacturer of power regulates its resale to domestic consumers; what about its use in industry? Congressman Rankin, one of the authors of the TVA act, insisted that passage of the wage-hour bill would mean "the end of civilization as we know it." In Tupelo, the day after the union victory, he was happy to talk about TVA and how much the Hotel Tupelo was saving on its light bill, but he wouldn't discuss labor questions. He didn't, he said, know what the cotton mill had paid its people. Congressman Rankin was reelected by a comfortable majority in the fall, and there can be no doubt that he is, for Tupelo, the perfect Representative.

It is less certain that it will be desirable for the country to make good in all respects a prophecy which President Roosevelt, in the first flush of enthusiasm over TVA achievements, voiced at Tupelo four years ago: "What you are doing here is going to be copied in every state in the Union."

[This is the first of a series of three sketches intended to illustrate three parallel lines of development in the South today—the feudal town, the runaway Northern-industry town, and the "model" company town. The latter two will be described in early issues.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

In the Wind

SURVEYS INDICATE that a large percentage of newspaper readers are "headline readers." Here are two warnings to those who skip the text. The Akron Beacon Journal recently published this headline: "No Third Term, Laborites Say." The dispatch beneath said nothing about a third term; it reported that Labor's Non-Partisan League would boycott "third-party movements." The New Haven Courier Journal ran this headline: "C. I. O. Lists Arguments for Labor Act Change." The dispatch stated that the C. I. O. had just issued a pamphlet called "Why the Wagner Act Should Not Be Amended."

THE NEWEST anti-Nazi story circulating in London concerns a drunk who was arrested in Germany for calling Göring a Schweinhund. He was punished for three offenses: (1) being drunk and disorderly; (2) using abusive language about a person in authority; (3) endangering the safety of the state by revealing an official secret.

IN A booklet published recently by the Osaka Chamber of Commerce appears this lament:

> The Japanese regret they are poor propagandists, especially in refuting lies circulated by the Chinese. . . . The Japanese cannot carry on propaganda because in their eyes it is tantamount to spreading false news.

NEWSPAPERS IN rebel Spain unearth strange scoops. A Seville paper, describing recent "Jewish provocations" in Germany, reports that "nevertheless the German people do not easily lose self-control or independence; not even one case of personal or material aggression against Jewish people has taken place." The Corte de Castilla of Valladolid has discovered the "secret" reason for French labor's efforts to retain the extra holiday provided in the Blum reforms and eliminated by the Reynaud decrees. Jewish influence, it finds, is behind the campaign because "Saturday is the Jewish holiday." What this journal has not discovered is that the extra holiday in France is on Monday.

ON NOVEMBER 19 this department stated that "negotiations looking toward ironclad censorship of Canadian news broadcasts" were taking place in Canada and that among the participants in the discussion were the Canadian Press and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Alan Plaunt of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and J. F. B. Livesay of the Canadian Press have since written us denying the statements and asserting that there is no basis for them. The original item was based on a source which we had every reason to believe was reliable; in the light of the information since received, however, we are satisfied that we were misinformed, and we are accordingly glad to withdraw the statements.

SPRINGING UP on Midwestern college campuses is a new organization called the Collegiate Forum of Americanism. Its spiritual and financial backers range from Grant Stauffer, Landon's Kansas City campaign manager, to Charles Walgreen, chain-drugstore magnate. Although its leaders insist it is "non-partisan," liberal students contend that its tone and direction are clearly anti-New Deal and pro-Republican.

TYPOGRAPHICAL TRAGEDIES: From the New York Times, December 4, 1938: "Then came the matron of honor, Mrs. John Roosevelt, in a velvet frock of blight blue, and a toque of ten other ushers." . . . From the St. Louis Star-Times, November 21, 1938, the headline: "Cofounder of Order Beautified by Pope Pius." . . . From the same story: "Mother Mazzarello was born in 1937 and died in 1881." . . . From Our Sunday Visitor, November 27, 1938: "Even allowing for exaggerations in testimony presented to the Dies committee, every prejudiced person must grant that witnesses are bringing to light information pointing to forces . . . which do not differ essentially from those to which the present excesses in Russia and Germany are traceable."

[We invite readers to submit material for In the Wind. The $5 prize for the best item submitted during December goes to M. of Chicago for the story about the Chicago Tribune published two weeks ago.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I HAVE read with interest Mrs. Franklin Roosevelt's vigorous defense of the right of a President's wife to earn money and of a President's children to lead their own lives regardless of their father's position. In an interview given to women reporters she said that she was speaking not merely for her own family but in general about the kind of life members of the Presidents' families should live. She asked if the American people wanted a family in the White House in which the children would make no effort to earn their own living and the wife renounce all her previous interests and obligations and be totally dependent upon her husband during his Presidency. This she thought might lead to the "wholly logical climax that a woman would refuse to live in the White House on such terms." Finally, she said she respected the ethical obligation upon a President's family not to profit from the association or use their position for special favors, but she did not feel obliged to renounce her normal way of living.

I am glad that Mrs. Roosevelt has thus openly stated her position. Let me say here that I admire her greatly and that I shall never cease to be grateful to her for having done so much to smash the silly tradition that was growing up around "the first lady of the land." The press of the country was doing its best to make of the President's wife a kind of quasi-royalty, and it was high time for a woman to come along and by her mode of life remind us that the President's wife is no different from the rest of American women, that she is entitled to no particular favors or special consideration as of right because her husband is President. I have said before that Mrs. Roosevelt rendered us a great public service when she declined to accept a police and secret-service escort. I happened to be in the same airplane with her once last winter, and it did me good to see her come in and take her place like any ordinary passenger without any escort whatever. I believe in the Cincinnatus idea for the President as well as for his wife. We ought never to forget in these days of dictators that the President is simply one of us who has left his plow for four or eight years and is going back to it.

But having said that, I want to point out one or two weaknesses in Mrs. Roosevelt's position. She assumes that every White House wife in the future will be as interested in affairs and as busy with her own special lines of activity as she herself. That is not likely to be the case. Mrs. Roosevelt's predecessors have been of the other kind. They have been women whose lives were wrapped up with those of their husbands before they entered the White House and who found they had enough to keep them busy in running the White House and living up to its social obligations. It is quite true that the American people would naturally like to have a family in the White House which stood on its own feet, whose members of working age set a good example of being workers and not drones. The difficulty here is that the members of Mrs. Roosevelt's family have not been content to take small positions and live quietly outside the limelight. They have been after the big money, and they have not been any too careful how they got it. This is a hard thing to say, and Mrs. Roosevelt may deny it, but I think it is none the less correct.

I refer specifically to one son and one son-in-law and her daughter, who have taken service with Hearst. Nobody has abused Franklin Roosevelt more than William Randolph Hearst. Pride in their father alone should have made it impossible for a Roosevelt, or a Roosevelt-in-law, to take Hearst money. More than that, Mrs. Roosevelt must know what every respectable newspaperman has felt—that Hearst has been for years the basest and most degrading influence in journalism. When he took a young newspaper reporter out of Washington and made him manager of his Seattle newspaper, although he had had no experience whatever in the difficult business of operating a daily, the deduction was inevitable that Mr. Boettiger was selected because he was the President's son-in-law. Not only is he drawing a very large salary, but his wife, in imitation of her mother, writes a daily column in that newspaper and is paid for it, too. Elliott Roosevelt has also taken service with the unspeakable Hearst, if reports are correct at a much larger salary than a young man of his years and inexperience could possibly earn if his name were not Roosevelt.

As for James Roosevelt, that is such a sad case that I prefer not to comment upon it as I do not wish to hurt Mrs. Roosevelt's feelings. There again it is impossible to believe that his new position has really been earned by him, or that his alliance with the insurance company in Boston, in which Mrs. Roosevelt has just become a director to represent his interest, has been altogether to his credit. With all friendliness to Mrs. Roosevelt and to the President, I am sorry to have to record my sincere belief that the example set by the Roosevelt children in their money-making is not one in which I as an American can take any particular pride. Sometimes I think it would have been better if they had done nothing.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Philanthropy and Education

PHILANTHROPIC FOUNDATIONS AND HIGHER EDUCATION. By E. V. Hollis. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

THIS sober and scholarly study is the best that has so far been published on the subject of the philanthropic foundations and their relation to education. The foundations have come to occupy a pivotal position in American social life, and in the field of research it is hardly too much to say that they are now almost the dominant influence. By their decisions they go far toward swinging the balance of policy in one direction rather than another. Professor Hollis has covered a wide sweep in his survey. He deals with over one hundred institutions, ranging from minor bodies like the Washington Foundation to major organizations like those of Rockefeller and Carnegie. He explains their policies, their methods of organization, the range of their activities, the subject matter of their grants. His work is done with a thoroughness that merits high praise; and there is throughout the pages of his volume a pleasant sense of ironic humor not always characteristic of books of this kind. It is particularly useful, moreover, to have these powerful institutions set, as Mr. Hollis sets them, in the general social context of the time.

It is not easy to say what conclusions emerge from the study. That there are wide fields in which the foundations have done invaluable work is unquestionable. Not least in the natural sciences they have raised both the standards of research and the level of the educational institutions upon which they have bestowed their blessing. If there has been much waste in their expenditures, if the objectives they have blessed have tended to be obvious rather than exceptional, if, for the most part, they have acted upon the principle that to the college which hath, more shall be given, all this is pretty natural; foundations are mostly the work of conservative benefactors unlikely to experiment with the unknown or the exceptional. It is interesting to note from Mr. Hollis's illuminating tables how fully the activities of foundations follow the drift of general sentiment in the age. It is important to observe how completely their trustees represent the dominant type of business man, and how unsuccessful they have been in their effort to secure any other form of government. Mr. Hollis says relatively little about the executive officers of foundations, though one may, I think, legitimately infer from his account that he is aware of how little they have really done to secure, in a general way, a personnel in any way adequate to the immense authority they exert.

The problem raised by their growth and power remains unsolved. It is simply the problem that universities cannot afford to neglect their good-will, and that they are therefore compelled to devote a considerable part of their energies to discovering how this good-will may be acquired. It is not improbable that it would be a good thing if foundations were permitted neither to assist specific objectives, which has the effect of tilting the incidence of an institution in a particular direction, nor themselves to engage in inquiries, which tends to direct the energy of researchers into channels of which the foundations happen to approve. Anyone who has had experience of them in operation cannot but be aware that in both these fields a great deal has been done that ought not to have been done. People have become powerful in particular institutions because they could influence the trustees. Others have become significant less by reason of the quality of their research than because its subject matter happened to interest the officers of a foundation. Universities have been tempted to set up on a large scale departments which have later died because the supporting body ceased to be interested in their operation. In the social sciences particularly, the foundations have encouraged the growth of a type of cooperative research which has multiplied the business of description without offering any clear guidance to what the description implies. In many institutions scholars have been under pressure to associate themselves with projects of research which a particular foundation was eager to bless, to the detriment of the work they themselves wished to undertake. And the foundations have unquestionably fostered the growth of a research proletariat, the tragic race of "research assistants," who have made quantitative research a substitute in many places for serious thinking. If America had the custom of appointing royal commissions, it would be illuminating indeed to have one make a critical examination of the place and function of foundations in our society. I think it would emerge from the inquiry that, in general, where they have assisted objects the worth of which was, whether as to method or end, proved before they came into the field, they have been of high utility; but that where they have sought to innovate, whether in end or method, their trustees have been too ignorant and their executives too second-rate to be capable of the insight and imagination requisite to successful innovation.

HAROLD J. LASKI

A Music Critic to the Rescue

MUSIC ON RECORDS. By B. H. Haggin. Oxford University Press. $1.25.

COMPARED to the sum total of permanently enjoyable music, the amount of recorded music is small; but compared to the amount of recorded music, the amount available in the concert hall or on the radio is more inadequate still. This fact of our cultural life is plain but often overlooked. It is easy to infer that if orchestras give us only the best, as they profess to do, what they do not give us must be inferior and negligible. The United States, which seems to become noticeably fonder of music every Christmas, should be made aware of this fallacy. To recognize it as such is to recognize that music is of all the arts the most subject to arbitrary fashion and complacent routine.

With all their imperfections, therefore, recordings do for music what books do for poetry and the drama. They make rlingame, Cal.

LIC LIBRARY

us independent of public bards and private managers; they enable us to know and enjoy a larger repertory than current taste or commercial instinct will at any time support. Now, the chief imperfections of recordings are poor performance and poor mechanical reproduction. Add to these the unfamiliarity of certain musical idioms and the confusing verbiage of blurb writers and you have the raison d'être of B. H. Haggin's latest book, "Music on Records."

Its aim is to give a critical list of the particular works and recordings of works that the music library of a fairly eclectic citizen might possess. The beginner is advised, the disc-collector of yesteryear is warned, and the practiced connoisseur is agreeably diverted by discussions of artists, pieces, and performances about which he may or may not agree with Mr. Haggin. For it is throughout a question of Mr. Haggin's choice. In vigorous and unmistakable language he tells us what his ears have heard and what his mind has thought in the disinterested pursuit of musical pleasure. That is in itself one of the virtues of his little book. Because he is a good critic, good music is what he approves of. A good critic is a man whose wide-ranging explorations have left him with definite opinions and concrete reasons for his preferences and who is still able to see that his preferences are useful sidelights and not absolute mandates.

Mr. Haggin takes issue with the popular—or highbrow—estimates of Tchaikovsky, Brahms, César Franck, and Wagner. He gives a handsome introduction to certain minor masters while generally disallowing the cant of coteries, whether about Bach or about Bruckner; and in showing by his attitude that the only critical sin is pretense, he always leaves one with the feeling that as opponent or as ally he possesses a just mind and a sensitive one. Music for him is not a badge of superiority, a private corner for pedantry, or an occasion for "rich, beautiful prose." It is simply a means of communication and a source of joy.

Since the book is a reference work as well as a critical account, it may not be amiss to mention here some trivial errors which it is hoped the author will have a chance of rectifying in future editions. The Index, for example, is well planned but incomplete. The names of Ethel Luening and Ralph Kirkpatrick, and perhaps others, which are mentioned in the text, are not listed at the back. Some recordings, also, are suggested without serial numbers attached. It is not true that no part of Haydn's "Seasons" is recorded: French HMV has an aria sung by Morturier (No. 1137). It might also be useful to add to the well-turned remarks recommending Berlioz's works that the recorded pieces of his do not begin to give a sample of his variety and power. Lastly, as a single lapse from unimpeachable critical style, the too frequent use of "breath-taking" as an adjective of praise might be corrected.

In the light of Mr. Haggin's persevering critical work—which includes his previous "Book of the Symphony" and his fortnightly review column in The Nation—the outcry against "canned music" appears obscurantist and precious. The phonograph can give us access to more music, and more varied music, than was ever available before. If any objection is to be offered on the ground that machinery kills art, it must be restated in such a way as to fix the responsibility for the alleged murder: the machine left to its own devices is inert; left in the hands of commercial agencies it tends to increase human stupidity by multiplying its opportunities and embalming its products; but controlled by critical intelligence acting through a catholic public taste, the machine remains in fact the only means of truly democratizing culture.

JACQUES BARZUN

Young Shoppers

JOHNNY GET YOUR MONEY'S WORTH. By Ruth Brindze. Vanguard Press. $2.

BEHIND THE LABEL. By Margaret Dana. Little, Brown and Company. $2.

NOT everything that looks like a book should really be considered one. Ruth Brindze's "Johnny Get Your Money's Worth" should be called household equipment. It is a tool for making buying more intelligent and saving you money, just as important in the house as a vacuum cleaner and much more so than that extra little table to hold ash-trays. The book is written for children and about what children can buy, but there is plenty in it for grown-ups.

Take candy and the big-looking 50-cent package that holds no more than a 10-cent package. The actual weight is put on in mighty small type. There's a rum toffee without either rum or toffee; "wild cherry" drops whose label is marked in tiny type, "added acid, artificial flavor, certified food color"—you need a magnifying glass to learn that only the sugar is genuine. It seems beyond belief that a manufacturer will try to sell children Easter eggs poisoned with lead and zinc dyes. But apparently a penny is a penny, and a hundred children's pennies make a dollar. "Break and Take" is the alluring name of a penny-gambling candy scheme which I couldn't have resisted when I was a child. In a single year a billion pounds of candy may be sold in the United States. Children eat most of it. It is pretty hard to get a boy or girl to examine a label closely before taking a good big bite. But a book like this addressed directly to the child increases his own sense of importance and responsibility.

The American pennies that don't go for candy mostly go for ice cream, and Miss Brindze says that 200,000,000 gallons of ice cream are made in factories each year. But you can make a gallon look like two gallons by whipping air into it. Or take bicycles. Children like bicycles with extra trimmings, say the manufacturers, and so they pile on big fenders, headlights, and such. The et ceteras make the bicycle harder to pedal and slower, and of course they cost more. Miss Brindze's book turns the testing of a baseball glove into a sort of game for boys, and of course any boy will like to read that part about baseballs and then tell the other boys how much he knows.

This book isn't just a guide to help you pick out flaws and frauds. It also tells you how to find the good things—plenty of them. I wish I had known about its definite tests for buying a fountain pen when I got my last one. I made some feeble attempts to write a word or two, but Miss Brindze's tests, so easy to do at the counter, never occurred to me. This is a new kind of consumer book, and well done.

"Behind the Label," by Margaret Dana, tells valuable things about fabrics and clothes. It gives precise technical information about textiles and interesting details about the fashion racket, silk stockings, and furs. It has the gentle tone that might be expected when you know that much of it ran in the Atlantic Monthly. Miss Dana believes that products have deteriorated partly because the manufacturer has lost contact with his ultimate customers; he is in touch instead with dealers and salesmen, who prefer "appearance value" to "performance value." She gently chides dishonest advertising.

HELEN WOODWARD

Wordsworth and Coleridge

FAREWELL THE BANNER. By Frances Winwar. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

IN "Poor Splendid Wings" and "The Romantic Rebels" Mrs. Winwar proved that books about poets dead and gone could make fascinating reading, could even win a place on the best-seller lists. In "Farewell the Banner" she has again taken the material usually relegated to the formidable pages of scholarly journals and successfully shaped it into an engrossing portrait of two writers, Wordsworth and Coleridge, and Wordsworth's devoted sister Dorothy.

In view of the not altogether unjustifiable aversion of the average reader to works about long-dead writers, one might well hazard a theory as to why Mrs. Winwar succeeds where most others fail. Certainly it is not because of any superficiality, or sensationalism, or lack of scholarly research: she has digested all the most authentic sources and has simply breathed upon this material with her usual warm spirit of interpretation, neither adding nor extenuating. Perhaps the secret lies in the fact that in each of her books she has presented not a single figure but rather a group of closely related writers whose dealings with each other help to keep them human for us, whereas in the usual literary biography the lens of the camera is focused so narrowly upon the one central figure that he tends to lose his humanity, to give the impression of a mere machine for turning out literature.

There must, of course, be one dominant personality. In "Poor Splendid Wings" it was Dante Rossetti; in the new book it is Coleridge who, in spite of his erratic and slothful temperament, his shrinking from the material responsibilities of life, and his self-abasement before first Southey and then Wordsworth, stands out and wins the reader's sympathy, as he obviously has that of Mrs. Winwar. For Wordsworth was not a lovable character; supremely egotistical, essentially puritanical in spite of his liberal views on theology, utterly wrapped up in his mission and in dark musings on his youthful affair with Annette Vallon, he sucked up the energies of those around him and gave little in return. Dorothy he doubtless loved, though even upon her worship he made exorbitant demands; as for Coleridge, whose stimulating presence stirred men's minds like a powerful drug, Wordsworth's disparagement of his sensitive friend's poetry was at least partly responsible for the latter's decision to abandon his chosen career and devote himself to the drudgery of lecturing and prose.

This poetic death of Coleridge is the central theme of the book, and the title, adapted from "Othello," symbolizes the lament of the poet for his art, as it does the lament of the Moor for his more warlike trade:

> O now for ever
> Farewell the tranquil mind! farewell content!
> The royal banner and all quality . . .
> Farewell! Othello's occupation's gone!

With his own valedictory Coleridge read the obsequies over his career as a poet of one great finished poem and several magnificent fragments.

And yet it is questionable whether this ignominious conclusion, so tragic to the man, really resulted in a very great loss to English letters. Coleridge might or might not have produced more poetry equal to "Christabel," but he lived to exert a profound influence on his time, as lecturer, as philosopher, and, above all, as conversationalist—if, indeed, his conversation was not one continued lecture. As one critic remarked, "He threw a great stone into the standing-pool of contemporary thought." He had, to use Mrs. Winwar's phrase, "the seminative power." The wild seeds of his imagination, "plentiful as thistledown, settled upon the retentive soil of Wordsworth's mind and bided their time. Everything Coleridge said, a word, a thought, a fleeting allusion or some elaborate extension of his philosophical discoveries, found a furrow for later root." Such a man, even in defeat, is worth knowing.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

The Machine Wins

F. O. B. DETROIT. By Wessel Smitter. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

HERE is a novel, the first within my knowledge, which expresses successfully the major preoccupation of civilized life—the domination of man by the machine. Mr. Smitter is enabled by his experience to adopt the direct and most forcible approach. The greater part of the drama takes place within a big automobile factory in Detroit, and we watch the two contrasted protagonists. Benny, who tells the story, is an old hand. He has worked for the Holt plant before; his ambition is to become what is called a straw boss, and he nearly becomes a stool pigeon. With complete simplicity he accepts Mr. Holt's booklets and dicta; he doesn't like to tell a lie because "Mr. Holt is against lying." It is the new theology.

Russ, on the other hand, knows nothing of factory life, having come direct from a lumber camp. He wants to make and save money so that he can take up clamming and have an open-air independent life. The first job he gets in the factory suits him well, for it gives him scope to use his brains and initiative. He runs an electric crane which handles big steel, and handles it in such a way as to inspire the watchful and protective Benny to rhapsody. But then comes marriage with an Italian taxi-dancer, and a baby is on the way when the factory closes temporarily as a result of the obvious machinations of big business. After a long period of semi-starvation, the two men go back to different work. Now Russ is "on the line": he has to feed the machine instead of controlling it. He sees around him men who are half crazy because of the continual tension of high-speed methods, and fears for his own sanity. In the end it is another calamity which overtakes him.

Dynamic, original, powerful are adjectives that will have been applied to Mr. Smitter's book for its quickfire, intimate narrative style. They are deserved, but the real strength of the story is the economy with which it lays bare this new cancer in the heart of progress. NORAH HOULT

The Railroads in the Nineties

REORGANIZATION OF THE AMERICAN RAILROAD SYSTEM. 1893-1900. By E. G. Campbell. Columbia University Press. $4.50.

THIS excellent documentation of the great railroad crisis of the nineties amply illustrates the fact that Mr. Micawber has been the patron philosopher of American railroad finance. For the railroad crisis from which the country is suffering today is merely a repetition on a larger scale of the earlier crisis, which was solved by the elder Morgan on the assumption that something would surely turn up to solidify the water his reorganizations poured into the railroads.

The specialized task which Dr. Campbell has set himself covers minutely the period of bankruptcy and reorganization which in so many ways launched the modern America of the trusts. The basic assumption accepted by all the reorganizers was that our industry would continue to expand during the first half of this century as rapidly as it had expanded during the last half of the last century, and therefore that the present generation could absorb and pay for all the watered capital and bad debts of the Robber Barons. The first half of this assumption has been amply justified. Who can deny that industry has grown as rapidly during the age of Ford as it did during the age of Bessemer? The second assumption has been invalidated by precisely the same practice which brought on the crisis of the nineties. We have not absorbed the debt burden which we inherited in the form of railroad bonds; on the contrary, the unbalanced budgets of the railroads, their inability to pay as they go, is brewing a crisis even more dangerous than that of which Dr. Campbell writes.

It is necessary only to substitute modern dates and modern bad actors for those of Dr. Campbell's period. Take the case of the Union Pacific. During the period of the pork barrel which followed the Civil War, government land and money grants made possible the building of the great transcontinental railroad systems, one of the foremost of which was the Union Pacific. The government, counting interest on its money, was owed some $70,000,000. The arrangement called for the Union Pacific to pay a fixed portion of its annual revenues into a sinking fund until a sum was accumulated sufficient to enable the road to pay off the government. This was never done, so that when the debt matured, the road was ready for reorganization. And Jett Lauck, the famous labor economist, says that the original "fictitious securities were perpetuated in the capitalization of the Union Pacific in the reorganization of 1896 and involved . . . an annual drain upon its resources of $5,000,000." Now substitute the B. and O. for the Union Pacific, and 1939 for 1896. In 1939 the billion-dollar B. and O. will be forced to pay some of its bondholders off to the tune of $51,000,000, of which it has a chance of raising not a dollar from its present resources. Or consider the plight of our railroad system as a whole, which squandered more than $2,000,000,000 on bond-

The Winter Issue of SCIENCE & SOCIETY
A MARXIAN QUARTERLY
Vol. III No. 1

◆

SCIENCE AND THE ECONOMY OF SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY ENGLAND Robert K. Merton
THE FASCIST MOVEMENT IN JAPAN Victor A. Yakhontoff
COURBET AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES Oliver Larkin
THE LIMITATIONS OF FREUD Francis H. Bartlett
THE LETTERS OF LINCOLN STEFFENS Harold J. Laski

COMMUNICATIONS AND REVIEWS
Walter B. Cannon Louis Lozowick
Curtis P. Nettels T. A. Bisson
And Others

◆

30 EAST 20TH STREET
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Annual Subscription: $1.00 Single Copies: [illegible]
(Mexico, Canada: $1.25 Foreign: $1.50)

MASS MEETING
LIFT THE EMBARGO
Speakers:
Louis Fischer Int'l Famous Journalist
Lt. Col. John Gates Pol. Com. Lincoln Brigade
Maj. Milton Wolff Commander Lincoln-Washing- [illegible] Brigade. Just returned from Spain
Dr. Edith Summerskill British Labor Party M.P. Outstanding Opponent of Chamberlain
— also —
Veterans of American Medical Corps in Spain and Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade
— And Others —
MECCA TEMPLE
133 WEST 55th STREET
THURSDAY—JANUARY 5—at 8:15 P.M.
Tickets: $1.10, 83c, 55c, 25c

JOINT COMMITTEE to LIFT the EMBARGO
381 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.
To aid in your work, I am enclosing my contribution of $....................
Name..
Address..
City..N

Auspices: JOINT COMMITTEE TO LIFT THE EMBARGO. Proceeds: Medical Bureau & No. Amer. Comm. to Aid Spanish Democracy & Friends of the Lincoln Brigade holders during the last depression and left itself without adequate funds for buying needed equipment and thus carrying its share of capital-goods buying power.

Throughout our history the methods of capitalizing bad debts and solemnly passing them on to the rentiers of the next generation, which Dr. Campbell so adequately describes in his account of the bankruptcy of road after road, have returned to plague us in the form of impaired railroad purchasing power for steel and other materials and astronomic debts, maturing after many years, which the roads are unable to meet. Thirty-eight years after the great period of reorganization ended, the railroads are returning to the same bankrupt state in which Morgan and Harriman found them, and this time a different method of reorganization, one in the public interest, will be needed. ELIOT JANEWAY

Critique of the Security Act

INSECURITY. Second Revised Edition. By Abraham Epstein. Random House. $4.

THE revision of this fundamental book describes the developments in the field of social security down to the present, and gives at the same time the most trenchant criticism of the Social Security Act and its administration which has thus far appeared. More than any other single person, except President Roosevelt himself, Mr. Epstein has been the driving force for a sound system of social insurance to provide pooled protection from risks against which workers cannot individually guard themselves. When the Roosevelt Administration came to draft its plan for a national system, it did not, however, take counsel with either Mr. Epstein or that other seasoned authority, I. M. Rubinow, and the plan which it finally adopted was contrary to that which they advocated.

So far as old-age insurance was concerned, the Administration chose to finance the system entirely from pay-roll taxes, to make the younger workers pay for the "unearned" annuities granted to those in the upper age groups, and, as a means of reducing future taxes, to accumulate a huge reserve the interest upon which was designed to help pay future annuities. Mr. Epstein's corrosive criticism shows all of these steps to have been ill advised. He correctly points out that it is the wage-earners who pay pay-roll taxes in the form of lower wages or higher prices, even when these are nominally advanced by the employers, and he argues that the wealthier members of the community should assume some of this burden. This is especially true so far as the cost of the unearned annuities to the older workers is concerned, since these should be charges upon society rather than upon the younger generation. Nor does he have much difficulty in showing the weaknesses in the plan for huge reserves. The supposed analogy with private insurance companies is wholly inapplicable, since the government by its powers of compulsion is assured of a future flow of income which it can use to meet future claims for benefit; whereas this is not the case with the private companies. There is great danger, moreover, that the presence of these reserves will tempt Congress to waste them on non-income-producing and non-socially-beneficial projects, and leave the fund with a dead mass of government bonds, the interest on which will have to be met out of a national income which will be no greater because of such expenditures. It would be better under such circumstances to accumulate only a contingency reserve and to finance future expenditures directly from future taxes without resorting to the fiction of the reserve.

Mr. Epstein also properly protests against the abuses in the administration of old-age pensions, particularly in such states as Oklahoma, Missouri, and Ohio; his early exposure of these matters helped to focus public attention upon them and gave to the Social Security Board a large degree of public support when it sought to protect the integrity of the system.

The system of fifty-one separate state and territorial funds for unemployment insurance also comes in for justified criticism. Since the assessments are virtually uniform among the states but the relative incidence of unemployment varies, it is inevitable that the states with a high relative volume of unemployment will—in the not distant future—exhaust their reserves and, unless other provision be made, will be forced to curtail benefits. Just as a pooling of funds within a state is needed to insure benefits to the unemployed in the depressed industries and to prevent a "freezing" of idle plant reserves, so some federal pooling is needed to protect the unemployed in the more depressed states and to permit the funds to flow most freely where most needed.

There is only one major point on which I believe Mr. Epstein errs. This lies in not according due praise to the Roosevelt Administration for the progress which it has made in the field of social insurance. With all its faults the Social Security Act is on the whole a gigantic step forward. Most of its defects can and, I believe, will be removed by future amendments, provided only that we can keep a progressive national Administration in power. The recent elections have, however, raised the definite threat of future reaction which may undo much of the progress made. In view of this peril, I cannot help wishing that the true friends of social security might possess a greater degree of spiritual unity. Criticism should continue, but those who hold a fundamental basic faith should realize that what they believe in common is far more important than their points of difference.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY YEAR
WORKERS SCHOOL
Winter Term Registration
Courses in: Psychology, Economics, Dialectical Materialism, Marxism-Leninism, Literature, American History, Labor History, Current Events, War in China and Its International Implications, Modern European History, Introduction to Philosophy and many others. For descriptive Catalogue E, write to School Office.
35 EAST 12th STREET, NEW YORK CITY, AL. 4-1199

NOW you may order
BOOKS
from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
The Readers' Service Division
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 7, 1939 NUMBER 2

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 21

EDITORIALS:

FRANCO'S "FINAL" DRIVE 23
PROSPECTS FOR RECOVERY 24
FATHER COUGHLIN AND THE CHURCH 25
THE RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY 26
THE NATION'S HONOR ROLL FOR 1938 27
THIRTY MONTHS OF WAR IN SPAIN by Louis Fischer 28
THREE SOUTHERN TOWNS. II. HUNTSVILLE: YANKEE INDUSTRY WELCOME by Willson Whitman 31
POGROMS FOR PROFIT by Vladimir Pozner 33
POCKET GUIDE. SNOW WHITE IN JANUARY by Helen Woodward 35
IN THE WIND 36
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 37

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

POET IN SPITE OF HIMSELF by Louise Bogan 38
THE PRESS by Oswald Garrison Villard 39
MEDIEVAL FANTASY by Hassoldt Davis 39
ENGLISHMAN IN REVOLT by Arthur Rosenberg 40
LOGICAL EMPIRICISM by Sidney Hook 40
SO GREAT A MAN by George Libaire 41
SHORTER NOTICES 41
DRAMA: HERE COME THE GHOSTS by Joseph Wood Krutch 44
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 44
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 46

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE EXTENT OF NAZI INFLUENCE AT LIMA has been disclosed in a spectacular dispatch by John W. White, New York Times correspondent. Writing from Arica, Chile, Mr. White declares that the American newspapermen at Lima were not only placed under the strictest censorship, but were repeatedly given false reports and subjected to spying and intimidation in case their dispatches were unfavorable to the dictatorships. Mail for the American delegates was delayed by censors, and on one occasion Peruvian secret-service men were caught searching the files of American delegates. Although the censorship and surveillance were carried out under the direction of President Benavides, the Peruvian dictator, no attempt was made to hide the fact that it was in the interest of the Nazi and Fascist dictatorships. The newspaper dispatches to which the censors objected were invariably those which revealed German and Italian intrigue at the conference. The Peruvian press was flagrantly pro-Nazi and pro-Franco. On the opening day of the conference Lima was literally covered with swastika flags, while the Stars and Stripes were displayed in only three places. There were more Italian and Japanese flags than those of any South American country. Here is a sensational commentary on the Lima conference and on the problems which confront us in Latin America.

*

THREE WEEKS AGO WE PRINTED AN ARTICLE by the Reverend William C. Kernan concerning the notorious radio speech in which Father Coughlin attempted to pin on the Jews the responsibility for communism. The Kernan article offered documentary evidence to prove, first, that Coughlin repeatedly made gross misstatements of fact and, second, that the source of his information was World Service, a Nazi journal intended to foment anti-Semitism outside of Germany. Father Coughlin has neither refuted the Kernan charges nor acknowledged the falseness of his information. But while the link he would forge between the Jews and Moscow has been shown to be fraudulent, the affinity between Coughlin and Berlin has become more startlingly apparent. On December 5 Coughlin published a signed defense of German anti-Semitism in his weekly Social Justice. That article contained at least eleven paragraphs the wording of which was almost identical with those in a speech made in 1935 by Paul Joseph Goebbels, Reich Minister of Propaganda and Public Enlightenment. This discovery was brought to light by the New York Post, which printed the paragraphs in parallel columns. While other papers chose to ignore the story, Coughlin himself could not evade a telephoned request for an explanation. "The materials available to us," said his secretary, "were, naturally, available to him [Goebbels]." This shabby argument, which apparently was meant to cover the identity of material as well as of wording, is brazen in the Nazi tradition. In that same tradition is Coughlin's cowardly refusal to face the facts contained in the Kernan article. We call upon him to meet that challenge or to abandon his hypocrisy and proclaim openly a doctrine of race hate which is as treasonable to Catholicism as it is to American tradition. The sooner the country knows the Coughlin poison for what it is, the sooner it can apply the antidote.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

THE SELECTION OF FRANK MURPHY AS Attorney General is a wise and reassuring move. In happy contrast to the snub accorded Aubrey Williams, the appointment is a mark of recognition for one of the New Deal's most forthright and talented advocates. Mr. Murphy's equipment for the post has been amply demonstrated, and he is a valuable addition to the President's first lieutenants. It is common knowledge that this group has heretofore included some of Mr. Roosevelt's least enthusiastic and most timorous camp followers; Mr. Murphy belongs in the category of those who want to practice what the President preaches. As Governor of Michigan he courageously defied reaction's most solemn commandment when he refused to shed the blood of sitdown strikers and insisted upon peaceful negotiations. It was for this and comparable sins that he was punished in the November election. His withdrawal from public life would have been a misfortune. We are confident that his appointment will survive the sniping of those Congressional critics who advocate—for Mr. Roosevelt—a steadfast policy of rewarding his enemies.

*

IT IS AS YET UNCERTAIN WHETHER THE thirteen thousand airplanes which recently soared into the headlines represented a definite Presidential proposal or were merely trial balloons. According to Messrs. Pearson and Allen, the scheme is a genuine one, with its real motive a desire to overawe the fascist dictators. Unless this can be done, the President has been convinced by his diplomatic advisers, impossible demands will be sprung on Britain and France within a few months, and a war into which this country will inevitably be dragged will start in the course of 1939. This opinion coincides fairly closely with that of a majority of Americans as revealed by recent Gallup and Fortune polls. Hence although there have been signs of growing opposition in the new Congress to the President's defense plans, they may, when fully revealed, find strong popular backing. Nevertheless, the idea of a more than fourfold expansion in our air strength seems pretty fantastic either as a measure for the defense of these shores or as a means of sobering Hitler and Mussolini. No military expert has ever suggested that the former purpose requires a fleet of such a size, and since it could hardly reach the blueprint stage for many months, it is doubtful whether the dictators would take it seriously enough to be deterred from their purposes.

*

THERE ARE, WE THINK, CHEAPER, SAFER, AND more effective ways of checking the advance of the fascist powers. We could help prevent their conquest of Spain—the key both to their further advance in Europe and to their cultural and economic invasion of South America—by lifting the embargo which is strangling the government forces. Again we could slow down Germany's furious armament program by refusing to supply it any longer with certain essentials which it cannot readily obtain elsewhere, especially steel-making plant, machine tools, and scrap iron. Public opinion, we believe, is ready to support such measures, for it now realizes that if we fail to arrest the incendiaries we shall be forced to help put out the fire.

*

CHIANG KAI-SHEK'S ACTION IN ORDERING the arrest of some 200 followers of Wang Ching-wei, pro-Japanese right-wing leader, was long overdue. For months reports have been seeping out of China to the effect that Wang was seeking to make peace with the invader. Although by no means as influential as he once was, Wang were undoubtedly responsible for much of the disunity and lack of zeal which has been exhibited in high official circles. Reports from various sources tell of inefficiency and failure to make full use of China's enormous resources for mass resistance. The same charge is implicit in Hallett Abend's year-end dispatch calling attention to China's incredible military ineptitude. On such occasions a clean-up is essential, though it must not be interpreted as a sign of fatal weakness. It will be recalled that the Spanish government suffered several such shake-ups and emerged from them far stronger than before. Now that Chiang has rid the Kuomintang of its corrupt right wing, there should be no further obstacles to the general adoption of the mass-resistance tactics which have been utilized so successfully in the north of China.

GOVERNOR BIBB GRAVES OF ALABAMA recently rebuffed pleas for immediate release of four of the Scottsboro boys who are still held in prison. The mysterious circumstances surrounding his action have opened a new and sensational chapter in the case. When Alabama last year freed four of the prisoners, there was widespread confidence that the others—except Ozie Powell, who had been subsequently sentenced for attacking a sheriff—would be similarly released. The prosecution had treated them as a unit; it was indefensible to free some while keeping the others in jail. Dr. Allan Knight Chalmers, chairman of the Scottsboro Committee, now asserts, with the corroboration of men of unimpeachable reputation in the South, that Graves had privately promised to free the boys whose appeals he publicly denied last month. Graves had admitted, again in private meetings, that Alabama's stand was untenable; he had said so in December, 1937, and had given an even more clearcut promise of action in July, 1938. Among those who heard his promises were such men as Grover Hall, editor of the Montgomery Advertiser. Suddenly, Graves changed his mind. The private promise of Bibb Graves is shown to have been a slender reed on which to base the hope for release of the boys, even though the charges against them rest on exactly the same flimsy evidence that led to the release of the first four. Unfortunately legal means have been exhausted. The pressure of an aroused public opinion must now be vigorously directed toward forcing Graves's successor, Governor Dixon, to carry out a judgment passed, not by "Jews from New York," but by prosecutors in his own state of Alabama.

*

SOME OF THE BEST LAUGHS OF THE SEASON have been provided by the continued barrage turned against the TVA. It is difficult to keep a straight face when the industry of Insull attacks TVA for bad accounting methods or when Wendell L. Willkie steps forward in the role of "trustee" for his investors. The web of accusation and propaganda in which power interests seek to enmesh the greatest single public improvement of our time is too hopelessly tangled by now to be unraveled, but a few of the main threads are still visible. It is understood that Mr. Willkie wanted cost plus a 25 per cent mark-up for intangibles for his Chattanooga properties, while the city offered cost minus depreciation. Mr. Willkie countered by suggesting that TVA buy all the Commonwealth and Southern properties in its area, allow the SEC to arbitrate the price, and set up separate spheres of influence for public and private power. The law would not permit this last step. Considering the huge inflations of capital that went into the creation of Mr. Willkie's company, valuation would be most difficult. Senator Norris points out that two years ago the utilities defeated a proposal to amend the TVA act so that whole systems could be purchased, as proposed by Mr. Willkie. Purchases must now be made by the cities affected; Mr. Willkie's plan would unload unprofitable street-car lines as power properties. His offer served the doubtful purpose of confusing the issue, and we are glad that the TVA rejected it.

*

ZONA GALE NEVER ENJOYED A FAME QUITE equal to that of her fellow-realists, Sinclair Lewis and Theodore Dreiser. She was not, indeed, as sensational as either, but her death at sixty-six will remind readers that her most widely read novel "Miss Lulu Bett" was exactly contemporary with "Main Street" and hardly less influential in establishing a new tone in fiction dealing with provincial America. Miss Gale had begun as a "local colorist," and her earlier stories combined a gift for meticulous observation with the somewhat sentimental attitude of Miss Jewett and her school. But she developed a more realistic method for herself, and her best-known novel may possibly seem to future readers sounder, because less self-consciously iconoclastic, than the work of her better-known contemporaries. A dramatization of it was awarded the Pulitzer Prize in 1920 and belongs among the very earliest of the plays which broke away from theatrical convention to establish upon the stage a new American literature. Miss Gale preferred retirement to metropolitan literary circles and had lived for many years at Portage, Wisconsin.

Franco's "Final" Drive

MORE than a week has now passed since the widely heralded rebel offensive against Catalonia was launched. While conflicting reports from the two sides leave its actual results still obscure, it is evident that Franco's Italian and Insurgent forces have made substantial, though not decisive, gains. Dispatches from the front tell the familiar, heartrending story of stubborn resistance by relatively ill-equipped men against a highly mechanized army.

At the time of writing government forces are still clinging desperately to Artesa and Borjas Blancas, the two principal immediate objectives of Franco's drive, though the capture of the latter has been frequently claimed by the Insurgents. There is grave danger, however, that both these towns may fall. Although their loss would not have serious consequences for the Loyalist defense, it would allow Franco to claim the victory which he so badly needs to bolster morale behind his lines. A much more decisive victory, however, will probably be required if Mussolini is to persuade Chamberlain at their forthcoming meeting to adopt a Spanish settlement predicated on the assumption of an ultimate rebel triumph. Realizing that the stakes are high, Franco has apparently abandoned his usual cautious tactics and risked his full force in the hope of striking a decisive blow. Such an outcome appears, at the time of writing, most unlikely. And it is evident that Franco has paid dearly for such success as he has achieved.

In any event it seems certain that the Spanish war will go on for many months, with the final decision resting not on the result of the present drive, important though that may be, but on the Spanish government's ability to get supplies from abroad commensurate with the assistance the rebels are receiving from the fascist powers. Since the part of Spain remaining under government control is predominantly urban and industrial, food is the most urgent necessity. Thus the United States, with its vast stocks of surplus wheat, is in a position to be of tremendous assistance. The committee which has just been set up under the chairmanship of George MacDonald, a papal marquis, to raise the $500,000 necessary to process and ship the 600,000 barrels of flour donated to civilians on both sides by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation deserves support. But this aid will not begin to meet the need in Loyalist territory, where the food shortage is extremely grave.

And Spain needs more than food if it is to defend itself successfully against continued Italian-German invasion. Louis Fischer points out elsewhere in this issue that an increasing proportion of the government's military supplies are being manufactured at home. But the amount is still far less than that being furnished to Franco by his fascist allies. As long as Chamberlain and Daladier pursue their policy of conciliating the dictators, the government cannot buy supplies in Europe. It must buy them in the United States. The friends of the Spanish republic in this country must therefore make a new and more determined effort to lift the unneutral embargo.

It is an open secret that the embargo has been maintained thus far chiefly because of Catholic pressure. Because a section of the Catholic clergy has been so articulate in its pro-rebel propaganda, it has been assumed that an overwhelming majority of Catholics favored the insurgents. The falsity of this assumption has been revealed by the most recent Gallup poll, which shows a minority of Catholics actively favoring Franco. Of those who expressed an opinion, including both Catholics and Protestants, 76 per cent favored the Loyalists and 24 per cent the rebels. Approximately one out of three of the Catholics voting declared that they were not in sympathy with either side. Of the remainder, 42 per cent favored the Loyalists and 58 per cent the rebels. Thus a small group constituting about 38 per cent of the Catholics, who in turn comprise less than one-sixth of the total population, are at the moment determining the foreign policy of the United States on one of the most crucial of all issues.

That the American people are overwhelmingly in favor of lifting the embargo has been demonstrated repeatedly, and Congress will undoubtedly take some action at its coming session. The danger is, however, that in its desire to modify the Neutrality Act so as to allow discrimination between aggressors and their victims, Congress may put off the lifting of the embargo until the more basic job can be done. Such a delay might be fatal to the Loyalists. Congress's first legislative move should be to right the wrong that has been done by repealing the special action it took against Spain in 1937. There will then be time to give careful consideration to the needed revision of our neutrality policy as it applies to Europe and the Far East.

Prospects for Recovery

TWELVE months ago economic prospects were exceedingly bleak. The curve of business activity was falling almost perpendicularly, and there were no signs of a halt or even of a flattening out. Unemployment was mounting rapidly, factories were closing, stocks slumping. As we enter 1939 the picture is much brighter —at least by contrast. Economic activity is still far from normal, but the trend is now upward. The Federal Reserve index of industrial production, which stood at 84 in December, 1937, and reached a low of 76 in May last, has now recovered to just over 100. It has still a long way to travel, however, before it will reach the high point attained in the last recovery—121 in December, 1936.

Up to the present, recovery has manifested itself most clearly in what may be called the consumer-capital industries. The automobile industry, which suffered a spectacular tumble a year ago, succeeded in cleaning up its inventory position in the late summer and for the past three months has been steadily gaining. December sales are expected to exceed those of a year ago by at least 10 per cent, and the improvement is expected to hold well into the New Year. Even more important is the rise in residential building, for which federal insurance of mortgages under the FHA is largely responsible. In spite of a poor first quarter, permits for residential construction showed a 16 per cent gain in the first eleven months of 1938. In November the improvement over the corresponding month of 1937 was no less than 67 per cent. The rising tendency in house-building is expected to be steadily maintained in 1939, with one authority forecasting a rise in construction of as much as 32 per cent for the whole year.

Satisfactory as such improvement may be, we must be on guard against any complacency in respect to the economic situation as a whole. It is difficult to talk about recovery, except as a change from black to gray, so long as we have anything like the present unemployment. Since June, it is estimated, the number of men in jobs has increased by a million, but nine million remain without work. It is noticeable, too, that employment and pay-roll indices have shown less recovery than the production curve. There is, it is true, a time-lag element here, since production always tends to move more rapidly in either direction than employment. But with the manufacturing employment index in November some 10 per cent below that of twelve months before, while the production was around 13 per cent higher, there are grounds for suspecting a considerable growth in technological unemployment.

We are not among those who decry labor-saving machinery as such. When it makes possible lower costs of production and these are utilized to reduce prices and increase output, the ultimate benefits outweigh the immediate dislocation they cause. But if its fruits are mainly absorbed by profits, the result is bound to be an aggravation of that gap between potential production and actual purchasing power which is one of the root causes of our present difficulties.

This question of prices is especially important at the present juncture. One of the chief uncertainties about the continuance of the recovery lies in the farm situation. In the past six months, while industry has been moving upward, prices of agricultural staples, afflicted by world influences, have steadily fallen. Thus the long-standing discrepancy between farm prices and industrial prices has been greatly aggravated. Since early 1937 the index for farm products has fallen from 96 to 67.4, while that for industrial goods is down only from 86.5 to 80. Despite federal relief there has been a sharp fall in the purchasing power of the agricultural areas which are so important a market for industrial products. Under the circumstances any attempt to raise the level of industrial prices would be fatal. In fact, what is needed is a general lowering of prices. There have been some steps in this direction in the past few months with the steel, automobile, and farm-machinery industries making moderate reductions in prices. But there is room for much wider action of this sort, and if business as a whole were to cut its profit margins it would be making the biggest possible contribution to recovery and would almost certainly find itself repaid by increased turnover.

The price question is one of the leading issues which will decide the course of the recovery. Another and even weightier one is the trend of government expenditure. It is now generally accepted that the main cause of the 1937 slump was the sudden curtailment in federal spending before private investment was able or willing to take up the load. Similarly the recovery since last June stems from the renewal of the pump-priming program. But now the advocates of "orthodox fiscal practice" are again raising their voices in Wall Street and Washington. It is doubtful whether they really wish to be taken seriously. Most business men agree privately that the immediate result of a serious move toward budget-balancing would be a nose-dive on the Stock Exchange and a rapid return of depression.

One of the unsatisfactory features of the present recovery has been the slow response of the capital market. New corporate financing in the first eleven months of 1938 was well below that for both 1936 and 1937. This means that while consumer-goods industries have been holding up fairly well, capital-goods' producers, who have the most vital contribution to make to recovery, remain in the doldrums. Were it not for orders directly or indirectly resulting from government expenditure, their plight would be still graver. Under these circumstances, if even the modicum of recovery so far attained is not to be sacrificed, the Administration must stick to its fiscal guns. Until business bestirs itself to utilize our great pool of dammed-up capital, the government must keep at least one sluice open through which to irrigate the fields of industry.

Father Coughlin and the Church

THE Catholic church is developing a badly split personality. Its head recognizes that the church and fascism are irreconcilable, yet a large section of the hierarchy is inevitably propelled into the camp of reaction, where fascism breeds. Pope Pius has courageously raised his voice against the racist doctrines Mussolini has dutifully taken over from the dominant end of the axis, yet a Catholic priest, Father Coughlin, continues to be the chief poisoner for the anti-Semitic movement the Nazis are carefully nurturing in this country. Mr. Roosevelt is the only one among the statesmen of the West to raise his voice firmly against Hitlerism, a movement profoundly anti-Catholic and anti-Christian, yet it is no secret that most of the American Catholic hierarchy is opposed to him and did their best in 1936 to spread the impression that he was "communistic." Nowhere are the contradictions of the church's interest and the church's position clearer than in the Spanish struggle. Victory for Franco, by completing the encirclement of France, would give the axis that position of strategic superiority in the west of Europe that the betrayal of Czechoslovakia gave it in the east. It would bring measurably closer Hitler's dream of world dominion, and under his rule—as the Vatican realizes—there will be no room for either Catholicism or Christianity. The victory of the Spanish Republic, on the other hand, will mean nothing worse for Catholicism than separation of church and state, a blessing in disguise for the church as well as for the state. It is no accident that the church is secure in Protestant countries today but fighting for existence in Catholic lands where in the past there has been no check on its power; Mexico, Spain, Austria, Italy, for all their differences, illustrate the anti-clericalism bred where the church has dominated the state, and dominated it invariably in behalf of the great and powerful. Yet again the church is helping its enemies; in this country Catholic pressure has browbeaten the press until it hardly dares express its natural sympathies for the forces of democracy in Spain.

It is against this background that we would have Catholics consider the case of Father Coughlin. It is good to see how many voices are being raised in his own church against his attempt to spread anti-Semitism in the United States. Among the latest we note two articles in the December 30 issue of the Commonweal—Father Coughlin's Facts, by Monsignor John A. Ryan, and Facts of History, by George N. Shuster. The letters to the editor in that same issue include similar pleas by Father James R. Keane, national director of the Perpetual Novena of Our Sorrowful Mother, and by the Reverend Daniel A. Lord, editor of the Queen's Work. It is unnecessary to dwell again on Father Coughlin's talent for misrepresentation. It is necessary to call attention to the fact that Father Coughlin represents a Catholic problem as well as a Jewish problem. He is using Jew-baiting, as generations of reactionary demagogues and fanatical pogromchiks before him have used it, to attack all that is progressive. Coughlin has repeatedly called upon "good Jews" to repudiate communistic ones or face the consequences of anti-Semitism. The Jews are not an entity. No Jewish organization speaks for them or can control the acts of individual members of the race. Coughlin, on the other hand, speaks as a priest of the most highly organized international in history. The longer it lets him spread his poison, the harder it will be to make people believe that the church itself does not look altogether with disfavor on the witches' brew he is stirring up.

The Right of Assembly

ALTHOUGH the Constitution is more than a century and a half old and the Supreme Court is popularly supposed to be the bulwark of the liberties safeguarded in it, the right of assembly is not yet firmly established in our constitutional law. On the contrary, the last time the Supreme Court passed squarely on the issue it laid down an obnoxious, unsound, and reactionary doctrine. It may seem strange to link the names of Hague and Holmes, but the legal sophistry by which the courts of New Jersey have been upholding the dictatorial conduct of the Hudson County Führer goes directly back to a decision handed down by Justice Holmes on the highest court of Massachusetts in 1895 and upheld by the United States Supreme Court in 1897.

Three quotations will make the genealogy and rationale of this doctrine clear. In Thomas vs. Casey, Judge Bodine of the New Jersey Supreme Court declined to order the Jersey City chief of police to grant Norman Thomas a speaking permit. "He [Thomas]," Judge Bodine ruled, "has no more right to speak in public places in that city, such as highways and parks, without permit than he has to invade a citizen's home without invitation." In the case of Commonwealth vs. Davis, Justice Holmes upheld the conviction of a religious preacher who spoke on Boston Common without a permit. "For the legislature absolutely or conditionally to forbid public speaking in a highway or public park," Holmes said, "is no more an infringement of the rights of a member of the public than for the owner of a private house to forbid it in his house." Appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and there, two years later, in Davis vs. Massachusetts, the majority not only upheld Justice Holmes but went farther and declared: "The right to absolutely exclude all right to use necessarily includes the authority to determine under what circumstances such use may be availed of, as the greater power contains the lesser." It was on these decisions that Federal Judge Clark, in his opinion on the Hague case, based his peculiar suggestion that Jersey City might censor speeches as a condition for the grant of a permit. Fortunately Judge Clark omitted this from his decree, and there is little doubt that the present Supreme Court would unhesitatingly reverse not only his censorship suggestion but the old Davis case itself. The importance of the C. I. O. suit against Hague is that it will for the first time in forty years bring the issue directly before the court.

The Special Committee on the Bill of Rights of the American Bar Association is to be commended for recognizing that the issue involved is of fundamental importance and that the doctrine of the Davis case must be wiped out, for it contains the seeds of censorship and repression. The brief filed amicus curiae by Grenville Clark, the chairman of the committee, and his associates, attacks the doctrine with clarity and courage, terms it "outmoded," and stresses the importance of the outdoor meeting for unpopular causes whose advocates lack the means to hire a hall or buy radio time. It declares that the correct analogy with parks is not the home but the public utility. "We submit," the committee says in its brief, "that law-abiding Democrats or Republicans or Communists . . . can no more be constitutionally kept out of empty park spaces reasonably suitable for open-air meetings than they can be ejected from an empty municipal trolley car or be refused current from a municipal power plant."

BURLINGAME LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The Nation's Honor Roll for 1938

FOR the eleventh successive year The Nation presents its list of American individuals and organizations deserving honorable mention for their activities during the preceding twelve months.

THE MEDICAL BUREAU, THE NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY, THE AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE, and THE AMERICAN RED CROSS, for their work in sending medical supplies and food to the people of war-torn Spain; and the AMERICAN VOLUNTEERS in Spain for their front-line defense of democracy.

HAROLD L. ICKES, for his outspoken and continuous criticism of the Nazi regime and for his persistent refusal to permit the sale of helium to the Third Reich.

JOHN LONGO, NORMAN THOMAS, JEFF BURKITT, and HERMAN MATTSON, for carrying on at great personal risk a war for independence against Frank Hague's dictatorship in Hudson County, New Jersey.

The late PAUL Y. ANDERSON, for his vigorous attack on the un-American Dies Committee, which was one of the last crusades in the notable career of a courageous and social-minded journalist.

JUSTICE HUGO L. BLACK, for bringing to the Supreme Court a new liberalism freed of legal cobwebs, and for answering those who would tar him with the Klan brush by his vote against Jim Crowism in the Missouri case.

THE CONGRESS FOR INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATION and its leaders, for consolidating the gains and charting the course of a rejuvenated labor movement.

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT, for giving voice to the conscience of the world in denouncing the barbarism of the Nazis when the heads of other democratic nations remained silent.

THOMAS MANN, American-to-be, for calling the citizens of all countries to the defense of their common heritage, the ideals of freedom and culture.

THE COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, for its intelligent and objective reporting of the events leading up to the Munich pact and the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, which set a new standard in broadcasting.

DOROTHY THOMPSON, for her forceful denunciation of Nazi persecution, her defense of Grynszpan, and her attacks upon "democratic" apologists for fascism.

THE EDITORS OF THE COMMONWEAL, Catholic weekly, for giving expression to the democratic loyalties of rank-and-file American Catholics.

DREW PEARSON and ROBERT S. ALLEN, for their pertinacity in exposing the pro-fascist influences inside the State Department which have been steadily exerted to prevent the lifting of the embargo on shipments to Loyalist Spain.

THE SOUTHERN CONFERENCE FOR HUMAN WELFARE and its sponsors and participants, for crystallizing and giving voice to progressive forces in the old South; the NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL, for its bold and thorough report on the South as our "economic problem No. 1"; and JONATHAN DANIELS, for his book "A Southerner Discovers the South."

JOHN and MACK RUST, inventors of a mechanical cotton picker, for their social responsibility in setting aside part of their profits for a foundation to inquire into methods by which labor-saving inventions may be a benefit rather than a threat to labor.

The late B. CHARNEY VLADECK, for his long and devoted support of the program of slum clearance and public housing finally enacted in New York City.

THE BOARD OF HIGHER EDUCATION, under the chairmanship of Ordway Tead, for introducing academic democracy into New York's city colleges.

STANLEY M. ISAACS, Borough President of Manhattan, for risking his political career to defend the right of a Communist to hold public office.

LEE MORRIS, editorial writer for the St. Petersburg (Florida) Independent, for his championship of basic human rights in an area notorious for oppression and violence fostered by the Ku Klux Klan.

VLADIMIR K. ZWORYKIN, of the Radio Corporation of America, for perfecting a model electron microscope which promises to open new vistas to the scientist comparable to those afforded by the invention of the first optic microscope.

PROFESSOR C. A. ELVEHJEM of the University of Wisconsin, for discoveries leading to the use of nicotinic acid in the treatment of pellagra, which will make it possible to fight the scourge of the South.

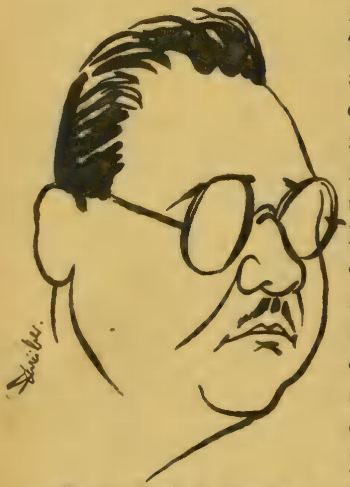
CLIFFORD ODETS, for a series of increasingly powerful plays, of which the current "Rocket to the Moon" is perhaps the best.

THE INTERNATIONAL LADIES' GARMENT WORKERS' UNION and the cast of "Pins and Needles," for producing labor's most successful theatrical venture.

Thirty Months of War in Spain

BY LOUIS FISCHER

AFTER two and a half years of war the Spaniards on both sides are naturally tired. But the Republicans are determined to go on, and they do not see how Franco can win. Franco said recently in a public statement: "We have two million persons [in Loyalist Spain] card-indexed with proofs of their crimes." These "criminals" and their immediate families probably number half the population in Republican territory. They have a vested personal interest in Franco's defeat. They have nothing to lose but the rope or a prison sentence. Better to fight. Premier Negrin, on the other hand, has promised "a complete amnesty" when the war is ended. "It would be an act of treason to our country's destiny not to yield up all thought of vengeance or reprisals," he said.



Prime Minister Negrin

Death loses some of its horror when one meets it in company. More than a million Spaniards have died since July 18, 1936. Every additional casualty on the Loyalist side exacts a pledge from those who remain not to betray the cause of Spain's freedom and social progress. Every new sacrifice in the rebel zone is another contribution to the prestige and strategic strength of the two foreign fascist empires that Franco serves. An increasing number of Spaniards in both camps begin to see the situation in just this way.

The continued resistance of the Spanish Loyalists acts as a tonic to all democratic forces in Europe, and perhaps in the Americas too. After the unnecessary surrender at Munich the struggle for democracy in Spain was a small light in the all-pervading gloom. If the Czechoslovaks had stood firm, or if the German left had withstood Hitler in 1933, fascist aggressors would today be less arrogant and self-confident. Resistance exhilarates the resisters, and the Loyalists are certain that their thirty-month fight makes a Franco victory forever impossible. The losses of the past and the moral stimulation of the battle for justice guarantee that. To win, the fascists will have to conquer every square foot of Loyalist territory. There will be no surrender. And before six months had passed, the civil war would begin anew. Franco cannot bring peace to Spain.

Anthony Eden declared in New York that the second world war began in July, 1936, in Spain. (I wrote and said the same thing two years ago.) It is a war of two mighty aggressor states against the weak Spanish republic. The republic has been shedding its blood for all of democratic Europe. Yet its hands have been tied by the very countries in whose interests it has held up the avalanche of advancing totalitarianism. History will scratch its head in amazement. Eden himself has a feeling of guilt for his own anti-Loyalist actions. He, like Winston Churchill and Duff Cooper, have been convinced by events that a fascist Spain would be a disaster. More and more Englishmen and Frenchmen are becoming conscious of the shameful and unpatriotic role of their governments in the Spanish conflict. Meanwhile, however, the Spanish Republicans, though bitterly resentful of the treatment the world has accorded them, thrill to the thought of being the only European nation with the stamina to post itself athwart the fascist tide. Their relative success makes them proud and strong. Spain once broke Napoleon's might. And in 1808 the French had occupied far more Spanish territory than the invaders-plus-rebels hold today.

The Loyalist army, about 800,000 strong, has discipline, cohesion, and an excellent corps of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, the steel girders of any army. The political commissars, now fully restored to authority, temper the steel. Staff work has improved. Foreigners have been withdrawn from staff bureaus and the ranks, but the resulting deterioration of quality is minimal.

The Loyalist forces—and cities—are inadequately supplied with anti-aircraft guns, artillery, and aircraft. But the machine-gun is the decisive defense weapon in this war, and the government has a good number. It manufactures considerable quantities. It also makes tanks which are better than the Soviet machines on which they are modeled, rifles, ammunition, some cannon and airplanes. The effectiveness of aviation against soldiers has been exaggerated. A hospital train which performed 22,876 surgical operations at the front in various important engagements of the war reports that 54.5 per cent of the wounds were inflicted by bullets, 35.4 per cent by shell shrapnel, 9.6 per cent by accidents, and only 0.5 per cent by aerial bombs. The Loyalists still buy arms abroad—but not from Czechoslovakia, which even refuses to deliver gas masks to England—and bring them in by sea, often using their navy for convoy purposes. The French-Catalan frontier is closed to such merchandise though not to oil and food. Germany sells no armaments to the Loyalists and exacts a promise from its customers not to resell to Republican Spain.

The Loyalists have learned to build complicated trenches and dugouts which reduce casualties and require direct attacks for the capture of each isolated point. On the Ebro the favorite rebel tactic of outflanking was usually forestalled. The army now knows how to fight and how to retreat. The enemy respects it. General Yague, an old Franco commander, publicly praised the bravery of the "reds"—and got himself arrested for so doing. The Nazi weekly, Deutsche Wehr, recently paid a tribute to the "numerous capable officers" in the Loyalist army who came up from the ranks. And the Berlin Völkischer Beobachter has lauded the engineering work on the Ebro. The republic finally has a real army, and, all his blustering announcements notwithstanding, Franco has no hope of winning quickly. But he has to do something.

Franco launched seven powerful offensives over a period of four months to retrieve the comparatively small Ebro area which the Loyalists occupied in five days in July. That July-to-November battle is regarded as a Republican victory and has encouraged Barcelona. It prevented the Fascists from resuming their drive on Sagunto and Valencia and from initiating any other attack. It cost the rebels between 70,000 and 80,000 casualties and 200 airplanes. The Loyalists, according to an unofficial estimate, had 7,000 dead and 25,000 wounded. The battle left Franco weakened, and but for internal and international politics he would have preferred to recuperate until the spring. Yet waiting is of little avail, for government supporters expect to be in a position next summer to smash through the Fascist lines and by a sizable military victory accelerate the rebel demoralization now often discussed in print by Franco's best friends. Moreover, guerrilla warfare, heretofore sadly neglected by the Loyalists, is spreading, and trains, bridges, and ammunition dumps are being blown up in increasing numbers, especially around Saragossa and in the Pyrenees.

Franco needs a big military triumph—not just the conquest of a few more uninhabited hill villages—to restore his dwindling prestige at home. He needs belligerent rights for the same reason, and in order to attempt the starvation of civilian Loyalists by blockade. He could get belligerent rights automatically, in accordance with the London plan of the Non-Intervention Committee, by repatriating all the Germans, Italians, and Portuguese in his army. Yet though belligerent rights would mean much to Franco, he keeps the foreigners because he cannot exist without them and because he has not the power to send them home. This is a most cogent argument against granting belligerent rights, which imply a stable and national regime. If Franco could stand on his own feet he would deserve to be recognized as an independent regime and to receive certain belligerent rights. It is said to be Franco who has started a new offensive into Catalonia. In fact, Italian divisions, Moorish cavalry, and Italian-German aircraft are bearing the brunt of the battle. Nevertheless, some newspapers continue to speak of the Spanish "Nationalists." The true Spanish nationalists are the Loyalists.

After two and a half years this truth is penetrating through the thickest propaganda fogs inside and outside Spain. Negrin's thirteen points, the program for a free people in need of liberty, progress, and tolerance, are well known in the rebel zone, where the charge of "reds" no longer convinces. When Republicans are taken prisoners they are asked about Russians, and each and every member of the International Brigade captured by the rebels has been cross-examined to find out whether he came from the U. S. S. R. So that myth is exploded. Contrariwise, the Spaniards in the rebel zone see their Nazis and their Italian Fascists digging in deeper and deeper. In November the machinery for a beer factory was imported into rebel Spain from Germany. Apparently they expect to stay a long time. German and Italian officers are bringing their private furniture from home into Spain by way of Hendaye, where French and rebel observers have been impressed by the circumstance. Literally hundreds of contracts are being let to Germans and Italians by the Franco authorities—for electric production, for cereal drying, for orange packing, for metal working, and the like. This applies to Spanish Morocco too. One can read the announcements in the rebel press almost daily.

"What Japan seeks [in China] is not territory. . . . Japan respects China's sovereignty," Prime Minister Prince Konoye said on December 22. With equal disrespect for human intelligence Mussolini has made similar pronouncements regarding Spain. Someone will believe anything, the Fascists reason. But Franco's subjects commence to disbelieve, and Franco's officers too.

Candide is a well-known pro-Fascist Paris weekly. In its issue of November 16 it published a long article by René Benjamin, member of the Académie Goncourt, an avowed Franco partisan just returned from a second trip to Francoland. He calls the article Year Three of the New Spain, and he starts out to bless. "My affection for it has increased," he writes. But he speaks of the "fatigue . . . of those who do not fight . . . [Franco Spain] is living through an hour of trouble . . . The ill humor which the war engenders . . . poisons the cities. . . . The cities . . . are bursting with wounded, with men on leave, with unhappy exiles. . . . One cannot open a newspaper without reading in immense letters: 'Franco, Franco, Franco.'

. . . These exclamations transplant a foreign custom unsuitable to the proud sobriety of the Spaniard. And how explain that as far as Morocco they sell postcard photographs of the little daughter of the Generalissimo? . . ." Dr. Benjamin visits the Franco army. "An officer whose finesse and taste I like talks to us of his impatience . . . his worry . . . his regret that there is not in Spain . . . a man of genius to lead the civilians. . . ."

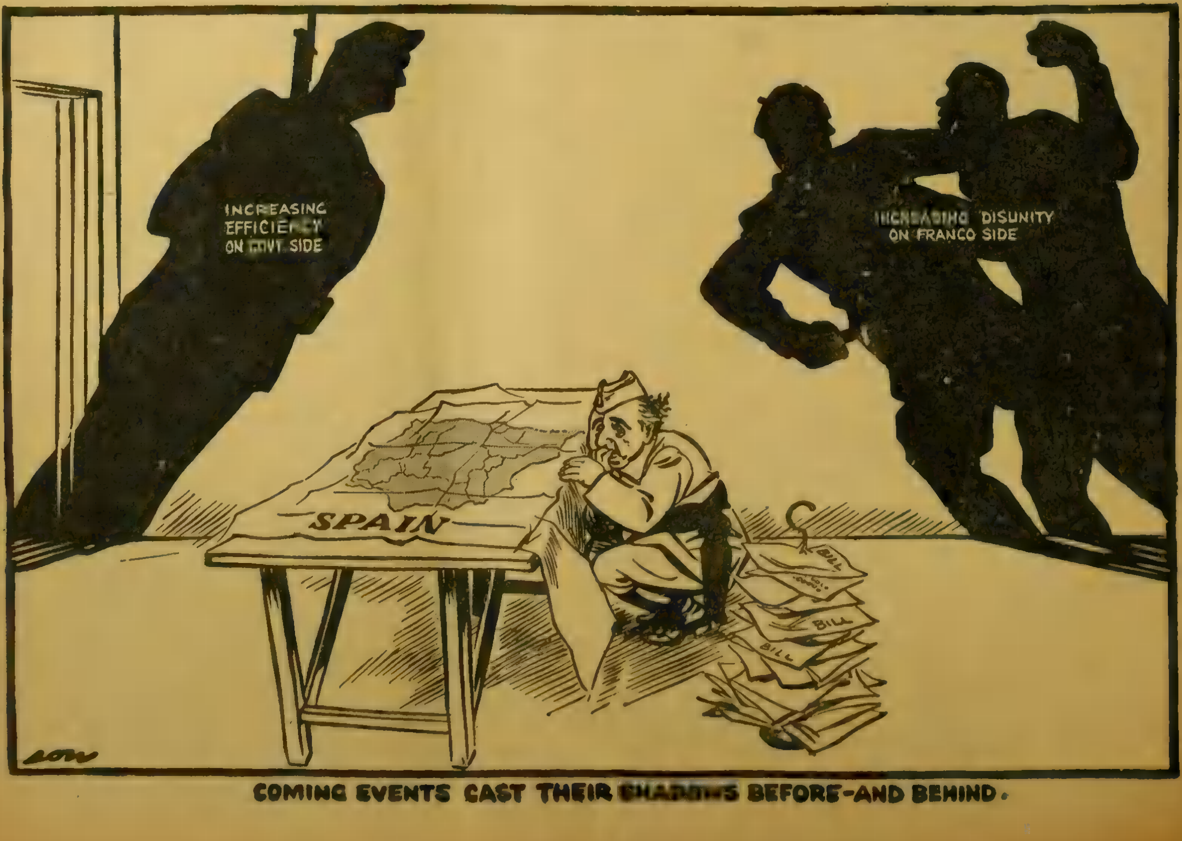
The officer was indignant over the official censorship. "They only know how to punish severely, to proscribe, to imprison, to exile," he complained. "Our best units are composed of peasants . . . who do not know the high reasons" for which they are fighting. This officer had an orderly who was a captured Loyalist. The officer said to the orderly, "You are a Marxist. Do you at least know what that means?" And the orderly replied, "Not very well. But I believe it means a life of greater justice."

René Benjamin discussed matters with a member of the Falange Party. "The Falange," the Spaniard said, "is a good mistress, but the monarchy . . . she is the wife. And that's why I believe that when we are ready to return to our homes we will have to decide in favor of the monarchy." But the monarchy died painlessly and unmourned in 1931. The Monarchists are an unpopular clique. Then this Falangist added, "We have great need of a long spiritual rest."

In Loyalist Spain, despite all the suffering, there is tremendous spiritual exaltation. President Azaña said recently: "The important thing is to be right." This is the essence of Spain, both Spains, and the people under Franco know that it was not right to drown Spain in blood for the greater glory of Mussolini and Hitler and to perpetuate the medieval past. The Loyalist population is keenly aware of the moral values involved in the war. Bombs and shells win territory but not hearts. Franco loses as he advances.

He would lose altogether if Great Britain, France, and the United States were neutral. Instead, "non-intervention" and so-called "neutrality" help Germany and Italy to subjugate the Spanish people. Munich opened many eyes. Public opinion in Europe is swinging toward the Loyalists. But French and British foreign policies still remain unchanged. Mr. Eden understood from President Roosevelt that the granting of belligerent rights would be regrettable; indeed, that a Franco victory would be regarded as unfavorable to American interests. Perhaps Chamberlain and Daladier will take the hint. There would be no Djibouti incident, no question of the cession of British or French Somaliland, and no agitation over Tunis, Corsica, and Nice if the French had displayed a firmer policy on Spain.

For the nth time, Franco has promised that this offensive will end the war. If it does not, and if the gains are insignificant, the discontent in and behind his lines may become a serious inconvenience to him and to his fascist allies. The cost of the war is back-breaking for Mussolini. Hitler is concentrating in another direction. The aggressor combination can still be beaten in Spain.



INCREASING EFFICIENCY ON GOVT SIDE
INCREASING DISUNITY ON FRANCO SIDE
SPAIN
BILL
BILL
BILL
LOW

COMING EVENTS CAST THEIR SHADOWS BEFORE—AND BEHIND.

Three Southern Towns

II. HUNTSVILLE: YANKEE INDUSTRY WELCOME

BY WILLSON WHITMAN

AT THE time of the Civil War they say that Huntsville, Alabama, was full of Federal sympathizers who held a meeting of protest against secession. But it wasn't a matter of principle so much as of money; people in northern Alabama did their trading with Tennessee, and as long as Tennessee stayed on the fence they wanted to do the same. The odd thing is that Huntsville's financial ties, which made it favor the Federal side in '63, pulled the other way in '33, to make the town look coldly on the New Deal and decide to keep itself an island of high rates in TVA territory. Even nearby Scottsboro and Decatur have voted to take TVA power, but not Huntsville. Nowadays it isn't just a matter of selling farm produce over the state line in Tennessee. It isn't a matter of local money at all; Huntsville is far beyond the simple feudalism of little Tupelo. Huntsville is a stronghold of the Alabama Power Company and a textile-manufacturing center, with its big mills owned in the North.

More people live in the surrounding mill villages—Lincoln and Merrimack and Dallas—than in the town of Huntsville; the population of the town is 11,000, that of the villages 15,000. Huntsville, in polite phrase, polices its suburbs; the state law forbids picketing, and there are special city ordinances about loitering or talking in groups, and entry and search. But the mill people can't vote in Huntsville elections, and a stranger has no trouble telling where the town stops and the mill territory begins. It isn't the houses, which are better than a lot of those in Huntsville, or the stores and public buildings—at the Merrimack mills they have good-sized, white-painted houses, with yards, a nice red-brick school with white colonial pillars, and two white churches. The difference is that the mill property is behind galvanized wire fencing, with strands of barbed wire at strategic points.

In the minds of Huntsville citizens there is an equally sharp division between town dwellers and mill people, but of course mill wages spent in Huntsville keep the town alive. When the mills closed down last year Huntsville blamed the unions. There was no strike, and the mills said they closed for lack of orders, but maybe there was some truth in the idea that they hoped to kill the unions the way TVA kills mosquitoes in its reservoirs, by opening and shutting the dam sluices. Huntsville, though, was alarmed, and when the Dallas mills threatened to close for good, the daily paper, owned in Birmingham, became excited over the loss of what it called a two-million-dollar industry. The paper not only blamed the workers; it warned them that one person out of five in Madison County was out of work, that only one applicant out of ten could get a WPA job, that unemployment insurance might stop at any time. It said the outside labor leaders—"foreigners" from Atlanta, Georgia, and Gadsden, Alabama—were as bad "as anything they ever had in Chicago gangs," and it threatened those workers who joined the Textile Workers' Organizing Committee. "You will be blacklisted until your dying day," it declared. "If you turn back to the farm there is no hope for you."

Huntsville citizens then had the bright idea of going to Montgomery to ask the Governor for "state protection" in reopening the mill. By this they meant, of course, martial law to break a strike, in case there should be one. A committee composed of city and county officials made plans for "Save Huntsville Day," April 20, 1938. The Mayor said, "Huntsville and Madison County are confronted with the most serious and tragic situation in our history." They closed the schools, the courthouse, the banks, the wholesale houses, and the cotton warehouse, and the Times suspended publication for the day so that everybody could drive to Montgomery. About a thousand Huntsville citizens actually went. They saw the Governor, but it didn't do much good; Governor Graves is a New Dealer, and he seemed to side with the unions. He said the union had agreed to arbitration, and he invited the mill to sit in. That wasn't what the Huntsville people had come for, so they booed the Governor and drove home.

But the big mills stayed closed, and shopkeepers grew low in their minds. Around the square they said the whole trouble had started with the NRA, when Washington first undertook to tell a man how to run his own business and egged on the mill hands to look for high wages. Then these agitators came. Even the Negroes living in shacks between the town and the mills said they couldn't see why the white folks had to go and make trouble with those unions. They were earning good money before, but when the unions came nobody could get work. The better people said it wasn't as if the mill workers hadn't been well treated before; the mills had built them houses and a hospital, and paid teachers' and preachers' salaries. Have an influence on what they taught and preached? Why, they could say anything they liked as long as they stuck to the schoolbooks and religion.

C. I. O. headquarters exhibited more normal business activity and more traditional Southern hospitality than any other place in Huntsville. The union men said that a long history of organization in Huntsville rather than any sudden enthusiasm accounted for the strength of the unions. They had begun long ago when conditions were really bad, in the old mills that had closed down in Hoover's time. In those days they had all sorts of trouble, but they had got a start; some things that had happened, like the favorite Southern trick of kidnapping the organizer, had helped build morale. And now they knew what they were doing. They still had their troubles, of course, but they figured they could stick it out. No one bothered to mention a typewritten note recently received: "You and your kind are not wanted in Huntsville. We advise you to get out at once." They were careful, though, to padlock the office when they went out.

At the mill offices nobody would talk. The Dallas mill had some local stockholders, but its directors met in New York, and the only qualified spokesman was "out of town—couldn't be reached." As their names show, the Lincoln and the Merrimack mills are owned in the North; so local employees were justified in referring inquiries to Boston.

One mill in Huntsville was running; a little mill, locally owned, had signed the T. W. O. C. contract. Its wage scale was low, but that wasn't what the union was fighting about. There was no barbed wire around it, and the owner, right there in his office, could be seen. He proved to be as Southern as the T. W. O. C. organizer, and as practical in his way. How come he is running when the other mills aren't? Well, maybe he's got extra good people, intelligent people, working for him. Intelligent enough to hold out for a C. I. O. contract? Well, maybe, if you want to put it that way. He's not afraid of unions—his son, up in New York, belongs to the musician's union, and he has a brother in the Railway Brotherhoods. It's an experiment, he says, to see how long he can run and make ends meet with competition from mills paying lower wages. On the other hand, he figures, keep everybody everywhere underpaid, and who's going to buy the goods? He adds that, in his opinion, the NRA was all right; and you notice a rarity in Huntsville, a picture of the President hanging on the wall.

"So you're scabbing on the capital strike?"

He laughs at that. He doesn't, he says, know what the other mills are doing. Maybe they haven't any orders, as they said.

He is no sentimentalist about the unions. He has heard they didn't do right over at the Dallas mill, and he isn't sure he approves of the check-off, but if his people want it, it's their business. This mill owner's attitude may be due in part at least to his family connections with unions. But he could also be considered a good example of the old-fashioned small capitalist who arrived by rugged individual effort and has retained some human regard for his workers. He had, he said, started in a mill when he was a boy, and he could tend a machine again if he had it to do. Of course he could hire only two hundred people while one of the big mills would take a thousand, and he didn't go in for housing or church-building. But he was asking no more from the little mill than a living for himself and his family, and he lived in a plain frame house. The superintendent of the big Lincoln mill was far more elegantly housed in a big brick mansion.

Huntsville, so hostile to foreign invasion, doesn't seem to mind absentee ownership. And it doesn't seem to realize that the Alabama Power Company isn't a local enterprise; a hardware man with a store on the square said he figured that the government's proposal to sell cheap power was just like a chain store coming in and competing with a local store. It wasn't fair. Huntsville people will tell you, too, about the taxes that Alabama Power pays the state, not realizing that the company had to be converted to that. Its founder once complained that the power to tax was the power to destroy. But then the Yankee financiers came in, advising, as Merlin H. Aylesworth said at Birmingham in 1924, "Don't be afraid of the expense. The public pays the expense."

Of course the public pays the Alabama Power Company's taxes, indirectly. Many persons wish current were cheaper so they could use more, but few understand the iniquity of a sales tax, direct or indirect. Nearly all, moreover, have a great distrust of interference from Washington, acquired in Civil War and Reconstruction days. Last year a Huntsville ice and coal company put in a claim for losses due to TVA's "social experiment," and Huntsville cherishes many tall tales about the errors of TVA. Government juice, they say, is too strong—blows the radio tubes right out. Then they have to write to Washington before they can make repairs. And all the fuss TVA is making over malaria mosquitoes is certain to ruin the fishing.

The county agent admits that TVA phosphate is all right, but they won't let you have it for row crops, and of course Madison County is the biggest cotton-raising county in Alabama. Change to other crops? Why, this is a cotton country and it isn't going to change. But it's not true that tenants aren't encouraged to raise garden stuff, they could if they weren't shiftless and lazy. Rural electrification? Well, the Alabama Power Company has done a lot to develop this country, and they're building new lines right now.

It won't be easy to change the cotton farming, though the warehouses are stuffed with last year's crop. Changing the mill set-up by federal legislation may be easier. The small local mill was bound to be helped by the wage-hour law, making general the scale it was paying. Lately the big mills have given up their open-and-shut tactics and resigned themselves to Labor Board elections; the Dallas mill, with its local connections, was the first to sign the T. W. O. C. contract. The Lincoln mill is still holding elections, hoping perhaps that the independent union or the A. F. of L. will gain strength, although the T. W. O. C. is ahead. In the Merrimack mill elections the T. W. O. C. won, and the contract calls for the mill to reopen this month with a thousand workers employed.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame

In a final struggle before this contract was signed, workers were evicted from the Merrimack houses, and the union found shelter for evicted families in an old hotel on the outskirts of town. The women's auxiliary set up cooperative kitchens, and the T. W. O. C. was able to add to its Huntsville history a successful experiment in group living, outside the wire fence. The town has shown no such adaptability, and this suggests that the worst barriers in Madison County are not the barbed-wire fences around the mill property. On the better residence streets of Huntsville the hedges are of rose-colored crepe myrtle, but the people living in the nice old houses are set apart behind less pleasant barriers of the mind.

They say that though these people may vote Democratic they pray Republican. And Huntsville boasts the first Garner-for-President club to be organized in the South.

[This is the second of three articles on Southern towns. In the first, printed last week, Miss Whitman described Tupelo, Mississippi, in which industry is on a feudal basis. The third, to appear in an early issue, will be on the "model" company town of Kingsport, Tennessee.]

Pogroms for Profit

BY VLADIMIR POZNER

FOR years the rulers of the Third Reich have been talking about "German blood" and its priceless value. At last we know what "German blood" is worth, not in terms of metaphysics, but in terms of cash. If it happens to be that of a diplomat, killed in Paris, and by a Jew at that, it is worth exactly one billion marks. Nazi fanaticism has been overrated. Hitler and his aides have proved to be amazingly practical, much more so than Shylock. Worldwide indignation and pity for the Jews have so far tended to becloud the underlying reasons for the mid-November anti-Semitic outburst in Germany. Let's try to be as practical as the Nazis themselves and discuss the problem not in terms of morals but in terms of easy money for Hitler and his movement.

In the March issue of Julius Streicher's Stürmer, the most pornographic magazine in the world, the following notice appeared: "The current business of the Bank of J. Dreyfus and Company, Berlin, has been taken over by our newly opened Berlin branch.—Merck-Finck and Company." In other words, the Aryan banker August von Finck, a protege of Göring, who appointed him "Führer" of the Bavarian banks, has expropriated the Jewish firm of J. Dreyfus and Company, whose directors —Willy Dreyfus, Kurt Landsberg, and Paul Wallich— have been asked to step out. In order to round out the deal, Finck bought Dreyfus's private estate of 7,500 acres in Bavaria, but forgot to pay for it, which apparently is considered in the Third Reich a very good practical joke. This quaint idea probably originated with Joseph Goebbels himself, who forced the Jewish banker Jakob Goldschmidt to sell him his famous Villa of Swans, at Werder, near Berlin, for 300,000 marks, promised but never paid. These and similar transactions have been termed in the Third Reich—though purists may resent it—"the Aryanization of Jewish business."

The National Socialist Party obtained the support of the masses by fighting banks, trusts, and monopolies, which, it claimed, were controlled by Jews. Jews were holding scores of directorates. Jews were promoting and favoring their relatives. German economy was a Jewish economy controlled by a dozen wealthy families. For five years the National Socialist Party was engaged in ruthlessly curbing such prominent capitalists as non-Aryan peddlers, junk dealers, and university professors. Then, Jewish wealth in those fields having been destroyed, it became time to assail its last refuge—the million-mark corporations and banks. Since April, 1938, moral and physical pressure has been supplemented by a law. Jews who had more than 5,000 marks were required to give the authorities a detailed account of their fortune. General Göring, in his capacity of dictator of the four-year plan, was allowed "to harmonize Jewish possessions in accordance with the requirements of the German economy," that is, expropriate them. The providential killing of a Nazi diplomat provided a pretext for Göring to put this law in operation. At last the party program could be fulfilled, and Jewish enterprises, as Hitler put it, "turned over to the German people."

Official Nazi statistics show that in January, 1933, when Hitler became Chancellor, there were in Germany 828 banks entirely or partly owned by Jews. On January 1, 1938, only 275 banks remained in the hands of Jews, and 50 of these were in process of being liquidated. Banks still controlled by Jews are located almost exclusively in the provinces. The expropriated banks have been in the main absorbed by a few larger banks, not altogether Aryan, which financed Hitler's rise to power, particularly the Dresdner Bank and the Berliner Handels-Gesellschaft. The former took over the most important of the Jewish houses—Hardy and Company, S. Bleichröder, and Gebrüder Arnhold. The latter engulfed so many smaller firms that it was able to raise its dividend rate from 5 to 8 per cent. Because of the high development of finance capital in Germany, almost every bank owned or controlled many industrial plants and companies. Gebrüder Arnhold, for instance, had built up one of the three trusts that have a practical monopoly of the German china industry, and the Arnhold brothers themselves held 112 directorships. The three leaders of J. Dreyfus and Company served on 35 boards of directors. The Aryanization of their establishments thus meant not only the consolidation of the banking business but also the further concentration of control of the German trusts.

On the boards of directors of these great trusts are personalities who, though indubitably German, are not exactly identified with the German masses. The Dresdner Bank boasts Krupp, Friedrich Flick of the steel trust, and Wilhelm Kisskalt of the insurance trust, who together received in 1937 over a million marks from this one source of income. Today, as a result of the Aryanization of industries formerly controlled by Jewish banks, each of these three officers of the Dresdner Bank serves on 83 boards of directors. The Berliner Handels-Gesellschaft, linked with the steel and insurance trusts, is governed by Hermann Bücher of the electricity trust, Arthur Klotzbach, a director of Krupp's, Herbert Göring, brother of the Air Minister, and a spokesman of the chemical trust. Each graces the directorates of numerous companies, and a comparison of the revenues they receive with the wages of the workers offers a grim commentary on the myth that Jewish business has been turned over to the German people.

As a matter of fact, the seven giant trusts that are interlocked with the leading Berlin banks and that account to a great extent for German economic wealth—Krupp, Thyssen, and Mannessmann (steel, iron, and metal trades); A. E. G. and Siemens (electricity); I. G.-Farbenindustrie (chemicals); and Allianz (insurance)—are the principal beneficiaries of the Nazi anti-Jewish drive. (Thyssen's companies are now included in the Hermann-Göring Werke.) I. G.-Farbenindustrie has absorbed all the Jewish firms hitherto active in its field, and controls today 94 per cent of the Reich's chemical industry as against 80 per cent in pre-Hitler days. Since the beginning of 1938 the Mannessmann trust has taken over eight Jewish metallurgical plants, increasing its capital by 10,000,000 marks and doubling its tin-plate production. The Siemens trust has annexed two large electrical plants, Heliowatt-Werke and Kabelwerk. The famous Hirsch-Kupfer-Werke have been absorbed by the Deutsche Bank for the benefit of Krupp. Some 20 per cent of the anthracite production in western Germany is controlled by Thyssen; 27.4 per cent of the soft coal industry by I. G.-Farbenindustrie. According to recent statistics, twenty-four persons, most of them connected with the same corporations, control 75 per cent of the output of anthracite and 80 per cent of the output of coal in the Third Reich. These are only a few typical instances.

In Austria, where the Aryanization principle was applied immediately after the annexation, the huge Styrian Alpine-Montan-Gesellschaft is now controlled jointly by the steel trust and the Göring-Werke. Krupp has taken over scores of enterprises which were partly or wholly owned by Austrian Jews. As for the Hirtenberg arms and munitions plant, formerly the property of the war magnate Mandl, who was connected with the Heimwehr, it has been "dejudaized" and given to the Wilhelm Gustloff Foundation, dominated by the Dresdner Bank, the steel trust, and Krupp.

It is worth while to point out that the banks and corporations mentioned above are almost all tied together by interlocking directorates. Fritz Thyssen is a director of Siemens-Schuckert. Siemens is an officer of Mannesmann. Friedrich Flick's name appears on the boards of A. E. G., the Dresdner Bank, and several of Thyssen's companies. Arthur Klotzbach serves on the boards of Krupp, A. E. G., and the Berliner Handels-Gesellschaft. Albert Vögler of the steel trust is on the directorates of Siemens and Halske and Siemens-Schuckert; Wilhelm Kisskalt provides a link between the Dresdner Bank and twenty-three insurance companies controlled by the Allianz trust.

These 6 men hold 127 posts in the most important German corporations; they preside over 32 of those corporations. They also hold many executive or honorary positions in the administration of the Third Reich. Gustav Krupp von Bohlen presides over the Association of German Industry and is a member of the General Economic Council, on which Fritz Thyssen and Carl von Siemens also serve. The last named, together with Hermann Bücher, president of A. E. G., and Wilhelm Kisskalt of Allianz, are members of the Akademie für Deutsches Recht. The general director of Allianz, Kurt Schmitt, was made the Reich's Minister of Economy as soon as Hitler seized power. Incidentally, the banker August von Finck, "heir" to the Jewish bank of J. Dreyfus and Company, is also a vice-president of Allianz.

General Göring

BURLINGAME LIBRARY

In appointing men to positions of command in the German economy the National Socialist leaders did not limit themselves to their original financial backers. Göring especially has been as solicitous for his relatives as any Jewish banker. His brother, Herbert Göring, became a director in the Air Ministry and draws from the state 150,000 marks yearly. In addition, he receives about 200,000 marks a year for permitting his name to appear on the list of directors of the Berliner Handels-Gesellschaft. At the same time he is on the board of the Allgemeine Deutsche Creditanstalt of Leipzig and of the Deschimag of Bremen, positions which bring in additional revenue. The Deschimag, a huge shipbuilding corporation, was nationalized by the Weimar Republic, but General Göring turned it back to private ownership, represented by his brother Herbert, and granted it without delay a 3,000,000 mark order. A second brother of Göring's, after the annexation of Austria, was made the head of the Tobis-Sacha, that is, practically the dictator of the Austrian movie industry. A brother-in-law, Herr Huber, was appointed Minister of Justice in the first Nazi Cabinet in Austria. Apparently justice does not pay too well, and Herr Huber has also been seated on the board of directors of the Merkur-Bank of Vienna, controlled by the Dresdner Bank. A more distant relative of the Field Marshal, a cousin, has had to satisfy himself with the celebrated Viennese Cafe Herrenhof, whose former Jewish owner was asked to step out.

Goebbels cannot compete with Göring in the warmth of his family feelings, though it may be noted that Hans Goebbels, after having been for years an obscure employee in the insurance business, became on May 10, 1933, general director of a large insurance company in the Rhineland and a member of the council of German insurance companies.

The material prosperity of the Göring and Goebbels families is indeed edifying, but it bears more on the ethics of the Third Reich's masters than on the economic structure of today's Germany. Behind the German scene large banks and corporations carry on the old struggle for monopoly, a struggle which has never been so successful as under Hitler, and in which the Aryanization drive is but an episode. It is natural that the Führer should favor those who helped him to seize power. But probably German bankers and industrialists knew perfectly well what they were doing when they invested considerable sums of money in a movement that called itself the National Socialist Workers' Party, and in a man who promised to destroy big business and "turn it over to the German people."

Pocket Guide

SNOW WHITE IN JANUARY

DID you see an advertisement in last Sunday's paper about a sale of coats? You saw so many that you probably had to rummage around to pick out the news. What did these ads mean to you? Let's look at them from the point of view of an able department-store merchant—Gordon Selfridge, the American who has built up the biggest department-store business in London.

Each time that Mr. Selfridge comes to America he has to listen to many a tale of grief poured into his ear by American department-store heads. He hears bleats about conditions and criticism of competitors. Before he goes back, he is always a guest at a luncheon or dinner given by the more important department-store executives. On these occasions he usually speaks his mind. He says, in effect:

"Let us suppose that I buy coats to retail at $95. In London those coats will retail at $95, for I am a careful buyer, and they will be worth every cent of $95. But in New York when a department store buys coats to retail at $95, it says to its customers: 'These coats are usually $95, but we have decided to spend a lot of money in advertising in order to make a special feature of them, and we are selling them to you at $75.' Now there are just two answers to that sort of advertising, and in London the public knows both the answers—either I'm lying when I say the coats are worth $95, or I'm a fool, stuck with a lot of coats that I'll be glad to get rid of at bargain prices." Many coats advertised for American sales are of course left-overs at bargain prices, but others are stocked specially for the sale.

Furthermore, when asked to advertise in American newspapers, Selfridge said, "No, I can't go along with your methods. If I should advertise a reduction in price on a dress, my customers who paid the full price would be indignant. And I am not advertising to fight competitors only. I have got to get people into my store. I don't care what Harrod does."

As a matter of fact, the American department stores themselves don't like these sales. Take the January white sales which are now upon us. For the store they are not good business, though they may be for the consumer. But they are not run for the sake of the consumer. They were begun and are continued for the sake of the newspapers.

I am told that the January white sale was born in the advertising department of the New York Sun. January is a bad advertising month for the newspapers. So the newspapers convinced the eagerly listening department stores that white sales would create "traffic"—a magic word with store executives—during the dull month of January. They convinced the executives that it would be a good idea to mark down towels and sheets—and spend big money with the newspapers to advertise bargains—in order to create a lot of small-profit or no-profit traffic through their stores. So now you can hear the department stores wail that they are working for the newspapers. "We advertise to please newspapers, not for ourselves. Because they haven't much advertising in August, they get us to have a furniture sale. And in January we must have a white-goods sale." One store claims that it made a profit of less than a hundred thousand dollars while the advertising department was spending three-quarters of a million in newspaper advertising.

If the department store really sells you white goods at lower prices in January, how does it manage it? There are several ways. It is no trick at all for a Fifth Avenue store to convince a manufacturer that no one ever heard of him, that he has no following in New York, whereas the department store is known to everybody. The manufacturer and his salesmen approach the department-store buyer already half-licked, willing to make any concession if only they can get their goods and their trade name into the store, on display, in its windows, named in its ads. Then they can tell the little dealers all over the country that the big stores in New York are selling their goods. That's one way.

Here's another way. The Globe Store (this name is entirely imaginary) has been selling white goods manufactured by a number of well-known concerns. Along comes a little man they never heard of before, who says, "If you'll give me an order for so many thousand sheets and pillow cases and towels of this quality, I'll give them to you at a price," and he names a figure way below what they've been paying. "But I want a signed contract." He then goes to some small Southern town where there is a bankrupt or closed mill. He shows the town authorities his contract with the department store and says, "I'd like to start in business down here, but you've got to help me out at first. You've got to cut out my taxes, get your people to work for 'reasonable' pay, give me special rates on power." They agree. He gets the mill rent-free, without taxes, pays cut wages and a cut price for his power. He runs the mill until he has filled his order and then folds up and goes away. The town holds the bag. The department store gets the "traffic." The consumer gets a bargain. The mill in Fall River that wanted the order is closed. Perhaps the customer's husband loses his own job because his firm depends on Fall River business. Well, you can ride on this merry-go-round without any further guidance from me.

Standard advertised brands sometimes play the same trick as the little man nobody ever heard of. But many brands sold in the white sales are made in regular factories at regular rates of pay. They may be sold to the department store at a reduced price for the reasons given above, or the department store for the sake of "traffic" may sell you the goods without profit.

HELEN WOODWARD

In the Wind

MAJOR GENERAL GEORGE VAN HORN MOSELY made the headlines a fortnight ago with his call for violence against "domestic enemies" (read New Dealers). He received less publicity last May when, in New Orleans, he urged "sterilization" of "political refugees" admitted to the United States. General Mosely said at that time: "If they are undesirables over there, why should we take them over here without some precautions?"

HEADLINE IN the London Daily Telegraph: "Premier's Second Grandchild. Gift from Wives of M.P.s." The story beneath told all: it was a christening cup.

A PAMPHLET just published in Paris throws startling light on the course of Italy's "racial" policy. Its author reports that late in 1935 he was commissioned by the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs to write a pamphlet on Italian Jews emphasizing the equal status they enjoyed in Italy. This was published only in English and was sent to prominent citizens in England and America. Its aim, the author now explains, was to win support among English and American Jews for the Fascist regime and to pave the way for Anglo-American financial aid.

A LONDON journalist tells this story about a German bombing plane which flew over the Austrian frontier into Czechoslovakia during the September crisis. When the crew landed in Czech territory they were arrested, but they explained that they were deserters anxious to fight for Czechoslovakia. After Munich the German government demanded and obtained their return.

THE CAMERA Accessory Shop, a New York firm, recently decided to import no more German cameras as a protest against Nazi policy. Advertisements announcing this decision were prepared, and proofs on the copy were received from the New York Times. At the last moment the Times banned the ad on the ground that it does not accept "boycott advertising." The same advertisement was rejected by the New York Herald Tribune, the News, the World-Telegram, and the Post.

IN LATE November the New York Daily Mirror printed a feature story by Hugo Roboz stating that Toto, the celebrated clown, had died a pauper. Two days before the story appeared, Roboz died. After its publication Toto (Armando Novello) announced that he was alive and prosperous and started a libel suit against the Mirror. The day his attorney visited him to obtain his signature for the suit he was stricken with peritonitis and died soon afterward.

AN INTERESTING example of Fascist journalism was afforded recently by the Popolo d'Italia. On December 3 this paper published a dispatch from London headlined: "England Recognizes that the Process of [Treaty] Revision Is Bound to Continue." The dispatch was based on an item in the London Times which really said: "In praising the Foreign Minister . . . the Fascist newspapers with one accord draw the moral that the process of territorial revision begun at Munich requires to be continued." The Popolo d'Italia had taken the Times's accurate summary of Italian press comment and wired it back to Rome—as the opinion of the Times.

APPEARING AT a recent benefit for Spain, Gypsy Rose Lee, strip-tease dancer, said to the audience: "You might think my mind is on lifting my skirt. You're wrong—it's on lifting the embargo."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TALKING the other day with a refugee from Vienna I was surprised to have him criticize me when I burst out vigorously, and I suppose bitterly, about the horrors in Germany. He had just told me that his sister had been turned out of her apartment in Vienna and that her husband had been taken away and, within forty-eight hours, beaten to death with clubs. Still he thought that criticism should not be uncontrolled. He believes that the German people are the victims, that there still is the finer and better Germany whose existence I used to stress during the war years; and he does not want the world to hate the German masses. Some of my friends in the Fellowship of Reconciliation also feel that it is the Christian's duty to speak softly now, to be forgiving, and to consider the conditions, beginning with the war and the Treaty of Versailles, which produced Hitler and the present world misery.

No one has stressed more than I the causes of the present situation in Europe from the day that the Treaty of Versailles was published, but I still feel that this is the time when one must speak out as violently and as unequivocally as possible. It is, of course, an ethical question which confronts us—at least a question of one's philosophy, if not religion. It is a question in which I have always taken a deep interest because it is the one which separated the Abolitionists during their struggle to abolish slavery. There is still much criticism of Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, and the other so-called extremists of the anti-slavery movement: if they had only not been so violent, if they had only used more moderate language, if they had only spoken in a more kindly way of the slave-owners and recognized that they were merely the victims of a bad system, the bitterness between the sections would never have been so great, and the Civil War would have been avoided.

Of course this criticism was made during their lifetimes. They replied that it was their duty to scourge the money-changers out of the temple; that they had no right to use moderate language, but only the duty to use immoderate language; that as long as human beings were being bought and sold, and husbands torn from their wives, and mothers from the babes at their breasts, the language used must fit the monstrosity of these crimes. As I have written elsewhere, Phillips and Garrison and their associates felt upon their own bodies the lash applied to recalcitrant slaves, the branding irons that so often burned into the flesh of slaves. They maintained to the end that if they had used less violent language, slavery would never have been abolished when it was, and they cited Lincoln to prove it; for after having been on every side of the slavery question Lincoln finally told Garrison that he could not have emancipated the Negroes had the way not been prepared for him by the non-compromising Abolitionists.

I feel the same way about the horrors in Germany; sometimes I think they are worse than those of American slavery, though surely not as bad as the downright fiendishness which marked slavery during the eighteenth century in what is now Haiti and Santo Domingo. I too feel that nothing that I can say, no language that I can possibly use, is too strong to describe the acts of Hitler, who has inflicted on his Jewish and non-Jewish victims indescribable mental torture in addition to physical suffering. I desire to use as immoderate language as I can about him and all his gang, to help to keep world opinion at white heat until the day comes when the German people will themselves purge their good name of its blood stain. I deeply regret that during this period injustice may be done to the enslaved and cowed German people, but that injustice is not of our creation; it is part of the criminality of Hitler. As long as a single German is tortured, abused, robbed, beaten, and murdered, I shall speak out and use as violent language as the character of the crime demands.

There is enough compromising in the world as it is, too many people from Chamberlain down, or rather up, see the "good side" of the dictatorships and think that the proper way to deal with Hitler and Mussolini is to speak softly until they are ready to wipe them out by force of arms; far too many people are inclined at all times to accept the status quo and "make the best of it." Someone must be on the other side to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth, to declare that there will be no compromise and no surrender to men who, if not checked by the moral indignation of the world, will take it straight back to barbarism, who will destroy all the ethical and intellectual advances that humanity has made since the Dark Ages. I am bold enough to believe that if Jesus were alive today He would not mince words. He would call things by their right names as did the great Jewish prophets, and He certainly would never yield in the face of evil, not a quarter of an inch. If by these words I were merely arousing the spirit of hate I should be sorry, but the responsibility would not be mine. Our duty as never before is to feel upon our bodies the tortures of the dictators and to cry out to high heaven until they are ended.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Poet in Spite of Himself

VARIETY: SECOND SERIES. By Paul Valéry. Translated from the French by William Aspenwall Bradley. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

AMERICAN readers eager for acquaintance with Valéry's work have been meagerly served. Just after Valéry's reception into the French Academy in 1927, Malcolm Cowley translated "Variété I," the collection of essays by which Valéry tried—not entirely successfully—to explain the researches into pure thought and "pure poetry" that had occupied him during twenty years of silence. Now, after a long lapse of time, and after Valéry has published many volumes, a new translation of miscellaneous essays appears, made up of pieces chosen from three books, "Variété II" (1930), "Pièces sur l'art" (1934), and "Variété III" (1936), together with an essay on Villon and Verlaine, published in France as a finely produced separate volume in 1937.

Faced with the last-named essay, the reader familiar only with the first, ten-year-old translation, may well be puzzled about Valéry's development. For the essay on Villon and Verlaine is, obviously, a well-made piece of hack writing. It is not profound or even subtle; it might have been turned out by a journalist in the ordinary run of his work. Where are the evidences of labor and strain which Valéry once insisted must go into the act of writing? Where are the results of his belief in literature's difficult function? This essay, taken by itself, is proof of the change which has come over the man who once disdained to utter any thoughts at all; who admired, in literature, not so much works themselves as the "genesis" of works, and the spiritual elements which, in fusion, bring about the initial impetus in the artistic process. We see here a result of the circumstances which have transformed Valéry from a poet and thinker who, as he has said of Poe, "tried to unite a sort of mathematics with a sort of mysticism" into Valéry the academician, expected to have ideas on all sorts of artistic manifestations, have them often, and have them publicly.

Valéry's general ideas were never particularly varied, and they tended, as he has lately himself admitted, to harden into idées fixes. His sensibilities, on the other hand, have always been fine and complex. But he has spent many years in crying down his major gifts. His early strong admiration for Mallarmé, his acquaintance with Mallarmé's arduous poetic practice, and his youth spent in the anti-romantic atmosphere of the symbolist movement gave him not only a dislike but also a positive feeling of guilt concerning literature sensuously or intuitively expressed. His poetry, he has said, has for him been a set of "exercises." He disparages the element of chance, "inspiration," and insists on the function of the will in art. He has swallowed without a tremor Poe's rationalizations of instinctive creative workings. He has peppered his writings with italics, as though he were constantly bearing down on their essential "thought." Beneath all this underscoring his style flows on fluidly, often with rhetorical magnificence. He is a writer, all his protestations to the contrary, endowed with a natural feeling for sonorous language, operating under the force of a highly refined and subtle intuition. Gifts of this kind cannot be concealed and cannot be forged. The fact that Valéry continually denies them lends to his work as a whole a faint, continual tone of sophistry. We believe in him only partially, and most completely when he has for a moment let down his guard.

One fortunate result of the demands made upon Valéry by his official position is the diminution of his habit of endowing certain artists with his favorite virtues. Although still extolling Protagorean man, "the measure of all things," he can now look more objectively on individual personalities. The essays in the present volume devoted to Stendhal and Baudelaire are truly distinguished pieces of analytical appreciation. The Stendhal essay throws light not only upon Stendhal but upon the complexities of his time. Stendhal, detached and ironic observer of the follies attendant, in the post-Napoleonic era, upon the beginnings of big business, bureaucracy, and middle-class decorum, who insisted upon following his own tastes in art and amusement while his contemporaries "ended by no longer believing in anything but money," Valéry appreciates as an example of free spirit. Again, in the Baudelaire essay, he places the poet in his rightful place as the man who broke through romantic extravagance into modern cleanness of expression and inexorable realism.

In contrast to these solid and illuminating pieces of criticism Valéry's sad views of the breakdown of the human spirit in the modern world—he has been writing and rewriting these views for twenty years—sound feeble and complaining. Defining "the spirit" almost out of existence, he neglects to mention the sources, in ordinary human vitality, from which it continues even now to draw refreshment. How would an illustrious figure from the past view our civilization? he asks. Would not such a one be terrified of it, or disgusted with it? Since no vital response is struck out of himself Valéry donates to men who might well be delighted with some manifestations of modern vigor his own elegant despair. Valéry is weakest when he allows his sensitiveness, lately absorbed into the chilly conservatism of the public man, to underestimate "the spirit's" essential toughness. Man may bomb himself off the earth, but it is unlikely that human attributes will recede back into the prehuman. And Valéry's illustrious ghost would recognize hold-overs from the past in the present: crime, poverty, and riches. The reasons for these hold-overs Valéry never allows himself to go into.

The present translation is uninspired. The translator has edited the French: the essay Mediterranean Inspirations, for example, has been cut in half, and the section containing some of Valéry's most fruitful writing dropped. It would be a good thing if a more representative collection of Valéry's prose were published. His dialogues, considered by some critics to be his most valuable writing, his reminiscences of Mallarmé and Degas, a selection from his aphorisms and aperçus, the essays which establish his connoisseurship in the minor arts, together with many passages which succeed in drawing with great delicacy lines connecting man with the beauty and mystery of nature—such pieces of writing would give readers of translations a better view of the man than has been afforded them up to now. Such a book would be an antidote to the unhealthy tendency toward formula rather than feeling, in literature at large and in Valéry himself. It would present Valéry the poet malgré lui—his most valuable role. True poets are rare. There are always plenty of real and disguised academicians. LOUISE BOGAN

The Press

LORDS OF THE PRESS. By George Seldes. Julian Messner. $3.

MR. SELDES'S new book sets forth the latest developments in the newspaper world. He brings together many facts, and yet I laid down the book with considerable disappointment. Composed in part of articles contributed to magazines, it lacks the thoroughness of his earlier writing. I think, for example, that the study of David Stern and his newspapers does not give a complete picture—perhaps because the book went to press too soon to profit by the revelation of Mr. Stern's alliance with Pennsylvania politicians, from whom he obtained loans with which to carry on. It has been said without much exaggeration that the recent gubernatorial contest in Pennsylvania was in considerable degree a fight between Mr. Stern and his backers, and Moe Annenberg, into whose heavy hands has unhappily fallen the Philadelphia Inquirer. It is hard not to have doubts about the genuineness of Mr. Stern's liberalism, but Mr. Seldes apologizes for him. At least he lets him off by saying that he is putting out as liberal a newspaper as is possible under existing conditions. Had a conservative publisher done some of the things that Mr. Stern has done, Mr. Seldes would have no difficulty whatever in removing his skin.

One notices, too, that Mr. Seldes, like so many others of the liberal or radical group today, tends to measure the liberalism of men and newspapers by their attitude toward the New Deal. A man who opposed the Roosevelt court proposal or reorganization bill is apt to be written down as a complete reactionary. Mr. Seldes thinks that it is complete proof of the reactionary character of the Baltimore Evening Sun that H. L. Mencken was appointed editor and that he printed a six-column editorial consisting solely of dots, 1,000,075 dots, "one for every 'federal government's [sic] immense corps of job holders. . . . Such is the bill for being saved from revolution and ruin by Wonder Men.'" Mr. Seldes has painted a good many valuable portraits of the lords with whom he deals. I miss, however, a careful, factual description of the collapse of the Hearst chain and the marked decline of the Scripps-Howard dailies. Rightly or wrongly the impression grows that the "Sunpapers" have lost their liberalism. It would have been well, too, if we could have had a study of the economic difficulties created by the greatly increased cost of paper and the rise in wages—the latter long overdue and finally brought about by the Newspaper Guild, to which Mr. Seldes rightly dedicates his book. The economic situation of the daily newspaper is perhaps graver than ever before, and in consequence the owners of weak newspapers are more than ever tempted to toady to advertisers and yield to pressure of every description, notably from groups or institutions such as the Catholic church.

Finally, Mr. Seldes recommends that newspapermen should run the newspapers; that, he says, "would be one of the few real practical ways of establishing a free press." He suggests ten tests for a free press, among which are the following: giving equal space to the political parties; giving the consumer a square deal by telling the truth about advertising and consumers' goods, which includes telling the truth about cigarettes and automobiles. He would have the newspapers also give labor a square deal and print both sides of a controversy. These ten tests came to him, he writes, "on the spur of the moment." Others, I think, might suggest themselves after more deliberation. But whatever Mr. Seldes's faults of omission and haste, his book will again help to focus public attention on the press, whose freedom was never more vitally necessary than in the present worldwide emergency.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Medieval Fantasy

THE SWORD IN THE STONE. By T. H. White. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

THERE is an excellent chance that this book will be one of the most disliked of the year, and one of the best liked too, among those to whom "The Crock of Gold," "The Worm Ouroboros," and Twain's "Connecticut Yankee" seem of enduring importance. There will be some to read riddles into it where none are intended, and there will be many to chafe at its outright nonsense, discovering no allegory at all nor any index of immediate social significance. Yet it is a wise book, in part a satiric fantasy of life in medieval Merrie England when King Arthur, known once as the Wart, was growing up. The Wart was tutored by Merlyn, who lived backward in time, who ran out of magic occasionally, knitted his beard into his skull cap, and prepared the lad for kingship by teaching him in curious ways that true education was dependent upon an understanding of nature. Thus the Wart, clothed in magic, viewed the world through the eyes of a fish, a badger, a snake, and a bird, and proved his mettle among them. So too he encountered the giants of man's mind ("They're hard to capture," said Sir Ector, "when they run out of scent") and the evil and exquisite Madame Mim (Pianoforte, Needlework, Necromancy).

The author has a scholar's knowledge of ancient economy, and the adept's delight in the precise, prescribed ritual of falconry and jousting and the hunting of the boar, however he may mock it. King Pellinore in pursuit of the Beast Glatisant, the Wart licking his puppy's nose, the knight hiccuping "Hic, haec, hoc!" are tenderly drawn though they may be fools. And underneath this sheerest nonsense there is a respect for both the time and the legend that makes "The Sword in the Stone" one of the soundest and most delightful fictions of early England that we have had. It is a wondrous tale, full of humor and beauty, with no plot and no sermon, and should serve well as a prophylactic against the dyspeptic news of our own day. HASSOLDT DAVIS

Englishman in Revolt

THE DECLINE AND FALL OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. By Robert Briffault. Simon and Schuster. $2.

THIS is the most hostile and pitiless book on England and the English that has been written for many years. Of course the author is an Englishman. For only an Englishman can describe his own people and their history with so much hatred as Briffault shows. The dull, superficial, conventional forms of English society do not have any real importance. Many independent men and women of England have looked on their society with an easy tolerance or have enjoyed it. But others think that they must break the fetters of convention; they liberate themselves and then they raise the flag of rebellion against England and the English.

The line of famous English rebels against England goes down from Lord Byron to Parnell, and Briffault follows these illustrious predecessors. Briffault was born in London of British parents. He lived many years as a surgeon in New Zealand, wrote a number of remarkable books, served in the British army during the Great War and received several British decorations, which he returned to King George on October 1, 1938, under the fresh impression of Chamberlain's betrayal of European democracy.

The strong side of this book is its exposure of the political methods used by the English governing class since the time of Queen Elizabeth. Briffault is a brilliant historian, and some small mistakes in details do not lessen the force of his argument or of his penetrating judgment. The weakness of his book lies in its use of the results gained by a thorough criticism of the English governing classes against the British nation as a whole. General judgments on a nation are usually a mixture of prejudice and misunderstanding. Remarks on "the English" as a unity are not truer than the usual characterizations of "the Jews" or "the Germans" or "the Americans." If Briffault had avoided exaggeration in his attacks on the English people as "English," his power to convince would be much stronger.

Nevertheless, the thanks of all the friends of progress and democracy are due today to every Englishman who shows that he really understands the fateful political course which brought Mr. Chamberlain to Munich. Briffault makes an extremely important remark on a principal change in European politics since the end of the Great War. Pre-war politics were concerned with purely political issues. They were motivated by national rivalries for power or economic advantage. British capitalists before 1914 wanted to foil the plans of German capitalists without much interest for the social struggles within Germany itself. Nobody in England or France in those days suggested sparing the Kaiser or allowing him better opportunities for colonial expansion because he was such a valiant fighter against the Socialist labor movement.

In post-war Europe purely national aims are subordinated to the bearing they may have on social issues. The English and French upper classes are ready to accept every humiliation from Hitler or Mussolini not because they are cowards or weaklings but because they look on the fascist dictators as their present or future allies against Soviet Russia and the labor revolution. Briffault gives a very clear description of the "ostensible and abnormal" pacifism which the governments of England and France always confess. This pacifism is only a pretext serving to confuse the issues and to deceive world opinion. Chamberlain and his friends hope to get a four-power alliance against Russia and the revolution, but there is danger that Chamberlain's politics will make the British Empire weaker and weaker and the fascists always more adventurous. Perhaps Hitler will come to the conclusion that it is better business to destroy finally the ridiculous British Empire than to attempt a crusade against Moscow.

Briffault tells a story which at this moment cannot be proved, but which may be true. During the Abyssinian War, when the situation of Mussolini looked desperate because of the economic sanctions of the League of Nations, suddenly the King of Belgium went to London to "consult a dentist." Really he was the bearer of a message from the King of Italy begging that Mussolini be spared; for if Mussolini were defeated the monarchy would be destroyed in Italy and a Socialist republic established there. The English government understood the danger to European capitalism of a Socialist victory in Italy, and the fight against Mussolini was dropped.

Briffault's publisher tells us that the author of this anti-English book is now living either in France or in the United States. But if Briffault should like one day to return to England, it is very improbable that anybody would hurt him on the streets of London. He could also go to Oxford and address a big meeting of students, and most probably the meeting would pass a vote of thanks for the courageous speaker. The English cannot be so bad as long as such independent and stubborn fighters as Briffault are being born on their island. ARTHUR ROSENBERG

Logical Empiricism

EXPERIENCE AND PREDICTION. AN ANALYSIS OF THE FOUNDATIONS AND THE STRUCTURE OF KNOWLEDGE. By Hans Reichenbach. University of Chicago Press. $4.

IN THIS book one of Germany's most eminent scientific philosophers presents his views to the English public. Professor Hans Reichenbach, formerly of the University of Berlin and of Istanbul, and now, happily for this country, at the University of California (southern branch), is well known as cofounder of the school of logical empiricism and editor of the Nazi-proscribed Erkenntnis. His critical exposition of the foundations of relativity theory and his development of the frequency theory of probability on a more ambitious scale than has hitherto been attempted represent contributions of the highest importance. Professor Reichenbach is an anomaly in the German philosophical tradition. His bias is definitely empirical. He is aware of the conventionalistic elements in the theory and practice of modern science but stresses the material and procedural contexts within which they function and are controlled. He resolutely closes the door to a priori metaphysical constructions in his philosophical analysis. The American reader will be impressed by the fact that he seems to have developed views which are close to the probabilism of Charles Peirce. The most distinctive feature of his present work is the non-technical restatement of his "solution" of the problem of induction, presented here in the context of a new probabilistic theory of meaning and truth.

A considerable portion of the book is devoted to epistemological questions, including grounds for belief in the existence of the external world, which pragmatic American philosophers with whom Reichenbach claims kinship have dismissed as meaningless. Professor Reichenbach's absorption in traditional epistemological problems, combined with his operationalism and frequency theory of probability, creates some puzzles that will stir many American philosophers to criticism and dissent. But his work will undoubtedly have a fructifying influence. On any theory of probability it is extremely likely that he will leave a distinguished mark not only on contemporary American philosophy but wherever thought is empirical, logical, and free. SIDNEY HOOK

So Great a Man

NAPOLEON: SOLDIER AND EMPEROR. By Octave Aubry. Translated by Arthur Livingston. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.75.

ENGLAND'S YEARS OF DANGER. By Paul Frischauer. Oxford University Press. $2.75.

BONAPARTE's trouble, it has been well said, was that he thought he was Napoleon. Here are two more books to prove it. Admirers of M. Aubry's "St. Helena" will wish to read the extended introduction to that work—which is what his present volume necessarily amounts to. Handsomely set up, with what looks to be a representation of Charles Boyer on the dust jacket (remember "Conquest"?—Garbo was in it), and translated with spirit and some useful editing by Arthur Livingston, this book follows in the main the reported facts of Napoleon's years of action as set down by the French memorialists of his era. Belliard and Bourrienne, Ségur, Caulaincourt, Fouché, Marmont, and the rest—all make revealing contributions to M. Aubry's chapters, in which there is a good deal of thunder but very little blood. The thunder, of course, is furnished by the protagonist: and there is an oddly modern roll to some of it. For example, this, from Napoleon's address to the Council of State on the eve of Ulm and Austerlitz:

> I go to crush the odious House of Austria which I should never have spared. . . . While I am engaged in far-away Germany the nation must be responsible for itself. . . . It must revive its old energies. It must show all Europe that it is one with its leader. . . . I am the nation's work. The nation must uphold me.

M. Aubry, however, does not labor such points as this. He belongs, as much perhaps as any Frenchman can when dealing with Napoleon, to the school of "objective" historians who set up the materials for historical analogies but leave readers free to draw their own.

For devotees of that instructive pastime, here is also the other side of the Napoleonic medal—Herr Frischauer's documentation of England's years of peril during the last world war but one, when they plowed up the green fields of the tight little island into breastworks against the Corsican ogre who never got there, but who pursued, instead, into the deceptive sunshine of a Russian autumn the chimera of Russia's temporary imperial ally perfide Albion, thus opening the way for himself to end his days in protective custody.

Herr Frischauer has already been widely praised for this skilful and judicious assembling of direct quotations into a running commentary by small and great persons upon the course of polity in their world during the years 1792-1815; from the National Convention, that is, to the last of the Hundred Days. All students of the period will wish to own his book. Typical quotation (it closes the book):

> If the Duke of Wellington declares himself against Napoleon being put to death, he is thinking and behaving like a Briton. Great Britain has no greater obligations to any mortal on earth than to this ruffian [Napoleon]. For through the events which he has brought about, England's greatness, prosperity, and wealth have risen high. She is the mistress of the sea, and neither in this dominion nor in world trade has she now a single rival to fear. . . .

The writer was Gneisenau, chief of the Prussian staff at Waterloo. GEORGE LIBAIRE

Shorter Notices

ALL THIS, AND HEAVEN TOO. By Rachel Field. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Rachel Field's great-aunt was Henriette Deluzy-Desportes, governess to the children of the Duc and Duchesse de Praslin, the woman who pleaded her own case in a murder trial that helped to drive the French king from his throne. Freed, she came to America and later married Henry M. Field, brother of Cyrus Field, who laid the Atlantic cable. The author has written her book with the loving care of one recording a family annal. Henriette is treated realistically enough, if a bit too tenderly, to be completely believable, especially in her role of a French woman trying to fit into the life of a New England village and of the hostess of a house in Gramercy Park in the nineteenth century. The novel as a whole is good reading; Rachel Field's style is well adapted to the telling of a romantic and amazing tale. Interesting details of social life in America, drawn doubtless from family letters, are given with humor and charm, and it is easy to forgive a grand-niece for idealizing somewhat so interesting an ancestor.

EUROPE REHOUSED. By Elizabeth Denby. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

Miss Denby, who comes to us with a well-deserved introduction from Professor Gropius, had long been actively engaged in public housing in Britain before setting out on an intensive study of the same field in Europe. This book deals specifically with progress made in six countries—Sweden, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, and France. In spite of widely differing conditions all these countries in the last twenty years have been forced to employ public funds in meeting desperate housing needs. Not that the problem was anything new; actually slums and overcrowding became a chronic evil with the rapid growth of populations which accompanied the industrialization of the Western world. The cessation of all building during the war called dramatic attention to the situation in Europe, just as the stoppage of practically all building during the depression opened the eyes of

WHY DON'T YOU FIGHT ARISTOCRATIC TAXATION?

The most appalling instrument of oppression in human society is the Fiscal Power, which is deliberately employed to penalize productive industry with burdensome taxes while at the same time subsidizing and promoting speculation in the value of improved and vacant land. This is why productive enterprise finds itself "on the spot" between rising taxes and inflated ground rent.

Industrial machinery and the ground on which the machinery is located are totally different economic factors. The machine and its products are values arising from Management and Labor. These values are over-taxed. But on the other hand, ground values are unearned increment caused by the presence of society; and these values, in comparison, are under-taxed in such a degree that vacant land can be held idle on speculation; while occupied land is used for extracting ground rent from over-taxed productive business.

The fiscal methods prevailing in modern civilization are a hang-over from feudal Europe. Bearing down heavily upon production while protecting the special privilege of unearned increment in land values, the existing system of taxation is lop-sided and aristocratic; and it constitutes a formidable but invisible drag on democracy. No democracy can permanently endure under the pressure of lop-sided, illogical taxation.

Machines and the ground on which they stand were mistakenly identified as "instruments of production" by Karl Marx. This confusion at the basis of Marxism goes clear up through the socialistic-communistic philosophy, just as an architectural blunder in the foundation of a house goes clear up to the roof.

Today's Marxist crusade against what is called "capitalistic exploitation of labor" is merely promotion of uncritical economics. The energy employed in Marxist propaganda simply increases today's widespread confusion when it could be spreading light by attacking the most vulnerable point in the economic problem, —lop-sided, aristocratic taxation. Marx knew nothing about the historical significance of taxation; and he had no conception of the Fiscal Power with reference to the phenomenon of ground rent.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

[Begin on opposite page]

More light on this question has been given by Henry George than by any other economic writer. But the deductive, a priori method of his "Progress and Poverty" needs to be supplemented by inductive, historical economics. The work of Henry George two generations ago has given rise to endless argument about the merits of an exclusive tax on the value of the land. Whereas the historical approach to the problem results in emphasis, not upon land, but upon capital and labor as victims of lop-sided fiscal methods introduced for the purpose of protecting ground monopoly against the advance of democracy. The term "single tax" could be eliminated to advantage.

Modern Democracy is an unfinished politico-economic structure which results from compromise between capitalists and ground landlords; the latter, in return for the bribe of complete, or partial, exemption of land values from taxation, having grudgingly submitted to lowering of the franchise from the largest property holders to the middle classes and thence to the laboring masses. Democracy is not a product but a process. Almost none of the present-day writers on political science tell the real story of popular government; how it actually originated; and what its actual meaning is in terms of historic realities. (For confusion on the problem, see, among many other works, "The State," by Woodrow Wilson; "Parliamentary Government in England," by H. Laski; article "Legislative Assemblies," in the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences; etc.).

[Material prepared by Louis Wallis]

this country to the crying urgency of the housing problem. Miss Denby's book should prove of intense interest not only to those engaged professionally in meeting that problem but also to socially minded laymen. It is well illustrated with photographs, plans, and graphic charts and supplies a great deal of detailed information without ever becoming heavily technical.

THE SURVIVORS. By René Béhaine. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

For thirty years now René Béhaine has been a dark horse in French letters. In all likelihood he is destined to remain so until he becomes eventually forgotten. Living in seclusion in Provence and doggedly continuing his interminable "History of a Society," he is periodically discovered by some enthusiast or other and likened to Marcel Proust, with whom he has very little in common, or—as Ford Madox Ford does in the preface to "The Survivors"—to Balzac and Flaubert. In reality he has a closer affinity with such honest and unassuming artisans of the novel as Edouard Estaunié and Georges Duhamel. Mr. Ford tells us that René Béhaine has performed the feat of remaining at once royalist, atheist, and pacifist. "The Survivors" concerns almost exclusively "the class from which the real royalists are recruited," the decaying nobility of France living parasitically in a dream world. The author's atheism makes itself abundantly apparent in the restrained irony with which he describes the dead crust of Catholicism that covers the useless lives of the members of that class. In fact, the criticism is never more than implied as he coldly depicts in detail the religious education of the demoiselles de Laignes and de Chappes, the processions, the scapulars, the convents, and the sewing societies for the African missions. An American Catholic will find nothing offensive here and indeed nothing new, unless it is a greater measure of austerity. The "History of a Society" as a whole simply records the union of a survivor of the old regime with a rather puny representative of the upper middle class, and "The Survivors" establishes the background from which Catharine de Laignes comes.

DEAD NED. By John Masefield. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The hero of this tale becomes before the book closes a resurrected corpse who goes off with a bloody captain to take part in the eighteenth-century slave trade. Before that occurs, however, as a young man apprenticed to a doctor, he is accused of a murder and hanged. The yarn is a very good one, exciting and full of robust characters. Masefield proved in "Sard Harker" that he could write the adventure story par excellence. In this new tale the action is rapid, the historical setting vivid and interesting, the comment on eighteenth-century medicine and practices very amusing. But primarily "Dead Ned" is a romantic picaresque novel, with the good rogue for a hero. The story is based on two factual occurrences recorded in the annals of surgery. Perhaps the most interesting part of the tale is yet to be printed, since Masefield excells in stories of rough life at sea, and Ned, after being supposedly quite dead, is resurrected and just setting sail when this book ends.

DRAMA

Here Come the Ghosts

FOR some years now cognoscenti have occasionally referred in awed tones to Sutton Vane's eerie comedy "Outward Bound." It has just been revived at the Playhouse with an excellent cast, and it promises to achieve today a popular success as great as that which it once enjoyed with those who took their theater seriously. Perhaps this implies some vast improvement in popular taste, but it may, I think, be accounted for more simply by reference to the fact that at present the general public is conditioned to the supernatural. During the two or three years just past there have been more ghosts of one sort or another on the New York stage than trod its boards during the whole of the preceding decade, and even tired business men who used to reach for their hats at the slightest hint of allegory or symbolism have learned to take disembodied spirits as a matter of course.

Even so, "Outward Bound" seems to me to put a considerable strain upon one's power of suspending disbelief. The subject is death and judgment; the method consists in attempting to inspire credence by making everything as completely matter-of-fact as possible. As you will remember if you were intellectual enough to have seen the play when to admire it was a mark of distinction, the entire action takes place in the smoking-room of a liner and concerns a group of passengers upon whom the realization gradually dawns that they are all dead. Obviously this is a good idea for a ghost story, but like so many ghost stories "Outward Bound" cannot reach a rational conclusion except by way of an increasing explicitness that gradually dissipates the eerie atmosphere upon which it depended. In the end Rhadamanthus appears in the guise of a bluff customs inspector who examines the spiritual baggage of the passengers and assigns each to the task of remaking his life. Thus what began as a ghost story ends as an allegory which might appropriately be concluded with a quotation from one of Mr. Browning's most fatuous pieces.

Much of "Outward Bound" is undoubtedly clever and more than acceptable as theatrical entertainment. In fact, a good half of the running time is occupied with the straight comic treatment of the humors of sea travel, and much of the material would be just as effective if the scene were supposed to be the SS. American Banker instead of Charon's Ferry and if the passengers were no more ghostly than they look. But as I remarked in connection with Philip Barry's recent "Here Come the Clowns," I find it difficult to understand why many persons assume, as they do, that even the most elementary allegory is somehow "deeper" and "finer" than anything else. Like Mr. Barry's play, "Outward Bound" is an ingenious novelty, but that the thesis of either play plumbs any hitherto unexplored depths I defy anyone to maintain. The piece is, however, rather unusually well performed by a cast which includes Vincent Price, Helen Chandler, Bramwell Fletcher, and two old-timers—Florence Reed and Laurette Taylor. Miss Reed is excellent as the snooty passenger who has difficulty in adjusting herself to intimate association with even the ghosts of her social inferiors, but I think that the highest honors should go to Miss Taylor, who gives so admirable an interpretation of the role of a mild-mannered charwoman as to make one wish that she would emerge more often from retirement.

"Spring Meeting" (Morosco Theater) is a London success which New York also shows signs of taking to, and it may therefore serve to relieve somewhat the strained relations at present existing between the two capitals, which have recently been exchanging acrimonious So-that's-the-sort-of-thing-you-like-is-it's across the ocean. Nevertheless, the play is actually one of the most British of British domestic comedies, dealing this time with an eccentric Irish baronet and his equally eccentric family. The tart old maid, the comic servants, and the flapper daughter frankly desperate for a man are all there. So too is that atmosphere suggestive of a family joke which Britons adore and which Americans generally find slightly embarrassing. Yet I found myself, like the other members of the audience, very pleasantly entertained. Perhaps an unusually agreeable cast headed by Gladys Cooper and A. E. Matthews accounts for the fact, but I suspect that something in the writing has a good deal to do with it also. The authors seem to stick pretty close to familiar formulas, but the formulas work even better than usual, and for once the family joke gets across to an American audience —even though the piece is unmistakably what the English call a "jolly" play. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

A DELICIOUS pie, with flaky crust, raisins, and a good touch of rum, has been cooked again by first-class chefs and is served excellently in "The Beachcomber." W. Somerset Maughan is the maitre de cuisine: Erich Pommer, the pre-Hitler chef of the German UFA, prepares the dish; the waiter and waitress are Charles Laughton and Elsa Lanchester (in private life married to each other); the restaurant Paramount.

Recipe: Take a drunkard and an inhibited virgin. Make the contrast between them as sharp as possible. Let them—he is a beachcomber, she a teacher—represent two opposing philosophies of life, which, of course, they must not really have. Mix them. Let the mixture become bitter—till they fall in love. Then out with the sugar box: marriage and the decent life of petty innkeepers somewhere in England. He never touches a drop again except to sell it, and she says, "Let's hit the hay." To make the whole plot difficult to compare with everyday life and thus more believable, let it take place 10,000 miles from the Western world on a Far Eastern island; this also adds spice. Fill it with the raisins of sharp psychological observations and witty bits of dialogue—and most guests will eat the confection with delight.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

I did so myself, up to a certain point. Charles Laughton creates again one of his vital characters, which one cannot forget because they are individuals and not the usual types which populate the screen. In this picture, if he had been permitted to follow the fate of the outcast beachcomber through to its true end—to be drowned in the surf and washed away—he might have given us the greatest piece of acting in his career so far; and the whole picture would have been an outstanding movie instead of only first-class entertainment that is, nevertheless, too subtle in spots to have the box-office appeal for which it obviously tries.

Elsa Lanchester is perfect as the drunkard's puritan foil. She is best when, rising above the level of successful theatrical routine, she gives chaste notice that she is falling in love with the man she is supposed to despise. In the jungle night (death is looming among the palms) she has moments which also make one wish for a tragic development so that she might show the whole range of her talent. Instead the film fizzles out into an ending of domestic happiness.

In comparison, "The Lady Vanishes," directed by Alfred 39-Steps Hitchcock (Gaumont), is, on a lower level, the better picture. Precise and without pretensions, it is the best spy thriller in a long time: growing suspense from beginning to end, no empty threats, no sticky romantics, no stupid explanation, no misleading clues—every minute is used to advance the plot, which has an almost mathematical logic. Of course, a whole arsenal of old tricks is employed, but with authority and irony. By this quantity is changed into quality. About the excellent use of the comic relief provided by two English sport enthusiasts one could write an essay. Besides being an excellent story, presented with technical perfection, the picture vividly conveys the ruthless, machine-like methods of an organization which has the features of a modern totalitarian system. Our compliments to Mr. Hitchcock: the thriller addict leaves this film not only highly satisfied but with no pricks of conscience at having been taken in again by trash.

"The Foolish Virgin" (Film d'Art) produced by Henri Diamant-Berger after the old play by Henri Bataille, presents a new actress, Juliette Faber, whom we shall look forward to seeing again soon. She plays the difficult part of a young girl falling in love with an elderly man and conveys her passion with such an economy of expression that her love becomes most natural and not at all foolish. This newest French picture, though it ends rather awkwardly in the old-fashioned manner of Henri Bataille's last acts, is worth seeing if only to make the acquaintance of Miss Faber.

FRANZ HOELLERING

NEXT WEEK IN The Nation
A Last Conversation with Karel Capek
by Erica Mann

IN EARLY ISSUES
"The Wild Palm" by William Faulkner
reviewed by Robert Morss Lovett
"Unforgotten Years" by Logan Pearsall Smith
reviewed by Odell Shepard

We Joined The NAZI MOVEMENT

To understand Hitler and Totalitarianism you need this vivid X-ray of the minds and emotions of his followers. Here is direct uncensored testimony from 600 National Socialists on WHY they cast their lot with the Austrian corporal—why each saw personal salvation in his dictatorship. A surging, convincing, first-hand explanation.

WHY HITLER CAME INTO POWER

By THEODORE ABEL, of Columbia University

$2.75 at bookstores

PRENTICE-HALL, Inc., - 70 Fifth Avenue, New York

AVOID REVOLUTION

UPHOLD CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

Send for free copy of recent address at regular session of London, England, Rotary by Louis Wallis on "LOP-SIDED TAXATION" the immediate under-surface issue in all countries; including remarks by a member of the Fiscal Authority in the British government, who attended session and gave complete endorsement. This address gives platform of forthcoming action by London County Council cooperating with two hundred and thirty city councils in England, Scotland, and Wales. For free copy, simply send your name and address clearly written on a post card to—

Dept. B,

THE HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE

30 East 29th Street, New York City

RECORDS

ON Columbia's December list is one of Brahms's best works, the Variations on a Theme of Handel (three records, $5), which has been available only in an unsatisfactory performance by Moiseivitch. I don't agree with Egon Petri's idea of Variation 22 and his telescoping of Variations 23 and 24; for the rest, however, he does an excellent job. Wiener and Doucet give a performance of Mozart's D major Sonata for two pianos (two records, $3.25) in a style polished and refined down to the point where the music hasn't the vitality and sparkle that it has in the Timely recording by Castagnetta and Kaye. Schubert's Sonata in A minor for 'cello and piano, beautifully played by Feuermann and Gerald Moore (2½ records, $4.50), gives us the qualities that are Schubert's, but in a work of minor stature. As for Bach's Sonata No. 2 for harpsichord and viola da gamba, well done by Ernst Victor Wolff and Janos Scholz (two records, $3.25), I find it as dull as the Sonata No. 1.

Columbia's orchestral releases include Respighi's enjoyable "The Birds," well recorded by Defauw with the Brussels Conservatory Orchestra (two records, $3.25); Beecham's fine new version of the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" (two records, $3.25); and Deems Taylor's "Through the Looking Glass," played on four records by the Columbia Broadcasting System Orchestra under Barlow. Columbia, which thinks $1.50 a record is enough for Beethoven or Mozart, thinks also that nothing less than $2 a record is enough for Taylor; but there are any number of things that would be better value for someone with $8—or even $2—to spend.

THE FOOLISH VIRGIN
CINEMA 49
ENGLISH TITLES
First Run in New York and Paris at the Same Time
49th Street, Just West of Broadway
Phone Circle 7-4931 — Continuous from 1 P. M.

IT WILL PAY YOU
to read the material under two captions,
"AVOID REVOLUTION" and "WHY DON'T YOU FIGHT ARISTOCRATIC TAXATION"

NOW you may order
BOOKS
from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
The Readers' Service Division
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

Victor's most treasurable December release is the record ($2) of the closing scene of the performance of "Boris Godunov" at Covent Garden on July 4, 1928, with Chaliapin as Boris. On its two sides it gives the music that is on the last third of the A side and the entire B side of Victor 6724, but this music with the life, the dramatic potency it acquires from the pace, the atmosphere of the performance—to say nothing of the better orchestra and recording (the two sides of 6724 seem to have been done at different times, with Chaliapin's voice badly recorded on the B side).

Then there is the album (four records, $6.50) of Christmas carols sung by the marvelous Vienna Choir Boys. It reached me after Christmas, but the singing of these boys is for all months of the year. Included among the songs from various countries is an American Indian song that I am sure no American Indian would acknowledge in the arrangement in which the boys sing it.

I dislike the music, but the performance and recording of the passages from "Parsifal" in the set (two records, $4.50) made by Melchior with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy are excellent. Yella Pessl's performance of the A major Sonata of Scarlatti, on her single ($1.50), is quite good; her performance of the C minor is heavy. Brahms's "Feldeinsamkeit" and Reger's "Waldeinsamkeit" and "Zum Schlafen," on another single ($2), are well sung by Maria Müller; but I do not care for Reger's songs. And an outstanding vocal record on Victor's special list that I reached a little late is Eide Norena's of Handel's "Care Selve" ($2).

I doubt that Byrd would accept Stokowski's translation of his Pavane and Gigue into the lush sonorities of the Philadelphia Orchestra ($1.50). And I fear that if Wagner heard what Stokowski makes of his "Tristan und Isolde" (five records, $10)—the falsification of the sense of the work by the rearrangement of material, the manner of performance—he would express his disapproval homicidally, with a second bullet for the gentleman who in the accompanying booklet refers to Wagner's own ending of his work as "the conventional ending" of concert versions, and who translates the second-act duet into a night of True Story love.

From my examination of the New York Post's records of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony I conclude that they offer a new recording made especially for the purpose. The performance is good; the surfaces are quiet (what they will be like later I do not know); the recording is clear but without the richness of present-day orchestral recording—as though care had been taken to give no more than was being paid for. You get that much if you paid 93 cents with your coupons; but if you paid $1.93 for a so-called Philharmonic Transcription—which means the same records with a few gaudy labels and an album that Victor charges 50 cents for—you do not get your additional dollar's worth. As for the record-player, a good one which, linked to a first-class radio amplifier and speaker, will produce the sounds described in the Post's promotion copy costs about $40.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Lift the Embargo!

Dear Sirs: A profound crisis in American foreign policy impends. There are the clearest indications that the powers whose pact at Munich made possible the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia have a similar dispensation prepared for Spain.

This is a matter which vitally concerns our nation. It is not merely the spread of authoritarian aggression and its consequent threat to democracies which concerns us, but the serious challenge presented to the economic security and political integrity of the Latin American republics. It becomes increasingly evident that the dictator powers are seeking to control the economic and political destinies of the countries of South America. If they are permitted to succeed, it will mean a very grave menace to our own interests and ultimately to our freedom itself. Fascism predominant in Spain, the mother country, will encourage further fascist penetration in South America.

The threat to South America has not been ignored by the United States. Plans for navy and army expansion reflect a growing concern on the part of the government. Strangely enough, our government, almost deliberately it seems, has turned away from the least expensive and safest antidote—the lifting of the embargo on arms to Spain. This step would not only aid a sister democracy but serve notice to the world that we do not intend to countenance fascist depredations in this hemisphere.

If the United States is interested in the preservation of the political and economic integrity of South America, in the preservation of democracy, in the preservation of international law and peace, the embargo must be lifted. Spain must not be the victim of a second Munich.

We urge all who value peace, democracy, and the rule of law to write at once to the President and to Secretary Hull and demand that the embargo be lifted.

DARWIN J. MESEROLE, HAROLD P. SELIGSON, WALKER GELLHORN, MILTON KOVNITZ, H. H. NORDLINGER, PAUL J. KERN, S. JOHN BLOCK, ALBERT S. BARD, DOROTHY KENYON, THURGOOD MARSHALL.

New York, December 28

Kernan—Progressive Veteran

Dear Sirs: May I express appreciation of the excellent, concise, and painstaking article in your issue of December 17 on Coughlin, the Jews, and Communism, by the Reverend William C. Kernan. Your many readers may be interested to know that Father Kernan is a veteran, a former post chaplain of the California American Legion, and a member of the Executive Board of the Council of United States Veterans. He is an outstanding example of the progressive veteran. SAMUEL ROBBINS

Milwaukee, Wis., December 30

Behind O'Connell's Defeat

Dear Sirs: As the editor of the Western Progressive, which brought Jerry O'Connell into political prominence in the state of Montana and gave him the build-up upon which he coasted up to the time of his defeat in the recent elections, I was quite amused by John E. Kennedy's article in the November 26 issue of The Nation, entitled Liberal's Defeat—A Case History.

We here in Montana know why Mr. O'Connell was defeated. When he announced his candidacy for Congress in 1936, he was serving as Railroad and Public Service Commissioner. The progressives of the state had worked hard to elect him to that office against the opposition of the corporate and specially privileged interests. He was elected to bring about a reduction in utility rates, and his term of office was for six years. He quit that office to run for Congress, and in that election he had the support of all of the corporate interests of the state. Jerry said they wanted to get him off the Railroad and Public Service Commission, and perhaps he was right. The progressives of Montana elected him for a specific purpose, and he quit before the job was done.

Mr. Kennedy's article complains that in the 1938 campaign the Catholic church, the corporate interests, Senator Wheeler, Governor Ayres, the subsidized newspapers of Montana, Labor, the great national paper of the Railway Brotherhoods, William Green of the American Federation of Labor, John L. Lewis of the C. I. O., and even Mrs. Wheeler were opposing Jerry. This is true. They all did oppose him, and so did a majority of the progressive citizens who had supported him in his first campaign. The moral, as one of the weekly papers of the state pointed out, was that a political candidate should have some friends.

Regardless of what Jerry and some of his associates in the East think of Senator Wheeler, we here in Montana have confidence in his honesty and integrity. Many of us differed with him on his court fight, but we never questioned his sincerity of purpose.

Of course the Communists supported Jerry, as they support most progressive candidates in Montana. Had he been able to retain the support of the Catholics of western Montana, and had he not lost the confidence of the liberal voters of the state, he would probably have been elected. The fault lies, not with Jerry's opposition, but with Jerry's own conduct. JOHN W. NELSON

Helena, Mont., December 23

The March Against Culture

Dear Sirs: Jewish students have now by a new Czechoslovakian government decree been shut out from attendance at the German university in Prague. This in itself would be saddening but not surprising. Since Hitler is now the real master of the Prague Hradschin, the German minority still remaining in the country enjoys the advantages of "coordination" without protest. But the Nazification of the university has an after-taste which is even more unpleasant. It is another milestone on the triumphant march of the new Germany against culture.

In the same Castle Hradschin where President Hacha takes his orders from the Wilhelmstrasse, there resided six hundred years ago a powerful, cultivated prince, Karl IV, of Luxembourg. Ruling the German Empire from Bohemia, this prince founded on Bohemian soil the first German university (1348) Countless learned men of worldwide reputation have since then taught and studied in the University of Prague, always the most liberal school of German speaking Europe. The numerus clausus against Jews on the teaching staff was never applied here, not even in the last years. And Jews have from the beginning formed a numerically larger proportion of the students than in other German universities. It was thus no accident that the University of Prague played an important role in the struggle for democracy; the "reading and conversation room" for German students was an important secret cell of the revolution of 1848.

Later, to be sure, even the liberal University of Prague was penetrated by the popular spirit. The Sudeten German students flaunted their varicolored ribbons and caps on the streets, and the mere sight of them so aroused the Czechs that often a Bummel of Sudeten students developed into a street riot and the police and even mounted military had to intervene. Many a minister of Franz Joseph's fell because of the Prague students. Only under Masaryk's mild scholar's scepter was liberalism fully reestablished in its first academic seat. Now the oldest German university has followed the example of its younger sisters. The exodus of Jewish and liberal scholars has already begun. Perhaps America will be able to offer hospitality to some of the exiles as it has to so many of their predecessors.

ANTON KUH

New York, December 29

Catalonian Writers in Need

Dear Sirs: I have had a letter from my friend, Maria Manent, a poet and scholar of Barcelona, who has translated much American poetry into Catalonian, asking me to form a committee with Mr. Archibald MacLeish, to endeavor to meet the desperate needs of a number of Catalonian writers who this year are faced with actual shortage of food. It is food, not money, for which he asks. I have met many of these writers and have the highest respect for them, as I have for Maria Manent, and I wish, in my own name and that of Mr. MacLeish, to ask American writers to help in this urgent emergency. It is to writers that Maria Manent specifically appeals.

Will any writer, reading this letter and wishing to help, engage himself or herself to contribute a sum of from $1 to $10 a month for six months, with the possibility of optional renewal, the funds thus contributed being used to send food, by means which have already been provided, direct to Catalonian writers in Barcelona. Please write to me at 25 West Forty-fifth Street, New York, inclosing a first-month check, or to Mr. Archibald MacLeish, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

HENRY S. CANBY

New York, December 28

Careful or Cavalier?

Dear Sirs: It was illuminating to me to contrast the opinion of Thomas Mann, as expressed in The Nation of December 10, to the effect that "the artist . . . is of course the careful human being par excellence" with a recent talk (as distinct from "speech") given at Harvard by Robert Frost as a prelude to a reading of his own poems. In his talk Mr. Frost differentiated the artist from the scholar as one whose approach to life, to knowledge, was easy-going, nonchalant, and, in his most emphasized term, "cavalier."

Are the differences here the differences in national cultures—on the one hand the inheritor of a ponderous, metaphysical tradition, on the other the inheritor of no conscientious hierarchy of thought or, indeed, of any attitude not at least implied in Whitman's initial liberation from bookishness? Or do the differences go deeper?

JOHN HASTINGS

Cambridge, Mass., December 23

The Italy America Society

Dear Sirs: On behalf of the Italy America Society I wish to correct certain serious misinformation about us that appeared in your issue of October 15, in an article entitled Mussolini's American Agents by M. B. Schnapper. Mr. Schnapper says that "the Italy America Society serves up its propaganda chiefly in cultural guises," and he conveys the impression that our activities have political connotations. Nothing could be farther from the truth.

We were organized in 1918, long before the advent of fascism, and from the start a cardinal principle of the society has been to eschew politics completely. Charles Evans Hughes was our first president. Other founders included William Fellowes Morgan and Hamilton Holt. Our roster of presidents speaks for itself: Justice Hughes, already mentioned, Paul D. Cravath, Thomas L. Lamont, Henry Rogers Winthrop, Marshall Field, Myron C. Taylor, and the Hon. Henry Prather Fletcher, the independence of whose attitude during his ambassadorship to Italy was well known.

Mr. Schnapper seems to think there is something suspect in the Italy America Society's having connections in Italy, including "Italian noblewomen as its Italian officers." These good ladies are not in any way active in the society, but merely act at times as hostesses to those of our members who visit Italy. Most of our members are Americans. They are people who are fond of Italy and who like to study its language and its achievements in art, literature, and science. While not of the eminence of those generations of Englishmen of whom Byron and the Brownings were outstanding examples, these American friends of Italy have the same feeling for its beauty and history.

HENRY BURCHELL, Vice-President

New York, December 1

[We fail to understand how those who share the feeling of Byron and the Brownings for the "beauty and history" of Italy can fail to take a positive stand against a regime which has done that culture to death. Until the society takes such a stand, we shall continue to believe that Mr. Schnapper's inference is a reasonable one.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's correspondent in Spain, is at present in the United States.

WILLSON WHITMAN is writing a book on the TVA, of which the present series of articles is a part.

VLADIMIR POZNER, a French journalist now visiting the United States, has recently published "Bloody Baron: The Story of Ungern Sternberg."

LOUISE BOGAN, poetry critic of the New Yorker, is the author of a book of verse, "The Sleeping Fury."

HASSOLDT DAVIS is a frequent contributor to magazines.

ARTHUR ROSENBERG until the rise of Hitler was professor of history at the University of Berlin. He is now teaching in the United States.

SIDNEY HOOK is chairman of the Department of Philosophy of New York University.

GEORGE LIBAIRE is the editor and translator of the memoirs of General de Caulaincourt.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs. Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRAR
Burlingame, Cal

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 14, 1939 NUMBER 3

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 49

EDITORIALS:
- THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE 51
- JUSTICE FRANKFURTER 52
- SABOTAGE IN CHINA 53

QUESTIONS ON THE WHITNEY CASE by I. F. Stone 55

LIVING PHILOSOPHIES. VIII. WHY I AM A MARXIST by Harold J. Laski 59

DEMOCRACY WINS IN CHILE by Freda Kirchwey 62

THE PRESS AND THE NLRB by Mary Bartlett 64

IN THE WIND 66

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 67

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- A LAST CONVERSATION WITH KAREL CAPEK by Erika Mann 68
- NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 69
- A GUIDE TO SOCIAL THOUGHT by Max Lerner 70
- A MIXED BAG by Norah Hoult 71
- ANSWER TO "MEIN KAMPF" by Paul Klapper 71
- ITALY IN COLORADO by Eda Lou Walton 72
- THE NEW PALESTINE by Philip S. Bernstein 72
- DRAMA: MORE MATTER AND LESS ART by Joseph Wood Krutch 73
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 74

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART
I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE QUESTIONS RAISED BY I. F. STONE IN AN article in this issue on the challenge of the Whitney case merit the attention of Congress. The failure of the Attorney General of New York and the nationally famous "racket-busting" District Attorney of Manhattan, Mr. Dewey, to go as deeply into this case as they might cannot be corrected by Congress. But the readiness of Chairman Douglas of the SEC to declare the Whitney case closed even after the resignation of Dr. Hutchins as a public representative on the Board of Governors of the Exchange warrants inquiry at Washington. Is the SEC so anxious to fraternize with President "Bill" Martin of the Exchange that it is willing to shut its eyes to facts which disturb the carefully built-up picture of a "reformed" Stock Exchange? Are the results of past New Deal investigations to evaporate in the warm but treacherous atmosphere of an era of good feeling between the Exchange and the SEC? Is our most important market, the market in which the value of the savings of the American people is in large part established, to be left in the hands of a sham "reform" administration? The unwillingness of the Exchange to inquire into the circumstances that enabled an embezzler to serve so long as its officer is apparent. Chairman Douglas's statement to Arthur Krock, "For the SEC, as for the Exchange, the Whitney case is closed," will be comforting at Broad and Wall streets but it should raise the alarm on Capitol Hill.

NOT SINCE DREYFUS HAS JUSTICE WON SO great a victory as in the freeing of Tom Mooney. The power of California's great capitalist interests sent him to jail and kept him there twenty-two years despite the fact that three official investigations indicated a frame-up. The power of organized labor and of its progressive middle-class allies has set Mooney free by the election of a governor pledged to pardon him. Culbert I. Olson, the new Governor of California, has covered his name with glory by his historic act. The Russian Revolution saved Mooney from execution—the cry of "Muni" set up by demonstrators before our embassy in what was then St. Petersburg led to the first investigation of the case and the commutation of Mooney's sentence to life imprisonment by Governor Stephens at the request of President Wilson. The upsurge of the forces that gave this country the New Deal has finally made it possible to set Mooney free, after repeated appeals to the Supreme Court proved unavailing. We salute Tom Mooney the symbol and the man.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1897.

*

UNLIKE THE EXTRAVAGANT ACCUSATIONS which preceded it, the Sheppard committee's report on "unjustifiable political activity" in the last campaign is a temperate document. It not only testifies to certain abuses; it disproves a great many reckless charges. In characteristic fashion the press has devoted headlines to the three states where such political activity in connection with the administration of relief was revealed, soft-pedaling the equally impressive disclosure that similar charges proved groundless in six other states. Despite the moderation of the committee's report, the habitual foes of a generous relief program have already converted it into a manifesto against the WPA. In citing this disparity between the report itself and the sweeping charges heard last fall, we do not propose to condone or dismiss whatever corruption has been disclosed. We do protest against the hypocritical use of these unspectacular findings by those whose main objective is to curtail relief. An aim that is politically so perilous must be camouflaged in noble phrases. Hence the proposal to return control of relief to the states, as if this would wipe out politics in relief and substitute efficiency. Walter Lippmann's extraordinary suggestion that all WPA recipients as well as public office-holders be disfranchised is more candid. In many quarters the outcry against "politics in relief" screens the desire to eliminate relief as a political issue—and thereby pave the way for elimination of a decent relief program.

*

MARTIN DIES HAS HAD HIS FLING WITH $25,000 of the public money. He has basked in newspaper publicity for several months and has hung up an all-time record for half-truths irresponsibly arrived at. Even the New York Times admits that the committee to which it gave such lavish space in its news columns has "made silly and vehement charges" and that its personnel should be altered if it is to accomplish any serious results. Unfortunately, however, Representative Dies has become the darling of bodies like the New York State Chamber of Commerce, and the committee, by playing on the fears of the public, has built up for itself a popular support which many politicians in Congress who privately have no respect for it dare not ignore. On the other hand, the La Follette committee, which has done such vital and careful work in investigating the denial of civil liberties, has no such prestige and is in danger of having its work cut short. Now that Congress has reassembled for one of the most momentous sessions in its history, the Dies committee should be given its walking papers. It should first be required, however, to give a financial accounting. Paul Y. Anderson charged, with supporting evidence, that the committee could not have carried on as long as it did on $25,000. The Dies committee has richly earned a thorough investigation.

*

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN, THAT PILGRIM OF "appeasement," has gone to Rome with his self-imposed Munich halo showing signs of wear. His growing army of avowed opponents at home has warned him not to buy any more worthless promises with other people's cash; his parliamentary followers, still outwardly faithful, are reported to be shaking in their shoes for fear the Duce will bully him into some undertaking that will set the smoldering electorate ablaze with resentment. His friends in the French government are clearly nervous about the lengths to which his simple faith in dictatorial hearts may lead him, and we imagine there was some plain speaking over the teacups in Paris. To Daladier the extravagance of the Roman demands has been a godsend. He is enough of a French nationalist to know that Corsica is not Czechoslovakia. Mussolini left him no alternative but an emphatic negative, and he has returned from his tour of Tunis to find his domestic position much strengthened. We hope he has been able to impart some of this belated firmness to his British colleague. Obviously he had to forbid any idea of British mediation of Italian claims on France. We trust he was also willing and able to convince Mr. Chamberlain of the danger of making further concessions to Franco.

*

FRANCO'S HOPE FOR A DECISIVE VICTORY AS a prelude to Chamberlain's visit to Rome has been dashed by General Miaja's brilliant drive in Estremadura. As we go to press both the rebels' offensive against Catalonia and the government's attack in the south are making considerable headway, Artesa and Borjas Blancas have fallen to Franco, but the Loyalists have recovered Valsequillo, Granja de Torre, and Fuenteovejuna. It is difficult to estimate the relative value of the two offensives. The total rebel gains have been somewhat larger than the government's, but the Loyalists have moved more rapidly since their drive opened. Both areas are strategically important, but of the two the Estremadura mining region possesses by far the greatest permanent value. Franco has the advantage of position. With Republican Spain divided into two parts, his strategy is obviously to throw his full force against the two sectors alternately with a view to crushing them one at a time. Offsetting this advantage is the fact that Miaja's drive, if successful, will divide the rebel area into sectors. The coming week is likely to show which drive is the more significant. If the rebel offensive pushes on to a point where either Tarragona or Barcelona is endangered, the Loyalist position will be desperate indeed. But if, as is more likely, both drives are checked, the government will carry off the honors because of the greater value of its gains.

*

BARON HIRANUMA, NEW PREMIER OF JAPAN, enjoys the unenviable distinction of being the leading jingo in a nation of fire-eaters. His selection as head of the government marks the elimination of the last vestige of moderate or civilian influence in the government. Some commentators are referring to the new Cabinet as "weak" because two leading reactionaries have been dropped—Seihin Ikeda as Finance Minister and Admiral Suyetsugu as Home Minister. Weak it is in the sense that it lacks outstanding personalities, but this very fact makes it more than ever the tool of the military extremists. Except for the Premier, the new Cabinet contains only two strong figures—Baron Araki, who at one time was the recognized leader of the military clique, and Hachiro Arita, author of the Tokyo-Berlin anti-Communist pact. It is impossible to conceive that such a Cabinet will moderate the policy of conquering China or make concessions on the Open Door to conciliate the West. There is a possibility, however, that having taken all the rope, the extremists may hang themselves.

*

BISHOP MICHAEL J. CURLEY, IN REFUSING AN invitation to visit Loyalist Spain and see for himself whether the Catholic church is persecuted there, reminds us of the child who refused to eat spinach because, he said, "I might like it, and I hate the damn stuff." The fact is that the Catholic hierarchy, in Spain and out of it, is so intent on discrediting the Loyalist government that it has deliberately worked to keep churches closed in order to provide a basis for its pro-fascist propaganda. Bishop Curley's excuse that he would be murdered if he went to Barcelona is, unless he was thinking of Franco's bombs, merely a crude extension of the same technique. The Catholic hierarchy has a vested interest in the rebel cause—and it is not religious. In this country it has launched a new campaign, which has the merit of being open, for the retention of the embargo against Loyalist Spain. The President's speech is bound to intensify this campaign—which puts him under an added obligation to turn his words into action and lift the embargo immediately.

*

MONTAGU NORMAN, ALWAYS THE MYSTERY man, ended his visit to Berlin without any news leak about his conversations there. Officially the only reason for his trip was to act as godfather to Dr. Schacht's grandchild, but we suspect he was also pressed to assume spiritual paternity for the Nazi plan to sell the Jews for foreign exchange. Dr. Schacht had attempted to put over this scheme when in London recently but had met a singularly cool reception. The need for boosting Germany's purchasing power abroad, however, grows ever more urgent, as is illustrated by the coffee famine which has developed at home. Hence Dr. Schacht's hope that in the more congenial air of Berlin he could perhaps enlist the influential support of his old friend. Mr. Norman doubtless proved a ready listener, but fortunately the decision does not rest entirely with him. Even if he could induce the British government to accept the plan, American assent would still be necessary. In the light of the President's recent speech, with its suggestions of economic sanctions against fascism, we hope and believe that assent will never be given. The proper reply to the Nazi attempt to levy ransom is to intensify the boycott. The effectiveness of this weapon extends beyond the German border. Poland, Hungary, Rumania, and Czechoslovakia are all tentatively considering plans for the expulsion and spoliation of their Jewish populations. The power of the boycott acts as a check; the success of the Nazi blackmail effort would be a powerful encouragement. In this connection we welcome the organization, under the leadership of William Jay Schieffelin, of the Volunteer Christian Committee to Boycott Nazi Germany. It should prove a strong reinforcement to a growing movement.

The President's Message

THE President's opening message to Congress rang out like a bugle across the world to rally the dispirited and retreating democracies to a stand. Both its manner and its matter place it among the great state papers of our history. Glowingly eloquent, it was a long way from mere rhetoric. Its essential appeal was to the intelligence, and as such it formed a striking contrast to the frenzied demagogy of the dictators.

In the Western democracies the message should strengthen the hands of those who are working desperately to inject a little adrenalin into government policies. It will be harder after this for Mr. Chamberlain to convince his followers that the fascist wolves can be appeased by a judicious sacrifice of other people's babies.

To Americans the message was a call to recognize the crucial nature of the fascist challenge and to accept it firmly and coolly. We are asked to recognize that it is no longer a matter of altruistic and academic concern for the liberties of Europe. "We no more than other nations can afford to be surrounded by the enemies of our faith and our humanity . . . cannot forever let pass, without effective protest, acts of aggression against sister nations —acts which automatically undermine all of us."

To suggest that the President, in urging definite American resistance to aggression, was whipping up a jingo spirit is grossly unjust. As he pointed out, there are effective economic weapons at our disposal for countering the bullying tactics of the dictators. "At the very least," he said, "we can and should avoid any action, or any lack of action, which will encourage, assist, or build up an aggressor." If words mean anything this sentence stands as the strongest possible condemnation of our policy with regard to Spain. By refusing supplies of arms to a legitimate government, engaged in combating rebellion instigated and aided from abroad, we have bestowed a blessing on aggression. What is more, we have connived at the sapping of our own defenses. If fascism wins in Spain it will be in a position to control the Spanish and Portuguese Atlantic islands—a development which so sober an authority as Major George Fielding Eliot declares would be of "grave concern" to us. At the same time it will be strategically placed to redouble that propaganda in Latin America which is already cause for alarm. The President has rightly said: Words are not enough. He has the power in his hands to make his words effective by raising the Spanish embargo. Hesitation will reduce a magnificent speech to mere wind. We look to him to act and act now.

THE HOME FRONT

If we are to defend democracy from foreign encroachments we must provide it with an unshakable foundation at home. Despite reactionary sneers, there is good justification for the President's claim that the New Deal has made a genuine contribution toward that end. But there is still much to be done before our boasted equality of opportunity is given reality and before "the right to work" is rescued from its misuse as an anti-union slogan. We regret that Mr. Roosevelt should have proclaimed in effect a moratorium on reform.

On the central question of the budget his attitude is firmer. Despite the barrage directed at him by the advocates of economy, he has taken the stand that any move toward balancing the budget would be fatal to recovery. We think he is entirely right. It is not merely the unemployed who are at stake: it is even more a question of holding on to the measure of business revival achieved in the past few months and using it as a springboard to real recovery. We are told, of course, that a balanced budget would buoy up capitalist confidence. That is the theory; in practice it would certainly prove a stunning blow. For its immediate result would be to undermine purchasing power, and it has never been a capitalist habit to make new investments in the face of obviously declining demand. Are the President's critics prepared to see us go down a third time as a preliminary to our rescue by orthodox methods? Is it not better sense to pursue the present policy than to drop it just as it is showing signs of developing sufficient pressure to bring forth new industrial investment on a large scale?

We shall be surprised if many of the Congressional rooters for economy dare give a negative answer to this question by accepting the President's challenge and making important alterations in the budget. When the message placed the responsibility squarely on their shoulders the enthusiasm which had greeted previous references to economy evaporated rapidly. Republicans elected by Townsend votes were chilled at the notion of cutting pensions; those who had capitalized farm discontent shrank from the idea of saving on agriculture. The truth is that few Congressmen have the courage of their economy convictions. The economy campaign has all the earmarks of a political stunt, but the perfectly legitimate tactics of the President are likely to make it recoil on its authors.

An early test will come on the deficiency appropriation designed to carry the WPA to the end of the financial year. The President is asking for $875,000,000, a figure denounced in some quarters as grossly extravagant. Actually it is very doubtful whether this is sufficient. It means that the WPA enrolment, which was 3,112,000 in December, must not average more than 2,868,000 over the remainder of the fiscal year. This is a very considerable reduction, and unless reemployment by private industry proceeds more rapidly than in recent months, it may mean the transfer of thousands to relief. Yet some reactionary Congressmen are talking of $500,000,000 as a sufficient amount. This is a scandalous proposal, and we hope it will be promptly squelched.

Justice Frankfurter

THE good that Presidents do is often interred with their Administrations. It is their choice of Supreme Court justices that lives after them. The noisy battles of Roosevelt I still echo in the phrases he added to the language, but nothing else he did has had so much effect on our national development as the appointment of Justice Holmes. Wilson's Clayton Act and his Federal Trade Commission, of which so much was expected, stand as monuments to futility. But the Calvinistic stubbornness and righteous belligerency that crammed the nomination of Justice Brandeis down the throat of an unwilling Senate have continued to bear fruit in our constitutional law. We believe that in the perspective of history the appointment of Felix Frankfurter to the Supreme Court will not seem the least of Franklin Roosevelt's accomplishments.

Prophecy in this field is hazardous. Our justices, like monarchs, are unpredictable quantities, and our constitutional history is full of surprises. Marshall did not prove as incompatible with Jeffersonianism in power as Adams expected. Taney went to the bench as a champion of the new democratic ferment under Jackson and died as the hated spokesman of the slaveholders. Lincoln's Field lived to be the most effective and ingenious reactionary ever to sit on the court. Great scholars, like Story and Gray, have proved sterile on that bench; lawyers of little reputation, like Waite and Miller, creative. Wilson's trust-busting Attorney General, McReynolds, turned out to be a pillar of reaction; Coolidge's Attorney General, Stone, has developed a liberalism and a capacity for trenchant expression no one dreamed he possessed. Chief Justice Hughes, fresh from success as a Wall Street corporation lawyer, saved Herndon, de Jonge, and the Scottsboro boys. But other justices—Holmes, Brandeis, Cardozo—were known quantities before their nominations and fulfilled all that was expected of them. It is in this last category that we feel safe in placing Justice Frankfurter.

Frankfurter's whole life has been a preparation for the Supreme Court, and his appointment has an aesthetically satisfying inevitability. No other appointee in our history has gone to the court so fully prepared for its great tasks. His experience in government, from his first service as an Assistant United States Attorney in New York under Henry L. Stimson through his work in the War Labor Administration under Wilson, has been a wide one. His authoritative work, "The Business of the Supreme Court," written in collaboration with James M. Landis, and the annual surveys of each session that he has contributed to the Harvard Law Review reveal an unequaled knowledge of the court's history, cases, and procedure. He is our foremost authority on administrative law, the law that has developed around our new regulatory agencies. He first assisted and then succeeded Brandeis as leader of the forces for minimum-wage legislation in this country. From the time he was instrumental in saving Mooney from execution to his defense of Sacco and Vanzetti, Frankfurter has shown his devotion to justice and his courage. Finally the respect and friendship he has won among people of many diverse and clashing social points of view are not an accident but the reflection of qualities essential in successful democratic government, the fruit of opinions pursued with moderation, of causes championed without fanaticism, and of controversies carried on without vindictiveness. If any man can help to lessen the asperities inevitable in an age of transition such as ours, if any one man can help to prevent a new irreconcilable conflict, that man is Frankfurter. There will be no Dred Scott decisions from a Supreme Court on which he sits.

Mr. Roosevelt gave the court new vitality with the appointment of Black; he gives it new and rich talents for conciliation, adjustment, and statesmanship in Frankfurter. We congratulate the President on having made the right and unmistakable choice to fill the seat held by Cardozo and before him by Holmes.

Sabotage in China

FOR some months reports have been current regarding the existence of an opportunist faction within the Chinese government which has deliberately sabotaged Chiang Kai-shek's efforts to weld a united nation to resist Japanese invasion. The action of Wang Ching-wei, right-wing leader and former Premier, in urging the acceptance of Japan's peace terms fully confirmed these reports. The full story of the sabotage by elements opposed to Chiang Kai-shek has not, however, been told. The following communication from Donald M. Davies, China-born Associated Press correspondent at Chungking, adds a hitherto undisclosed and disheartening chapter. We have every reason to believe that it is a true story. In interpreting it the reader must remember that it refers specifically to conditions in Szechuan, the most populous of the provinces remaining in Chinese hands. These conditions contrast very markedly with those existing around Shanghai or Hankow, where Chiang Kai-shek was long personally in control. They also contrast with those in Kwangsi, where Li Tsung-jen and Pai Chung-hsi have for years steeled the population for resistance to Japan, and in the Northwest, where the Eighth Route Army has organized the population for mass resistance. Even Shantung, where Han Fu-chu was executed for treason, has contributed its share to mass defense.

For the first nine or ten months of the war Szechuan was isolated and relatively unaffected by the conflict. Then when Hankow was first endangered last spring, the civil capital was moved to Chungking, while Chiang, with some of the more active branches of the government, remained at Hankow. During the long period before Hankow actually fell, there were many occasions on which Wang Ching-wei and his followers in Chungking appeared to be sabotaging Chinese resistance. They opposed closer cooperation with the Soviet Union, prevented the arming of the masses, and, as the following communication so clearly shows, failed to take the most elementary steps for arousing the population to China's peril. Mr. Davies's story is a disturbing one:

> What you see and what you don't see on the streets of Chungking, China's capital, give a hint of the situation in Szechuan, which is today the economic and military key to China's future. What you do see is new recruits tied with ropes being led to their quarters under guard of two or three moth-eaten provincials armed with outmoded blunderbusses, newsboys screaming headlines of late war reports, and very few people buying papers.
>
> You see refugees who are an expense to the government, which makes little attempt to use them; you see intelligent people in civilian clothes with nothing to do.
>
> What you don't see is organizers at work. In six weeks in Chungking this writer has seen only one street meeting to arouse the people's interest in China's fight. That was one day after the fall of Hankow, and the speaker was an organizer who had come from down river and still clung to the idea that it was essential to instil some spirit into the people. He learned the custom of the interior quickly, and he has not been active on the streets since then.

There were no organized press conferences for foreign correspondents until mid-November. It took weeks of pleading and arguing by the reporters to get that. Even then, the government officials who attended gave out material which any competent correspondent had known about for weeks. The first conference was attended by representatives of the executive, finance, economic, and foreign ministries, one from the Generalissimo's headquarters, and one from the National Relief Commission. Yet this array of important people produced only two small items worth cabling.

Offices are not as well staffed as they should be. At least one government office admits this as its excuse for inefficiency and delay. It is not a good excuse when one remembers the dozens of well-educated young men and women in town who are out of work. Many of these speak foreign languages and had been competent administrators in their own communities prior to Japanese occupation.

Spirit and instruction are lacking in new recruits. Farmers and city laborers are left in the dark as to their country's need. They learn of it when some soldier with a length of rope comes along and ties them like prisoners to other conscripts.

There is a story about another Black Hole of Calcutta. A handful of soldiers were having trouble recently near Chungking. Two or three score conscripts whom they had rounded up obviously did not want to go to the front. They were locked in a single room pending orders for their disposal and promptly forgotten. Because of crowding none of them could lie down; there was no sanitation, no bedding, almost no food or water. Some of the men, not too strong to begin with, died. The rest broke through a door after a week's imprisonment, and ran. Guards shot and killed ten. Some of those recaptured were tortured, had their arms and legs cut off. The remainder, who were eventually sent to the front, managed to escape before they got there.

Peasants around Hsintu, Szechuan, it is reliably reported, were continually harassed by the soldiery, who were conscripting at random, using kidnapping methods. Outraged by the unusually cruel treatment, farmers armed themselves and attacked the town. In the riot that followed it is estimated that there were some twenty casualties on each side. An investigation is being made, but it is almost too late. The spirit of resentment is already awakened.

There is another story, confirmed, of the waste of a group of officers who had graduated from the national military academy and were ready to fill an urgent need for trained men at the front. Just before the fall of Hankow forty young officers left the Szechuan branch of the military academy ready for service. Hankow bound, they reached Ichang when the capital fell. Unable to get in touch with their commander for instructions or to obtain money with which to proceed to another front, they returned to Chungking. Here they found their superior officer, who promised to get their new orders. The forty youths wanted to go north to Wei Lih-wang's army, but their commander disappeared, leaving them stranded, without money, food, or a place to stay. What became of them—or of their superior—is unknown at this writing.

These examples of official incompetence might be explained if the officials were afraid of an aroused populace. Perhaps the distinction between officials and the common people, between governed and governors, is still too strong. The two groups must be welded into one unit bent on blasting invaders out of China. Perhaps there is fear that an aroused people might demand sacrifices or exertion on the part of their officials; they have every right to make those demands if the war is to be carried through. The Generalissimo cannot fight without Szechuan, and Szechuan must realize that. This province is about the only source of man power left. Kwangsi and Kwangtung are milked dry, Yunnan and Kweichow combined have only infinitesimal supplies of men fit for war; in the other provinces are small bands of refugees fleeing west and south. Economically, militarily, in every way, Szechuan is the key to continued resistance, and if this province collapses, the future for China is dark.

Determination must begin with chiefs of departments, government leaders, and executives in Chungking. Defeatist attitudes have no place in a country at war, and passive support is not enough. The only answer to a crisis of this magnitude is organized propaganda to arouse the people to a full realization of what they face and the enthusiasm to face it. For only under the pressure of aroused public opinion will the necessary cooperation, coordination, and discipline be achieved.

DONALD M. DAVIES

Chungking, November 25, 1938

A certain amount of disorganization, inefficiency, and even disloyalty is inevitable in war time. But it is evident that Chiang Kai-shek has something worse than ordinary war-time corruption on his hands in Szechuan. The swiftness with which the Generalissimo acted to purge the Kuomintang ranks of the followers of Wang Ching-wei, once the latter's treachery was revealed, is encouraging. We are particularly glad, in view of Mr. Davies's disclosures, to note that Chiang has named a new Minister of Propaganda to replace Chou Fu-lai, who significantly enough accompanied Wang Ching-wei to Indo-China. It is probable, however, that a further clean-up will be necessary before China's masses can be organized to put up the resistance of which they are capable. The sooner this is done, the sooner China can count on the whole-hearted support from the West to which it is entitled.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Questions on the Whitney Case

BY I. F. STONE

I

IN RETROSPECT the most striking aspect of the Whitney case is the speed with which it was closed by the authorities in charge of prosecuting it. Richard Whitney was suspended by the New York Stock Exchange on March 8, 1938. The cell doors closed on him at Sing Sing on April 12. The most sensational scandal in the history of the New York Stock Exchange was disposed of with astonishing celerity. Had it not been for the interposition of Chairman Douglas of the SEC, who asked two weeks' delay, sentence would actually have been imposed on March 28. Men of wealth and prominence usually fight charges against them with every device that may serve to delay action or to soften punishment. Whitney placed himself under arrest. The day after his suspension he issued a statement to the press admitting that he had committed wrongful acts, declaring that "none of my partners, none of my business associates or connections [my italics] . . . has or had any responsibility or participation" in them, and placing himself "at the disposal of the Attorney General of the state." The Attorney General, John J. Bennett, was for ten years confidential secretary to Edward R. Stettinius, a Morgan partner, but there is no evidence that this had any influence on his handling of the case, and I do not mean to imply that it did.

District Attorney Dewey of New York County obtained the first indictment in the case on March 10. This accused Whitney of stealing $105,000 from a trust fund established by his deceased father-in-law, George R. Sheldon. On March 14 Mr. Bennett obtained his indictment for the theft of $100,000 in bonds from the New York Yacht Club, of which Whitney was treasurer. Pleas of guilty were entered to both indictments, and Whitney's counsel seems to have believed that the guilty pleas would make it possible to avoid public inquiry. "Richard Whitney," the New York Times reported on March 22, "was subjected yesterday to the public questioning which his counsel protested last week, as being forestalled by his pleas of guilty to grand larceny." The public questioning did not go very far. On March 21 Assistant Attorney General Ambrose V. McCall elicited the fact that Richard Whitney had borrowed $1,082,000 from his brother, George Whitney, a partner in J. P. Morgan and Company, in November, 1937. The loan was to restore securities and cash Richard Whitney had appropriated to his own use from the gratuity fund of which he was a trustee, a fund established by the Stock Exchange to aid the widows and orphans of members. Leslie Gould, financial editor of the New York Journal, had the courage to write in his column the next day: "The Assistant Attorney General . . . did not ask what excuse Richard Whitney had given his brother for the need of such a great sum of money. After all, it wasn't $100. Did Richard Whitney tell his brother he had hypothecated Stock Exchange securities? Did his brother know he was insolvent? Why was the firm allowed to coast along until March 8 . . . ?" Neither the Attorney General nor the District Attorney supplied the answers. It was not until March 30, before the federal referee in bankruptcy, that Richard Whitney admitted that he had confessed the gratuity-fund theft to his brother in November.

II

It is worth noting that when Richard Whitney was expelled from the Exchange on March 17, one of the five counts was the misappropriation of securities belonging to the gratuity fund. This amounted to more than a million dollars, a sum far greater than all the other larcenies combined, and involved a sacred obligation to his own deceased colleagues. The circumstances surrounding the restitution raised grave questions, and the most honorable of men could hardly object if they occurred to a District Attorney in the discharge of his duty. Section 570 of the Penal Code of the State of New York makes it a felony to take "money or property . . . upon an agreement or understanding, express or implied, to compound or conceal a crime, or a violation of a statute, or to abstain from, discontinue, or delay a prosecution therefor, or to withhold any evidence thereof. . . ." Section 580 makes it a misdemeanor for two or more persons to conspire "to commit any act . . . for the perversion or obstruction of justice, or of the due administration of the laws." Had Richard Whitney been indicted for the gratuity-fund embezzlement, the prosecuting officer might have asked himself: How many knew of the offense at the time? Did their silence constitute conspiracy to obstruct justice? Did those who accepted restitution do so "upon an agreement or understanding, express or implied, to . . . conceal a crime"?

This failure to indict on the largest of Whitney's embezzlements may make it easier to understand a curious paragraph which appears in District Attorney Dewey's report to the court on April 9, recommending a "substantial and punitive sentence" for Richard Whitney. "This memorandum," the District Attorney wrote, "does not purport to state or evaluate the responsibility, if any, of the authorities or members of the New York Stock Exchange for permitting Richard Whitney and Company to continue in business, or the time when they acquired knowledge of its financial condition [my italics, of course]. This matter is the subject of an investigation in progress by the Securities and Exchange Commission." This paragraph has an interesting history. The writer is prepared to state that it did not appear in the original draft as first submitted to Chairman Douglas by the District Attorney. Without that paragraph the reader of the report would assume that the conviction of Whitney was sufficient to close the case.

But an inquiry into possible violations of New York's criminal statutes is not the job of the SEC, and that body was careful to state that its public hearings would "not be directed primarily for the development of the criminal aspects of the case." It is true that the SEC in its report said that those who knew of the gratuity-fund embezzlement and failed to disclose it might in some states (but not in New York) be considered guilty of "the ancient crime of misprision of felony." But the SEC's chief accomplishment was vastly to widen our knowledge of what had actually happened. It condemned the "gentlemen's club" spirit of the Exchange and the "stubborn indifference to the public responsibility of the Exchange as . . . revealed in the testimony of Thomas W. Lamont," but it ended on a note of pious hope. "Happily," the SEC said, "a new management has assumed control of the New York Stock Exchange."

Not so happily, Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, on December 15 resigned as a "public representative" on the Board of Governors of the Exchange. "In the hearings before the Securities and Exchange Commission," Dr. Hutchins wrote, "there was evidence tending to show that members of the Exchange or their partners knew of Richard Whitney's criminal conduct or of the condition of his firm some months before its failure. The public interest, the good name of the Exchange, and the good name of the members referred to all require the Board of Governors to institute proceedings in which the question of the responsibility of these members may finally be disposed of. The decision of the board yesterday to take no action compels me to present my resignation."

III

The unwillingness of the Stock Exchange to act as Dr. Hutchins thought it should can be properly evaluated only in the light of the amazing irresponsibility with which this institution has been conducted. Whitney had been a member of the Exchange since 1912, but as a non-margin broker he was never asked to file a financial report, much less submit to an audit, until 1938. Neither he nor his fellow-trustees seemed to think it strange that he should act both as a trustee of the gratuity fund and as its broker. In the latter capacity he collected his usual fees. "Was there ever any consideration," E. H. H. Simmons, past president of the Exchange and chairman of the trustees, was asked in the SEC investigation, "as to whether it was proper to pay a commission to a trustee for business which he did for the other trustees?" "Never was discussed," Mr. Simmons answered. The trustees did not even seem to regard themselves as trustees. When the SEC examiner said to William B. Potts, secretary and treasurer of the board of trustees, "Well, Mr. Potts, do I understand that the trustees did not regard themselves as acting in a fiduciary capacity?" Mr. Potts replied, "Well, I would say no." Mr. Potts was questioned about how it was that Richard Whitney was able to keep more than a million dollars in gratuity-fund cash and securities from February to November, 1937, and turn them to his own use. Mr. Potts testified that he didn't know that the cash and securities were in Whitney's office.

> Q. This provision of the constitution, then, which says that the treasurer shall have the custody of all securities belonging to the fund was never consulted in the daily administration of the fund?
>
> A. I would say it was a dead letter.

Although Whitney's retention of the securities and cash was discussed at a special meeting of the trustees on November 22, 1937, there is no mention of the fact in the minutes, and Mr. Simmons did not appear at the next meeting, December 20, to explain what had happened and how he had got the funds back. If one is to judge from the minutes, nobody seemed interested enough to ask. Yet two of the trustees, Allen L. Lindley and Blair S. Williams, were also members of the Business Conduct Committee, which is supposed to police the Exchange. Simmons said he did not suspect criminality but assumed that Whitney had found himself "pressed for cash." Roland L. Redmond, counsel for the Exchange, testified that he also knew of the difficulty of replacing the funds and that George Whitney had helped his brother out of "a financial tight corner." On November 22 Richard Whitney told Simmons that he was too "short-handed" to send over the securities and cash. On November 23 Whitney said he was going to see his brother and would make delivery the next day. Simmons also saw George Whitney. Redmond testified that he was kept informed. He was questioned as to the discrepancy between what Richard Whitney said on November 22 and what he said on November 23.

> Q. In other words, you knew right then and there at three o'clock on the 23d that Richard Whitney had not told the truth to Mr. Simmons in the previous conversation?
>
> A. That is a fair assumption; yes.
>
> Q. Well, you made that assumption, I take it?
>
> A. No; I assumed Mr. Whitney had given a convenient excuse the first time to explain why he wished for a delay and the second time he gave an explanation of why he was sure he could make delivery the next day.

> Q. Do you distinguish now between a convenient excuse and a falsehood?
>
> A. No; I was not attempting to.

Williams, as a trustee and a member of the Business Conduct Committee, was troubled by what happened and at one time seems to have felt that the whole affair should have been brought to the attention of the committee. His testimony on this point is interesting:

> Q. I am just trying to find out what reasons prompted you not to go to the Business Conduct Committee following your talk with Mr. Simmons.
>
> A. We felt that there was no necessity, that the whole situation had been cleaned up by the help that Mr. Whitney had received from his brother. . . .
>
> Q. And if he were pressed for cash, that was a matter which concerned the Business Conduct Committee very directly, did it not?
>
> A. Not enough, under the circumstances, when I was told by Mr. Simmons that the whole thing had been fixed up and that everything was right, and that there was no necessity of doing anything about it, and I didn't feel that there was any necessity of doing anything about it.

But Mr. Simmons seems to have changed his mind by March, for Richard Whitney testifying before the SEC on the two occasions when he had seen Charles R. Gay, then president of the Stock Exchange, said:

> A. One was on the afternoon of Thursday prior to the 7th of March. I called Mr. Simmons for some reason and got him in Mr. Gay's office and he said he had been trying to find me and would I come over there immediately, which I did. I was then informed by Mr. Gay and Mr. Simmons that a preliminary report had been—or knowledge, perhaps, is a better word—had been conveyed to them regarding the gratuity-fund security situation in November and the extreme seriousness of that situation.

IV

Thomas W. Lamont testified before the SEC that he loaned $1,022,000 to George Whitney in November, 1937, knowing that the loan was to enable Richard Whitney to return securities he had taken illegally from some organization of the Stock Exchange. When asked whether he felt any obligation to report the fact to the Exchange or to the public authorities, Mr. Lamont explained that he believed, "whether justifiable or not, that the Exchange people had knowledge that Mr. Whitney had been slow in his deliveries to them and they have adequate machinery for checking up all their houses of that kind." We have already seen how that machinery failed to work in November, 1937.

If the Morgan firm looked to the Exchange to do its own policing, the Exchange looked to the Morgan firm as a guaranty of Richard Whitney's financial stability and solvency. Whitney's interminable borrowings, according to one witness, were a subject of gossip as far back as 1931. One witness after another testified that the questions that might occur to them in most cases did not occur in Whitney's because of his position as bond broker for J. P. Morgan and Company and his relationship to a Morgan partner. One is compelled to conclude from the testimony of the Morgan partners that they do not find time to follow the details of their business very closely. The firm keeps no minutes of its meetings, and the partners could hardly be described as garrulous on the witness stand. But even on the basis of a meager record it is clear that there were storm signals long before Whitney crashed. I do not mean, and there is no evidence to indicate in any way, that they knew or suspected illegal actions on the part of Richard Whitney. The first to know of this were George Whitney and Lamont in November, 1937. But they do seem, perhaps because of their fondness for both Whitneys, to have asked none of those fearful questions that bankers usually put to their debtors and those through whom they transact business.

Herbert G. Wellington, a governor of the Exchange, testified that as early as 1930 or 1931 the late Thomas Cochran, then a Morgan partner, asked him to form a partnership with Richard Whitney. Mr. Wellington denied that Mr. Cochran expressed concern over Whitney's "reckless handling of money." "As nearly as I can recall," Mr. Wellington testified, "the substance of Mr. Cochran's statement to me was this: 'Mr. Whitney has a very good business, he uses very bad judgment in his investments, but he has got a very good business and he needs a good partner, somebody who isn't just an office boy, as the rest of the partners seem to be. . . .' "

Francis D. Bartow, another Morgan partner, a fellow-director with Richard Whitney at the Corn Exchange Bank, testified that in 1931 he learned that Richard Whitney had obtained an unsecured loan of "two or three hundred thousand dollars" from the bank. Bartow said he spoke to George Whitney about it. They both felt that while a loan of this kind to a director was not "improper," it was "unwise." As a result J. P. Morgan and Company, on June 29, 1931, made an unsecured ninety-day loan of $500,000 to Richard Whitney, from which it was assumed that Whitney would pay off the Corn Exchange loan. Mr. Bartow testified that he didn't know whether the Corn Exchange loan was paid off or not, but when Whitney failed in March, 1938, that ninety-day loan was still outstanding, only $16,000 had been paid off on it. Collateral was put up behind it by George Whitney on two occasions, once in the spring of 1934 when J. P. Morgan and Company was about to have, under the new banking laws, the first examination in history by a state banking examiner. Bartow testified that he and Whitney felt the loan might be questioned. In December, 1934, a $200,000 reserve was set up against the loan, and in October, 1936, when Cochran died and J. P. Morgan and Company formed a new partnership, the loan was "left behind" with the old partnership as a "slow debt."

George Whitney was as long suffering as Job in his relations with his brother. Richard Whitney owed him $2,897,000 when he failed. To ask a brother to send a brother to jail is inhuman; one can also understand Mr. Lamont's feelings as a partner. But one might have expected them to exact a promise from Richard Whitney to get out of the brokerage business and the Exchange. George Whitney did not seem to realize the full significance of the embezzlement. It is true that he discussed with his brother the liquidation of Richard Whitney and Company. But when asked, "Did you make as a condition precedent to your loaning the money [to restore the gratuity-fund securities] the condition that he would so liquidate?" George Whitney's answer was, "Not the slightest. Never mentioned the question of liquidation to him until Thanksgiving morning." Later there is an illuminating passage in the George Whitney testimony:

> Q. Well, now, were these some of the reasons why you were anxious to see his firm liquidated immediately?
>
> A. Oh, they may have been contributing causes, yes.
>
> Q. What would you consider to be the principal contributing cause?
>
> A. The one I gave you yesterday.
>
> Q. His handling of the gratuity-fund securities?
>
> A. Oh, certainly not; I never even mentioned that yesterday as a reason.

V

The fact is, of course, that if it had not been for some quite accidental circumstances Richard Whitney would probably still be a highly respected member of the Exchange and might still be misappropriating securities in all safety. A floor trader in January, 1938, thought that distress selling of Greyhound stock was emanating from Richard Whitney and Company. He informed Mr. Wellington, who informed the chairman of the Business Conduct Committee. Under new rules of the Exchange, Richard Whitney and Company would have been required in 1938, for the first time, to answer a financial questionnaire, the so-called "short form" for brokerage houses not engaged in a margin business. It was decided to send it out at once. Unluckily for Richard Whitney, there were a few debit accounts on his books. Consequently it was treated as the financial return of a house dealing in margin accounts. The firm was found to have insufficient capital for a margin house, and as a result it was decided to make an audit of the books; the audit revealed misconduct.

One Morgan partner would have liked to help Whitney even at the last. Francis D. Bartow testified Whitney revealed to him on March 5 that he had misappropriated securities belonging to the New York Yacht Club, the Sheldon estate, and a Mrs. Baird, and that Whitney asked a loan of $280,000 so that he could return these securities and "truthfully" tell the Business Conduct Committee "on Monday morning" that there were no irregularities in his office. Bartow and Randolph Mason, attorney for Whitney, went to Glen Cove, Long Island, to consult John W. Davis. Bartow's testimony on this point is very interesting.

> Q. What was Mr. Davis's judgment?
>
> A. Mr. Davis gave it to me as his opinion that neither I nor he nor anyone else should do anything or could do anything; anyone who did would run the risk of taking actions that would be misconstrued and misunderstood. He said a lot about preferences in bankruptcy. "All right," I said, "Mr. Davis, I accept your advice and counsel in that. I am glad to come to you. I want to ask one more question. Could I properly call"—I am going a little ahead. I had explained to him that from the beginning of my knowledge of Richard Whitney since January 30, I had been baffled and confused by my inability to get the information that I wanted . . . in the absence of a reliable certified-accountant's report; did he think it would be all right for me to call Mr. Gay, with whom I had previously spoken in the evening, and ask whether it would be possible to postpone for a period of twenty-four hours or even forty-eight hours the Business Conduct Committee hearing that had been scheduled for Monday morning [March 9] at 10:30.
>
> Mr. Davis gave it to me as his opinion that there was no reason why I should not do it.

Gay refused to postpone action. Certain questions arise here: if it was Mr. Davis's advice in March not to lend Richard Whitney money to make restitution because it might be "misconstrued and misunderstood," what would have been his advice in November? Why did he think it might be "misconstrued"?

The reader who compares Mr. Gay's refusal to postpone action and his expulsion of Richard Whitney with the conditions revealed by Dr. Hutchins's letter may wonder which is the "reform" administration of the Exchange—the present Martin administration or Mr. Gay's, bad as it may otherwise have been?

The ghost of the Whitney case still walks. Had the case closed with the convictions obtained by Attorney General Bennett and District Attorney Dewey, we should know only a part of what we now know about it. They were—to put it mildly—hasty. But the SEC, to which we owe most of our knowledge of the case, was too optimistic. The "reformed" management of the Exchange has done its best to write finis to the story. Chairman Douglas now says, "For the SEC, as for the Exchange, the Whitney case is closed." Must there be a Congressional investigation to answer questions which still remain unanswered?

The biggest question of all is why neither Attorney General Bennett nor District Attorney Dewey saw fit to indict Whitney for his greatest breach of trust.

Living Philosophies

VIII. WHY I AM A MARXIST

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

I HAVE, I suppose, been a socialist in some degree ever since the last years of my schooldays. When I try to think out the sources of a faith that has been the central conviction of my life, I find that the difficulties of sorting them out are immense. Something was due to the influence of a great schoolmaster who made us feel the sickness of an acquisitive society. Something, too, was the outcome of a Jewish upbringing, the sense it conferred of being treated differently from other people and for no obviously assignable cause. I learned a good deal from books, especially from those of Sidney and Beatrice Webb. They made me realize that a whole class of human beings was overlooked in the traditional liberalism of the family to which I belonged. And there stays in my mind a speech I heard in Manchester as a boy on the threshold of a university career from Keir Hardie, whose account of the effort of the Scottish miners to form a trade union made me begin, at least dimly, to understand the price the workers have to pay for the social reform they achieve.

I went up to Oxford with radical views, and my years there confirmed me in them. It was the first experience I had of the intensity of class division in England. It was the first experience I had, also, of the resistance atmosphere can impose upon the admission of new ideas, which are dismissed less because they have been examined than because their premises are outside the environment they seek to penetrate. My debt to Oxford is immeasurable. Contact there with the late Professor Dicey, with Mr. Herbert Fisher and Professor Ernest Barker was, on the purely academic plane, a superb experience. But they were all, if I may so phrase it, aloof from life. Oxford generally, so far as its teachers were concerned, thought about social problems in a way which suggested interest in them but not responsibility for their solution. It told you, as it were, that correct analysis was important. It did not suggest that, when the analysis was made, any obligation emerged to act upon the principles it suggested.

I devoted a good deal of time at Oxford to the Fabian Society and to propaganda in behalf of woman suffrage. These brought me into contact with two of the greatest men I have ever known—George Lansbury and H. W. Nevinson. From the first I learned the meaning and importance of equality, and from the second the meaning and importance of liberty. George Lansbury, too, gave me my first job. He was then editing the Daily Herald, and when I left Oxford, in the summer of 1914, he asked me to write editorials for his paper. That was a significant experience for me. It brought me into contact with a good deal of what was most radical in the pre-war Socialist movement, and it made me formulate to myself, in a coherent way, some of the lessons I had learned at Oxford. Contact with Lansbury was a great education. He was absolutely straightforward, absolutely democratic, and entirely fearless. He always meant every word he said, and it never occurred to him to say less than he meant. Through him I got my first chance to see the inside of the Socialist movement at first hand, and that at a critical time.

Within six weeks of my going to the Herald Great Britain was at war. I sought to enlist on the first day. I did not believe in the war, but I did believe that, on the whole, the victory of Germany would mean more evil than its defeat. I was rejected on physical grounds, mainly a weak heart. That rejection altered the whole course of my life. For I was asked, through the influence of Herbert Fisher, to take a lectureship in history at McGill University to replace an Oxford don who was anxious to serve. I accepted the invitation expecting to stay a year on the American continent. Instead, I remained there, first at McGill and then, for four years, at Harvard, until 1920.

There is, I think, a sense in which my years on the American continent were the most fundamental experience of my life. I learned there that it was my vocation to be a teacher, that, in whatever other fields I might wander, this was the activity, above all, to which I should devote my energies. I learned, secondly, that to teach political science, it was not enough to read books; one had to learn politics from actual experience of their working, and to seek to make of one's lectures an intimate marriage of theory and practice. I learned, thirdly, that the university scene in America was vitally related to the social environment. One could speculate freely, but one must not question the basic assumptions of the system. When I was at McGill, I made a speech attacking the "bitter-endism" of Mr. Lloyd George that was immediately followed by urgent demands for my dismissal. When I was at Harvard, the famous Boston police strike occurred. President Lowell immediately offered the services of the university to the city. It seemed to me that one ought to know why the police were striking before one accepted the view that the city was right. Accordingly, I took great pains to discover what had led to the strike, and found that it was the outcome of long-accumulated grievances met without sympathy or insight. I ventured to say so; and there broke about my head a storm of indignation in which I was described as almost everything from a villain who seduced youth to a Bolshevik who preached revolution. I was solemnly investigated by the Overseers of the university; and though it was decided that I was not to be dismissed, President Lowell explained to me with emphasis that a teacher limited his utility when he spoke on matters of current controversy. I was not, I inferred, to say my say on the living issues of the time if what I said was inconvenient to the rulers of Harvard. Thus though I loved Harvard and found there friendships of inestimable value to me, I was not sorry when, in the next year, the London School of Economics and Political Science invited me to join its faculty. There I have remained since 1920; and there I hope to remain during my life as a teacher.

But it was not only that I learned in America what I believe to be my vocation. I saw there, more nakedly than I had seen in Europe, the significance of the struggle between capital and labor. I learned how little meaning there can be in an abstract political liberty which is subdued to the control of an economic plutocracy. I saw, too, in strikes like those of Ludlow and Lowell, how the vast machinery of the state is used to crush any movement that questions the authority of those who own economic power. I learned from the imprisonment of Debs and the attacks on La Follette how immense are the pressures to conformity, how fragile the claims of tolerance, whenever the security of a social order is threatened. Not least, I began to perceive, in the difference in the average American attitude to the February and October revolutions in Russia, how profound is the influence of the property relation in shaping opinion. I came back from America convinced that liberty has no meaning save in the context of equality, and I had begun to understand that equality also has no meaning unless the instruments of production are socially owned. But I was still academic enough in experience to believe that this could be proved on rational grounds, and that its proof would be sufficient to win acceptance for it as a principle of social organization. I had associated in America mostly with progressive or academic people who were accustomed to give argument its due weight; and even when, like Mr. Justice Holmes, they were fundamentally conservative in outlook, they were prepared to change their views in the light of discussion. Up to 1920, I think, as I look back, that my socialism was above all the outcome of a sense of the injustice of things as they were. It had not become an insight into the processes of history.

That, I believe, is the main burden of my experience in the eighteen years since I returned to England. They have been full years. From the outset I have been an active member of the Labor Party. I have served on government committees. I have "deviled" for ministers during the two periods when a Labor government was in power. I have done a good deal of industrial arbitration. I have helped the trade unions in every important strike, especially the general strike of 1926. Teaching and the writing of books apart, most of my leisure has gone into work for socialism. I learned a great deal from five years as an alderman of a London borough. I have seen, too, a good deal of political journalism from within, not least in those four last brilliant years in which H. W. Massingham edited the London Nation. I have been closely concerned with the adult-education movement. Invitations to lecture abroad have given me first-hand acquaintance with the politics and the universities of France and Spain, pre-Hitler Germany, and the Soviet Union; and I have returned constantly to America.

Out of it all, the great lesson I have learned is the broad truth of the Marxian philosophy. What I have seen at first hand, no less than what I have read, has left me no alternative. I came back to England in 1920 hopeful that I was going to watch the slow permeation of economic relationships by the democratic principle. I have been driven to the conclusion that no class voluntarily abdicates from the possession of power. I have come to learn that the private ownership of the means of production makes it impossible for the democratic idea to transcend the barriers of class without the capture of the state power by the working class. The experience of Russia, the advent of fascism in Central and Southeastern Europe, the attitude of the owning class in Spain and France and the United States to all serious attempts at social reform, the general strike of 1926 and the betrayal of 1931 in England, the new imperialisms of Japan and Italy, have all convinced me that, in large outline, there is no answer to the philosophy of Marx. Men, broadly, think in terms of an experience made and unmade by their class position. Their conceptions of right action are born of the inferences they draw from the experience of that class position. Individuals may transcend it. But taken generally, all our institutions and their working are conditioned by the property relations of any given society. The dominant ideas and principles of that society will be set by the way in which, in any moment, its property relations are working. If they are working well, there will be a period of concession to the multitude, which can live only by the sale of its labor power. If they are working badly, the policy of concession will halt. A system which lives by profit must make profit. If its power to do so is challenged, the owners of the system will seek to destroy the men and the movements which challenge that power.

This is the reason for the decline of liberalism in the post-war epoch. Ours is that age, the coming of which was foreseen by Marx, in which the relations of production are in contradiction with the essential forces of production. Our time is comparable to that of the Reformation, when a similar contradiction appeared. Then as now a new property relation was essential, and then as now those who lived by the privileges inherent in the old were ready to fight for them rather than find the terms of a new accommodation. For when such a contradiction reaches its maturity, the price of continuing concession means the erosion of the privileges associated with private ownership. It means a scale of taxation fatal to the making of profit in international competition. It compels that examination of social foundations which, because it disturbs traditional routines, destroys men's ability to be tolerant in matters of social constitution. For those who have been taught by long use to regard privilege as right are rarely able to adjust themselves to the admission that their right may be built upon what other men have come to experience as wrong.

It is, as I think, in this background that all the central problems of our time have to be set. That it makes the future of capitalist democracy dubious is clear. That the inference from it, in the international sphere, is the necessary relation between capitalism and war is clear also. For, given the present distribution of economic power, the owning class is driven into the search for markets abroad in order to win profit. Thence comes the need for armament. Thence comes also the politics of imperialism, concession-hunting, spheres of influence—that whole gamut of power politics to which the world since 1919 has so grimly accustomed us. The failure of the League of Nations is built upon the fact that it demands from its members the surrender of the policy to which the whole inherent logic of their economic system impels them. We have either to find the way to a resumption of the economic expansion of the Victorian Age or enter upon—as we have already entered—a period of war and revolution. But we cannot resume that expansion unless we adjust the relations of production in our society to the potential forces of production. Unless we do so, we are bound to have poverty in the midst of potential plenty, restrictionism, that economic nationalism which, all over the world, is lowering the standard of life. Since the state power is directed by men who live by the vested interests represented by these policies, it is at least difficult, and probably impossible, to transcend them within the limits of existing class relations.

I know no other way of explaining adequately the position in which our generation finds itself. The conclusion I draw from it is the necessity of a unified working-class party able either to win political power or, if it meets the challenge of fascism, to emerge victorious from the conflict. The lesson of Germany and Italy is the clear one that division of the working class means its defeat. The lesson of France and Spain is the equally clear one that the attainment of unity at the least enables the working class to give a good account of itself when the challenge comes. And the evidence makes it plain that capitalism in its phase of contraction will respect no principle, however venerable, in its effort to retain the power of the state in its hands. That has been the experience of M. Blum in France; it has been, also, the experience of Mr. Roosevelt in the United States. Each had a great popular majority behind him. Each found that the power of his majority was largely nullified by the refusal of the propertied class to cooperate with his purposes. At the historical stage we have reached, the will of the people is unable to use the institutions of capitalist democracy for democratic purposes. For at this stage democracy needs to transform class relations in order to affirm itself; and it will not be allowed to do so if the owning class is able to prevent that achievement.

This attitude seems to me the explicit result of post-war experience, and it is, as I have said, the vindication of the analysis that Marx made of social phenomena nearly a century ago. Certain modes of behavior that I profoundly respect are, I think, ruled out of court by the inferences it involves. It is incompatible with the pacifist doctrine of non-resistance. Had that way been chosen by the Spanish government, it would now be under the heel of a fascist conqueror as brutal in his methods as Hitler. It rules out, also, the Fabian method of gradualism. That principle was the natural method to recommend in an age of capitalist expansion. In the period of capitalism's decline, its result would, I think, be to give to the owning class a supreme opportunity to organize itself for counter-attack. The real lesson of post-war Germany is the futility of trying to reorganize the economic foundations of capitalism by half-measures. That, again, is the inference I would draw from the experience of the two Labor governments in Great Britain. Each was more anxious to prove its orthodox respectability to its opponents than it was to get on with the work of socialism, to which it was committed by public profession. The result was to discourage its friends and to persuade its enemies that the price of social reform was greater than capitalism could afford. The time has come for a central attack on the structure of capitalism. Nothing less than wholesale socialization can remedy the position. The alternative in all Western civilization outside the Soviet Union is, I believe, a rapid drift to fascism, in which the working class will be at a definite disadvantage by reason of the division of its forces. That division has already cost it Italy and Germany. It may one day cost it England and the United States as well. In that event, we shall see a new iron age descend upon mankind in which the very memory of civilized living may well become no more than a traditional legend.

Democracy Wins in Chile

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

Santiago, Chile, December 30

ON September 5, 1938, an armed revolt organized by the Chile Nacista Party was put down with brutal vigor by the Alessandri government then in power, and from 61 to 100 young men were killed, most of them unnecessarily and in cold blood.

On October 25 the Presidential election was held and Pedro Aguirre Cerda, candidate of a broad popular front, was chosen President, defeating the reactionary Gustavo Ross, who was backed by most upper-class Chileans and foreign business.

On December 24 Aguirre Cerda was inaugurated, and that same night he freed the Nacistas, including their leader, Gonzalez von Maree, who had been in prison since the uprising.

The West Coast of South America is four thousand miles long, but news and rumor run from one part to the next, and what is said in Panama is repeated in Callao and so on down. From the moment the Santa Maria left the Canal on December 9 we heard one opinion expressed over and over in tones of satisfaction or resentment. "Aguirre Cerda will never come to office." "The business interests and the conservatives will never allow Aguirre to become President." "There will be some sort of a coup before the inauguration." If wishes were horses, Aguirre Cerda would have been unseated by a cavalry charge. Such comments are only the surface expressions of more solid and unpleasant facts. It is a fact, for example, and a shameful one, that North American business firms helped to finance Ross's campaign. Let this be remembered if these firms complain of "unfair" treatment at the hands of the new government.

The workers of Chile are horribly poor. It is hard to compare wages, especially where the currency is depreciated. The Chilean peso, which was formerly worth about 12 cents, now ranges from 25 to 31 to the dollar. In these terms, Chilean workers earn from as little as 5 cents a day on the farms in the south—and even less for casual labor—to about 75 cents in the best foreign-owned copper mines. Other wages can be roughly gauged by these.

The working-class districts of Santiago are dirty and dilapidated. Whole families, big ones, live in a single room, and the toilet arrangements make even an old-law tenement in New York seem sanitary by comparison. There is much tuberculosis and syphilis. Chile's ragged workers must be seen if the country's problem is to be understood and if the frenzied joy of the last few days is to have its full meaning.

On the afternoon of December 24 the stores were closed and the streets jammed. By the time we reached the doors of the Congreso where the "Transmission of the Mandate" took place, a mob of fighting ticket-holders was ahead of us. Finally the officer at the main entrance to the grounds shoved us through a barred gate, and we found ourselves pressed into a solid mass that lined the walk from the gate to the pillared portico of the parliament building. And there we discovered why cardholders—even those with the potent word Prensa on their tickets—were kept on the street: the people had got in ahead. All around us, on every step, clinging to every pillar, standing on benches and rails and one another's feet, was a mass of tense excited citizens. All classes were among them, but ten to one the crowd was proletarian—men and women straight from the slums of Santiago. Inside the building, when the doors opened, I saw a crowd, equally solid, with a bigger proportion of well-dressed people—officials and party workers and invited guests. But the "common man" was there too, in numbers. He didn't need to be invited; he had voted Aguirre into office and this was his show.

It proceeded with strict conformity to tradition. Troops marched up to the gates of the grounds and formed a guard of honor at the entrance. Cars arrived with representatives from all the embassies and special representatives sent by a few of the more friendly governments. None of these bore obvious emblems of their origins, but the crowd, by what seemed a miracle of intuition, knew in almost every case. The Mexicans were welcomed with shouts of approval and a sea of clenched fists; so in less degree were the Colombian delegates. But the loudest cries of Frente Popular and Viva were saved for Prieto and the Spanish Ambassador; and next to them in order of popular approval were the Chinese. The Germans and Japanese had reason to feel that they were running a gauntlet of threatening hostility; they walked by with impassive expressions. No physical demonstration was made, but a chorus of hisses followed them up the steps. The Papal Nuncio and his delegation had a mixed reception—some clapping, a few hisses, a few lifted fists, but for the most part stolid silence.

Alessandri arrived in a state carriage. The outgoing President was quitting office under the dark cloud of September. But he had, against all predictions, allowed free elections. And he was now about to transmit to his chosen successor the Presidential mandate—not to mention the ribbon of office and the Star of O'Higgins. He was cheered by a part of the crowd when his carriage stopped at the gates, and a few people—were they followers or opponents?—lifted their palms in a fascist salute. But the majority were unfriendly and openly triumphant. He stepped out of the carriage and made his way to the Congreso through fists raised like flags. Some voices shouted, "Murderer!" He went up the steps, shoving through with the help of his attendants and the police, and was greeted by a throng inside only a little less hostile.

The end of the ceremony came soon and suddenly. The doors opened. A few carabineros struggled to force back the people. A shout went up. Then a small compact group with a small, square-faced man in the center pushed toward the steps. Roars of joy met him. "Aguirre Cerda." "Nuestro Presidente!" "Nueva Chile!" "Frente Popular!" They roared and waved their fists and filled the whole portico. The President pushed through; he was swept down the stairs by the crowd; he was hustled and mashed by people as closely packed as in a subway rush. The carabineros were no protection; they tried only to get him to the gates. Finally he reached the waiting carriage. He stood and smiled and waved, accepting the crowd and its emotion. A North American made the callous comment: "He's a Santa Claus with an empty bag." There is just enough truth in this to make the future precarious.

Two nights later Prieto spoke at a meeting of the left parties. He said that clenched fists and cheers were all right to start things off, but serious action was needed to keep them going. He said that the new government in Chile was full of promise—but Spain had had a good popular-front government, too. He said that Chile might well become another Spain; that the right would not simply resign itself to defeat. Chile must prepare to defend its new administration by strong constitutional measures so that it would not have to defend it with arms. First of all, he said, Chile must take action to remove from key positions the reactionaries that were still in office. And the parties of the left must remain united and strong and resist the temptation to quarrel over minor differences.

Aguirre had the backing of a coalition of his own party, the Radicals, and a group of parties to the left—Socialists, Communists, and Democraticos. In addition he was supported by a more equivocally left group—the Nacistas, Union Socialists, and the followers of General Ibañez, whom the attempted coup of September would have put into office. It is a confused front including many conflicting elements. Almost certainly it will crumble at the edges. If Aguirre remains in power, his main strength will rest in the Socialists and Radicals—the two largest left parties. With their support he may be able to carry on a vigorous reform administration.

One danger lies in the defeated but unreconciled right, composed chiefly of the big interests, both Chilean and North American. It is biding its time, waiting for the new government to make its first mistake or get bogged down in its difficulties. Then it probably will move—independent political observers and newspapermen seem to agree on this; but no one pretends to know who will come forward as Chile's would-be Franco.

Another danger, less clearly, lurks on the left. The Nacistas are a fast-growing party of highly dynamic possibilities. They carried through the disastrous putsch of September, but as the election returns proved, they emerged from that ill-timed and reckless venture stronger than before. In the campaign they swung their support from their former choice, General Ibañez, then in jail, to Aguirre Cerda. Although their chief surviving leaders were also in prison during the campaign, the Nacistas contributed some 25,000 votes to the Popular Front candidate.

I saw the head of the party, Gonzalez von Maree, in jail about two days before Aguirre's inauguration. He is an attractive, vigorous person with great self-confidence. He insists with every evidence of sincerity that his party has no connection, actual or ideological, with the German Nazis. He disclaims anti-Semitism; admits no sympathy for dictatorship. He even repudiates violence and non-constitutional methods, and insists that his party will loyally support the government. He proclaims as his chief aim the formation of a single left party with a program of anti-imperialism and the nationalization of agricultural lands, natural resources, and major industries. He is strongly nationalist; but nationalism seems to be a common denominator of most left parties today. It is not necessary to doubt Gonzalez's honesty. It is necessary to question his stability and judgment. Whatever he now believes, before September he was an open advocate of violence, and it is certain that if his attempt had succeeded, Ibañez would have been made dictator. For these reasons the adhesion of the Nacistas is an element of uncertainty as well as of strength to the left. In January the Nacistas will hold a convention and announce their new program; they plan also to change their name, which has become a burden in the pursuit of avowedly democratic aims. Their future importance and their relation to the new government may be decided at that meeting.

Aguirre Cerda is a homely, swarthy man with an attractive smile. He deserted his first Cabinet meeting to talk to us, and he spoke with apparent freedom. He is a moderate—socially and politically. Popular education is his chief passion; that and public health he puts at the top of his program. He intends to extend the already radical provisions for social insurance and public housing. He is, in short, a New Dealer. Unfortunately his country is poor—and New Deals seem to come high—but fortunately it has a balanced budget. Taxes are low, especially on incomes and profits from land, and it should be possible to raise money by taxing the big landowners and the industries. It should be, but will it? Added taxes are one of the chief things the rightists fear. The price of genuine reform may be revolution on the right. Aguirre knows it.

I asked him directly what his policy would be toward foreign investments. He said that his country needed capital and new industries. He would encourage foreign enterprises in Chile, "especially businesses operated by persons living in the country." He said that it was to be understood that foreign capital must accept all the conditions imposed upon domestic business; there would be no special privileges under his administration. Aguirre realizes that Chile must not make Spain's mistake of allowing rightist officials and military men to continue in key posts. This is indicated by the speed with which he displaced certain high army officers and the heads of several departments. It may prove fortunate for the new Chile that Indalecio Prieto is in Santiago during these first days.

The importance of the change in Chile is great. It is likely to be underestimated in the United States. But no one should be misled by the paucity of Chilean news in the North American press; that is just an old North American custom in dealing with our good neighbors. The change of government in Chile was a conquest by democratic methods and a left program of one of the three most important countries on this continent. In the end the only hope for democracy in our time and in our hemisphere lies in the spread of democracy; it is not to be found in ambiguous resolutions adopted under the benevolent auspices of dictatorships.

If Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull really care about ridding Latin America of fascism they will go farther out of their way than they have yet gone to prove their friendship for the new regime in Chile. Many Chileans hoped that Mr. Hull would represent President Roosevelt at the recent inauguration. His presence would have demonstrated a genuine interest and would have been enormously appreciated. It would be equally useful if our very amiable ambassador, Norman Armour, would draw into his wide circle of friends in Santiago more of the prominent leftist leaders—who include, incidentally, most of the chief intellectuals of the country. And surely the President and the State Department could make plain their disapproval of financial and political meddling in Chile's internal affairs by North American business firms. When a reactionary candidate with known dictatorial intentions is staked financially by our business men in Chile, ordinary Chileans are apt to smile at solemn warnings from Washington about "foreign propaganda" and "fascist penetration." Strangely enough, in the face of all the facts, they still trust Mr. Roosevelt, though they cannot understand how he squares his maintenance of the Spanish embargo with his anti-fascist position. But as a Chilean writer said to me just after the inauguration: "The Roosevelt Administration will soon end, but imperialism goes on."

The Press and the NLRB

BY MARY BARTLETT

THE press, says Editor and Publisher, "presents the daily history of the world in proper perspective." If that is the intention it must be apparent by now that at least in the case of the National Labor Relations Board an overwhelming number of newspapers suffer from a pronounced astigmatism. With the new Congress receptive to proposed changes in the Wagner Act, it is a dead certainty that this affliction will become even more acute.

Consider, for example, the different press treatment accorded two decisions on the powers of the NLRB, both handed down by lower courts before the Supreme Court upheld the National Labor Relations Act on April 12, 1937. One court ruled that the board did not have jurisdiction over labor relations in a manufacturing plant, the Jones and Laughlin Company. Another court upheld the board's jurisdiction in the case of a wire service, the Associated Press. The Division of Press Intelligence, a federal agency, clips stories on government activities carried in newspapers all over the country. A count of D. P. I. clippings reveals the following illuminating facts: stories of the Jones and Laughlin decision, which was unfavorable to the board, appeared in 128 papers, to a total of 1,428 inches; the Associated Press decision, favorable to the board, appeared in 17 papers to a total of 167 inches. In each of these cases the circuit court was deciding whether the board had jurisdiction over labor relations in a particular enterprise; it was rendering no opinion on the board's jurisdiction in other types of industry. Yet headlines on the Jones and Laughlin case ran: "Wagner Board Is Held Powerless. New Deal Labor Act Unconstitutional." Few of the newspaper stories mentioned that the decisions were subject to review by a higher court.

The astigmatism of the press is revealed in the varying emphasis which it gives to stories about the NLRB—a story unfavorable to the board is played up in editorial and news columns more than a favorable story—and in the inaccuracy of its account, news articles, headlines, and editorials often telling a tale not based on facts. When Senator Nye blasted the Labor Act in July, 1937, fifty papers in the country, according to Division of Press Intelligence clippings, published sixty-three editorials using all the rubber stamps against the board without any specific reference to the board's record. But only thirty-four of the papers covered by the D. P. I. carried any reference in news or editorial columns to Roosevelt's statement in March, 1938, that the act should not be amended this year and that it had received unfair treatment by the press.

Similarly handled were the stories of Senator Burke's proposal early last year to investigate the board. On January 27 and 28 seventy-one papers of those covered by the D. P. I. carried an Associated Press story in several columns giving Burke's charges. But only five papers used the A. P. story of January 29, which quoted a letter from the A. F. of L. opposing the investigation. And only thirteen of the seventy-five papers which carried the A. P. version of Chairman Madden's reply to Senator Burke did not cut the story down to a few scant paragraphs. The sixty-two papers which rewrote the A. P. report of Madden's scholarly reply printed a story like that which appeared in the Macon, Georgia, Telegraph of February 4:

> The National Labor Relations Board is not biased and has no "starry-eyed" illusions about remaking the social order, Board Chairman J. Warren Madden testified before a Senate committee today.
>
> This was his reply to frequent accusations of partiality and radicalism. . . .

When the investigation was "indefinitely postponed," only ten papers carried the A. P. dispatch, the item not exceeding three paragraphs in any of them.

Behind this distortion there often appears an intent to thwart the purpose of the act. The Columbus Dispatch, for instance, five days after the NLRB was upheld by the Supreme Court, commented bitterly that the verdict had not lessened labor disputes. As if to arouse feeling against the act, the Charleston News and Courier queried in April, 1937:

> Do not the court's decisions point the way to coerce Southern cotton mills in which only white persons work? What if groups of Negroes, instigated and financed from New York, ask for employment in Southern mills? What if this matter should be tested?

Deliberately encouraging labor disputes, the Lewiston Sun, February, 1938, cried:

> Employers ought to refuse to have anything to do with the National Labor Board. They ought to fight it out and fight it out even if they have to go to jail. Fight it out as one of the fundamental principles of American liberty.

Yet it is the NLRB, according to the press, that fosters labor disputes.

Among other false charges which the press brings against the board is that of partisanship for the C. I. O. "Unless we miss our guess," the Cedar Rapids Gazette ventured in April, 1937, "the chances are that the C. I. O. does not represent a majority in any major industry." Yet from October, 1935, to December, 1937, the C. I. O. won 452 out of the 906 NLRB elections (Monthly Labor Review, July, 1938). "The C. I. O.-controlled labor board" is a common press designation of the NLRB. Yet an actual count of board decisions in disputes between C. I. O. and A. F. of L., according to an article in Fortune for October, 1938, gives the A. F. of L. a greater number of favorable decisions.

Another newspaper charge has been that the board restricts freedom of the press. During the Hartley Barclay discussion in December, 1937, the board summoned to the witness stand the editor of Mill and Factory, a trade publication which had printed an adverse story on the NLRB which was subsequently reprinted and distributed to employees of the National Steel Company at Weirton. The issue was whether the article was a creation of the steel company, on trial for unfair labor practices, and the purpose of the board in calling the editor to the stand was purely informative. Yet many papers pretended to see this as an attempt to punish and muzzle an editor. The San José Mercury Herald's comment was typical:

> The issuance implies the publisher committed an offense in printing the article in his magazine and that the board had the power to inquire into it . . . and to inflict suitable punishment.

How quickly an editorial writer will seize upon a statement which apparently discredits the board is illustrated by an editorial which appeared in the Arizona Republic for February 26, 1938. Someone intrusted with reporting the news had added two ciphers to the board's appropriation, which is just under $3,000,000. Immediately an editorial cited with horror $300,000,000 as the sum.

News stories on the Burke charges reached a low for accuracy. In connection with Burke's proposed investigation Senator Neely read a statement by Supreme Court Justice Stanley Reed, then Solicitor General, saying in part, ". . . I should like to bear witness that in these difficult situations the record of the board bore unmistakable evidence of careful and impartial hearings, with every protection to the rights of all contestants." Omitting this sentence entirely the Washington Star printed only that part of the statement which led up to the bouquet and covered the matter in a headline which ran: "Neely Reads Reed Statement Urging Reticence in Condemning Body of Bias."

Praising the board in superlatives, the Honorable Elbert D. Thomas brought his testimony to a climax with ". . . something almost miraculous has been done in the setting up of the Labor Relations Board." He saw no need for an investigation, and referred incidentally to his work with the Maritime Committee as a burden on his time. "Senator Thomas," went the Associated Press version, "told the judiciary subcommittee that he opposed an investigation now on the grounds that it would handicap the Senate-House Maritime Committee efforts to adjust maritime labor laws."

The same malicious distortion occurred last May when the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a decision rendered by the Department of Agriculture in the Kansas City Stockyards case because no intermediate report had been issued. In cases in which prompt decisions were desired, the NLRB also had on occasion omitted a trial examiner's report. In each case the company could have defended itself in oral argument before the decision had it so desired, but in order to square its procedure completely with the court's verdict, the board withdrew five decisions so that it might issue an intermediate report. It had no intention of altering the decisions, but news reports put their own interpretation on the board's scrupulousness. Typical headlines were the following:

> NLRB Appears Loser to Ford (Buffalo Times).
>
> Rehearing of All Pending Cases Hinted (Evansville Press).
>
> Labor Board May Back Up on Big Cases (Milwaukee Journal).

With no factual basis whatever, a story appeared in the New York Herald Tribune for October 3, 1938, headed:

> "Slow-Down" Hits U. S. Agencies as C. I. O. Organizes Employees. NLRB and Labor Department Among Bureaus Whose Overworked Staffs Deliberately Run Behind; Actual Sitdowns Feared Next.

When the Washington Post picked up this same story, a protest from the board evoked the following apology from the managing editor:

> . . . I have no defense whatever of the original article. I believe it was a bad story in every way. . . . This story, furnished by a news service, was allowed to slip by without proper investigation.

The anti-labor interests of the press have been exposed frequently enough to show that its astigmatism in NLRB stories is superinduced. Big business has found devious ways to evade the act; the press will find more devious ways to defame the board.

In the Wind

IN DENMARK the Nazis have registered one of their most decisive victories over the press. The victim is the Berlingske Tidende, Copenhagen's oldest and second-largest daily. After Munich that paper's foreign editor was dismissed on direct order of the German legation, and its editorial policy became belligerently pro-German. Now a new "foreign expert" has been appointed, one Baron von Rheinbaben, a German, a member of the Nazi Party, and, of course, a publicist for the Third Reich.

CHIEFTAINS OF the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party are weighing reports they have received of a rift between the new Republican Governor, Harold E. Stassen, and Old Guard G. O. P. leaders. Stassen, like many other Republican candidates last November, indulged freely in liberal rhetoric; now, according to these reports, he wants to live up to his speeches. The Old Guard says no.

WHAT HAPPENED when Ambassador Kennedy conferred with George S. Messersmith, Assistant Secretary of State, shortly after Kennedy's return from London? The meeting, of course, was private, but when Kennedy emerged he was visibly angry. Messersmith, it is reported, displayed the same mood.

WHEN MEXICAN film exhibitors planned recently to show a Spanish-language film made in Berlin, members of the movie unions threatened to strike in protest. Finally they consented to work on condition that the first day's receipts from the Nazi film go to Loyalist Spain. They collected 3,000 pesos; the next day the picture was withdrawn.

SOME WEEKS ago Mr. M. S. Reynolds, a resident of Vancouver, wrote a letter to Neville Chamberlain criticizing British foreign policy. Shortly afterward—on November 23—Mr. Reynolds was visited by two plain-clothes members of the Royal Canadian Northwest Mounted Police. Producing a copy of the letter he had sent to Chamberlain and of another he had sent to Lord Lloyd, they warned him not to write such letters again. Mr. Reynolds reported these facts to the editors of the London Tribune, and added that he told his inquisitors he would keep on writing "just so long as postage stamps are available."

THE REPORT of the Senate Committee on Campaign Expenditures contained a protest by Senator Bulkley of Ohio against the allegedly excessive expenditures of Robert A. Taft, victorious Republican candidate. The Cleveland Press ran this headline on the continuation of the story: "U. S. Probers Cite Expenses of Taft Race; Report $159,451 Spent on Office." Directly below appeared a Washington dispatch headlined: "Economy Is Taft's Slogan as He Takes Senate Seat."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE President's message to Congress, though unusually eloquent and able, is the mixture of good and bad, and of facing both ways, characteristic of the skilled politician that he is. It goes without saying that his defense of democracy will move profoundly every loyal American heart, and we must be especially grateful for his complete recognition of the fact that the truest defense for any democracy against fascism or communism is a contented and prosperous people, governed with equity and justice. "Our own hourglass tells us," he says, "that we are off on a race to make democracy work, so that we may be efficient in peace and therefore secure in self-defense." Elsewhere he says: "Our nation's program of social and economic reform is therefore a part of defense as basic as armaments themselves." The latter is only half the truth. Social and economic reform is infinitely more important than armaments, which, as Calvin Coolidge said, never kept any country out of war or insured its victory.

It is pleasant to record also that the President realizes now more clearly than in the past that there are better ways of bringing pressure to bear on international wrongdoing than going to war. The passage is worth quoting here:

> Words may be futile, but war is not the only means of commanding a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people.

This is what I and many others have been preaching for many years. To be logical and truthful the President should have gone on to say that the World War has clearly proved that you cannot safeguard or enforce democracy by mass murder, that no nation can win a war, that war reduces every nation to despair because of the inevitable economic collapse after the orgy of destruction is over, that every modern war gives rise to new evils which cannot be foreseen and fortifies the hold of militarism upon the peoples of the world.

Mr. Roosevelt failed to say this because, though he now realizes that there are other weapons in our arsenal besides war, he still thinks many of the outmoded thoughts of the past. He still believes that "weapons of defense" give the only safety. Not only is he now eager for armed forces and defenses, but he wishes them "strong enough to ward off sudden attack against strategic positions and key facilities essential to insure sustained resistance and ultimate victory." He adds that "we must have the organization and location of those key facilities so that they may be immediately utilized and rapidly expanded to meet all needs without danger of serious interruption by enemy attack." That is laying down a wholly new defense plan, under cover of which the country may easily run into endless expense and almost complete militarization, with a large part of industry dominated not by the needs of peaceful development but by the supposititious needs of future warfare. Finally, he declares that "no nation can be safe in its will to peace so long as any other single powerful nation refuses to settle its grievances at the council table."

This is a new and extraordinary doctrine which, like so many of his other statements, he has plainly not considered in all its ramifications. If it is true, it means that if Russia, for example, or Germany, refuses to disarm there can never be any disarmament. In that case nations are doomed to destruction, for some, as the President has repeatedly pointed out, are now expending more than 50 per cent of their national income on armaments and thereby steadily lowering the living standards of their masses. Mr. Roosevelt fails to appreciate that his armament program takes us in exactly the opposite direction of that which he urges when he declares that our democracy must save itself by raising the standard of living and vastly improving the status of the individual citizen while speeding up the processes of our democratic government.

It is the same old Roosevelt, well-intentioned, patriotic, and wholly confused in his intellectual processes and economic thinking. He cannot resist saying out loud whatever occurs to him. Years ago Charles E. Hughes when Governor of New York declared in his first term that he had already learned one thing, and that was that a man in public life ought not to voice the first thought that came into his mind. He was plainly striking out at another Roosevelt, Theodore, who also was given to just this sort of thing. That Franklin is cleverer than Theodore I do not deny. None the less, there is much resemblance between them, and as a politician Theodore would have approved of the President's political strategy in promising not to be radical on domestic issues and to be good to big business for the remainder of his term, while raising the preparedness smoke screen. His appeal for a united people against encroachments upon our democracy will be heard and followed. His demand that all criticism cease and that there be no longer any differences over his New Deal should and will fall on deaf ears.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A LAST CONVERSATION WITH KAREL CAPEK

BY ERIKA MANN

THE death of Karel Capek, the Czech author, is a great sorrow for all who knew his work, his noble and gallant bearing as a public figure, his animation, warm-heartedness, and talented intensity as a private person. The news came as a great surprise, very suddenly, although it was not really surprising. With a consistency that has no parallel for horribleness, the best, the most spiritual persons, the true representatives of every country, disappear from the scene in that country as soon as the fascist dictatorship comes to power. They flee, they are killed, they kill themselves—or they simply die: they let any disease germ penetrate their despairing bodies; an attack of grippe which under other circumstances would scarcely trouble them carries them off. An artist of Capek's rank and convictions could not breathe in a mutilated, fascist Czechoslovakia subject to Hitler's overlordship. And since to him as his nation's greatest poet, who combined high spiritual and literary qualities with genuine and deep-rooted patriotism, to live and work in a foreign language and a foreign land was inconceivable—and since on the other hand it was clear that he could not remain any longer at home—he lay down and died.

I spent a whole day with him immediately after the Munich "peace" pact. I drove out to his house in the country in a small open car placed at my disposal by the Ministry of Propaganda, which was still on a war basis. A soldier sat at the wheel beside me—a young lad in uniform, silent and very pale. His narrow Slav's eyes had an angry and defiant expression. The streets were choked with the retreating columns of the Czech army; silent, hanging their heads, the soldiers evacuated one village, one height, after another, though no enemy was visible. The sight of these strong, splendidly equipped troops drawing back, back, back without a struggle was painful because it seemed completely incomprehensible and unnatural. I speak to the chauffeur about it; he has tears in his narrow eyes as he shows me the fortresses and explains the wire entanglements and the air-raid defenses which had been built so joyfully. "We could have held out for months—alone if necessary," he says; and his face, the face of the deceived and betrayed Czech people, will remain forever in my heart and memory. When he sets me down before the beautiful old manor house which is my destination, he asks for three hours' leave. He would like to drive to his family in the little village of X— not far from here. "We don't know yet whether Hitler will march in there," he says, "and my people are democrats—it would go badly with them."

I have known Karel Capek since the first of many visits in Prague. I know that he is very friendly with Benes, and I hope that he will be able to explain to me why Benes showed such inexplicable trust in powers which had announced clearly enough their treacherous intentions, why he had hoped and waited, as if paralyzed, like a rabbit held by the eye of a snake. Frau Capek, the renowned Czech actress Olga Scheinpflugowa, receives me. She is white as a sheet; one can see that she has been weeping for a long time. She tells me that Capek passed the night weeping and writing to Benes; never in my life have I seen so many men weep as in these days since the Czechoslovak Republic was condemned to death by its friends.

Capek, though his fine Slavic face was marked with melancholy—his dark eyes could be of a boundless sadness—was fundamentally cheerful by nature. He was a clear strong spirit who often found expression in sharp and extremely comic satire. His play "The White Sickness," which was produced with the greatest success throughout Europe, is a magnificently drawn up, aggressive, and tragi-comic indictment and exposure of the fascist dictatorship. The "white sickness" is a mysterious, revolting, and deadly disease which appears as a pestilence wherever fascism comes to power. In the end it brings down the dictator himself at the moment when, the desire and goal of his existence having been achieved, the chaos of the world war finally closes in. "The White Sickness" shows the brilliant, humorous, polished side of the poet. It shows Capek, moreover, as a fighter of quality who was able to wage war on the highest level and from the watch tower of the spirit.

"We have lost it, our battle," he says to me now. "It is all over. Of course I cannot live here any longer—but that is the least of it. I would go gladly if I might do so for good reasons." I answer that there could never be good reasons for him, Capek, to leave the country. "There could only be these abominable, vile, evil reasons." The white sickness, I say to myself, that and only that could drive this man away. "We will emigrate," says Mme Scheinpflugowa. "We will learn to speak and live where freedom still exists." The look which her husband gives her has the shoreless sadness of which I have spoken. Where? that look seems to ask; where, in all the world? We speak of America and again it is the wife who is hopeful. "America is great and free," she says, and I add that Capek will be appreciated there. Instead of answering, Capek says, "What will Benes do? He will not be able to remain either." It was two days before the President resigned, but certainly Capek, his friend, already had knowledge of it. I ask my own questions about Benes. "I know, I know," says Capek, putting me off wearily; "he could perhaps have done otherwise, ought perhaps to have done otherwise. But don't you see—his whole life, the collective conception of the Masaryk state, the Benes state, our state, stood and fell with the idea of the Western democracies. If England and France betrayed this idea they betrayed us and delivered us up. So we were lost not only in a military and practical sense but within ourselves, when everything on which we had built crashed."

"But you yourself," I say, attempting a sanguine tone, which miscarries, "surely you will come to us abroad and go on with your work. This horror will have one good consequence for us: the scattered forces of our fighters will receive great and wonderful support from the Czech reinforcements." Again he does not reply directly. "Seek recruits for us across the sea," he says, "I beg you; and when I am no longer here tell the Americans that Czechoslovakia should not be allowed to perish. We must have aid, economic aid at least, to keep alive." "But we are going, aren't we?" asks his wife in an imploring voice. "You do not want to stay here?" Capek shakes his head, but it does not look like a decisive no; this head-shaking is in final despair. "Here I cannot stay—" he says. His voice does not fall, and the sentence has the effect of being unfinished.

Even when I bring the conversation around to his books, to "The Newts" or "Hardudal," he does not cheer up. "Imagine to yourself something on the order of 'Hardudal' if I had to write it in a foreign country," he says. And, indeed, this most poetic and most moving of his books is so truly "Blood and Soil" in the best, in the real, sense of the words that the Nazis must turn pale with envy. "But 'The Newts,'" I say, "is read in many languages. The story of these sly clever creatures which were first trained by man for all sorts of uses and which finally, turning into a mob without soul or morals but with dangerous technical skill, plunge the world into ruin—this story is so contemporary and exciting, so convincing, and in addition so comical and entertaining that it wins friends everywhere." "Perhaps," he says, again with the languid gesture of denial. At the sound of this "perhaps" his wife bursts into tears.

Karel Capek is dead. He could not remain in Czechoslovakia—he said so—but neither would he have been able to live outside. The loss to the world is great. The victims claimed by the "white sickness" have been increased by one more, a heavy and terrible sacrifice.

BOOKS

Notes by the Way

JOHN A. KOUWENHOVEN'S "Adventures of America, 1857-1900" (Harper, $3.50) exercises the same appeal as the current play about Abraham Lincoln. It is a collection of prints from Harper's Weekly, with commentary, which recreate more vividly than written history the humor and tragedy of provincial America growing into an industrial nation. Like the family album it induces a pleasant nostalgia for a vanished era and a warm sense of the past. The wood engravings of Thomas Nast—which prove that the static quality so often found in woodcuts of today is not necessarily inherent in the medium—are the most striking pictures in the book. And they remind us, among other things, that although we have come to think of the present as a pictorial age, no contemporary cartoonist has matched Nast's achievement in breaking the hold of the Tweed gang in New York by his great series of cartoons directed to that end.

William Murrell, in his admirable "History of American Graphic Humor" (Macmillan, $7), of which the second volume, covering the period from 1865 to 1938, has recently been published, ascribes the decline in the influence of the political cartoon to the collapse of the widely circulated weeklies in which they appeared and to the fact that every important newspaper in the country now prints at least one cartoon a day, which perforce dies with the day. The law of diminishing returns operates in this field as well as in others, but perhaps another reason for the decline of the cartoon as a decisive political weapon is to be found in the parallel decline of American politics from a struggle between two parties fresh from an actual civil war over real issues to a mere struggle for public office. Nast, the Republican, was himself caught in this decline, as Mr. Murrell's book demonstrates, and the most powerful cartoons of this century have sprung from an opposition far to the left of both the Republican and the Democratic Party. Inevitably their circulation, and therefore their influence, has been limited by the obstinate refusal of the inhabitants of the land of opportunity to accept as real or relevant the struggle between classes, as opposed to the fight between two political parties whose basic assumptions are after all identical. The old Masses was propelled into the main stream of American popular thinking by its opposition to the war, and its cartoonists and editors had the distinction of being directly attacked by the government.

Since then many of our best cartoonists have labored in the obscurity to which, so far, the American public has condemned radicalism. Less radical though very accomplished artists such as Edmund Duffy, Rollin Kirby, and D. R. Fitzpatrick fit better into Mr. Murrell's diagnosis: the influence of their work has been diluted by the very ubiquity of cartoons, including their own daily output. The question arises, however, whether a left liberal weekly like The Nation which speaks to that fairly wide section of opinion represented by the left wing of the New Deal is not neglecting an important weapon. With the record of Harper's Weekly before me I am inclined to think so.

Aside from the drawings of Nast, Mr. Kouwenhoven's book contains a great variety of humorous and serious drawings in which the drama of Civil War, Reconstruction, and industrialization fills many pages—along with the fantastic costumes in which our not far distant ancestors performed their historic roles. In a picture of mixed bathing at Newport in the fifties the presumably happy bathers look more like victims caught fully clothed in a flood, and the representation of a lady tourist in the vault of the Sub-Treasury in New York inspecting gold bricks reminds us of the days when gold was gold.

The most charming pictures in the book are some early prints by Winslow Homer. His scenes in Boston Common and Central Park in New York have the quality, to be found in the paintings of Renoir of a quite different background, that reflects the existence of a homogeneous and stable, though limited and provincial, society. Great forces—the Civil War, industrialism, and immigration—broke it up. We shall not have such pictures again until our assimilation of our own extraordinary industrial and technological inventions and of the alien cultures that have reached our shores in continuing waves shall have produced a new homogeneity and stability.

Such books as "Adventures of America" and "A History of American Graphic Humor," aside from their direct appeal, are extremely valuable in this connection. They offer a perspective in which the almost fashionable despair of achieving a distinctive American culture appears, as it actually is, excessive. The task of assimilating our past, near and distant, is a great one. Henry James, in "The American Scene," wrote eloquently of the complexity and scope of the problem, especially in relation to immigration—and quailed before it. Yet its very magnitude, which implies the scale of the reward in its accomplishment, should stimulate rather than discourage the intellectual perennially searching for a function in the real world. Fortunately the past decade has seen a genuine critical movement toward the discovery and understanding of our artistic and social resources—which is essential to any intelligent ordering of our future.

On the first page of the delightful "Oxford Book of Light Verse" ($3), compiled by W. H. Auden, this couplet appears in The Song of Lewes (circa 1264):

> Richard of Alemaigne whil that he was kyng,
> he spende al his tresor upon swyuyng

Shall we now have protests from the learned societies against the swinging of Early English?

One of the most embarrassing things about the dictatorships these days is their invocation of principles and policies, usually contradictory, on which the Western empires have operated. Japan is "civilizing" China for its own good; Mussolini's only motive in invading Ethiopia was to give the natives the advantages of Italian culture. But the item which should make us cringe most is the announcement from Berlin of a "Jim Crow" law for Jews in the Reich.

MARGARET MARSHALL

A Guide to Social Thought

SOCIAL THOUGHT FROM LORE TO SCIENCE. By Harry Elmer Barnes and Howard Becker. With the Assistance of Emile Benoit-Smullyan and Others. D. C. Heath. Two Volumes. $9.50.

THIS is a huge enterprise carried out with courage and ability. The first volume surveys the history of social thought from its beginning with the preliterate peoples who, the authors point out, must have had social thought even if they could not write, up to the latest cyclical theory of Pitirim Sorokin, who, the authors do not point out, insists on writing even when he hasn't much social thought. The second volume, abandoning the chronological for the national, surveys the present trends in sociology from England to Japan, including the Scandinavian countries and including also so piquant a caption as "émigré Ukrainian sociology." Together the volumes form a short encyclopedia of social thought, more likely to be referred to than read—a collective enterprise with a far-flung authorship in addition to the two main authors, over a decade in the writing, and with a literary history so complex that an elaborate key is required to indicate who wrote what.

The authors have leaned upon every reference and research aid, but chiefly they have been influenced by the sociological tradition proper as represented by such men as Albion Small in America and Max Weber and von Wiese in Germany. Considering the scope and magnitude of the work, they have shown an impressive accuracy, competence, and discrimination. They have produced what is easily the best single survey of the history of social thought—a category that comprises probably our dreariest and dullest textbook writing. Not that they have wholly escaped dreariness and the impress of scissors and paste-pot. Often I have got more out of browsing through their voluminous bibliographical footnotes than out of reading their discussions of Adam Smith and Spengler Despite that, the book has bursts of vigor and a certain sharpness. Its weakness lies in the authors' vagueness as to what constitutes social thought. Sometimes you think they are including the whole realm of what Charles Beard has called "the discussion of human affairs." At other times they are narrowly sociologists, limiting themselves to a "central field" of inquiry.

This stricture is true especially of the second volume, whose chapter on the United States gives a dull recital of sociology instruction in various universities and the "contributions" of a long list of scholars. Why this was done it is difficult to see; no authors would dare say what they really think of their academic colleagues and contemporaries. I could quote howlers such as the one about the Harvard Sociology Department: "The prospects for extensive graduate instruction at Harvard are now good." If Harvard social science today has any prospects, they are certainly not to be found in sociology proper. Another result of the authors' cultivation of a single "central field" is that by pursuing sociology they miss the social sciences. In America, at any rate, the field o sociology has become eroded. The great names—Small Cooley, Ward—are the names of the past. It is in the marginal fields, such as law, anthropology, psychology, economics that the real creativeness of American social thought must be sought. But the authors do not seek it there.

The chapter on Marxian theory is one of the fairest I have seen in an academic textbook. Nevertheless, the authors find it necessary to point out, perhaps because they know the mentality of sociology teachers, that while Marx's name is important in the history of social thought, "we do not necessarily subscribe either to his theories or his program." There is no similar caveat for Burke or Bagehot or Weber or any other theorist. But if socialism has cast its shadow on these pages, fascism has not. Aside from Pareto and Spann there is no discussion of fascist sociology such as may be found in Kolnai's recent splendid book, "The War Against the West." In its fundamental conception the book predates the sharpening of the social struggle in the past decade. Yet it is out of social struggles that social thought develops.

MAX LERNER

A Mixed Bag

NEW WRITING. New Series. Fall, 1938. Edited by John Lehmann. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

THERE is every reason why we should be disposed to examine sympathetically a further instalment of a book whose blurb claims that "it continues to be the most important expression we have of the younger men who are determining the art of the future," but in view of the title sympathy does not exempt from disappointment at failing to find much original inspiration or imaginative power behind this particular sample of modernity. Leaving aside the few characteristic samples of tense war- and graveyard-conscious verse, the bulk of contributions to the book can be divided into critical or social essays and stories designed to make either our flesh or our nerves creep.

Mr. Spender dissects in a critical spirit the poetical dramas of W. H. Auden and Christopher Isherwood; Mr. Robert Herring writes with contagious appreciation of French films; and Mr. Edgell Rickwood discusses André Malraux. The sociological essay, which occupies the most space in the book, is a study of jazz and its protagonists in the cheap dance halls of industrial England, but though the author is finally discovered to be unsympathetic toward this "post-war religion of modern youth" he surveys without bringing any conclusiveness to his survey.

The stories lead off with a page or two of the American scene, and then there is a German item concerning the behavior of men trapped in a mine awaiting rescue, a plight which needs to be done very well at this point if it is to be done again, whereas Miss Seghers indicates tension by the easy device of a lack of coherence. But English writers are chiefly represented: there is a stimulating account by Mr. Willy Goldman of the Jewish novel, with special relation to the London East End Jew, and the East End comes in once more with a short story of some louts who beat up a young Jew walking out with his girl. A beating up also ends the story of two English sailors who, having to ship as kitchen hands, take it out of the unjust steward after drawing their pay. But stark realism has never been the English forte; here one may consider how much more effective is a translation from the French of Louis Guilloux of a stupid hysterical quarrel between a man and a woman which nevertheless, through the mere rendering of detail, encompasses a tender sense of humanity's irrationality. But such a tolerant sense of life is far to seek in this particular specimen of "New Writing," which, if it were representative of literature, would seem to show that we have progressed from the Comédie humaine to the Condition humaine, and lost in the transition.

NORAH HOULT

Answer to "Mein Kampf"

OUR BATTLE. By Hendrik Willem Van Loon. Simon and Schuster. $1.

"OUR BATTLE" is a lost opportunity, at best a Pyrrhic achievement: one more such defense of democracy and—. The more the pity because of the influence of the author as a liberal teacher. His book is a warning that not even a professional historian with a facile pen can achieve a dignified and effective product overnight. On October 12 Van Loon heard in his Connecticut home that the Mayor of the City of New York was booed, while the name of a "foreign dictator was greeted with tumultuous applause," at a Columbus Day celebration. On October 13 he came to New York to see the expressions of organized resentment by the liberal citizens. Keenly disappointed at finding that the burghers did not take seriously the mistaken loyalty of a group of ardent Latins who made up for their ignorance of American institutions and the English language by excessive and sentimental devotion to things Italian, he returned to Old Greenwich and on October 14 began his answer to "Mein Kampf." On October 21 he completed his book. Within a month his publisher had it on the counter for the American public. After reading "Our Battle," one wonders why Van Loon did not take his son's advice. But fathers never do. The young man read the manuscript very carefully and then with commendable frankness assured his parent that his "warning against Hitler" could have been reduced to a single paragraph that "every housewife would have understood."

"Our Battle" would gain immeasurably if it were written with dignity and concentrated its effort on carrying the reader to an enduring conviction. Every page is given to name-calling until the reader wonders why the author did not follow the more effective technique of the scholar—to present the facts and let them indict the hysterical dictator drunk with power. In his "Force or Reason," Hans Kohn presents a devastating indictment of the totalitarian state, but the indictment is invariably drawn by the reader, never by the author.

In the limited space of his small book Van Loon gives us the family history of both Hitler and Mussolini: Hitler's father had three wives, the Führer being a son of the third; the neglected offspring of the irresponsible father became an itinerant dauber, a postal-card artist, never a house painter or a paper hanger—details as irrelevant as the story of Rousseau's illegitimate progeny or of Franklin's philanderings in France would be in tracing the development of the concept of democracy. The author deems all this small gossip important, but his story of how Mussolini and Hitler actually seized organized governments is surprisingly brief and very hazy.

The most disappointing feature of "Our Battle" is its complete neglect of the great human gains that we may attribute to democracy. It includes a careful and detailed formulation of the great contributions of Fascism in Italy and Nazism in Germany. Pages 44-56 present at least twelve major social gains under totalitarianism as practiced by Il Duce. The list of contributions of Hitlerism, skilfully tabulated on pages 127-131, will strengthen many a critical Nazi follower in his wavering faith.

No honest student will quarrel with this presentation of the achievements of these two systems of totalitarianism. Even the devil must be given his due. But why cheat the angels? We quarrel with the author on at least three counts: for omitting an equally skilful analysis of the human gains attributable to democratic forms of control; for neglecting to present a full analysis of the social cost of the gains in totalitarian states; for failing, so sadly, to show that these and comparable gains have been achieved under democratic systems without the loss of basic human rights and all civil liberties.

The dictators have proved themselves adept at mud-slinging and name-calling when democratic communities have taken issue with totalitarian techniques of social control. Van Loon evidently decided to fight fire with fire, forgetting that fire is employed for the purpose when the use of water is impracticable. As a keen student of social evolution, he should have employed the method that is more native to one of his training and his superb gifts. PAUL KLAPPER

Italy in Colorado

WAIT UNTIL SPRING, BANDINI. By John Fante. Stackpole Sons. $2.50.

JOHN FANTE'S short stories are already known. His first novel tells the story of an Italian-American family in Colorado. The son, an Italian of the second generation in this country, is the chief interpreter of the little drama that takes place between a lusty father and a religious mother.

The characters are real; the style is excellently adapted to the presentation of a simple, untrained mind attempting to articulate and arrange ideas growing out of the contact of the Italian with an alien culture; the whole story is fully imagined and convincing. Actually the plot is very simple, being a quarrel between a husband who suddenly begins to feel important in a new situation and a wife who clings to God until her husband deserts her and then, with precise fury, has her vengeance. But it is not the plot that makes the interest of the book; it is rather the innumerable correct details of life in such a family, together with the quality of the writing. John Fante keeps himself out of the picture, but he is obviously writing about people he knows at first hand. Nothing, for instance, could be more accurate than his description of Bandini's shame when the "widow" who has picked him up puts him out. The characterization of the "widow," incidentally, was clearly the most difficult in the book, yet she is completely convincing.

Mr. Fante's quick images of people and his abrupt but rhythmical sentences bespeak more than the usual skilful novelist. "Wait Until Spring, Bandini," although it has no such powerful theme, reminds one of Silone's "Fontamara" in its use of a pruned yet at times rich prose to convey the speech of a somewhat inarticulate people. Mr. Fante clearly has deep knowledge of a folk. EDA LOU WALTON

The New Palestine

DEEP FURROWS. By Avraham Ben-Shalom. Translated by Frances Burnce. New York: Hashomer Hatzair. $1.35.

THIS little book will find a place in the enduring literature of the new Palestine. For it presents the first comprehensive description in English of the Zionist collectives which have attempted to change the psychology, the economic habits, and the status of the Jews. Because it is written with sincerity, vividness, and quiet humor, and also because the life of these colonies, many of which stand on the dangerous outposts of Jewish settlement, resembles in some respects that of the early American frontiersmen in their stockades, it should be of special interest to American readers.

The wisest and most idealistic of the young Zionists have realized from the beginning that no healthy Jewish life could be built in Palestine by exploiting cheap native labor. They insisted that Jews must do their own work in order to free themselves from the insecurities of the middle-class position which historic necessity had forced upon them. From the attempt to make the Jew a worker flowed the natural desire to create a cooperative rather than an exploiting economy. That this effort met with any success is quite amazing in the light of the middle-class psychology of most Zionists and of the competition in Palestine of vast numbers of impoverished natives ready to work for starvation wages. Only unwavering idealism and the creation of a powerful, disciplined, statesman-like labor movement enabled the Jewish workers to achieve a significant victory. Today the General Federation of Jewish Labor with its collectives and cooperatives, its housing, maritime, and public-works projects, its schools and press, dominates Jewish Palestine as no other labor movement does in any other free country in the world.

Among the strongest elements in the Palestine labor movement is Hashomer Hatzair, the Young Guard. Originally a Scout organization of middle-class Jewish boys in Poland, it became a movement to establish socialist collectives in Palestine. It has formed thirty-five of these collectives, and they are among the most successful enterprises in the land. In terms of his experience in one of them the author describes the various phases of their life, their ideology, their achievements and failures, their economic and political organization, their culture and education, their family life, the status of women, and the rearing of children.

Of greatest interest at the moment is the attitude of this group toward the Arabs. They have insisted that the interests of the Jewish masses and the Arab masses are identical and that the friendship of the latter is more important than British promises. They have even envisioned the possibility of a bi-national socialist Palestine, freed from exploiting effendi, imperialists, and capitalists, participating in a pan-Arab federation.

> The hundreds and thousands of terrorists who leaned on German rifles or Italian bayonets and spread the net of fascism from Gibraltar to Suez cannot blind us to the hundreds of thousands of starved fellaheen and exploited Arab workers who sooner or later must join us in the struggle for our common welfare. The day will yet come when this alliance will break down the walls of hate and murder erected by Muftis and Arab Effendi as well as the boundaries that have been set up by British imperialism.

Toward this end they have participated in movements to organize Arab peasants and workers, to initiate agrarian reform, and to teach the Arab how to produce more from his barren soil. These efforts, however, have met with little success. For in Palestine as elsewhere nationalism has become the ruling force. If some day class interests should predominate over national, the program of Hashomer Hatzair would hold out the greatest hope for peace.

In the meantime this group, together with all of Labor Palestine, does not give ground. Although they refuse to participate in acts of terrorism, they successfully defend themselves against Arab terrorists. No settlement has been abandoned, no land surrendered. Instead new colonies have been established on the very spots where Jewish workers were murdered, as a kind of blood bond with the soil. This is the only place in the world where Jews under attack are not running away. Under each fresh attack they sink their roots deeper into the land. Even the most fanatical Arab extremists do not hope to drive these Jews from Palestine, but only to prevent further immigration and land purchase. Their success will depend on whether nationalism or socialism will triumph in the modern world. In that struggle an important part will be played by those whose "eyes are fixed on distant horizons, for our feet stand fast in deep furrows."

PHILIP S. BERNSTEIN

DRAMA

More Matter and Less Art

LAST week I remarked in passing that ghosts of one kind or another were taken as a matter of course on the contemporary stage. I might have added that what used to be called the conventional dramatic form is being abandoned with increasing frequency and that half the first nights on Broadway now reveal plays whose techniques even the patrons of little theaters would have regarded as eccentric five years ago. In certain instances the results have abundantly justified the means, but novelty is no longer novel and demands no especial consideration in its own right. Five years ago the least that one could in decency say of an unconventional play was to call it "an interesting experiment"; today there is no reason why one should not translate the phrase into what is actually an equivalent and say only that the author "means well."

I cannot find it in my heart to say much more in favor of the first of this week's "experiments," which is called "Everywhere I Roam" (National Theater). Here we have a sort of

LILY PONS
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
EUGENE ORMANDY
JOHN CHARLES THOMAS

The World's Greatest Artists are Yours for Keeps on Victor Records!
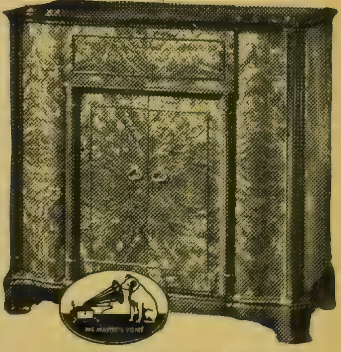
They'll thrill you with the music you love whenever you wish!

YOUR own music . . . the selections that give you the deepest pleasure . . . All can be Yours for Keeps on Victor Records. You can be right on the spot with the newest popular hits . . . Enjoy the great symphonic performances that thrill Carnegie Hall and Covent Garden . . . Glory in the operatic performances of Salzburg . . . These are just a few of the things you can enjoy whenever you wish, with Victor Records. RCA Victor instruments for playing Victor Records range in price from the inexpensive Victrola Attachment to de luxe automatic models in superb cabinets . . . One of the most delightful is shown at right.



RCA Victrola U-134A with Automatic Record Changer and Electric Tuning

Combines Victor Record and Radio Entertainment. Has Automatic Record Changer, Feather-Touch Crystal Pick-up. Radio has Electric Tuning. Price includes $9.00 in any Victor or Bluebird Records you choose, $2.00 subscription to Victor Record Review, membership in Victor Record Society, RCA Victor Master Antenna. Mahogany $365*, walnut $355*

BLUEBIRD RECORDS
(made by Victor)
For popular bands, new tunes, big hits!
ONLY 35¢

MUSICAL MASTERPIECE OF THE MONTH

"Symphonia Domestica" by Richard Strauss . . . Played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, Conductor. A delightful tone poem . . . partly lyrical, partly humorous . . . which Strauss, the greatest orchestral technician, dedicated to "my dear wife and our boy." Victor Album M-520 (AM-520 for automatic operation.) 10 sides $10.00

You can buy RCA Victrolas on C.I.T. easy payment plan. Any radio instrument is better with an RCA Victor Master Antenna. *Price f.o.b. Camden, N. J., subject to change without notice. Listen to the Magic Key, Sundays, 2 to 3 P. M., E.S.T., on NBC Blue Network

Get $25.95 value, in Victor or Bluebird Records and RCA Victrola Attachment, for $14.95!

Save $11.00 . . . Get $14.95 (list price) RCA Victrola Attachment . . . $9.00 in any Victor or Bluebird Records you choose . . . $2.00 subscription to Victor Record Review . . . Victor Record Society membership . . . for $14.95. RCA Victrola Attachment can be connected to any modern AC set at little or no expense; plays Victor or Bluebird Records with full tone of set.

RCA Victrola
COMBINES RECORD AND RADIO ENTERTAINMENT
A SERVICE OF THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

Child's History of America in picture, story, and song, in the course of which legend is mingled with allegory and Johnny Appleseed frustrated by two sinister figures in top hats representing Finance. Others have already complained that it is hardly fair to set a sort of Currier and Ives picture of the age of innocence over against a singularly unattractive cartoon of the machine age, and the complaint is justified. Even more serious, however, is the fact that the highly stylized presentation achieves no real style and does little to charm one into the acceptance of its naivetes. Marc Connelly is set down as coauthor with Arnold Sundgaard, and it doubtless seemed to Mr. Connelly that the technique of the "Living Newspaper" might be combined with that of his own "Green Pastures" to make something twice as effective as either, but for a fairly obvious reason it does not work out that way. The non-realistic portions of the "Living Newspaper" were acceptable because the allegory served as a sort of highly intellectualized shorthand. "Green Pastures," on the other hand, was acceptable because it succeeded in creating a certain mythological atmosphere in which everything occurred in accordance with the logic of a recognizable folk imagination. But the allegory and the symbolism of "Everywhere I Roam" seem dictated by no consistent controlling principle, and the mingling of intellectual shorthand with vaguely mythological elements is made not less but more confusing by the fact that there are purely external similarities between personages proper to the one and personages proper to the other. Since no real style is achieved, such a scene as that in which the sinister financiers uproot an apple orchard one foot high is neither quaint on the one hand nor abstract on the other. It is merely very close to being downright silly. Some of the dancing is good.

The

Protestant Crusade

by RAY ALLEN
BILLINGTON

1800-1860

A REVEALING study of an unpleasant chapter in America's past—the development of anti-Catholic and anti-foreign feeling up to the Know-Nothing crisis. $5.00

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
60 Fifth Avenue New York

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division

The Nation ▪ 20 Vesey Street ▪ New York

Next Week in The Nation

THE UNITED STATES AT LIMA

By HUBERT HERRING

Thornton Wilder's "The Merchant of Yonkers," for which Herman Shumlin has leased the Guild Theater, is by no means so ambitious or technically so unusual as the same author's "Our Town," but it does come under the head of "novelties," and it suffers like "Everywhere I Roam" from a failure to achieve satisfactorily the stylized manner toward which it is obviously aspiring. According to a program note the play is "based upon a comedy by Johann Nestroy (Vienna, 1842), which was itself based upon an English original." With neither of these originals am I familiar, but it is obvious that the ultimate substratum consists of a farce, soundly constructed upon familiar old-fashioned lines, in which young lovers frustrate Old Money-Bags and everybody has frequent opportunity to hide in closets, behind screens, and under tables. The idea seems to be to play Mr. Wilder's version of this old play as a period piece, to encourage the actors to use all the old low-comedy tricks, and to emphasize the artificialities in order to heighten the generally larkish atmosphere of the occasion. Presumably Mr. Wilder is responsible for the soliloquies setting forth neatly a whimsically epicurean commentary, and these are pleasant in their own way; but so far as I could make out, most of the amusement which the play furnishes (and it is often quite laughable) is the result of the honest farce of the original author, to which neither the rewriting nor the stylized production contributes very much. On the other hand, a good deal is contributed by the very effective performances of Jane Cowl and June Walker.

"Mamba's Daughters" (Empire Theater) is DuBose Heyward's novel of the same name made into a starring vehicle for Ethel Waters. Miss Waters gives an impressive and full-bodied impersonation, and the singing—there is one song composed for the occasion by Jerome Kern, and a number of traditional tunes—is uniformly magnificent. So, for that matter, are the local color and the atmosphere, but unfortunately the story is neither very powerfully imagined nor very dramatically told. The action is obviously suspended from time to time in order to make a place for such scenes as that of the "love feast," and in itself is little more than a series of conventional tear-jerking situations. Such material deserves a better framework.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

"I WANT A LITTLE GIRL," which I mentioned recently as an outstanding jazz record, is one of several that the Kansas City Six—a group from Count Basie's Orchestra—made for Commodore. It is also the best; but the briefer solos that Buck Clayton and Lester Young contribute to "Pagin' the Devil" are very fine; and Clayton does beautiful things throughout "Good Mornin' Blues." Some of the big words that are slung around pretentiously for effect rather than for meaning, in this field, have been applied to Lester

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Young: "warmth and simplicity that probably have not been approached since the days of Teschmaker"; but a man who actually heard Teschmaker at close range for a long period tells me the style and feeling of his playing were completely different from Young's.

On Billie Holiday's record of "I Can't Get Started" and "The Very Thought of You" (Vocalion) are instrumental interludes by superb players who should have been named. Then there is a re-pressing of the Mound City Blue-Blowers' "One Hour" (Bluebird), with a tenor-saxophone solo by the distinguished Coleman Hawkins. And moderately good are Mildred Bailey's "My Melancholy Baby" (Vocalion) and Cootie Williams's "Swing Pan Alley" and "Chasing Chippies" (Vocalion).

As for Benny Goodman's "Swing Session" (Victor: four records, $3.50), "Make Believe" offers extensive solo work on muted trumpet, presumably by Harry James, whose playing is usually coarse, but who plays here with delicacy and sensitiveness in a style that is delightful—though I must add that his invention is not unfailing, and that some of the phrases which begin with such clear direction end in aimless profusion of notes. And Goodman himself has an exquisite solo in "Sweet Sue—Just You." But the rest is dull; and Goodman's solo in "The Blue Room," from the first note of his entrance to the last flourish of his exit, is the straining exhibitionism of the spotlighted band-leader playing with clarinet tilted toward the ceiling—horrible in itself, and disastrous to the delicate quality of the Rodgers song. Nor is this the only record in which Goodman's playing shows the effect of his recent activity, in a straining for effectiveness that he does not achieve: even in "Bumble Bee Stomp," which is fairly good, his own work is poor.

The guitar-playing of Vicente Gomez is a miracle of technical mastery and musical subtlety which can be experienced in the little album (three records, $2.75) issued by Decca. The pieces are by Gomez himself; and the best are "La Farucca" and "Sevillanas y Panaderos" on record 23068.

Sampling the 50- and 75-cent Decca records further I have encountered some that are very good: additional Handel Concerti Grossi played by the Boyd Neel Orchestra; Vera Schwarz's singing of an aria from Mozart's "Idomeneo"; the Ambrosian chants recorded by singers of the Ambrosian School of Sacred Music in Milan; Schumann's "An den Sonnenschein" and "Marienwürmchen" delightfully sung by Lotte Lehmann, the first with orchestral accompaniment, the second with piano. Emmy Bettendorf's singing of Brahms's "O wüsst' ich doch den Weg zurück" and "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" is excellent, the violin and piano accompaniments highly objectionable (imagine the effect of a treacly violin obligato in a treacly Brahms song); on the other hand the old orchestral accompaniment does not spoil my pleasure from Maria Ivogün's singing—in German—of "Ah! fors' è lui" and "Sempre libera" from "La Traviata." As for the Queen of the Night's aria from "The Magic Flute," Lily Pons sings it as she sings the Queen of Shemakha's aria from "Le Coq d'Or."

I have been informed that certain models of the Ansley Dynaphone use a German motor. The Ansley Company admits this, claiming that it cannot avoid using the motor in these models.

B. H. HAGGIN

THE Nation announces a series of articles of great significance to Americans by

Eliot Janeway

Beginning in the issue of January 28

I. America in the Post-Munich World

A summary of how radically the world has changed since the Pact of Munich, and what part the United States must play in a new economic situation.

II. We Arm Our Potential Enemies

We equip Japan, Germany, and Italy with the necessities of war; we enable them to create capital equipment for future military self-sufficiency. Why? Who is responsible? What would happen if we placed an embargo on such trade?

III. A New Deal for Latin America

Suppose Japan were to cut off our access to sources of raw materials in eastern Asia. Suppose Germany and Italy were to threaten our trade routes from the Mediterranean. Could we rely on Latin America, or does much spade work remain to be done there?

IV. Reconstructing Our Domestic Economy

The new isms of Europe and Asia begin to have an effect on American farmers. What can be done to help them and to bring idle capital and idle labor together, so that It Won't Happen Here?

Also in Forthcoming Issues:

Can Democracy Save Itself Without Force?

Three different points of view expressed by three profound thinkers: AUREL KOLNAI, REINHOLD NIEBUHR, BERTRAND RUSSELL.

Liberalism as a Weapon for Progress

A debate by MAX LERNER and ARCHIBALD MACLEISH.

*

To make sure that you read all these articles, and all that The Nation offers you besides, week after week, mail the order form below today!

THE NATION 20 VESEY ST. NEW YORK

For the inclosed $________ please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

☐ Ten Weeks ($1) ☐ Two Years ($8)
☐ One Year ($5) ☐ Three Years ($11)

Name________________

Address________________

City________________ 1-14-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c.

Letters to the Editors

Facts Are the Answer

Dear Sirs: The leading article in your issue of December 17 has again given eloquent proof that your publication stands in the vanguard of liberal American journalism. The Reverend W. C. Kernan's factual analysis of Coughlin's controversy with the Jews of this country is a masterpiece of research, fact-finding, and logic.

I wish some means could be found to give even wider publicity to the Kernan article. This is a dire need at this time in view of the campaign being conducted not only by Coughlin but also by such Catholic newspapers as the Brooklyn Tablet, by the International Truth Society, and by various so-called "Christian Front" organizations. Libels against the Jewish people are being circulated with great force and vigor and must be answered not by name-calling but by undisputed facts and data.

ELIHU L. PLATOWSKY

Brooklyn, December 30

Refugee Theater

Dear Sirs: Actors, directors, writers, and musicians now in exile from Austria have formed the Refugee Artist Group, which plans to open soon in New York a theater similar to the former Kleinkünstlerbühne in Vienna.

Rehearsals are about to start for the first production, with Arthur Lessack of Labor Stage as voice director. The project offers one of the very few possibilities of reestablishing refugees in their own profession. Among the sponsors are Albert Einstein, Edward G. Robinson, John Haynes Holmes, George S. Kaufman, Maurice Evans, and others.

THEO LOWE

New York, January 3

Wilson and Hemingway

Dear Sirs: As a more or less regular reader of The Nation I wish to protest against Edmund Wilson's review of Ernest Hemingway's new books in the issue of December 10, especially against that part in which he characterizes Hemingway as unaffected by the "butchery by Communists of the Fascists."

In my opinion, it ill becomes Mr. Wilson to criticize Ernest Hemingway, a writer who has acted on his beliefs; and it ill becomes The Nation to print statements such as this which only serve to confuse the minds of liberal thinkers at a time when Spain needs the wholehearted and unqualified support of every decent, democracy-loving person in this country. Why Mr. Hemingway, who has risked his life behind the scenes of Loyalist Spain and therefore is in a position to evaluate properly the splendid work Communists have done in organizing the Spanish people to fight fascism, should even dream of criticizing them for doing our work, fighting our battles, is more than I can understand.

MRS. EDWARD G. CLARK, JR.

New York, December 20

Louis Freeland Post

Dear Sirs: I am writing a biography of Louis Freeland Post, single taxer, editor of the Public in Chicago, and Assistant Secretary of Labor in the Wilson Administration. Should any of your readers possess material relating to Mr. Post I would appreciate their communicating with me, at 5211 Second Boulevard, Detroit.

STUART PORTNER

Detroit, January 4

The Teachers' Union vs. Professor Childs

Dear Sirs: The New York Teachers' Union regrets that Professor Childs mistook an article in The Nation entitled Twilight at Teachers College, regardless of its merits, for a statement of the union's position and made that article the basis for an attack on the New York locals of the American Federation of Teachers.

Professor Childs's statement charging "Stalinist domination" of the New York locals seems to us to do an injustice both to Professor Childs and to the New York locals. The charge is unworthy of an educator who has made Professor Childs's contribution to the amelioration of conditions among Teachers College cafeteria workers, and is unfortunate considering that unfounded charges of Communist domination necessarily today have anti-union and anti-liberal consequences.

Professor Childs's charge is unfair to the New York locals because it is untrue. The New York locals are democratically organized and not controlled by any group.

The New York College Teachers' Union has objected to the undemocratic procedure adopted in the closing of New College. But it has too much confidence in the liberal members of the Teachers College faculty to believe in the Twilight of Teachers College.

EXECUTIVE BOARD, New York College Teachers' Union
EDWIN BERRY BURGUM, President
ARNOLD SHUKOTOFF, Secretary

New York, January 3

Dear Sirs: Confronted by incontrovertible evidence, Local 537 of the American Federation of Teachers by indirection withdraws the charge of the officers of the Joint Board "that Professor Childs's interest in the labor movement ceases when educational problems on his own campus are concerned." Why was this false statement ever published?

The union complains that my charge of left-wing sectarianism is "unfounded." This notwithstanding that:

1. I attended regularly the meetings of the Delegate Assembly of Local 5 for one year. These meetings were often marked by bitter sectarian disputes.
2. Dr. Counts, Dr. Hacker, and I have described the methods of these factions at Columbia University.
3. I was invited to attend a meeting of the "Communist fraction" in Teachers College so that "I could see how constructive its activities were."
4. Dr. Langford publicly admits I was asked to discuss union problems with Mr. Earl Browder and Mr. Clarence Hathaway.

This problem of sectarianism must be faced fundamentally. I hope this controversy will help break the pernicious notion that all public criticism of Communists by liberals should be suppressed. Democracy will suffer if we fail to criticize where criticism is required. Public criticism of the tactics of Communists at Teachers College was long overdue.

JOHN L. CHILDS

New York, January 6

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs, Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRAR
Burlingame, Cal

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 21, 1939 NUMBER 4

CONTENTS

LIFT THE EMBARGO! 77
THE SHAPE OF THINGS 78
EDITORIALS:
WPA AND WALL STREET 81
MUSSOLINI STANDS PAT 81
THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND "THE NATION"
A LETTER FROM MICHAEL WILLIAMS WITH AN ANSWER BY THE EDITORS 82
WHAT HAPPENED AT LIMA by Hubert Herring 84
MUST DEMOCRACY USE FORCE? I. PACIFISM MEANS SUICIDE by Aurel Kolnai 86
THREE SOUTHERN TOWNS. III. KINGSPORT: THEY PLANNED IT by Willson Whitman 88
ASIA FOR THE JAPANESE by Ernest O. Hauser 90
POCKET GUIDE by Helen Woodward 92
IN THE WIND 93
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 94
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
MAJOR ELIOT ON NATIONAL DEFENSE by Keith Hutchison 95
FROM PLAINS TO SALT WATER by Constance Rourke 96
ZOOLOGY, ILLUSTRATED by Hugh H. Darby 96
FALLADA AMONG THE NAZIS by Robert Vambéry 97
A CATHOLIC IN MAJORCA by Mildred Adams 98
ART AS EXPRESSION by Eliseo Vivas 98
ARAGON'S "REAL WORLD" by Justin O'Brien 99
AN INDIAN'S MEMORIES by Eda Lou Walton 100
DRAMA: TWO HITS by Joseph Wood Krutch 100
FILMS by Franz Hoellering 102

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

Lift the Embargo!

THOSE whose belief in democracy is more than rhetoric have no more important task at this session of Congress than to fight for repeal of the arms embargo on Spain. Hearings on the Neutrality Act open before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee on January 25, but the question of the Spanish embargo is too pressing to wait upon a general revision of the act itself. The embargo was imposed as a piece of special legislation rushed through Congress under pressure from various reactionary sources. Its repeal, too, must be specially considered. The combination of duplicity and inertia that has led the democratic powers to lend at least passive aid to the destruction of democracy in Spain is one of the most shameful crimes of the shameful age in which we live. The American people cannot afford to be partners any longer in the tragic farce of "non-intervention," and the Administration must summon up all its courage and propose repeal of the embargo or confess that the brave words of the President's message to Congress ring untrue on the hard counter of deed and fact.

It is no secret that the only real obstacle to repeal of the embargo is Catholic pressure. The leadership of the church is deliberately attempting to nullify the expressed pro-Loyalist sentiment of a majority of the American people. Few campaigns in recent years have been as hysterical or as bitter as that now being conducted to prevent the lifting of the embargo. Many leading Catholic papers are devoting their entire issues almost exclusively to the Spanish question, and despite the plain fact, revealed by the Gallup and other polls, that most Americans favor the republic, the Catholic press has the effrontery to declare that the movement against the embargo is Communist-inspired and to attempt to stigmatize all the leaders of the pro-Loyalist movement as "red." Michael Williams, in a letter published and answered in this issue, complains that we have no evidence to support our frequent criticism of the American Catholic hierarchy. The tactics being used in the campaign to keep the embargo against Spain testify eloquently to the truth of our charges.

In this hysteria Catholic leadership has overplayed its hand. For when the one group in America which is pro-Franco stands alone in advocating the continued application of the Neutrality Act to Spain, it is evident that that act is far from "neutral." In order to prevent this from being generally realized, the Catholic hierarchy has tried desperately to line up a few non-Catholic individuals to advocate retention of the embargo. In this they have failed. At the mass-meeting held in Washington on January 9, the Catholic "Keep the Spanish Embargo Committee" was unable to induce a single prominent non-Catholic to deliver an address. A few leading non-Catholics signed the original petition for retaining the embargo, but subsequent investigation revealed that two of the most prominent of these also signed petitions for the lifting of the embargo and had signed the Catholic petition by mistake.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

The hierarchy's intransigent position on the embargo is the more difficult to understand in view of the fact that a very substantial minority—42 per cent—of the Catholic population, as shown by the Gallup poll, sympathizes with the Loyalists. This fact is not denied by the Catholic press, but is explained on the ground that a substantial number of Catholics do not read the "truth" as contained in Catholic publications. The truth is that if the Loyalists lose in Spain, fascism will have gained a powerful foothold in the West, and the effects upon the church as well as upon the democracies will be disastrous. The center from which Latin America still draws its cultural sustenance will be fascist. France, with three frontiers to defend against fascists, will be immeasurably weakened; no one can doubt that the next step against it would be to foment a civil war. The British Tories, not too democratic under any circumstances, will hasten to make their peace with fascism, and peace can only be made—as the history of Germany's smaller and weaker neighbors indicates—by curtailing basic liberties and moving toward totalitarianism. Spain's struggle is democracy's struggle; it is not too much to say that in the mountain fastnesses of Catalonia the destiny of our century is being decided.

Lift the embargo, and strengthen the forces struggling in Britain and France against Munich and surrender. Lift it, and bring aid to masses as desperate as were our Continentals. Lift it, and make possible their victory. The defeat of Hitler and Mussolini in Spain would reverse the whole momentum of events since 1931, and strike a deadly blow at the axis dictatorships. In a world dominated by them Christianity would be a mockery, and history will yet demonstrate to American Catholics that they have been fighting on the wrong side of the fence. The millions of Americans who believe in democracy for Spain as well as for America must take immediate action to counter the barrage of telegrams laid down by Father Coughlin. Wire your Congressman and Senator today. The embargo must go.

The Shape of Things

*

THE PRESIDENT'S DEFENSE PROGRAM MAY seem modest, at least by contrast with the paper schemes which have recently darkened the Washington sky. But there is in reality nothing picayune about a proposal to add another 3,000 planes to our existing total of 3,800 military and naval units and our authorized strength of 5,320 planes. The President does suggest important expenditures on other arms of the services, but he places his main emphasis on aviation, and that is the purpose for which the bulk of the money is required. One searches the message in vain to discover why. Is it just a case of turn about is fair play? Is aviation getting a big hand this year because last year the navy got the limelight and the cash? Or does the most recent Gallup poll provide the explanation? That showed eight out of every ten voters favoring a larger army and navy but nine out of ten plumping for a larger air force. Popular sentiment on this matter has perhaps been unduly affected by the supposed influence of the threat of fascist bombers on the British and French governments in the September crisis. But whatever role inequalities of air power are playing in Europe, no one can contend that this country could be directly menaced by hostile air fleets so long as the navy remained intact. In the present state of the world we do not deny the necessity for armaments in this country or even the probability that considerable additions to our existing defenses may be wise. But we do question the wisdom of letting decisions as to the type of arms we require be influenced by poorly informed popular sentiment.

*

IN TRUE POST-MUNICH STYLE THE JAPANESE press has launched a campaign against the fortification of Guam as part of the American rearmament program. One newspaper declares that "the Japanese people are determined to smash the American fleet" if the project is carried through. In this connection it is important to recall that the fortification of United States possessions in the western Pacific would probably have been carried out fifteen years ago had it not been for the naval-limitation agreement. In this treaty the United States, France, and Great Britain agreed to refrain from building new fortifications within a specified area on the understanding that Japan would abide by the 5-5-3 naval ratios and the provisions of the Nine-Power Pact signed at the same time. These latter, which Secretary Stimson declared to be interrelated and interdependent, obligated Japan to respect the territorial and administrative integrity of China and to preserve the Open Door. Great Britain's firm note to Japan delivered this past week-end points out clearly how far Japan has fallen short of fulfilling its end of the bargain. When Britain abandons its appeasement policy long enough to register a vigorous protest against aggression, it is hardly fitting for the United States to yield to Japan's angry protests. Such an action would destroy all hope of an effective democratic front against aggression in the Far East.

*

SOME THIRTEEN HUNDRED STEP-CHILDREN of King Cotton and the AAA pitched their dreary camps last week along U. S. Routes 60 and 61 in Missouri in one of the most dramatic demonstrations in the long history of Southern poverty. Under the leadership of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, men, women, and children, with their pathetic belongings and ragged clothes, hovered over open fires in winter weather along 150 miles of the public highway in an attempt to show the country the desperate situation of a large sector of Southern farm labor. Their plight is the direct responsibility of the federal government. Landlords unwilling to share with their tenants the benefits paid for acreage reduction have shifted their "hands" from a share-cropping to a day-labor basis; there has also been an increase in mechanization. As a result, within the past two or three years thousands of farm families have been evicted from the tumble-down shacks they once called home. On the plea of protecting the public health, local and state authorities removed the peaceful but stubborn demonstrators from the public view. Some have been returned to their former homes; others are being temporarily housed in public buildings in the section. Meanwhile, landowners are mumbling threats at "agitators" and calling for a federal investigation. The principal agitators in this case are hunger and despair; and certainly a federal investigation by the AAA or the Farm Security Administration or both is in order. The Tenant Farmers' Union is demanding that Congress appropriate $125,000,000 specifically for the relief of Southern farm labor. The present policy of solving the problem by ignoring it can only be disastrous.

*

JERSEY JUSTICE HAS DONE ALL IT CAN TO Joseph Scutellaro. When a jury last week found him guilty of manslaughter in the death of Harry Barck, Overseer of the Poor in Hoboken, the little unemployed carpenter, half-starved, half-dead for that matter, for he is a victim of encephalitis, stared blankly. He was, as he himself had cried out in the course of his trial, "in a fog, where I am lost. I have suffered so in that jail." On a February morning a year ago, when there was no food in his house, when both his children were sick and his wife desperate, Scutellaro went to Barck's office to ask again for relief. Barck said: "If you want money, send your wife out on to Washington Street and tell her to swing her bag." Such advice was not unusual in the case of applicants without political connections. There was a scuffle. When the police arrived they found Barck dead from a wound inflicted by a desk-spindle on which he placed relief rejections. It will never be known exactly what happened. Scutellaro insists that Barck, in attempting to seize him, fell upon the spindle. The Hoboken authorities are mainly interested in drawing the curtain, which the trial momentarily pulled back, over the terrible realities of the lives of men and women on relief in New Jersey. A death sentence would have had the opposite effect. The jury's verdict, carrying a maximum penalty of ten years, has the advantage, for Hoboken, of putting the bewildered little man back behind the bars. He will probably not outlive his sentence.

*

UNLESS GOVERNOR LEHMAN INTERVENES, five poverty-ridden youths from New York's East Side will be executed next week for the murder of a detective in a neighborhood hold-up. Too often such cases are treated as routine elements in the continuing tragedy of slum life; this time public officials, social workers, and lawyers have been stirred to protest. They have not only unveiled several dubious links in the prosecution's case, but have soberly exposed the facts about the miserable environment in which these five youths grew up. Innocent or guilty, the defendants were long ago framed by the slums. We hope that Governor Lehman will grant a commutation of sentence if only to make possible a more conclusive review of the case.

*

THE TROUBLE WITH THE LIMA CONFERENCE, a retrospective survey of which is furnished by Hubert Herring on another page, was that its preliminary build-up was quite out of proportion to its possible achievements. The yawning gulf between expectation and performance encourages cynicism, which can only be strengthened when official spokesmen, such as A. A. Berle, hail the results as "brilliant" and "far-reaching." Secretary Hull, in a statement on his return, referred in exaggerated terms to the magniloquent "Declaration of Lima"—the spacious generalizations of which thinly disguised the impossibility of agreement on a specific policy. Actually, as Mr. Herring suggests, the value of the conference lay not in the resolutions adopted but in the intangible contributions it made to understanding and good-will. In the promotion of the latter Mr. Hull's patent sincerity and high character were undoubtedly factors of importance. The delegates to the conference must have been impressed, as are the great majority of his countrymen, by his patient and hardworking idealism. Nevertheless, we are entitled to ask whether the effectiveness of that idealism would not be increased if it were clarified by a little more realism. It is one thing to accept with good grace the thin harvest of a stony soil. It is something else again to overestimate the value of that harvest, to make believe that everything in the Lima garden was lovely, and to insist that its democratic walls were proof against any serpent of intrigue.

*

CHILE'S NEW POPULAR FRONT GOVERNMENT, whose birth was described by Freda Kirchwey in our last issue, has got off to a flying start with a broad and vigorous reform program. A vast new 500,000,000-peso public-works plan has been announced; another 10,000,000 pesos is to be spent for the care of tubercular patients; and 8,000,000 pesos have been set aside to provide clothing for poor school children. A government low-cost housing program is being prepared; also a plan for distributing bread and meat at low cost to the working class. In order to increase agricultural production an impressive scheme has been devised for colonizing federal land. Freight rates for farm products have been cut by 50 per cent, and interest rates have been abolished on fertilizer loans. As a safeguard against an uprising of reactionaries similar to the Spanish revolt, President Aguirre Cerda has accepted the resignation of seven generals and a large number of other officials, including many of Chile's diplomatic representatives abroad. In addition, fifteen aviation colonels and the commanders of the military school and of all units of the Santiago garrison are slated to retire. No reform government can be safely judged on the basis of the plans announced during its first weeks in office, but at least Chile seems to be profiting by the mistakes made elsewhere.

*

AS THE PRESIDENT OF THE CARNEGIE Endowment for International Peace, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler is a fiery critic of aggressor nations; as president of Columbia University he is fond of inveighing against totalitarian propaganda techniques. How does he reconcile these pronouncements with the role of unofficial social ambassador for Italian Fascist propagandists? From a trustworthy source The Nation has learned that Dr. Butler is now exerting strenuous efforts to brighten the impending visit of Signora Margherita Sarfatti, Mussolini's friend and biographer, whose unscholarly but warm celebration of Il Duce has won her wide recognition in Italy. Among other things Dr. Butler has written to the presidents of numerous colleges urging them to welcome her to their lecture platforms; the Signora, although she is a Jewess, will no doubt recite the recent wonders wrought by Il Duce. While Signora Sarfatti is a distinctly minor menace, Dr. Butler's astigmatism in relation to Italy has assumed major proportions. Several years ago The Nation exposed in detail the Fascist domination of the Casa Italiana on Morningside Heights; but the Casa Italiana remains, and so does Dr. Butler's inability to detect any link between the Rome he serves and the Berlin he deplores. We do not suspect him of anything so contemporary as allegiance to the Fascist program. It is more likely that he has been so loaded with honors by Mussolini that he now instinctively regards any friend of Il Duce's as a friend indeed. We once more insist that he choose between his role as impresario for Italian Fascist agents and his role as guardian of the world's conscience.

*

COLUMNISTS LIPPMANN AND THOMPSON have found a way out—and up. And strangely enough it is President Roosevelt, inventor of all those terrible New Deal methods, who has given them the clue. On January 9 Mr. Lippmann announced that the President's message, naming religion as the source of democracy and international good faith, indicated a "fundamental reorientation in the liberal democratic outlook upon life." It reflected a world trend, he said, and he cited the collapse of the French general strike as one of the happy effects of the reconciliation between the "democratic masses, the army, and the church" in that country. He finally landed on a fleecy cloud far from the troubles of a mundane world. The President's message, he said, "is an event in modern history comparable, so to speak, with the Communist Manifesto of 1848. For in that manifesto there were anticipated and propounded the principal ideas which have been dissolving the structure of Western society. This message contains within it . . . the outline of that reconstruction in their moral philosophy which the democracies must undertake if they are to survive." The very next day Dorothy Thompson flew up to join him. In a column entitled Thoughts After Lippmann—and Roosevelt, she said she couldn't understand why this aspect of the message had not struck her more forcibly. "And I think," she said modestly, "that the reason is that I have been living with this conception so long that I have come to take it for granted." It will be hard, substituting Frank Buchman for Karl Marx, "God-control" for the class struggle. But Lord and Lady Atlas have spoken, and we know how futile it is for him who is without syndicates to cast the first stone—or even a whole shower of mere economic facts.

*

HERBERT HOOVER HAS ADDED HIS VOICE to the plea of forty-nine prominent Protestant and Catholic clergymen that Congress take steps to make possible the entrance, outside the present quota limits, of German refugee children. Great Britain, Holland, and various other European countries have already given hospitality to thousands. America can well afford to admit from 10,000 to 20,000 of these innocent victims, especially since funds for their care are assured.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRAR
Burlingame, Cal

W PA and Wall Street

WHOOPED on by a large section of the press, the tories in Congress have bravely demonstrated, at the expense of the unemployed, their independence of the President. Disregarding the testimony of Colonel F. C. Harrington, WPA administrator, in support of the budget proposal, disregarding the case for a somewhat larger amount effectively presented by Mr. LaGuardia for the United States Conference of Mayors, the Appropriations Committee recommended the provision of $725,000,000 to carry the WPA through the next five months. This figure was adopted after a debate in which a handful of progressives strove in vain to hold back the reactionary tide.

It is worth noting that for all their boldness the triumphant tories took certain precautions. The original suggestion of Mr. Woodrum, chairman of the Appropriations Committee, that $500,000,000 would be ample was conveniently forgotten after it had served the purpose of establishing its author as a stout enemy of extravagance. Careful measures were also adopted to insure that no record vote was taken on the cut. A good many of the economizers found their courage unequal to letting their constituents know what they were up to. As a final attempt to cover up, the story is being assiduously circulated that Mr. Roosevelt purposely inflated his estimate knowing that Congres would reduce it and thus incur the odium of a reduction in WPA rolls which was in any case inevitable.

The weak point about this yarn is that, as The Nation pointed out last week, the President's request for $875,000,000 was too meager rather than too generous. The substituted figure, as the Appropriations Committee itself reported, means an average of 2,377,000 on the rolls in the five-month period. The committee suggested that the present number, which is around 3,000,000, could be brought down to 2,800,000 in February and the load progressively reduced to 2,000,000 by June. It failed to inquire whether in this period private industry was likely to produce a million new jobs, contenting itself with a WPA estimate that this possibility existed.

It is worth noting that in the past six months, while industrial production has been rapidly mounting, only a million workers have been reemployed in private industry. Moreover, the tempo of recovery shows signs of lagging. The proposed sharp reduction in WPA expenditure will quickly make itself felt and will serve as a new brake. It is significant that, despite the ideological support Wall Street gives to federal economy, the Stock Exchange signalized the emergence of a Congressional revolt against the budget by a pronounced slump. We fear that on this occasion the market's claim to be a reliable barometer may prove well founded.

Mussolini Stands Pat

AS FAR as anyone has been able to discover, Prime Minister Chamberlain accomplished nothing during his visit to Rome. For this the world can be profoundly thankful. Chamberlain's failures, as opposed to such successes as Munich, have the merit of at least delaying the disintegration of Europe. Since Chamberlain has claimed no gain for peace from his meeting with Mussolini, it is reasonable to suppose that he gave nothing of vital importance away. Another milestone has been passed apparently without the granting of belligerent rights to the Spanish Insurgents. This important result was achieved, we happen to know, not because Chamberlain has modified his appeasement policy, but because his plans to make this concession were blocked by the pressure of public opinion in London and Paris.

Although he failed to gain a victory of Berchtesgaden-Munich proportions, Mussolini doubtless looks back upon the Rome conversations with considerable satisfaction. He made no promises regarding Tunisia or his other demands upon France. Plans are reported to have been drawn up after the conference to give Italy free port privileges in Djibouti and Zeila, the one in French, the other in British Somaliland. Talk of a British loan to Italy, either directly, or indirectly through a loan to Franco, has been revived. But Mussolini's primary victory was scored with respect to Spain. Chamberlain apparently brought no pressure on Mussolini to compel him to live up to the sections in the Anglo-Italian pact on the withdrawal of Italian troops. Moreover, Il Duce completely outmaneuvered France in threatening serious complications if French help were sent to the Loyalists. Thus Mussolini has obtained Chamberlain's tacit approval of a situation in which Italy, and Italy alone, is privileged to intervene in the Spanish civil war.

This fact, coupled with the loss of Tarragona, places the Spanish government in a most perilous position. The Loyalists are desperately in need of munitions to counteract the steady flow of material help to Franco. Without such aid, the best that can be hoped for is a long back-to-the-wall struggle ending in final defeat. France is in a position to furnish this aid promptly and effectively, but it is unlikely to do so as long as the present government remains in power. The Soviet Union is far away, and has heavy commitments to China. The United States, like France, seems to have given hostages to Chamberlain, and more especially to the Catholic church. The democratic world will have its eyes fixed anxiously on Catalonia during the coming weeks. But the fate of Spain will not be determined in Barcelona, where the Spanish government is doing all that is humanly possible, but in Paris and Washington, where popular will is at the moment being thwarted.

The Catholic Church and "The Nation"

DEAR SIRS: In your issue of January 7 you cite on your annual "honor roll," as you qaintly describe it, "The Editors of the Commonweal, Catholic weekly, for giving expression to the democratic loyalties of rank-and-file American Catholics." As one whose name appears on the editorial page of the Commonweal, as its founder, and now as its "special editor" although no longer actively associated with its direction, I must promptly and firmly decline what you no doubt quite sincerely deem to be an honor, and request you, in the interest of fair journalism, to acquaint your readers with that fact by publishing this letter.

My main reason is the conclusion I feel compelled to draw after studying what you say about the Commonweal, the Catholic church, and the hierarchy of the church in the same number of The Nation. These remarks, to which I shall allude below, are similar in import to many others which you have published at other times. They seem to me to bear concurrent and consistent evidence of a policy which The Nation and other "left-wing" publications, organizations, and individuals, notably the Communists but including also those who without being members of that party are nevertheless willing to be allied with its policy, are now acting upon: namely, to do all you possibly can to separate American lay Catholics from their bishops. The latter, which means the church itself, for without the bishops there could be no such entity as the Catholic church, you condemn in season and out. You insinuate and assert that they, and as a consequence the church, are "reactionary," anti-democratic, allied with fascism. For example, on page 25, in your editorial, Father Coughlin and the Church, you say: "Mr. Roosevelt is the only one among the statesmen of the West to raise his voice firmly against Hitlerism, a movement profoundly anti-Catholic and anti-Christian, yet it is no secret that most of the American Catholic hierarchy is opposed to him and did their best in 1936 to spread the impression that he was 'communistic.' " What a wholly preposterous accusation! How could you possibly support it—not to say reasonably prove it, for that would be impossible? Long before President Roosevelt had spoken out against Hitlerism, the Pope, who is a statesman as well as an ecclesiastic, had condemned the root evils of Hitlerism. Are you maintaining that the American hierarchy—so many of whom had spoken out against Hitlerism before Mr. Roosevelt did—don't know or don't care about what the Pope thinks and says about the heresy of racialism and the fundamental wrongness of all forms of the absolute state, or the absolute race, or the absolute party, or class, or church, and are so "reactionary" that they oppose the Pope as well as the President?

In another place in The Nation, page 21, in commenting upon the article by the Reverend William C. Kernan you very properly commend its author for offering documentary proof for his assertions that Father Coughlin made gross misstatements of fact in the radio speeches in which, according to you, Father Coughlin "attempted to pin on the Jews the responsibility for communism." As a matter of fact, Father Coughlin did not do that in the speeches I heard; he accused "atheistic Jews" and exempted others. I bear no lance for Father Coughlin's latest speeches, much as I have honored him for his efforts to promote social justice; for I agree with Monsignor Ryan as to the harmfulness of Father Coughlin's methods. And these are the same bad methods which you, the editors of The Nation, employ against the Catholic church and its hierarchy, or at least "most of the American Catholic hierarchy," to use your words exactly. You offer no proof, documentary or logical or of any other sort. You appeal to prejudice solely. You spread suspicion and distrust and hatred of the leaders of the Catholic church in this country, while by praising and publicizing individual Catholics, laymen or priests, occasionally even a bishop, for some utterance or other that you approve of, and by constant references to "liberal" or "progressive" or "democratic" Catholic individuals, you do your best—or, rather, your worst—to drive a wedge between the bishops and the leaders, or the masses, of the laity. If a bishop says or does something that seems to you opposed to the common good in government, in social relations, or in cultural concerns—or a group of bishops, or all the bishops—of course you as journalists should say so, and attack what is said or done. But you should offer documentary or readily accessible evidence or proof of your statements. You should not offer mere suppositions if you expect to be considered jounalists acting up to what ought to be the canons of honor and responsibility of a free press, and therefore entitled to dispense honors in journalism to others. I for one do not believe that in your treatment of the bishops of my church you have observed the canons of honorable journalism. I may add that few journalists now practicing in this country, whether they are Catholics or not, no matter what religious belief, if any, they may hold, have more often publicly written and spoken in opposition to Hitlerism and all other forms of government or philosophy which deny human liberty than myself. I don't say that I have exerted much influence—Catholic journalists generally don't; but for what it was worth I spoke out my conviction, which was taught to me by my church, specifically by those who are teachers in my church, the bishops, and more specifically by the bishops in my own country, the United States. I know, if The Nation does not, what the doctrinal instructions of all our bishops from Carroll on have taught American citizens. So do American Catholics generally. So do an ever-increasing number of American non-Catholic citizens. I advise The Nation to give up tactics which have failed during twenty centuries and show no signs of permanent success; although, as in Mexico, Spain, Austria, and elsewhere, they may cause temporary trouble and spill innocent blood.

Westport, Conn., January 9 MICHAEL WILLIAMS

We are pleased to print the foregoing letter from Michael Williams because it affords us the opportunity of setting forth our attitude toward the role of the Catholic church in social and political affairs.

Chief among Mr. Williams's accusations is the charge that we are trying to "separate American lay Catholics from their bishops," that is, from the church itself. It seems to us that when high Catholic officials make statements or take actions which we consider it our function to oppose, three alternatives are open to us: First, we can maintain a complete silence, on the theory that in this way religious dissension may be avoided. Mr. Williams is too honest a journalist to overlook the cowardice and the dangers in such a course. Or, second, we can condemn the church as a whole and Catholicism generally because the policies laid down by certain bishops and priests seem to us to be a disservice to democracy and an invitation to fascism. This kind of all-or-nothing treatment we consider sheer poison. It is of a piece with the anti-Semitism which condemns all Jews because those who are not positively "bad" are guilty of failing to suppress those who are. We oppose this totalitarian approach precisely because we are not anti-Catholic.

What course, then, is left to us but this: to distinguish between those Catholic officials and laymen whom we consider to be enemies of democracy and those who are its defenders, to condemn specific offenses, while making it clear beyond doubt that we are not attacking the body of Catholic laity or the church as a religious institution?

Yet it is exactly this policy that Mr. Williams condemns as cunningly designed to "drive a wedge" between the bishops and the laity. With something less than Christian charity he suspects that any tribute we pay to a Catholic is a devious maneuver, and he doesn't like the way we refer to this or that Catholic as "progressive" or "liberal" or "democratic." What bothers him is the application of these words to "Catholic individuals" rather than to the church as a whole. Here again he would have us make a total approach. He can't believe that we honestly think the Commonweal has done a conspicuous service to democracy in 1938 while the Catholic church, working through its bishops, has not.

Mr. Williams feels that we have been unfair to the bishops of his church. The Pope, he says condemned Hitlerism even before President Roosevelt lifted his voice against the recent pogroms, and he wants to know whether we believe the "American hierarchy" to be so reactionary that it opposes the Pope. We believe that the Pope's stand on racism has been magnificent (we said so in the very editorial which Mr. Williams cites), and we know that many Catholic prelates have been as outspoken in their condemnation of the Nazis as he has. But need we point out to Mr. Williams that bishop after bishop, priest after priest, has used the persecution of minorities in Germany as a basis for making the most calculatingly fraudulent comparison in recent history—that false and unscrupulous parallel between the fate of the Jews in Germany and that of the Catholics in Spain? Here is one of those gargantuan distortions which seem so obviously false that no one bothers to straighten them out until they have an unbreakable hold on the public mind. Germany is a country at peace; Spain is a country in the midst of war. In Germany the Jews are persecuted and put to death solely because by chance of birth they are Jews, regardless of their political or religious beliefs; in Spain Catholics are persecuted by other Catholics because they are ranged on opposite sides in a social and political struggle. There are priests on both sides, and if those who are on the side of the insurgents are treated just as all other avowed enemies are treated in war time, it may be pointed out that devout Catholic Basques —priests as well as laymen—are not treated otherwise by the forces of General Franco. Yet it is on the basis of such deceptive comparisons that the Catholic church is waging the fight to maintain the Spanish embargo discussed elsewhere in these pages.

When Mr. Williams accuses us of bishop-baiting, let him recall Cardinal O'Connell's defense of fascism as a "wall of defense" against communism in Europe; let him remember also that worthy's bland justification of Franco's terroristic bombing of Barcelona; let him explain the scurrilous insolence with which Archbishop Curley rejected an invitation to visit Loyalist Spain as "base fraudulent trickery" and an invitation to murder; and finally let him explain why the superiors of the noisome Coughlin permit him to preach race hate as a priest of the Catholic church. The list could be sadly lengthened.

We fully believe Mr. Williams when he tells us that he learned from the church the doctrines of freedom and human dignity which he preaches. But there are many ministers of his church who, if they learned those doctrines, certainly do not preach them. These we regard as enemies of everything we value, and, cloth or no cloth, we intend to go on fighting them.—EDITORS THE NATION.

What Happened at Lima

BY HUBERT HERRING

Lima, Peru, January 1

THE Eighth Pan-American Conference has adjourned; the delegates from the twenty-one free and sovereign republics have packed and departed; the halls of the Peruvian Congress can again be closed to gather dust—as they have been closed during the past three years of President Benavides's rule; and the bystander can now pause and ask exactly what happened at Lima in December, 1938.

The obvious answer is: Not much. To which the rejoinder is: What did you expect? As a matter of fact, a lot of people in the United States expected a great deal. They had been fed scare stories about the Germans and the Japs, they had listened to Mr. Roosevelt's proposals for continental solidarity, and they half-expected that when the representatives of twenty-one republics assembled in Lima the Latin Americans would put their trembling fingers in the great firm hand of Uncle Sam, and then with one accord all Americans would say big brave words to the Führer, the Duce, and the Son of Heaven. The conference was overadvertised.

Inter-American conferences belong in the realm of faith. Ever since Simon Bolivar first brooded upon his vision of an American Continental Congress, there has been no lack of other dreamers who would resolve the dislikes and the suspicions of the New World around the conference table. If Bolivar's Panama conference in 1826 did nothing more than lift a new banner, it at least served that purpose. So, indeed, have the eight pan-American conferences which have met at various intervals since 1889.

The importance attached to the recent conference in Lima by the different nations is indicated by the caliber of the delegates which they sent to represent them. Some nations deliberately played up the conference by sending strong delegations, representative of the best thought of their respective countries. This was true of Chile, Mexico, Colombia, and of some of the lesser republics. It was true of Brazil, whose delegation was headed by the able Mello Franco. Some did not do so well. It was noticeable that Argentina's delegation was quite undistinguished.

To judge from the speeches made by Messrs. Roosevelt, Hull, and Welles, the United States took Lima very seriously and expected great things from it. But no sober witness would know it from Mr. Roosevelt's selections for the American delegation. The members were seemingly picked to convince the American electorate. Mr. Alf Landon of Kansas was on hand, a little hazy on Latin American affairs but pleasant, and delighted to read the little speeches which others wrote for him. Professor Charles G. Fenwick, teacher of international law at Bryn Mawr, had done good work at Buenos Aires and was reappointed, to the gratification of his fellow-Catholics and to the joy of believers in concord. The Reverend Mr. O'Hara, president of a Catholic college, furnished further cheer to American Catholics and was given a continuous ovation by the Peruvian hierarchy. All agreed that Mr. O'Hara was an agreeable man, even though some suggested in hotel lobbies that Roman Catholicism had better be wary in urging uniformed churchmen upon official American delegations. Labor was present, with Dan Tracy of the Electricians to represent the A. F. of L., and Kathryn Lewis to represent her father and the C. I. O. American women were represented by Mrs. Musser of Utah. Puerto Rico furnished a member of its Supreme Court, Justice Toro. The State Department furnished a couple of diplomats and a lawyer—also the Assistant Secretary of State, Adolf A. Berle, whose precocity sometimes outruns his perspicacity. The delegation was headed by Cordell Hull, who has done rather more for Pan-Americanism than any other of our statesmen. It was a notably weak delegation, despite the excellent work of Mr. Hull and several of his aides in the State Department.

The chief problem in inter-American cooperation is the relation of the United States to Argentina. Mr. Hull had already done yeoman service in persuading the former Argentine Foreign Minister, Carlos Saavedra Lamas, to play with the United States. In fact, some thought the Secretary of State overpatient in dealing with the matchless Mr. Saavedra Lamas. Thanks to Mr. Hull, the Argentine statesman had won his coveted peace treaty at Montevideo, had been given a free hand in arranging terms in the Chaco war, and at last had been awarded the Nobel peace prize. Even these favors had not persuaded Saavedra Lamas of the desirability of committing Argentine interests to the safekeeping of Washington. This was abundantly evident at Buenos Aires, where he succeeded in wrecking Mr. Hull's finely wrought plan for an inter-American consultative committee.

The agenda at Lima presented many items. But for the United States there was but one goal: Washington hoped for some new assurance that no matter what might happen in the world the Western Hemisphere would stick together against impending confusion. Some gains had been made in the two preceding conferences. At Montevideo the peace pacts had won wider adherence, the reciprocal trade treaties had been given some impetus, and a half-hearted declaration against intervention had been accepted. At Buenos Aires the consultative principle had been launched and gingerly accepted, the pledge against intervention had been strengthened, and a treaty consolidating the peace measures had been adopted. What, then, would come out of Lima? The ambitions of the United States were clear. Washington hoped that the republics of the New World might rouse themselves to the defense of their sovereignty and send a joint warning to the Old World, and that they might strengthen their regional peace machinery.

But at Lima the United States again came into head-on collision with Argentina. And Argentina had the support of some of its neighbors. The reasons for Argentina's recalcitrance are various. First, its economic ties are with Great Britain. Britain has more than two billion dollars invested in Argentina; the United States not more than $700,000,000. Britain buys Argentina's meats and grains; the United States cannot buy them. Some 95 per cent of Argentina's exports are agricultural products, which means that its market is and must be Europe. Argentina will make no commitments which will block trade in time of war. Second, there are psychological forces which hold Argentina back from regional American understandings. One-third of the population is Italian —and those Italians are entering no league directed against their mother country. Third, Argentines give considerable loyalty to the League of Nations, and are proud to have been active in its counsels. Fourth, they feel considerable jealousy and suspicion of the United States. Argentina and the United States are much alike. Argentina is ambitious, resourceful; it has an eye on expansion; it proposes to be the leader of South America, and it resents any proposal which would give the United States a position of leadership. Fifth, Argentina shares the general sense of uncertainty. With war and rumors of war in many parts of the world, it is wary of commitments. It will sign no blank checks. These are among the possible explanations of Argentina's attitude. That British interest, jealous for economic position, or Nazi or Fascist influence was behind it is an unlikely hypothesis.

Brazil, traditionally an ally of the United States, sided with Argentina at Lima. The explanation for this defection is more difficult. In fact, no satisfactory explanation has been found. Of course, President Vargas has established a kind of corporative state, on lines similar to Germany and Italy. Furthermore, Brazil's stake in trade with Germany is growing rapidly. And it is possible that there was definite Nazi influence behind certain Brazilian delegates. This was much discussed at Lima.

Whatever may have been the exact line of Argentina and Brazil, it was abundantly clear that almost all the South Americans felt that the United States overplayed the "menace" of armed attack. Nowhere, except perhaps in Brazil, is there any apprehension. Therefore, when the United States made its bid for more precise consultative machinery and more specific guaranties of solidarity, it faced many varieties of opposition. The final compromise, beaten out after hours of stiff debate behind closed doors, was the Declaration of Lima, one of those glittering documents which mean no more and no less than the several signatories mean.

It starts off with a pious apostrophe which stirs to vulgar laughter: "Considering . . . that the peoples of America have achieved spiritual unity . . . their unshakable will to peace . . . their profound sentiment of humanity and tolerance . . . their absolute adherence to the principles of international law, of the equal sovereignty of states. . . ." And so on. Decency bars footnotes. Then follows the declaration, reaffirming "continental solidarity and their purpose to collaborate in the maintenance of the principles upon which the said solidarity is based." Then comes the decision to defend these principles "against all foreign intervention or activity that may threaten them"; then the promise to make common cause, using the machinery of consultation, but "it is understood that the governments of the American republics will act independently in their individual capacity." Yes, we will all play together, but each will make his own rules. That is the highly advertised Declaration of Lima. The cynic may overdo his scoffing. No matter how empty the statement may be, it was probably worth making. It at least laid the groundwork for later agreements.

Of course, many other things happened at Lima. There was the barbed resolution proposed by the Cubans under which the American republics would have expressly repudiated "all persecution of a collective character because of racial or religious motives." This aroused Brazil, Argentina, and others to protest. They would not call Hitler names—naturally enough, for trade is precious. In heated sessions behind closed doors the North Americans and others argued for the resolution, while the charming Brazilian spokesman, Mrs. Rosalina Müller, made slashing attacks upon it. The result was a delightful compromise in words which said little, but which prevented an open break which might have wrecked the conference.

And there was the battle of the women. For years Miss Doris Stevens had fought to win acceptance of conventions guaranteeing equality to women. These conventions represented the Woman's Party point of view and contemplated the end of all special protective legislation for women. At Lima the American delegation, through one of its auxiliary members, Mrs. Quincy Wright, arranged a campaign to eliminate Miss Stevens and her committee. This was done in a resolution which praised women's rights while at the same time safeguarding the position of those who believe in special legislation.

It would be easy to dismiss the Lima conference as a profitless waste of time and money. Not so fast. In spite of the endless futile talk, there is solid value in a meeting of the representatives of twenty-one nations. They may not understand each other; they may jockey for position; they may indulge in silly speech-making. But a solid residue remains of progress in understanding and of new appreciation. That is the justification for the Pan-American Conference at Lima.

Must Democracy Use Force?

I. PACIFISM MEANS SUICIDE

BY AUREL KOLNAI

EVERYONE who observed closely the evolution of public opinion in Western Europe, particularly in France, during the Czechoslovak crisis will agree that the pressure exercised by the pro-fascist right in favor of surrender would have failed its effect had it not been for the powerful support of left-wing pacifism in its divers varieties. The teachers and other radical intellectuals who were urging the government to avert war at any possible cost (meaning at any cost), the "Committee of Anti-Fascist Vigilance" which declared it preposterous to wage war in order to preserve an "absurd" state like Czechoslovakia, the Socialist leaders who preferred being called agents of Hitler to being "promoters of war" and who "refused to choose between war and servitude"—all these worked more effectively in favor of capitulation than the plutocratic press and its financial backers.

It is of the utmost importance to give this fact due appreciation if we are still unwilling to acquiesce in fascist world hegemony, or are at least desirous of a clear understanding of the factors which bring about its realization. It is not true that "world capitalism" as such engenders world fascism and makes it possible for the fascist powers to subjugate the earth; the truth is that pacifism has every claim to be recognized as an autonomous force in the service of this object. The surrender of democracy does not in any way mean simply that the bourgeoisie abandons democracy to check the emancipation of labor; it also means that the democrats abandon democracy to avert war. The murder of democracy is grafted, as it were, on the suicide of democracy.

Of the manifold aspects of this process I shall point out a few which to me seem particularly obvious and characteristic. We may call them the fetish of peace in general, the belief in the absolute evilness and senselessness of war, the identification of war and fascism, the bogy of "ideological war," the indifference to power on the international plane, and the pseudo-idealistic or pseudo-humanitarian refusal to take account of unpleasant realities. Most of these motives are of "left" origin; an unscrupulous pro-fascist right is only able to exploit them for its own aims because left humanitarianism has largely tinged public opinion in the democratic civilizations far beyond the pales of the actual "left." Reaction mobilizes the unpolitical, inert masses for its own aims—and on grounds largely borrowed from progressive thought. To some of us this may sound very "dialectical." Nevertheless, it is true.

The accusation of being a "war-monger" makes every one of us pale. It disarms all resistance. "Are you, after all, in favor of war?" "Would you, then, have preferred war?" "Are you sorry that peace has been saved? Surely not!" The answer is invariably surrender, express or tacit. It is this interior surrender to the pacifist which guarantees our outward surrender to the fascist. We are also taught to believe unreflectively that "war is never inevitable," that it is always worth while to "save peace in the last moment," that there is no situation in which "negotiations" cannot help. Although the formula "peace at any price" is usually disliked and frequently disclaimed, it is practically the maxim of our conduct. There is no trace of material difference between it and the principle that war is never inevitable. There is, of course, a great psychological difference, which consists in the fact that the so-called radical pacifist has the courage to say honestly what he means, whereas the pacifism under which we are thriving so cheerfully takes great pains to obscure its real significance and to goad us into a false consciousness of having preserved our "honor" and our interests. We are certainly very far from being genuine "idealists," however mistaken; unlike the martyrs of outspoken pacifism, we stumble over the precipice —not war, but destruction without war—like undignified dupes. We have not made up our minds that we shall not resist evil; our faith is that it need not be resisted because, after all, it does not exist. Thus we succumb, not in sacrifice which transcends egoism, but in sheer dishonor and dishonesty, which are morally inferior even to naked egoism.

Herein lies what is most tragic in our annihilation:

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

the moral surrender that completes political surrender, the relative justification which fascism draws from our behavior. The present writer is the last to affirm that no cause is intrinsically good or bad, and that the main thing is whether one stands for a cause keenly, whatever it be; but there is an element of incontestable superiority in standing for something, however evil and barbarous, in comparison with such as are unable to stand for anything. The aggressor despots pursue their objects; they are determined to get what they want. They do not stoop to the imbecile theory that war is a naughty pastime from which well-behaved little statesmen should always refrain; they do not take refuge in the anodyne fiction that war is the result of a deplorable misunderstanding between different groups of respectable liberal citizens which can surely be cleared up before they come to blows. Their government is as savage as it is vile; but, as Mussolini once put it, it is government. The democracies, on the other hand, lead their people not to defeat but to collapse without fighting. In a word, it is not war but peace which seals the doom of liberal civilization.

Day after day it is dinned into our ear that war is the worst of evils, and that to maintain peace must be the supreme aim of our policy. Nonsense; for apart from other objections war and peace do not designate integral conceptions but merely two opposite conditions of society; they are highly important and differ greatly in their desirability, but they do not imply ultimate good or ultimate evil. We could as well believe that it should be the supreme aim in individual life to avoid surgical operations; or that, whatever may happen, men ought never more to jail their fellow-men. It is urged that "war settles nothing"; that ineluctably "war breeds evil"; that whatever the issue may be, "war knows no victors, only losers." The truth, however, is that war has settled many problems in history, as far as there can be such a thing as "final" settlement; that if war breeds evil, peaceful capitulation may—particularly in situations like the present one—breed much fouler evil and in a more definitive way; that if the cause of justice does not always triumph in war, the cause of injustice always triumphs in peace, provided that the men who wield it are determined to war while their antagonists have given clear proof that they are not; that—one is ashamed to insist on such a truism, but unfortunately there is need for it—it does make an enormous difference who wins and who loses the war. The fact that the victorious side also suffers severely in no way impairs the validity of this primitive and self-evident truth. Most of us who are not "litigious-minded" can think of very much more intense and noble pleasures than the one derived from a successful lawsuit. Still, sometimes the only possible course is to engage in one, and to try to come out "victorious."

Then, of course, we are stunned with phrases like these—they are also more or less obligatory in decent society now: "War breeds fascism"; "War and fascism are children of the same spirit"; "We cannot fight an evil by turning its own weapons against it"; "We shall become like them if we fight them." The answer is that we are indeed on the way to becoming like them, not because we fight them but because we do not fight them. The answer is, further, that it is the hallmark of civilized man, not that he is unable to use barbarous weapons, but that he is able to use them in a restrained, governable, exterior, and transitory fashion. If this be impossible, then civilization is impossible except as a momentary whim of nature. If the humanitarian is really bound to be at the mercy of the barbarian, then barbarism is the inescapable law of human life. Or rather I should say it is the invariable characteristic of humanity; for I should call a man who is permeated with automatic mansuetude and unable to differentiate his reactions according to circumstance, to differentiate between his general trend and the temporary exercise of faculties less in tune with his intrinsic ideal of life, as barbarous as a man given over to the lust of cruelty and domination.

Pacifism is only barbarism turned inside out. Its outlook is not only unpractical but degrading; it lays the stress on sweet and sympathetic "states of mind" rather than on moral personality endowed with consciousness, will-power, and responsibility. It is basically fatalistic and mechanistic; thus it accounts for fascism as a "result" of the condition of war. As it happens, none of the existing fascist dictatorships, especially the chief ones, have been born of war; inasmuch as they express from the outset a determination to warlike expansion and the preparation of its means, the primary thing is spiritual decision in this sense and certainly not the technical "exigencies" of war. On the other hand, the Spanish republic has shown no sign as yet of turning fascist, although in fighting against the fascist invader it is certainly subject to the direst technical "necessities" of war. Spain will become fascist, no doubt, when its conquest by the fascist armies will be completed—for it does make a slight difference who "wins" and who "loses" the war. Finally, the assertion that war and fascism spring from the same mentality is pointless, for fascism is a conception of politico-social order while war is an event or condition in society. The insane idea that war is a magnificent condensation and culmination of life or that men at their highest are "essentially soldiers" is indeed pertinent to the fascist spirit; but war as such is not.

"Ideological war" is often considered a peculiarly naughty and indecent thing even by people who are enthusiastic for democracy and against fascism. "Imperialism" and "intervention" of any kind appear to be essentially bad. The fascists, it is true, do not wholly share this opinion; but so much the worse for them.

Not a few socialists profess this view, although they do not condemn civil war. This differentiation in their attitude throws a curious light on their internationalism: it seems that the fascists, better than they, have grasped the reality of interdependence among nations and the interrelation between domestic and foreign policy. Yet a correct revolutionist is above all anxious lest he be suspected of "patriotism" and conniving at "home imperialism." The best way to fight German and Italian fascists, he thinks, is to fight British, French, or American capitalists. He is unwilling to realize that if international capitalism today is more or less subservient to fascism, fascism is certainly the more concentrated, more self-subsistent, and more venomous reality of the two, and not at all a mere function or figurehead of capitalism. Nor will the orthodox "leftist" ever accept the sacrilegious idea that there may be a reason why some nations rather than others embark—for a longer or shorter period in history—on anti-humanitarian adventures.

Again, less revolutionary politicians and journalists never tire of assuring us that "totalitarian" and "democratic" states may quite happily and peacefully live side by side with each other. We must wait patiently till the "totalitarians," in their turn, shall equally have appropriated this simple and comfortable truth. Apart from other snags in this argument, it is to be feared that before the "totalitarians" have come to understand the aforesaid truth, no "other side" will be left for peaceful companionship. For the fascists do believe in their faith, and show little disposition to accord an equal footing to a radically hostile faith, the negation of which has been the wellspring and the charter of their very existence. Moreover, their faith happens to inclose the imperative of limitless expansion and relentless increase of power.

We, on the other hand, are hugging the complacent belief that the essence of democracy is compromise; so we book "compromise" with the fascists, of the Munich type for instance, as a triumph not only of peace but even of democracy. We only forget that there is a marked difference between compromise within democracy, which presupposes the common ground of democracy accepted by all the various competing groups of the people, and compromise with the convinced and uncompromising mortal enemies of democracy. We are extremely afraid of tarnishing the immaculate beauty of our democracy by any use of violence or display of intolerance; not, however, of compromising democracy in its integrity.

[Mr. Kolnai's article represents the extreme anti-pacifist position in a symposium of views on the question of the necessity of force in the preservation of democracy. What might be described as a centrist view will be advanced in our next issue by Reinhold Niebuhr, to be followed by the arguments for peace at any price as expounded by Bertrand Russell.]

Three Southern Towns

III. KINGSPORT: THEY PLANNED IT

BY WILLSON WHITMAN

MOST Southern towns just grew, but in the Tennessee Valley is a town that is supposed to show you what American business can do when it turns its hand to civic planning. Kingsport, Tennessee, was "deliberately planned for a city of industrial efficiency, civic beauty, and human happiness."

The quotation is from "Kingsport, a Romance of Industry," first published in 1928 and still to be had in abridged form from the Kingsport boosters. The book contains affecting stories of how the romance began. One tells of a visiting financier who expressed curiosity about how the sunbonneted women in the nearby hills made a living. His local informant admitted that this was a problem, but said they might learn to make hosiery, whereupon "the financier was silent for a time, studying. Then the gracious, big-hearted man replied, 'Meet me at eight o'clock in the morning and we will select the site for the hosiery mill.' "

In another tale the visitor is taken to a little school in the hills, and the assembled Anglo-Saxon children are told that this great man from the East has it in his mind to build a big factory that will bring the blessings of prosperity to Kingsport. A little boy stands up and says, "Please, mister, build your plant here." So the plant was built. This second story was repeated last summer in the Saturday Evening Post, and therefore must be true. It is undisputed that Yankee industry came to Kingsport because of eager, tow-headed boys and women willing to work. Or, in the words of a report to the Labor Board, "One of the chief inducements held out . . . in securing these industries was the plentiful supply of cheap labor." In telling of Kingsport's origins, the report says:

> A certain New York banker named Dennis, with railroad and other interests in northeast Tennessee, conceived the idea of building an industrial city in this section of the country. He enlisted the services of one

> J. Fred Johnson, then a small merchant in Kingsport, which was at that time but a hamlet. Johnson turned out to be a man of unusual vision and salesmanship and soon became and still remains a kind of patron saint of the community.
>
> Dennis, Johnson, and associates formed a corporation called the Kingsport Improvement Company, which purchased practically all the land in what is now the incorporated limits of the city; and beginning in the year 1917 started a real-estate development which resulted in attracting several large manufacturing establishments from the North. . . .

The city fathers have always made much of their planning; planning is all right if the right people do it. In December, 1937, the Nation's Business published an article explaining in detail that Kingsport was a "yardstick" of good planning, by private enterprise, while Norris was an example of bad planning by the government. As the boosters would put it, at the birth of the little city all the good fairies of industry presided. The happy parents were the Clinchfield Railroad and the land company; the fairy godparents were the Eastman Company, the Corning Glass Company, and the Kingsport Press of New York, the Borden and the Holliston mills of Massachusetts, the Mead Fiber Company of Ohio, and the Pennsylvania-Dixie Cement Corporation. Deliberate planning for industrial efficiency meant that these industries were linked together. The paper and cloth used for books turned out by the Kingsport Press are manufactured in Kingsport; the paper mill gets its wood pulp from the Eastman plant, and so on. For the industries the advantage is obvious. For the town the idea is that there shall be no dependence on one employer, as at Tupelo, or even on one industry, as at Huntsville.

As for civic beauty, private enterprise can do well enough with physical planning as long as it is willing to spend money. At Kingsport the money lasted until there had been produced a handsome common with red-brick colonial buildings reminiscent of New England or Virginia, a wide main street, and even an artistic filling station. Civic administration was also carefully planned, with a charter examined and amended by the Bureau of Municipal Research of the Rockefeller Foundation. Could anything more be done to insure that third consideration of the planners, human happiness?

You wouldn't think so to read about beautiful Kingsport or even to look at it if you didn't wander too far from the Inn or Watauga Street, where the well-to-do people live. Of course the Kingsport industries built model houses for their employees; you can read about a Borden mill village where the houses have bathtubs. In 1928 there were sixty-two houses in two Eastman villages —at that time 422 persons were employed in the Eastman plant. Afterward the number of employees grew to five thousand, and of course the owners built a beautiful new plant. They didn't, though, build a new town.

Where do the workers live? In theory they are healthfully established all over the neighboring countryside, on their own little farms, from which they drive to work in their own cars. Actually many of them live crowded together on Long Island in the Holston River, which the early settlers of Kingsport foolishly took away from the Indians. No self-respecting Indian would live there now. But plenty of Kingsport workers do; the island is built over with shacks that would do no credit to a cotton plantation, although they rent for $10 a month. They are worse than plantation shacks to live in, because they are jammed so close together and there are no sewers on the island. The healthful combination of rural and industrial life in this part of Kingsport means that you have rural sanitation with city crowding, and the real miracle is that there has been no typhoid epidemic.

Long Island folk are not pampered with fancy public buildings, either. The beautiful brick churches on the common are for those who live on Watauga Street; if the Long Island people want a church they will have to build one. Their school is a little shack so crowded that the children attend in three shifts.

What's wrong with the Long Island people? Nothing at all. But you remember that low wages were one of the industrial attractions of Kingsport. Of course the Kingsport Press has to pay some skilled workmen, though they can't expect to make what printers get up North; and the Eastman plant has to have technicians for the Ersatz articles it makes out of wood pulp. But the cotton mill, until the wage-hour law went into effect, had the usual $5-to-$15 Southern scale, and plenty of people in the other industries were at that wage level. They couldn't pay much over $10 a month for a house, and so they lived on Long Island.

You don't have much luck buying your own little home, in Kingsport. Of course with the real-estate company behind the town, and brick and cement and lumber among the local products, the authorities would like to see the workers invest and therefore they arrange loans and mortgages; but it always seems to work out that families trying to buy a house end by losing it. Even in Kingsport employment is irregular.

You can't expect, of course, to take the blessings of industry and reject any little discomforts that come, too, such as the pall of cement dust that hangs over Kingsport within a wide radius of the cement works, or the pollution of the Holston River by chemicals dumped by the Eastman plant. These things go along with being what the Labor Board report calls "perhaps the most completely integrated industrial community in America."

If you wonder how the Labor Board came to get a report on this industrial paradise, it must be whispered that there was actually a strike in Kingsport two years ago, in the silk mill that is closed now, and last year the T. W. O. C. called for a hearing on the cotton mill. The complaints were, as usual, intimidation and discharge of workers joining the union, efforts to foster a company union, and so on. But the NLRB examiner considered that the peculiar local conditions had a bearing on the case. He noted that instead of the familiar political bosses, Kingsport had an "oligarchy composed of the 'founding fathers' " working with the industrialists:

> Practically all real estate has been sold by the Kingsport Improvement Company, with suitable restrictions and strict selection to preserve unity and cooperation in the industrial development conceived by the "founding fathers" aforesaid, so that the latter have exercised at all times, and continue to exercise by this and other means, a very real, if not apparent, control of the government and its affairs.

To show how this works out, the Mayor of Kingsport at the time of the hearing was plant superintendent at the cotton mill. Cooperation of this kind is found everywhere, of course, but the careful industrial planning in Kingsport makes it easier to attain. J. Fred Johnson runs Kingsport just as Rex Reed runs Tupelo; only Mr. Johnson does not act for himself alone but as agent for the coordinated industries.

It is true that in the last election a little upset occurred. It seems that odd things can happen about taxes in Kingsport. Perhaps a piece of land is considered a park and not taxed, until the land company has a good offer for it; but you wouldn't expect back taxes to be collected on it then as commercial property, would you? People aren't fussy about such things in Kingsport, but they did get to watching poll taxes, as Southern minorities do, and in the last election a local lawyer who opposed the oligarchy of the founding fathers bought radio time outside the town and told what he found out. So they elected a sheriff that didn't belong, instead of the paper-mill man who was slated for the job. The sheriff's office could stand a little reform because it had had as many as seventy-eight deputies sworn in at one time. But it will take more than one election victory to change Kingsport. With everything owned up North the way it is, about the only hope lies in the intervention of the national government.

Kingsport is probably no worse than many other industrial towns over the country; what lays it open to criticism is its own claim to be a "yardstick." It sets itself up as the industrial ideal; and if it is, there can be but one answer. On a tent in a shanty section where a revival meeting was being held one of the less prosperous citizens of Kingsport lettered this excellent advice: "Ye Must Be Borned Again."

[This is the last of a series of three articles designed to show parallel lines of development in the South of today. The other two, which appeared in the issues of December 31 and January 7, dealt respectively with Tupelo, Mississippi, as an example of a feudal town, and Huntsville, Alabama, as a Northern-owned company town.]

Asia for the Japanese

BY ERNEST O. HAUSER

THE present phase of the Far Eastern war is marked by the incompatibility of two principles—the Open Door and the New Order in Asia. In this conflict Japan does not have to face the armed resistance of Chinese soldiers. It has to turn around to face the violent reaction of Western powers, chiefly the United States and Great Britain, rallying in an eleventh-hour effort to save what is left of their positions in China.

Despite Japanese assertions that the principle of a New Order does not necessarily conflict with foreign vested rights and privileges in China, the ideas behind this principle preclude a compromise. At the bottom of the New Order is the ambitious scheme of an East Asiatic bloc. A study of the political, economic, and cultural facets of this scheme is necessary for an appraisal of Western opportunities in the countries of this bloc.

China, from the Japanese point of view, has been a semi-colonial area, subject to various degrees of exploitation by foreign interests. Technically speaking, this is correct. Ever since the Opium War of 1839 Western powers have scrambled for the spoils of the China market, and privilege after privilege was wrung from the numbed imperial government at Peking. Once Japan was successfully vaccinated with the serum of Western imperialism, it joined the scramble and got its share.

The political basis of these privileges remained relatively flimsy. While the imperial powers succeeded in dividing the entire continent of Africa into colonies, their own jealousy prevented them from doing the same to China. Outright sovereignty was not achieved. Except for the tiny British colony of Hongkong, the complicated legal structures of various "concessions," and the privilege of extraterritoriality, the net result of the entire process was influence. And this influence was the chief security obtained for a tremendous outlay in loans and other investments. Great Britain finally emerged with the largest share of influence.

The new China, coming of age under the leadership of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, looked at the top-heavy edifice of foreign prerogatives with growing apprehension. The semi-colonial status was not willingly accepted. Various diplomatic feelers and authoritative statements on the part of the Chinese government anticipated an early discussion of the problem. There was hope that a frank exchange of opinions among all nations concerned would lead to the abolition of extraterritoriality, and there is little doubt that most of the treaty powers were ready to help China regain its full sovereignty. China, before the outbreak of the war, was on the point of emerging from semi-colonial bondage and becoming a free and powerful nation.

Within less than two years this China has been pushed back into the rough valleys of Szechuan. The puppet governments set up by Japan speak a different language, and discussions with them are hardly likely to succeed. Moreover, the Stimson doctrine of non-recognition, paralleled by similar attitudes of the League powers, prevents diplomatic intercourse with them. What is likely to happen is the monopolization of trade and influence by the Japanese, who wield more actual power in China than any other foreign nation ever did. The pawns and privileges of Western countries, under these circumstances, will become worthless.

But China is devastated and will have to be rebuilt. Reconstruction is expensive. Japan is a poor nation, and the financial losses of this war have brought it to the verge of insolvency. If foreign capital is excluded from the process of reconstruction and development, Japan will have to wait a long time before the conquered country, if, indeed, it will be conquered, can be turned into a profitable enterprise.

This is the point where a compromise with foreign interests suggests itself. Those who rule Japan, with their distrust of orthodox economics and their firm belief in the blessings of totalitarian compulsion, seem to think that Japan could succeed in "colonizing" China even without the assistance of foreign capital. An interesting controversy has developed around this question. Radical elements, especially the army and navy, which are now equally antagonistic toward Great Britain, hold that Western privileges have to be uprooted at once, even if time is lost in developing China's resources.

Moderate elements, particularly the realistic business community and most of the civilian members of the government, think it wiser to appease Western nations by leaving them temporarily in nominal possession of their prerogatives. In return for so much indulgence, their cheerful assistance in various development and reconstruction schemes will be expected. Former Premier Konoye's statement of peace conditions, softly worded, was in line with this program. The idea behind its moderation is hurry: although the present political balance of the world, heavily slanted by the Munich agreement, favors Japan's splendid isolation, a change might occur soon. And Japan wants to have things done in China before that time. A speedy realization of bloc economy requires cash. Thus even radical generals and admirals may be persuaded to tone down their attacks against the West.

It must be borne in mind, however, that this division of opinion concerns a tactical question only. There is full agreement on the principle of wholesale abolition of Western influence. China's semi-colonial status is to be ended, and the new "sovereign" China is to be a member of the East Asia bloc, unconditionally at the mercy of Japan. There will be nothing "semi" about its colonial status. This intention, despite all sugar-coating, excludes equal opportunities (the Open Door) for other nations. If Western powers will be allowed to put up all the money, the Japanese will have all the say. And China's "territorial integrity," the backbone of the Nine-Power Treaty with its Open Door pledge, has become illusory anyway.

Meanwhile an effort is made to fortify the bloc idea with a spiritual program. Inside Japan a new school of thought has arisen which busies itself with the formulation of a cultural policy. Its apostle, Kiyoshi Miki, proclaims as the foremost necessity the creation of a spiritual basis for the bloc. He finds "the spread of right ideas of paramount importance" and speaks, in numerous magazines articles, of the "challenge Japanese culture is confronted with, now that it has started to extend its sphere of influence over the Asiatic continent."

Miki, a young philosopher and writer, is no idle dreamer. The fact that most of the army firebrands are among his followers is proof of the practical implications of his cultural crusade. Miki's slogan, "Japan has to resort to the measure of influencing China by means of ideas," appeals to those elements which believe that communism is the most tangible danger in East Asia. Since China is too big to be watched continuously, the imposition of a positive ideology contrary to communism would come in handy.

In their opinion the ideology of "Nipponism," prevalent among civilian and uniformed fascists within Japan, should be expanded into an Oriental philosophy. General Araki, exponent of Nipponist ideas, in a recent interview with this writer explained that the essence of the "Spirit of Japan" should be applied to the new community of Asiatic nations. This essence is the equality of individuals and their utter insignificance as seen from the top—which is, in Japan, the imperial throne. Japan's totalitarian ideology, in other words, would have to be swallowed by the suavely individualistic Chinese. The fact that the Japanese are ready to add a spoonful of Confucianism ("the common ideological bond") is not likely to make the medicine any sweeter.

It is significant, in this connection, that General Araki continues as Minister of Education in the new Hiranuma Cabinet. The reorientation of Japan's youth along Asiatic lines is an important task. Toshio Shiratori, one of Japan's most brilliant nationalists, now Ambassador to Italy, told this writer that Japan's own revival was of primary importance within the scheme of an Asiatic confederation, and that careful selection of cultural elements not essentially Japanese was imperative. "We can't, of course, discard our battleships," he added, "just because battleships were not invented in Japan."

While there are realistic and influential people in Japan who disapprove of ideological ballyhoo in connection with the China campaign—their protagonist, Mr. Heisuke Sugiyama, has sprung from the once liberal newspaper Asahi—the radicals are likely to be given a free hand. Hence the penetration of conquered China with a totalitarian philosophy, made in Asia but very similar to European brands of fascism, is within reach. Hostility to the democratic ideology with its fundamental respect for the individual is thus to be an outstanding characteristic of the East Asia bloc. Its close relationship with Italy and Germany is likely to be emphasized through an early recognition of "reborn China" by the governments of those countries.

Here is an important step toward the elimination of British, American, and French influence in China. This influence was based to a very large extent on prestige. Japanese propaganda is bent on undermining this prestige. The idea that the world has been unreasonably unicentral and that it should be multicentral draws growing attention in the Japanese press: China, in this new, multicentral world, will be freed from its peripheral position and absorbed by the Asiatic center, the Rising Sun.

Under the impact of its powerful radiation the face of China is changing already. Now, as the guns are becoming silent again, structural changes of first-rate importance emerge from the debris. The pseudo-capitalism which had been created and pampered by Western business interests is disappearing. The compradore class, native go-betweens living on the fat margin of the White Man's going concern, is dying out. The Japanese have no use for them, chiefly because Japanese business is operating without that fat margin, as competition among individual firms is close and quite ruthless. The incipient native capitalism which was growing up independently in China before the war is also faced with extinction as a result of Japanese monopolization. The very groups which were dependent on the White Man, and which in turn furnished the organic link between four hundred million customers and the white trading community, are blasted out of existence.

The diplomatic struggle for the preservation of the Open Door thus shrinks to unimportant proportions compared to developments going on behind the scenes. Even if a compromise should be arrived at, even if the legal foundation of Western privileges—concessions, treaty rights, extraterritoriality—should stay intact, Western influence and Western interests in China are threatened. They are threatened by a purposeful Japanese policy which aims at destroying the narrow basis of Western activities. Political, cultural, and economic campaigns are coordinated and used to undermine the White Man's footholds in Eastern Asia. Radical dreamers in Japan already envisage an Asiatic Asia, with British influence pushed back to the Red Sea, with American influence pushed back to Hawaii.

This country, in its relationships with the Orient, has hardly made imperialism the tenor of its policy. Instead, peaceful commercial intercourse and a large measure of emotional investment—schools, hospitals, missions—have characterized our doings in the Far East. The continuation of these activities requires little more than good-will on the part of our neighbors on the other side of the Pacific Ocean. That the new bloc is to be forced away from a policy of good-will and understanding, that it is to be made to turn its back on an international civilization to which it owes so much—this, aside from the financial losses entailed, is a pity.

Pocket Guide

THE PATMAN BILL

WHAT is going to happen to the Patman bill, labeled "House Resolution No. 1," when it comes up before Congress early in the present session? God knows, but there is nothing to keep us from guessing.

Representative Wright Patman of Texas proposes to drive chain stores out of existence by levying a prohibitive tax which involves higher mathematics when the chain is spread over many states. His bill requires each store in interstate chains to pay a tax of $1,000 multiplied by the number of states in which the chain operates. For instance, if you operated a store in New York City, one in Connecticut, and one in New Jersey, you would have to pay $3,000 annually on each store. If the Patman bill should go through, you would probably close up your Connecticut and New Jersey stores; then you would not have to pay a cent.

But how about the big national chains such as Atlantic and Pacific? The tax on each A. and P. store would run up to $48,000, and the A. and P. system would have to pay the federal government about $500,000,000 a year to do business. The total charge against Sears Roebuck would be $14,000,000 a year.

Mr. Patman's idea is that the bill, if it becomes a law, will help small, independent retailers. Well, let's see about that. Several states already have similar laws taxing chains, though not so heavily. Texas, for example, has had one since 1935. It has caused the A. and P. to close down many stores, but it has done little good to the small independent retailer. Who has benefited? Why, the local chains which own ten or a dozen stores, all in Texas. New York State is big enough for 500 grocery stores, at least, in a centrally controlled system. The Patman bill would not touch them.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The "Freedom of Opportunity League" is a part of Mr. Patman's scheme. It has a pleasant sound, but all it promises is that boys and girls may have a chance to open little neighborhood stores and fail miserably. A similar bit of bait in Germany helped to build up the Nazi Party among small shopkeepers. Department stores and big concerns were to be wiped out. Well, they haven't been.

My guess is that the Patman bill will be defeated in Congress if it ever gets to a vote. But there is strong pressure behind it. The independent retailers are strongly organized and have lots of publicity and lobbyists. One possible reason for the defeat of the bill is that Mr. Patman's name has been mentioned in newspaper stories of the McKesson and Robbins scandal. It is said that Coster paid him to deliver a series of lectures. Mr. Patman says he "made no profit whatsoever from the addresses." But the story will go a long way to defeat his bill.

If the Patman bill is passed, the national chains may go out of business. Or they may reorganize as forty-eight separate state corporations. The statewide chains would become the really powerful group. In the mix-up the cooperatives might find their chance, though of course Mr. Patman has no desire to build them up. Far from it.

Whatever his prospects for success, Mr. Patman's activities have scared the chain stores into hysterical and vociferous public-relations campaigns.

MINORITY NEEDS

In big-scale production the minority group gets no favors. Take men's pajamas. The manufacturers did some research and learned that many men don't wear pajama trousers. They therefore designed and offered for sale a long pajama coat without trousers; this was really the old-fashioned nightshirt in a different form. But there is a minority of men, probably some millions, who would like just the opposite—a pajama suit with one jacket and two pairs of trousers, because pajama trousers wear out more quickly than coats. Big manufacturers figure that they can't afford to bother with this minority.

Among other minority needs that whisper unheard are women's low-heeled dance and dress shoes in patterns as attractive as high-heeled shoes. These are easy to get at $12 and $16 but not at a moderate price.

Years ago all women's corsets were laced in the back. For a number of reasons they became unfashionable. But it is the step-in corset that helps us to get those runs in our stockings. The laced corset stays firmly on the figure, but the step-in doesn't. It pulls the stockings this way and that until a thread breaks. Women could have fewer runs if they went back to laced corsets, but they're not likely to do that. Stout women can still get laced corsets, but if a small woman wants one that looks dainty she has to have it made to order for a minimum price of $12.

I am sure there must be thousands of such minority demands. Perhaps it would be a good idea to make a list of them. A manufacturer might come along who would do something about them. Especially I'd like to call these items to the attention of the cooperatives. HELEN WOODWARD

In the Wind

REPORTS ARE now current that Frances Perkins will be named United States Ambassador to Moscow when Davies's successor is chosen. This possibility is fortified by Washington's conviction that "Fanny" can't end the war between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. The appointment would no doubt have the support of conservatives, who have long urged sending her to Russia—unofficially.

SOME WEEKS ago the Chicago Tribune, which calls itself "the world's greatest newspaper," carried an article sensationally headlined: "C. I. O. Strangles San Francisco; Industries Die." The article "revealed" that because of labor strife "the Chevrolet automobile assembly plant, employing 3,500 men, was moved to Los Angeles." Shortly afterward the Tribune published a note explaining that the Chevrolet plant had never been in San Francisco.

WHEN A. A. BERLE returned from Lima, he, like Cordell Hull, hotly denied reports of "censorship" and "espionage" by Peruvian officials presumably sympathetic to fascism. In publishing Mr. Berle's speech lauding Peruvian hospitality the New York Times made a curious error:

> . . . I might note that the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Peru, Dr. Carlos Concha, is . . . as a matter of face, as friendly to the United States as you can well find.

WASHINGTON REPORTS have suggested that the A. F. of L. fight against Donald Wakefield Smith, NLRB member, stems from a mistake made by President Green at a White House conference, and that the A. F. of L.'s real foe on the board is Edwin S. Smith. This confusion is not restricted to Green. George Meany, New York A. F. of L. leader, recently exclaimed to a group, "We've got to get that man Smith off the board." Asked which Smith he meant, Meany admitted that he wasn't sure.

INSTEAD OF Mrs. Roosevelt's daily column, readers of the Kansas City Star recently read this announcement:

> "MY DAY" IS OUT
>
> "My Day," column by Eleanor Roosevelt, today is omitted from the Star. The column, entirely devoted to a visit Mrs. Roosevelt made yesterday to a reptile farm in Sarasota, Florida, contained no information the Star believes its readers would enjoy reading. The column will be resumed tomorrow.

BOTH RICHARD WHITNEY and F. Donald Coster were members of the New York Yacht Club. At a post-mortem on the Coster affair, one prominent club member privately commented: "It was pretty bad, but not as bad as the Whitney affair. At least Coster didn't steal from the club."

ST. DUNSTAN'S HOSPITAL in London recently reported fourteen new cases of blindness caused by the delayed effects of poison gas—gas used during the last war.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

AT THE risk of repeating something of what the editors of The Nation said last week, I must record my profound gratitude to President Roosevelt for the appointment of Felix Frankfurter. I know of no other appointment of his as courageous and as altogether fitting as this one. Indeed, I think the last three—Frankfurter to the Supreme Court, Murphy to the Attorney Generalship, and Hopkins to the Department of Commerce—are together the most remarkable the President has made since he took office. Two of them have been much misunderstood in certain circles which wish to misunderstand. In appointing these men Mr. Roosevelt therefore renews the hope that he is recovering some of the fighting spirit of the first years of his Administration. Certainly no one can question that all three men tremendously reinforce the liberalism of the Administration.

It is true that so outspoken an opponent of the President as the New York Herald Tribune has warmly approved Mr. Frankfurter's selection, and that up to the time of this writing the only voices raised in protest have been childishly stupid. Still, Frankfurter has been under fire for some time past for having given a great many ideas to the New Deal and supplied many of the men needed to carry it on. To have withheld the appointment on any such grounds would have been the grossest injustice—most of all to the Supreme Court itself. I do not believe that in my lifetime anyone has been appointed to the bench who was better qualified or more truly liberal, and when I say that I am not forgetting Oliver Wendell Holmes and his long previous experience on the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. For two more reasons the Frankfurter appointment was extraordinarily fitting. First, the President could not have found any man in the United States who more nearly embodies in himself the beauty of spirit and the lofty Americanism which characterized the late Justice Cardozo; I think that is the highest compliment that I can pay Felix Frankfurter. Secondly, I have no doubt that the President welcomed the opportunity to appoint Frankfurter just at this time as another answer to the Nazi ideology—excuse me, I should have said mania. It makes me proud of being an American to have our President honor so notable a Jewish-American when even in our own country the abominable tide of anti-Semitism is rising.

The other day my clever friend Victor Ridder heard a man say in a small group: "That proves it. That Frankfurter appointment proves that the Jews own America." Without a moment's hesitation Ridder replied: "I agree with you. And the appointment of Governor Murphy as Attorney General proves that the Catholics own the United States, and that of Harry Hopkins as Secretary of Commerce proves that the Methodists own the United States." That left nothing of the man to whom the retort was directed. Mr. Murphy is a Catholic, and if I mistake not he cherishes a perfectly legitimate desire to be the first Catholic President of the United States. I don't like many things that the Catholic church is doing just now; I think it is digging its own grave in mixing into politics and exercising a censorship in various fields, but I don't think this fact has the slightest bearing upon the fitness of Mr. Murphy's appointment. No one can question his ability and his liberalism, and I want to put it on record that I honor him particularly for the actions which brought down upon him the criticism of all the superficial readers of newspaper headlines and the abuse of the reactionaries and the entire anti-labor crowd of this country.

Of course Governor Murphy could have made a grandstand play against the sitdown strikers that would have made Wall Street and State Street and the Herald Tribune and the Chicago Tribune applaud him without end—it would probably have cost many good American lives, created numerous labor martyrs, and intensified the struggle between capital and labor. He did temporize; he did show great patience which to some seemed great weakness, but if ever a man was justified by the outcome it was Frank Murphy. Today the sitdown strike is a thing of the past. I believe that that particular form of strike will and should be outlawed. But whether I am correct in that or not, I think that Frank Murphy did the right thing.

I am not competent to pass judgment on Mr. Hopkins's administration of relief. That he has made grievous mistakes is plain. He deserves censure for his political speeches when Relief Administrator, and I am inclined to think that the newspapermen who charge him with a grave indiscretion in speaking of relief and then of votes for Roosevelt are pretty near the truth. But I find it hard to believe that he himself approved of corruption of voters. I still hope that he may prove worthy of confirmation. We have had a lot of dumb business men in the Commerce office. It is time that we had a different type of man and a fresh, able, liberal mind on the job, but we don't want another politician there—not even one like Hoover, who as Secretary built up a great political machine in his department.

BOOKS and the ARTS

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame Cal.

Major Eliot on National Defense

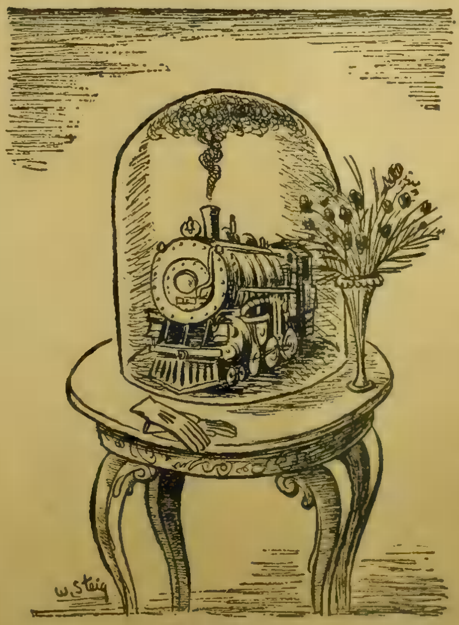
THE RAMPARTS WE WATCH. By George Fielding Eliot. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

MAJOR ELIOT'S new book will, I believe, be quoted freely and frequently during the coming months while America's defense problems are being debated in Congress. It should prove an excellent influence, for even if some of its conclusions are open to question, the general temper of the book is admirable. To a discussion usually carried on in a superheated atmosphere compounded of emotion and ignorance it offers cool appraisal of a well-ordered array of facts.

Neither the extreme pacifist nor the extreme jingo will derive much comfort from Major Eliot. He does not pooh-pooh the possibility of any attack on America; he believes that security can be achieved only by preparedness. On the other hand he is no advocate of a reckless piling up of arms. He thinks America needs a navy second to none, but not one on each ocean. He supports the naval and military air programs passed last year but rejects proposals for an air fleet outnumbering that of any other power. He examines carefully the alarmist theories about the vulnerability of the Panama Canal and concludes that the possibility of its being put out of action in a war is not very great. Nevertheless, conceding that damage or destruction is not entirely out of the question and realizing the vital importance of this link between East and West, he urges the construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

Major Eliot is not one of those military men who are indifferent to civil liberties and regard freedom as merely a good slogan to inspire cannon fodder. He strongly opposes such measures as the May bill, asking: "Why should we go to war to defend freedom if we must begin by destroying it with our own hands?" The advocates of "total militarization" in the event of war base their arguments, he suggests, on the assumption that the next war will be fought under the same conditions and by the same means as the last. But if America makes the navy the spearhead of its defense and resolves not to employ large-scale expeditionary forces, there is no reason why these conditions should recur.

In putting the navy in the center of the picture, Major Eliot makes the good point that a large navy is far less dangerous to domestic liberty than a large army. No admiral with dictatorial ambitions could impose himself on this country through command of the navy; a general disposing of extensive forces strategically placed throughout the land would have a much better chance. The American army ought to be auxiliary to the navy. To perform its functions efficiently it needs better organization but not very much greater man power. In this connection Major Eliot makes an interesting proposal for greater coordination between the regular army and the National Guard, with regiments of the former being brought up to full strength on mobilization by drawing on affiliated units of the latter. As part of this scheme he would like to see the National Guard, which is paid and equipped by the federal government, relieved of local police duties. Some governors, he says in a masterpiece of understatement, have used the guard "for purposes hardly in accordance with the reputation for impartiality and dissociation from politics which is the army's pride."



Book Review
"High Iron" by Lucius Beebe

Major Eliot is well aware of the close relation between defense policy and foreign policy, but he assumes that the latter will continue to be limited to a narrow range of objectives. There are, he suggests, three fixed points determined by public opinion which cannot be overlooked: (1) We will make no covenant with foreign powers which might involve us in a war not of our own making. (2) We will defend the principles of the Monroe Doctrine. (3) We will maintain at least the existing measures of restriction on immigration. Pursuing such aims, America can, it is claimed, follow a strictly naval policy of defense. Like Britain, before the advent of the bomber destroyed its insular security, it can remain immune from attack by maintaining an invincible navy.

At this point Major Eliot might with advantage have followed a little farther the teachings of history. In order to maintain naval predominance Britain always regarded it as essential to uphold the balance of power in Europe. For two centuries it strove to prevent any one nation acquiring the hegemony of the Continent, and toward that end employed a series of diplomatic combinations supplemented on occasion by expeditionary forces and subsidies to allies. The question that has arisen since Munich—this book was evidently completed prior to that momentous agreement—is whether America can contemplate with equanimity the domination of Europe by a potentially hostile power. Major Eliot admits that if Germany's aspirations were realized in Europe its ambitions "would shortly come into conflict with our own." German control of the Azores or Cape Verde Islands or of the bulge of West Africa would, he considers, be a matter of very grave concern. For the first time since 1812 a potential enemy would be able to set up bases within striking distance of America.

So long as Britain and France command the eastern Atlantic, this is but a hypothetical danger. But the possibility that these powers will be either conquered or intimidated cannot any longer be ignored. It may be that Americans should ask themselves whether it would not be wise to insure against this risk. Payment of the premium would not involve a larger armament program than Major Eliot outlines. It would mean rather taking a leaf from Britain's book and supplementing naval policy by the power of the purse and the industrial machine. America has yet to realize that in the long run its economic strength outweighs all other weapons of defense. My most serious criticism of this book is that it has not done all it might to enlighten public opinion in this regard.

KEITH HUTCHISON

From Plains to Salt Water

COWBOY SONGS AND OTHER FRONTIER BALLADS. Collected by John A. Lomax and Alan Lomax. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

SONGS OF AMERICAN SAILORMEN. By Joanna Colcord. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

WHALE SHIPS AND WHALING. By Albert Cook Church. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

SPACIOUSLY designed and with airs given for most of the songs, the new edition of Professor Lomax's classic collection is made for singing, and now includes "Goodby, Old Paint," "The Strawberry Roan," "Quantrell," and others indispensable for a final roundup. A few of the ballads of the earlier collection are unaccountably omitted, but on the whole these are of somewhat inferior quality, with the possible exception of a song which plays variations on that once familiar command, "Root, hog, or die."

Professor Lomax's original collection, published nearly forty years ago, made an opening wedge for the slowly developed argument that we have a native folksong. As it happens, cowboy songs were among the latest of its creations, while others of a far older lineage came much more gradually into recognition, among them the sea shanties which Joanna Colcord gathered a few years back in "Roll and Go" and which she now presents in a greatly enlarged edition in her "Songs of American Sailormen." In this volume we have the first full insistence that Americans have made their own contribution to sea shanties and forecastle songs. Since English shanties have been faithfully collected, and since American sailors undoubtedly took over many English shanties, it has been assumed that our own only followed, somewhat passively, the English tradition.

No one could be better fitted than Miss Colcord to argue the point or to present the evidence to the contrary. A descendant of five generations of deep-water seamen, masters and builders of square-rigged vessels, she knows the materials by a direct line; she spent most of her girlhood at sea on board her father's ship, on China voyages; and her knowledge and affection have led her to a thorough study of special collections of maritime material. She presents a large number of shanties and forecastle songs whose origin is unmistakably American, and others in abundance which show by their themes, their allusions, and their lingo that they were shaped as well as sung by American sailors. Not least interesting are ballads which suggest that some of the New England songs of the lumber shanties were carried out to sea and there somewhat transformed by the sailors who sang them. "Rocks in de Mountains" is obviously a transliteration of a John Henry song, and others were born out of Negro minstrelsy. Throughout, Miss Colcord stresses the infusion of Negro themes, rhythms, choruses from the days when Mobile was a great Southern port. She includes two ballads of Great Lakes shipping, "The Persia's Crew" and the well known "Cruise of the Bigler," but her real province is salt water, a sufficiently large one, and songs popular on sailing ships from Duluth to the Soo, Chicago, and Buffalo await a devotion similar to hers.

Like "Songs of American Sailormen," the volume by Albert Cook Church has grown out of long and habitual knowledge of the sea. Some two hundred photographs have been drawn from Mr. Church's truly vast collection to portray the history of whalers and the complex business of whaling. Some of them are from old wet-plate prints which had to be restored; some of the negatives had to be rebuilt from broken glass; many date back forty years or more. We could wish that half-tones rather than offset had been used for the reproductions, for sharper edge and detail, but the collection is truly an incomparable one, and we may well be grateful for what we have.

Here indeed are ships, some of which were built at the beginning of the last century. The Charles W. Morgan, nearly a hundred years old and shown in many phases, weathered the hurricane of last September, losing some of her planking and most of her copper sheathing but nothing aloft. The main stages of building whaleships are shown, as well as an evolution of types. Try-pots appear in operation. A most engaging group of pictures indicate typical masters, mates, and seamen. Mr. Church builds up climaxes by his pictures, showing whalers hove down for repairs—a truly gargantuan sight—and others breaking up after a wreck, or peacefully homeward bound. The Wanderer and the Morning Star appear in a stately series. Some of the most beautiful of the photographs are of sections of canvas or of geometrical patterns of rigging. The pictures are preceded by a brief, clear history of American whaling.

CONSTANCE ROURKE

Zoology, Illustrated

ANIMALS WITHOUT BACKBONES. By Ralph Buchsbaum. University of Chicago Press. $5.

THERE was a time when the informed public was deeply interested in the biological investigations of the day. I am thinking of the immediate sale and discussion of Darwin's "Origin of Species." Today the layman is much more concerned with the electron and its brethren than with things biological. This is due in part to the lack of good general books in the field, and also to the fact that with the exception of the theory of the gene we have been presented with no big generalizations but rather with a welter of minutiae.

Recently the advent of cheap photographic film—a development which supports Hogben's thesis of the interrelationship of science and economic progress—sent the younger naturalists afield. This book is the first example offered to the public of what is happening in the modern biology classroom. By means of pictures the student is given a much better idea of the panorama of living things than he was likely to acquire from surveying a shelf of preserved specimens.

The book is composed largely of non-technical descriptions of typical animals of the invertebrate kingdom, supported by excellent line drawings and numerous splendid photographs One only wishes that color photography were available for this kind of work. As a general résumé of the anatomy and natural history of the invertebrates, the book is excellent.

It is unfortunate to have to record a major omission, and to probe into its causes. The conspicuous absence of any mention of the fruitfly, Drosophila, from the chapter on insects led to the discovery that neither the fruitfly nor the subject of genetics is mentioned anywhere in the book. From its worldwide use for studies in genetics Drosophila has acquired a special importance in the invertebrate kingdom, and its omission is unpardonable. If the book were primarily concerned with invertebrate anatomy, it might be argued that genetics had no place in it; but it is really an introduction to general zoology based on the invertebrates, and any student or layman opening such a volume should be able to obtain an idea of the simple basic principles of genetics, and of what Drosophila is like. In contrast to the omission of genetics, a whole chapter is devoted to the subject of regeneration, based almost exclusively on the work and theories of Professor Child and his students at the University of Chicago.

This type of sectionalism is unfortunately widespread in the teaching of zoology. In recent years it has reached such proportions that a presumably general course given at one university may include very little of the material given at another. The significance of biological theories and researches is in many quarters subordinated to the status of the biologist responsible for them. "Animals Without Backbones" is written with a fine disregard for research in certain fields done at other places than Chicago. Some persons may point out that similar behavior is to be observed at other universities. This criticism will be correct; and it goes a long way to explain the doldrums in which contemporary American zoology finds itself. Such well-developed prejudices in a young scientist are lamentable, and reflect small credit on his teachers.

There is no permanent separation possible between development and heredity. It is true that in their quest for the elucidation of the gene, Bridges, Muller, Morgan, and Sturtevant deliberately disregarded development for a long time. But the function of the gene in development has to be recognized; and when, as on page 130, the author inquires into the origin of certain developmental mechanisms and ignores heredity as a possible factor, he is limiting the possible fields of investigation and negating the scientific method.

In order to keep alive, zoology has to compete with the other sciences both for financial support and for recruits. The layman of means recognizes this emphasis on personality and this preoccupation with minutiae, and turns aside. The talented recruit avoids a field in which the limits of investigation are defined in terms of local politics. The outlook for zoology, as evidenced by this book, is none too hopeful. With wider use of the camera we may expect better technical exposition and possibly a revival of interest in natural history, but general theory still lags behind instead of leading the way.

HUGH H. DARBY

Fallada Among the Nazis

WOLF AMONG THE WOLVES. By Hans Fallada. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

FALLADA'S first two books, "Peasants, Bosses, and Bombs" (1931) and "Little Man—What Now?" (1932), were works of a vigorous realist. There was a wicked and stupid world and even the good were weak, but there was also sincere sympathy with the little pleasures and the great sorrows of the under-dog. Then came 1933. Nevertheless, in 1934 Fallada published "The World Outside," which was still in the same vein, though in an apologetic preface, omitted in the English edition, he explained that the wickedness portrayed in the book was only possible under the false humanitarianism of the old system and was now happily a thing of the past. In his next book, "Once We Had a Child" (1934) —a boorish book about a boor—Fallada tried to toe the line. Not with full success, it seems, as the preface of "Wolf Among Wolves," also omitted in the English translation, mentions attacks on the score that the central character, a German peasant, was not sufficiently idealized.

Then Fallada fled into fairy tales. Both "Sparrow Farm" (1935) and "An Old Heart Goes A-Journeying" (1936) were certainly inoffensive politically; they were also second-rate literature. They were in fact feeble imitations of E. Th. A. Hoffmann and Jean Paul.

In his latest novel Fallada speaks again with his own voice; again it is the evil world in which brutes and blockheads torture the weak. But the author is forced to speak through the device of the historical novel. More recent experiences may be hidden in the convenient garb of the past. Nowadays, we are instructed in the preface (omitted), all this is remedied, but we should remember it in order "to be twice as happy about our fortunate salvation." I think Fallada does not mean it; his book is not a Nazi book.

The dollar stands at 414,000 marks when the book opens. When the hurly-burly's done—it closes on a hopeful note—the Rentenmark is established. This was to have been the history of the German inflation, but gradually it becomes the story of the reformation of an amiable scapegrace, ex-Second Lieutenant Wolfgang Pagel. After the war, in spite of his respectable parentage, the lieutenant becomes a gambler, but redeems himself by working as a bailiff on an East Prussian manor. His reward: he is allowed to study psychiatry at the University of Berlin and to marry his former mistress, Petra, an occasional street-walker with a pure heart. The child—indispensable to every full-fledged Fallada novel—is born, in this one, behind the scenes. Around Wolfgang Pagel revolves an ambitious panorama of the inflation in town and country, with countless characters and scenes through 724 overcrowded pages. Unfortunately there is never a dull one.

The background is authentic enough. I noticed only a little slip: the play "Finden Sie das Constanze sich richtig verhält?"—the German adaptation of Maugham's "The Constant Wife"—is mentioned as a great success of the year 1923; actually it was not produced in Berlin before 1928. But characters and situations show the German lack of degree and proportion. Fallada's liking for the macabre leads him too often into caricature and melodrama. The necessity of getting all his weird characters into all their weird situations forces him to overwork the mechanism of chance. (Not that I object to chance, but it should be blind; here it is mostly a malignant Argus.)

Nevertheless, there are some excellent bits, and though the book never achieves the compassionate reality of "Little Man, What Now?" though Wolf and Petra never become as real as Pinneberg and Lämmchen, it has merits. It is interesting, certainly a merit in any novel. And it betrays pity for human suffering, which is certainly a merit in a German novel today.

ROBERT VAMBERY

A Catholic in Majorca

A DIARY OF MY TIMES. By Georges Bernanos. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

GEORGES BERNANOS, Catholic, conservative, royalist, does not like the world he sees about him. Particularly he does not like a section which his prejudices might expect to find a paradise—beautiful and pitiful Majorca, where fascist groups under the leadership of an Italian general executed three thousand people in the first seven months of the Spanish civil war. "Let me remind you," he says as he tells of it, "that this tiny island can be crossed in two hours, from one end to the other. So that any inquisitive person with a car, if he took the trouble, could successfully wager that he would witness the blowing-out of fifteen wrong-thinking brains per day. These figures are not unknown to his Lordship the Archbishop of Majorca."

He does not like dictators or liars or cowards. He does not like cruelty dictated from above and turning kindly people into beasts or victims. He does not like perversion of youth under the guise of patriotism—his own son was a member of the Phalanx until the killings sickened him—or the glorifying of brutality under the name of order. He does not like terrorism stalking about to "save Spain" and "save religion." "It is a cruel thing," he says, "when what you were born to love becomes degraded before your eyes."

He says he does not like these and many other manifestations of our times. He says so violently and vividly, in a book of 265 pages that is a fine and fiery piece of sustained invective. He makes no bones about what the state of the world is, or the effect of the Archbishop of Palma "fluttering his august hands" in a blessing over Italian machine-guns. He tells their Catholic Lordships the Spanish hierarchy just what it is that they are letting themselves in for, and he minces no words.

The book is not easy reading. It goes on and on with its high-pitched prose and its sustained indignation. People who like logic, who prefer orderly development, will grow restive under the gusto with which it hurls, and hurdles, contradictions. People who like facts will want to take some of the things he says out from under the way he says them and look at them in a quiet light. But there is no escaping the searing flame of his passionate outcry. And when it is all over, and you have turned out the light and gone to sleep, you will wake up the next day with the feeling of having passed through a healing furnace. For those of us who hate violence, and who are by that very hatred rendered incapable of the violent efforts necessary to stamp it out, there is a certain catharsis in his denunciations. He says what we are obscurely restrained from saying, and we thank him for his white-hot words.

MILDRED ADAMS

Art as Expression

THE PRINCIPLES OF ART. By R. G. Collingwood. Oxford University Press. $4.50.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Collingwood's name may not be known in this country to a very large public, professional students of aesthetics for over thirteen years have known his slender little volume "Outlines of the Philosophy of Art" as one of the ablest presentations of Croce's theory that have been made in the English language. The publication, therefore, of a full-sized treatise by him is to be welcomed. For in spite of the seeming neglect into which Croce has fallen, his theory of art as expression is still widely, though unwittingly, held, even by those who reject the notion of art for art's sake.

Widely accepted as it still is, however, the implications of the theory of art as expression are seldom adequately realized. It is one of the merits of Mr. Collingwood's treatise that he draws them out in their full aggressive starkness, and thus forces us to see what we are committing ourselves to when we accept it. If art is the imaginative expression of emotion, it is an activity which is different in kind from other modes of human activity, and it has no relation to craft or technique. Nor has it anything to do with representation or amusement. What enables us to suppose that craft or technique is somehow connected with art is the distinction we make between form and content or matter. This distinction, Mr. Collingwood argues, is essentially confused and unacceptable. But if art is the expression of emotion, it is a purely inward, spontaneous, imaginative activity, complete when the emotion is felt by anyone to have achieved satisfactory clarification or intelligibility; and it is therefore essentially independent of its "externalization." Again, if art is expression of emotion it has nothing to do with moral or political activity. An artist "with strong political feelings will be to that extent better qualified to produce works of art than one without." But if he is an artist, and not a magician, he will seek to clarify his emotions, not to arouse them in others. What "most of our leading young writers have reverted to" is not art but magic. For magic is not the science of illogical, primitive minds, as we have been taught, but a technique designed to arouse emotions which can be used as motive force in communal activity.

No one who is seriously interested in art will quarrel with the belief that it has little to do with amusement or representation. But anyone who is not an idealist must object radically to the distinction between the creative act and its "externalization" through the material, for mind cannot exist independently of the materials and tools which the human animal handles. Those aware of the lack of consistent principles in current criticism will welcome Mr. Collingwood's efforts to define art, and to distinguish it conceptually from "magic." But few will assume with him that a logical distinction entails an actual separation of the things distinguished. It is possible under unusual conditions to enjoy a "pure" aesthetic experience. But seldom is serious art free of "magical" elements, and when it is, its purity does not guarantee its value in the total human economy. Objections to Mr. Collingwood's position, however, should not obscure the fact that his book faces unambiguously some of the most central difficulties of contemporary aesthetics, and does so under the conviction that aesthetics is not a timeless science but must be relevant to contemporary art. It is the immediate incidence of this book which gives it its challenging and stimulating quality.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

ELISEO VIVAS

Aragon's "Real World"

RESIDENTIAL QUARTER. By Louis Aragon. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

THE years immediately preceding the last World War saw a crisis in European civilization that was nowhere more marked than in France. Today that crisis is attracting the attention of many of the most distinguished novelists of the political Left Bank. To Jules Romains's and Roger Martin du Gard's and L. F. Céline's recent cyclic novels, which bring us up to the events of 1914, must now be added Louis Aragon's "Real World," of which the second instalment has just appeared in English. Whereas the authors of "Men of Good Will" and "The Thibaults" had reached manhood before the war, MM. Aragon and Céline had not yet done their military service, and it is fitting that in their novels we should view the oncoming catastrophe through adolescent eyes. Nor is it surprising if their vision is slightly blurred. In addition, their lack of maturity, even today, may explain why their message suffers from being too obvious.

M. Céline's record is the only frankly autobiographical one, for Louis Aragon has shared his own experiences between the two Barbentane brothers. Edmond, a free-thinker and realist from childhood, abandons the study of medicine for gambling, blackmail, and the career of a super-gigolo. Armand, always an idealist, undergoes a series of disillusionments as he gives up his double preparation for the priesthood and strike-breaking to become a Socialist and day laborer. One might think that there would be some point at which these two careers would cross, but the poignant meeting of the two in Paris after Armand has run away from home proves the impossibility of mutual sympathy. In fact, the Edmond-Armand antithesis turns out to be a factitious and flimsy thread on which to hang a novel, though it does offer an excuse for the fashionable multiple-plot composition. Too obvious and repetitious, likewise, are the constant satire of the middle class and corresponding defense of the masses. The truth is that M. Aragon has sacrificed everything to accomplishing those ends. Lacking in any real atmosphere, the novel is peopled with puppets.

There is no need to know that M. Aragon is an editor of l'Humanité and Commune to hear the voice of the militant

RADIO-PHONOGRAPHS

Which ones are "Best Buys"? Which are unsatisfactory?

A good radio-phonograph combination is an expensive proposition. Before spending your money for one, make sure you're going to get good value.

To help you in getting good value Consumers Union has tested 16 models of radio-phonographs and has rated them by name for tone quality, faithfulness of reproduction (both for radio and for records), and other factors.

You'll find the results of this test in the January issue of Consumers Union Reports. You'll also find results of tests and ratings of ready-built record players and record player parts and some data on needles.

This report, by pointing out which instruments may be expected to perform more satisfactorily than other instruments of the same general type in the same general price range, may easily save you a considerable sum on the purchase of a radio-phonograph and help you get the high quality which music lovers want in such an instrument.

Other reports in this issue give valuable buying data on HAIR DYES, muslin and percale SHEETS, industrial LIFE INSURANCE, DRY CLEANING FLUIDS and other products.

CONSUMERS UNION OF U. S., INC.

Even casual use of the buying information supplied in the January issue of Consumers Union Reports may save you several times the cost of subscription to this magazine and help you steer clear of worthless or dangerous products. If one issue can do this, think of what twelve will do for you! Mail the coupon below today! We'll immediately send you the January issue. In April you will receive without extra charge the 1939 Buying Guide—a pocket-size handbook rating by brand name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable," most of the products you buy.

To CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.
17 Union Square W., New York, N. Y.

Send me Consumers Union Reports for one year and the 1939 Buying Guide when it appears. I enclose $3. I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Name ....

Address.. 1N9

1779 1939

"A SONG ABOUT AMERICA"

A Musical Play by Hoffman Hays

MONDAY · JANUARY 23RD

LENIN MEMORIAL

MADISON SQ. GARDEN

Speakers

WILLIAM Z. FOSTER • JAMES W. FORD
ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN
ISRAEL AMTER

Auspices

NEW YORK STATE COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY

Admission $1.65, $1.10, 65c, 25c

Tickets at Workers Book Store, 50 East 13th St

WHAT DOES THE FUTURE HOLD?

CAPITALISM
FASCISM
COMMUNISM
SOCIALISM

WHICH?

- History of Socialism
- Introduction to Socialism
- "Isms" in the American Labor Movement
- Communism, Fascism, Social Democracy
- Also Advanced Courses

FREE COURSES
Start JAN. 23 & 25

RAND SCHOOL 7 E. 15 St. AL 4-3094

ASK FOR BULLETIN NS-1

Next Week in The Nation

ELIOT JANEWAY on

America in the Post-Munich World

in "Residential Quarter," nor is it necessary to be informed of his early affiliation with the Dadaist movement to sense a certain resemblance to Cloud-Cuckoo Land in his "Real World." He has not entirely lost, either, his early obsession with the erotic. There are those who would contest the translator's assertion in the introduction that M. Aragon is easily more gifted than Jean Cocteau or Jean Giraudoux. The same readers will reproach the translation for its marks of carelessness.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

An Indian's Memories

SON OF OLD MAN HAT: A NAVAJO AUTOBIOGRAPHY. Recorded by Walter Dyk. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE influence of a definitely patterned culture upon persons is best revealed by studies of the individual in relation to a simpler society than our own. This autobiography of a Navajo, like Paul Radin's shorter but fine Winnebago autobiography, "Crashing Thunder," shows the cultural patterns of a primitive society in operation upon an individual. It is a transcript, completely unromanticized, of an Indian's memories of his childhood and young manhood, and these memories prove that in an integrated culture like the Navajo, the individual and social concerns of a young boy are the same. Not that the individual is suppressed—his observations are often unique and, to us, poetic—but the Son of Old Man Hat never thought of his ego as separate from its extension in the lives of his family and tribe or from its functioning in the culture of a nomadic, sheep-herding people. This Navajo resolves without effort all conflicts between the personal and the social. The book will interest readers who find more analytical anthropological studies of primitive cultures confusing, for here Indian psychology is shown as growing out of a society.

An autobiography offers always an excellent field for the examination of individual maladjustments. This serene Navajo's memories of companionship and loneliness, of how he came to recognize death as part of life, of his acceptance, as an adolescent, of awareness of sex as a normal experience, prove that individuality exists untroubled in a culture which does not deny but trains it.

EDA LOU WALTON

DRAMA

Two Hits

"THE WHITE STEED" (Cort Theater) is by the Irish schoolmaster, Paul Vincent Carroll, whose "Shadow and Substance" was so widely admired last season. The chances are that the new play will enjoy an even greater success, for though the theme is much the same, the terms in which it is stated are considerably more familiar to an average audience. Last year the conflict between ecclesiastical bigotry on the one hand and loving faith on the other was presented in the guise of a conflict between a proud canon who fancied himself in the role of an Italian prince of the church and a simple servant girl who was almost a saint; this year the same conflict appears as a struggle between a tolerant old shepherd of his flock and the puritanical young tyrant who is sent to replace him. If the two devices are, in the abstract, equally satisfactory, the second is likely to be more immediately understandable to an American audience, which has had little direct experience with either princes of the church or saintly servant girls but does know the genus reformer both as an actual person and as a villain in popular literature. "Shadow and Substance" seemed theatrically impressive but a little remote; Father Shaughnessy and his Morals Committee are easily recognized as equivalents of our own Purity Leagues.

…RLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY … Cal.

In Ireland, at least, the new play is also bound to seem much more of a pamphlet than "Shadow and Substance" was. Its anti-clerical—though not anti-Catholic—tone is bitterer as well as more downright, there are a number of polemical passages in defense of secular government, and there are also various satirical references to the Irish habit of blaming everything on England which are obvious invitations for a shower of vegetables in the best tradition of the Abbey Theater. None of these things is directly relevant in America, but what remains is an obviously heart-warming tale of snoopers defeated and the triumph of tolerance in the persons of both the rebellious heroine and the humane priest. The fact that the issue is presented in terms which are neither very new nor very subtle is no disadvantage in the case of a play whose appeal is obviously to familiar sentiments. The audience is not left for a moment in doubt concerning which side it is on, and it is disappointed in none of its emotional expectations.

In view of the fact that there seems to be some disposition to accept the author as the latest in the succession of Irish dramatists, it might be just as well to go on record with the opinion that, charming and effective writer though he is, Mr. Carroll is no John Millington Synge and no Shean O'Casey, but an amiable and facile popular dramatist whose gift for humor and eloquence of a typically Gaelic sort he finds it all the easier to exploit because his convictions and his enthusiasms are simple and readily accepted. Thanks to a certain naivete—both intellectual and emotional—which is obviously his, he can state with all the passion of a newly discovered conviction propositions which a profounder man would find it more difficult to get excited about, and in all sincerity devise theatrical situations which would be bound to arouse the suspicions of a more sophisticated mind. But that they are effective as theater there can be no doubt, and there is nothing surprising in the fact that an audience which has been led along well-worn paths to hate a meddler should feel very happy when he is disposed of by a miracle—which may be a miracle of the Holy Virgin and may be a miracle of the will. At the proper moment the paralyzed priest rises to his feet and the career of his successor is abruptly terminated. Richard is himself again. The present production is admirable, with George Coulouris as the villain, Barry Fitzgerald (formerly of the Abbey Players) richly Irish as the paralyzed priest, and Jessica Tandy as Nora, the young girl who can't be browbeaten. Liam Redmond is also excellent as the frightened young schoolmaster whose final determina-

THE RAND SCHOOL OFFERS COURSES IN

GOVERNMENT, Dr. Harvey Pinney
Mon. 7:00
THE MOTION PICTURE. Dr. Richard R. Plant
Mon. 8:30
ECONOMICS. Dr. Samuel Stein
Tues. 6:00
HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY, Dr. Mordecai Grossman
Tues. 8:30
MASTERWORKS OF OPERA. Adele T. Katz.
Tues. 8:30
MARXISM SINCE MARX. Algernon Lee
Wed. 7:00
APPRECIATION OF LITERATURE. Elias L. Tartak
Wed. 8:30
PSYCHOANALYSIS. Dr. Theodor Reik
Thurs. 7:00
FORUM. Elias L. Tartak, Chairman
Thurs. 8:30

• ENROLL NOW •
FEE FOR 14 WEEKS — $4.50
(Single Admission, 50c)

40 Other Courses
Send for Bulletin N-1
Term Starts
Week of January 23

RAND SCHOOL, 7 E. 15th St., N. Y. - AL 4-3094

2nd Annual Dance for Spain
MECCA TEMPLE
133 West 55th St.
SAT. & SUN. Eves at 8:15 Feb 4th & 5th
ARGENTINITA and her Spanish Ensemble
Maria GAMBARELLI
Doris HUMPHREY — Chas. WEIDMAN and Dance Group
Juan MARTINEZ & ANTONITA HAL LEROY TAMIRIS
ANNA SOKOLOW and Dance Unit EDWIN MICHAELS of "Pinocchio"
FELICIA SOREL'S "Railroad Dance"
from Marc Connolly's play "Everywhere I Roam
Tickets: $2.20 $1.65 $1.10 85¢ 55¢ tax included at American Dance Association 1560 B'way (46th St.) Med. Bur. & No. American Committee [illegible] 4th Ave (27th St.) Workers Bookshop 50 East 13th Street Leblanc B'way at 42nd Street and all University Bookshops
Sponsored by AMERICAN DANCE ASSOCIATION
Benefit MEDICAL BUREAU & NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY
Program For Each Evening Announced Later

NOW you may order
BOOKS
from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

tion to mount behind Nora on the white steed which brought Finn back to Ireland is perhaps more satisfying than convincing.

"The Primrose Path" (Biltmore Theater) is another play probably destined to a large success because, in addition to some other virtues, it has that of supplying in highly satisfactory form one of the things which a public wants. Based on the popular novel "February Hill," it deals lustily with the adventures of an amoral family whose members manage to combine the total depravity of the denizens of Tobacco Road with a cheerful exuberance possible only in a region free from the hookworm. The clan is led by Helen Westley, who plays the cheerful old harridan of a grandmother with fine abandon, and the play is frankly bawdy—which word, as Arthur Guiterman has recently pointed out, is never used in current dramatic criticism except as a laudatory adjective. Grandma gets herself sent to jail when she wants a rest; mother supports the family on an income derived from weekends with visiting business men; and daughter exhibits a fine talent for shoplifting. But there is, for all this, nothing grim about the play, which is sweetened by a touch of sentiment or of pathos at the right moments and proceeds merrily upon the assumption that the daughter of a shanty family has not only a good heart and lots of sex appeal but may be expected to look very well in her clothes. "The Primrose Path" is not for the squeamish or for those who demand grim realism, but it is directed in spirited fashion by George Abbott, and is a very pleasant piece of good unclean fun.

At the Martin Beck the ever-welcome D'Oyly Carte Company is paying another of its visits. There are many of the familiar faces but some new costumes and new scenery. Just for the sake of variety I might confess that the performance of "The Mikado" seemed to me ritualistically perfect but not especially spirited.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FILMS

"IT'S no use getting angry," said an intelligent-looking young girl to her friend as they walked out of Radio City Music Hall after the opening of "Trade Winds" (Walter Wanger). Her friend had obviously intended to show her something beautiful and exciting.

It's no use getting angry. I wonder. The daily reviewers seem to have followed that advice. They mocked gently at the picture and found this and that in it to praise. In my opinion it is almost the worst hodge-podge ever produced. The facts are these: Tay Garnett, the "director" of the whole, went on a world cruise and made some amateurish shots of street scenes, bars, and a horse race in the Far East. He brought back nothing usable, but the shots were used nevertheless. With the magic help of the screen process the Hollywoodians superimposed a few actors and a story for which the right adjective is stupid. A girl (Joan Bennett, with black hair in imitation of Hedy Lamarr) shoots at a playboy for driving her sister to suicide and starts around the world to evade the police. The well-equipped San Francisco police department apparently has no means of finding out that the fatal shot was fired by someone else—the girl's pistol was loaded with blanks. Instead the police have to hire a private detective (Fredric March) to catch the alleged murderess after a chase around the world. He pretends to be a heel who is only after the $100,000 reward in order to prove that a man cannot die of a wound he didn't receive.

The plot—its dulness is matched by the dulness of the dialogue—is presented as sort of prologue and epilogue to a tiresome sequence of Mr. Garnett's shots, on which is superimposed uninspired studio lovemaking that is seldom nice to look at and always painful to listen to.

There are many bad movies for all kinds of legitimate reasons, and there is no use getting angry about them week in and week out. But "Trade Winds" is a cynically dishonest production. Seldom has the discrepancy between movie technique and its corrupted use been so frivolously demonstrated. That the picture stars two well-known actors, obviously disgusted themselves, who brought only their names to the studio, and that it is launched under the good name of Walter Wanger of "Blockade" fame, only underscores the deliberate deception of the public. If your milkman waters your milk or your liquor dealer your whiskey you can send the police after them. Not so with movie producers. But you can get angry, and it might help if we all got angry together the next time.

I went from "Trade Winds" to "Arrest Bulldog Drummond" (Paramount), which is disarming in its honest execution of a successful pulp formula. It is always the same story; the producers might issue the older Drummond pictures with new titles and nobody would notice it.

At Cinema 49 is a program both delightful and touching. Walt Disney's Mickey Mouse cartoon, "Lonely Ghosts," is grotesque fantasy with surrealist touches, but it is even more profound than the wonderfully witty "Mother Goose." It is combined with a simple new French picture, "Heart of Paris" (André Daven), in which the good-hearted owner of a bicycle shop first saves, as an obstinate juror, an innocent girl from the guillotine and then takes her into his home, hiding her identity even from his good wife. After many comic and dramatic twists the family finds it out—along with his honest intentions. Raimu plays the part of the Parisian shopkeeper with the warm bonhomie of our fellow-citizen Hendrik Willem Van Loon, whom he greatly resembles. Michèle Morgan impersonates the innocent girl with such simplicity that she will not easily be forgotten. Marcel Achard has written an excellent dialogue. Here, again, is a French picture worth seeing—an essentially true story sincerely told.

FRANZ HOELLERING

In an Early Issue of The Nation

The Baltimore Sun Goes Down

Fact and Myth in the Sunpapers Legend

BY WILLARD R. ESPY

Letters to the Editors

Nominations for the Honor Roll

Dear Sirs: We have just read The Nation's Honor Roll for 1938 in the January 7 issue, and we congratulate you on your selection of the people and organizations which have fought to preserve American democracy in the past year. We were, however, keenly disappointed to see that you omitted the consumers' cooperative movement, which is growing to such an extent that it will soon be a tower of strength in the preservation of democracy.

Your readers will be interested to know that there are now two million members of consumer cooperatives in the United States, and their business last year exceeded half a billion dollars. The cooperatives in rural areas have broken the commercial-fertilizer trust, and the gas and oil co-ops have beaten down the excessive margins in gas and oil distribution. In the state of Ohio alone the cooperatives saved consumers more than two million dollars on gas and oil purchases last year. The Consumers' Cooperative Association in North Kansas City, Missouri, is completing plans for the construction of its own refinery and is now shipping oil to co-ops in France, Scotland, Belgium, Bulgaria, Esthonia, and Canada.

These are a few of the things which have made the cooperatives eligible for inclusion in any honor roll of those who are fighting the battle for economic democracy. WALLACE CAMPELL,
Assistant Secretary,
the Cooperative League
New York, January 7

Dear Sirs: As a member of the Executive Committee of the Medical Bureau and North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, I was gratified to find the name of that organization included in The Nation's Honor Roll for 1938, along with the American Friends Service Committee and the American Red Cross. I should like, however, to call your attention to one omission which does an injustice to a large body of magnificent supporters of the Spanish struggle in America, namely, the Confederated Spanish Societies to Aid Spain. Made up largely of naturalized Spanish-American citizens, this committee very quietly and effectively raised $300,000 from May, 1937, through November, 1938, with an overhead of less than 10 per cent. From intimate contact with the Spanish societies I can testify to the amazing consistency with which their members, almost all of whom are of the working class, have given large proportions of their weekly salaries to feed and clothe their brothers in Spain.

JAMES LOEB
New York, January 8

Dear Sirs: I have read The Nation's Honor Role for 1938 with great interest and heartily approve of the selections. However, I believe that a niche should have been found for the New York Post, for the following reasons: For its brave editorial policy, its unceasing and good fight for the underprivileged, its attempt to spread culture among the masses, and its timely and brilliant exposé of the Nazi spy ring.

J. WEINSTEIN
Brooklyn, N. Y., January 11

Fingerprinting Workers

Dear Sirs: You are no doubt aware of the recent order issued by Colonel Brehon Somervell, WPA administrator for New York City, to fingerprint all educational workers who come in contact with children. The ostensible reason for the order was that fingerprinting would prevent possible sex crimes. We are, of course, in agreement that precautions should be taken to avoid sex crimes, but it is self-evident that fingerprinting will not serve as a preventive and that the sex angle is being emphasized to justify the fingerprinting of a large section of our working class.

Our suspicions have been justified by the new course the fingerprinting is taking. Carpenters, printers, clerks, technical workers, and many others whose duties never bring them near children have reported to us that they have been ordered to submit to the fingerprinting.

We feel that the present order to fingerprint educational workers is simply a trial balloon which, if successful, will lead to the fingerprinting of more than 170,000 WPA workers in New York City. This would be a most dangerous precedent for the following reasons: (1) compulsory fingerprinting provides the basis for a labor blacklist; (2) it offers an easy means for control and intimidation of WPA workers; (3) it subjects a large body of organized workers to police surveillance; (4) it opens up unlimited possibilities for frame-up and blackmail; (5) it opens the way for search without warrant and denial of habeas corpus; (6) under a reactionary or fascist regime using the pretext of national emergency, it might lead to untold persecution and might conceivably be used to destroy the secret ballot. WILLIAM LEVNER,
Executive Secretary
WPA Teachers' Union
New York, January 4

Japanese "Order" in China

Dear Sirs: The New York Times has recently been printing a series of columns by Hallett Abend, sent from the coastal town of Tsingtao and other places in so-called Japanese-occupied areas, in which he makes statements which would lead one to believe that the Chinese and Japanese are now a happy band of brothers, working together for a common cause, Japan's cause of course. Mr. Abend tells us (New York Times, November 9) that there is a trend toward orderliness in the Tsingtao area, but he does not tell us that the orderliness is of the same nature as that existing in Germany and due to the presence of the military police and the steel bayonet.

Since I have recently come from China and am returning there very shortly, I feel it incumbent upon me to write a refutation of Mr. Abend's statements, which tend to harm the Chinese cause at a moment when the need is great. I cannot speak of Tsingtao, but I know from my own experience that from other towns held by the Japanese the Chinese civilians leave in droves. I saw many thousands of innocent Chinese civilians, men, women, and children, during August and September of this year trekking over the hills, struggling day after day in the burning sun, without food and water, in order to get away from the Japanese. Mr. Abend should have visited the south bank of the Yangtze and seen the unfortunate civilians from Kiukiang and Kuling in one long sorry human stream, fleeing the kindly embraces of the Japanese.

As to the business activity of the Japanese, Mr. Abend forgot to mention that their most lucrative and most dastardly activity is the revived opium trade. Perhaps he was not shown any of this nefarious trade by his Japanese friends and guides, but he could have seen it going on if he had had his eyes open. How naive of Mr. Abend to tell us that Shantung Province is headed by the venerable old man, Ma Liang, and that he is sponsored by the Japs! Ma Liang is just a figurehead, ninety-nine years old, behind whom the Japanese stand and through whom they carry out their machinations.

Knowing the high spirit and morale of the Chinese soldier and civilian, I refuse to believe that either the guerrilla or the peasant in the north or south is demoralized, or that there can be any sort of mass feeling against anyone except the Japanese. Mr. Abend seems to put us in the same category as the duped Japanese people, who accept as gospel truth what their military leaders tell them—that they are engaged in restoring "law and order" in China.

H. TALBOT,
Surgeon, Chinese Red Cross
New York, December 15

Soviet Foreign Trade

Dear Sirs: Edward Grove, quoting from Current History of June, 1938, in a letter in The Nation for December 17, attempts to prove that Soviet commerce with Germany is undiminished. Fortunately for the unity of the world boycott against the products of fascist aggressor states, Mr. Grove's information is erroneous.

The outstanding British publication on economics, the Economist, makes the following statement and gives the figures to back it up: "The most recent foreign trade figures of the U. S. S. R. provide small warrant for the apparent uncertainty in Western Europe about even the general lines of Soviet foreign policy. The curtailment of Soviet foreign trade with Japan, Germany, and Italy during the first seven months of 1938 has been the most striking feature of recent Soviet economic policy abroad." The figures, cited in the November 5 issue of the same publication, which is hardly to be branded as pro-Soviet, specifically show a drop of Soviet imports from Germany from 308,463,000 rubles in 1936 to 35,038,000 in the first seven months of 1938. Even more drastic drops are to be noted in Soviet trade with Germany's allies, Italy and Japan. Italian shipments to the U. S. S. R. slumped from 42,014,000 rubles in 1936 to 52,000 rubles in the opening seven month period of 1938, Japan's drop for the same period being from 61,968,000 to 354,000 rubles.

HERBERT ROSENBLUM
Brooklyn, N. Y., January 3

True Patriotism

Dear Sirs: Dear old England has not changed. Elizabeth Barrett Browning wrote the following as part of a preface dated Rome, February, 1860. How contemporary it sounds!

> And if patriotism means the flattery of one's nation in every case, then the patriot, take it as you please, is merely the courtier, which I am not, though I have written "Napoleon III in Italy." It is time to limit the significance of certain terms, or to enlarge the significance of certain things. Nationality is excellent in its place; and the instinct of self-love is the root of a man, which will develop into sacrificial virtues. But all the virtues are means and uses; and if we hinder their tendency to growth and expansion, we both destroy them as virtues and degrade them to that rankest species of corruption reserved for the most noble organizations. For instance, non-intervention in the affairs of neighboring states is a high political virtue; but non-intervention does not mean passing by on the other side when your neighbor falls among thieves—or Phariseeism would recover it from Christianity. Freedom itself is virtue as well as privilege; but freedom of the seas does not mean piracy; nor freedom of the land, brigandage; nor freedom of the press, freedom to calumniate and lie. So, if patriotism be a virtue indeed, it cannot mean an exclusive devotion to our country's interests, for that is only another form of devotion to personal interests, family interests, or provincial interests, all of which, if not driven past themselves, are vulgar and immoral objects. . . . If the man who does not look beyond this natural life is of a somewhat narrow order, what must be the man who does not look beyond his own frontier . . .?
>
> I confess that I dream of the day when an English statesman shall arise with a heart too large for England; having courage in the face of his countrymen to assert of some suggested policy: "This is good for your trade; this is necessary for your domination; but it will vex a people hard by; it will hurt a people further off; it will profit nothing to the general humanity: therefore, away with it!—it is not for you or for me." When a British minister dares to speak so, and when a British public applauds him speaking, then shall the nation be glorious, and her praise, instead of exploding from within, from loud civic mouths, come to her from without, as all worthy praise must, from the alliances she has fostered and the populations she has saved.

SIRVART POLADIAN
Berkeley, Cal., January 12

More Haggin Wanted

Dear Sirs: I have just discovered that B. H. Haggin writes his column for The Nation only every other week. Why, oh, why don't you let him write more and oftener? I happen to know that he has a great following and that every one of us would like to read him every week instead of having to wait so long between columns. Your excellent magazine can, of course, stand on its own merits, but please do give Mr. Haggin a free rein!

JULIUS J. SPECTOR
New York, January 12

CONTRIBUTORS

HUBERT HERRING is chairman of the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America.

AUREL KOLNAI is the author of "The War Against the West."

WILLSON WHITMAN is writing a book on the TVA, of which the present series of articles is a part.

ERNEST O. HAUSER is the author of "The Rest of the World." He has traveled extensively in the Orient and is now on his way back to China and Japan.

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of "Charles Sheeler: Artist in the American Tradition."

HUGH H. DARBY is an associate in the Department of Biological Chemistry at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University.

ROBERT VAMBERY, son of the Hungarian scholar Rustem Vambéry, is now living in this country. He has written several plays and served as dramatic adviser to a Berlin theater.

MILDRED ADAMS has studied Spanish affairs over a long period. She translated "Invertebrate Spain" by José Ortega y Gasset.

ELISEO VIVAS is a member of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Wisconsin.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN is assistant professor of French at Columbia University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 28, 1939 NUMBER 5

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 105

EDITORIALS:

THE REICH TIGHTENS 108
VERMONT PREFERS FLOODS 108
THE KLUCKHOHN CASE 109
JOB INSURANCE IN PERIL 110
WPA—OR THE DOLE by Robert S. Allen 111
AMERICA IN THE POST-MUNICH WORLD. I. AMERICA HAS THE POWER by Eliot Janeway 112
THAT FRANCO-SOVIET PACT by Genevieve Tabouis 115
MUST DEMOCRACY USE FORCE? II. PEACE AND THE LIBERAL ILLUSION by Reinhold Niebuhr 117
STUDY IN RELIEF by McAlister Coleman 119
IN THE WIND 121
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 122

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE PURE IN HEART by Louise Bogan 123
MEDICAL CARE IN BRITAIN by Michael M. Davis 124
CAPITALISM: A DIAGNOSIS by Harold J. Laski 124
PAINTER OF PITTSBURGH by Jerome Mellquist 125
MARXIST HISTORY OF ENGLAND by H. B. Parkes 125
PHILANTHROPIC MONEY by Eduard C. Lindeman 126
SHORTER NOTICES 127
DRAMA: CUCUMBER SANDWICHES by Joseph Wood Krutch 128
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 129

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE MILITARY SITUATION IN CATALONIA, as we go to press, is almost desperate. Rebel forces are reported to be within fifteen miles of Barcelona. Evacuation of civilians is already under way. Although fresh troops have been brought in from the Madrid-Valencia sector, the Loyalists in Catalonia are outnumbered and seriously lacking in munitions. Food supplies, already low, have been further depleted by the sinking of a British ship laden with wheat. But though the situation is critical, it is not hopeless. Madrid has shown that a city can be made into an impregnable fortress so long as communications can be kept open. Barcelona may repeat the demonstration. The refusal of the French government to come to the aid of the republic across the Pyrenees has been met by something closely approximating a revival of the Popular Front. Large numbers of Radical Socialists have joined the Socialists and Communists in an effort to reopen the frontier before it is too late. Victory in this effort would go far toward redeeming Munich. Defeat will be even more disastrous than the betrayal of Czechoslovakia. Surrounded on three sides by hostile dictatorships, the Third Republic may be the next sacrifice on the altar of appeasement.

*

TO AMERICA'S SHAME THE SPANISH EMBARGO has been permitted to remain in force another week though the life of the Spanish republic hangs in the balance. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has postponed its scheduled consideration of the neutrality legislation. The House Committee, with Chairman McReynolds ill, has not even set a date for hearings on the most crucial matter before the United States today. Once again word is being passed around that it is too late to save Spain. Last May an Administration move to lift the embargo was shelved on the pretext that "Spain could not hold out a month." But as Senator Nye has pointed out, nine months have passed since then and Spain is still holding out. It will still be holding out three months from now, but each week that it is denied aid reduces its chance of ultimate victory. Former Secretary of State Stimson has added the weight of his very great prestige to the view, frequently expressed in these pages, that the President has the power to lift the embargo with or without Congressional approval. The President's silence becomes more inexplicable daily as it becomes evident that the only groups in the country desiring to keep the embargo are certain sections of the Catholic church. It is estimated that more than 90 per cent of the 1,150,000 Catholics on Long Island have been asked by their parish priests to send letters and telegrams to Washington calling for a retention of the embargo. In each of several churches four or five thousand signatures were collected for petitions supporting the embargo. It is high time for Protestants and Catholics who believe in democracy to exert some influence on our foreign policy.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

WHILE SPAIN WAGES ITS LONELY BATTLE for Western democracy, Central Europe is the scene of uninterrupted fascist advance. There is some competitive bidding, of course, but it is between Hitler and Mussolini; this area is virtually their private preserve. Count Csaky goes to Berlin, and Hungary signs on the dotted line, becoming a full-fledged member of the "anti-Comintern" fraternity; Count Ciano is entertained in Belgrade, and Yugoslavia enters into closer relations with the fascist bloc—only six months ago Belgrade crowds were clamoring to march with France against the axis. Although it is too early to know the details, the Belgrade parley apparently contained few surprises. It was interesting chiefly as another symptom of Mussolini's deepening anxiety. For if part of Ciano's mission was to lure Yugoslavia closer to the axis, his most urgent desire was to accomplish this under Italian auspices. It is no secret that German trade with Yugoslavia has steadily increased, and that Nazi agents within Yugoslavia have performed fruitful labors. In Belgrade Ciano continued the Duce's quest for support within the fascist front which would enhance his own bargaining power with the boss in Berlin. Many rivalries are fanning this smoldering conflict, and multiplying the causes of hostility among the countries now being added to the fascist alliance. But there is no alternative for the disgruntled except reluctant submission. Once Hungary and Yugoslavia are safely "coordinated," the likelihood of further Rumanian defiance will be appreciably smaller.

*

THE IDEA OF ENDING TAX EXEMPTION ON federal and state bonds and salaries has so many powerful supporters that innocent folks may have expected the President's message on the subject to be received with acclaim. Mr. Roosevelt takes the view that the Sixteenth Amendment to the Constitution, permitting taxes on "income from whatever source derived," means exactly what it says. He has therefore suggested to Congress that the practice of tax exemption, having been created by mere statute, may be ended in the same way. Such a simple approach, however, has been severely castigated by the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, and other upright commentators. Certainly, they agree, tax exemption is economically undesirable and should be abolished, but the only decent way to do it is to submit the question to the nation in the form of a constitutional amendment. They do not apparently dispute the obvious meaning of the Sixteenth Amendment; rather they argue that disregard of this meaning has become hallowed by time. This amounts to a claim that the Constitution can be altered by usage—a strange doctrine to be advocated by those who normally are the most fervent defenders of its sanctity. It is difficult not to conclude that many of the President's critics oppose tax exemption only in theory.

*

ONE OF THE MOST SINISTER ECONOMIC developments in this country since the depression has been the growing tendency to build economic barriers around the different states. The illusion that it is better business to pay the local producer a little more than the "foreigner" demands has led to intrastate favoritism in contracts and even to efforts to bar products of other states by devious means. Thus laws allegedly designed to control plant diseases have been used to prevent shipment of farm products from one state to another. According to Governor Stark of Missouri, who addressed the Council of State Governments on this subject last week, "Under the guise of protection of public health, the encouragement of new industrial development, and sometimes merely as very bald protection of home industry, we of the states have been accused of Balkanizing this formerly great free-trade area. . . . States have definitely prescribed new frontiers for business. Some state legislatures have enacted much legislation concerning special privileges for local interests. In fact, these state barriers constitute a subsidy for organized minorities." We are glad to note that this confession of sins appeared to arouse the general concern of the conference. Such a disruptive movement should be promptly checked. Protagonists of states' rights might consider that efforts to destroy our great internal free-trade market make a poor advertisement for their cause.

*

FELIX FRANKFURTER WAS ASSOCIATED IN the minds of conservatives with the Sacco-Vanzetti case and the Brain Trust; Frank Murphy with the sitdown strike. Harry L. Hopkins's real crime, despite the charges that he mixed relief with politics, is that he fed the hungry and provided work for the jobless. Yet while Justice Frankfurter was confirmed without opposition in the Senate, and only seven votes were registered against Attorney General Murphy, Mr. Hopkins was subjected to a bombardment of recriminations from the right, and his confirmation was opposed by twenty-seven Senators, five of them Democrats. So large a vote in opposition is unusual. Even the Republican leadership in the Senate recognized the impropriety of exercising the sort of veto over a nomination to the Cabinet that might be used in the case of a Supreme Court justice. That Secretary of Commerce Hopkins should have evoked more bitterness than either Mr. Frankfurter or Mr. Murphy does not throw too complimentary a light on the attitude of American conservatives. Though they dare not cut too far, those on the right seem to resent relief and WPA. The feeling still persists that relief has been used as a sort of gigantic pork barrel to obtain the votes of the underprivileged. WPA and politics have been linked in several states, but there has been no evidence whatsoever to connect Hopkins with improper practices.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame Cal.

*

HOMER MARTIN, UNSTABLE PRESIDENT OF the unstable United Automobile Workers, is now accused by his executive board of conspiring with Henry Ford to disrupt the union and start a secession movement. Shocking as this indictment is, it comes with no startling suddenness. As long ago as last November the C. I. O. convention at Pittsburgh seethed with rumors. Not even the ardent protestations of solidarity from the auto delegates or Martin's pledges of loyalty to the C. I. O. could smother suspicions that the problem union was about to break out in a new adventure. Then the great question was whether Martin's enemies were spreading the story of the Ford conspiracy as groundwork for a coming coup or whether the story was true and was being confined to the grapevine in the hope that Martin could be controlled and the Ford campaign taken out of his hands before he did any harm. The answer to that question still is not known with finality, but the case for Martin is none too convincing. He admits that the voluntary dissolution of Ford's company union, the Liberty Legion, is a result of his negotiations with Harry Bennett. If the terms of the deal were open and aboveboard, it might well prove a downy feather in the Martin cap, but nobody knows the price Martin paid—and he won't talk. If that seems autocratic, it is normal trade-union procedure compared to what has followed. In another of his off-with-their-heads moods, Martin suddenly suspended fifteen of the twenty-four members of his executive board, locked them out of union headquarters, and removed all the records to his own hotel. Violence and impeachment followed, and it now seems inevitable that there will be two conventions of automobile workers in March. This is the saddest thing that has happened to the C. I. O. since its creation, not excluding the exit of the I. L. G. W. U. Once organized labor begins dividing in this fashion it may look forward to attaining not only the amoeba's reproductive capacity but its influence as well.

*

DO REACTIONARY AMERICAN CATHOLICS subscribe to a common bureau of misinformation with the Nazis? We raise the question once more because we have again discovered a remarkable parallelism in their utterances. In its issue of December 24 the Brooklyn Tablet, a Catholic weekly whose statements closely resemble Father Coughlin's, savagely attacked President Roosevelt for his reported desire to lift the Spanish embargo. A long passage ascribed this desire to the President's alleged connections with the Masons—a deft bit of detective work—citing a number of Masonic groups with which he was supposed to be identified and a long congratulatory message sent to him by numerous Masonic lodges after he had denounced aggressor nations in an address at the pan-American conference of 1936. All these sinister disclosures seemed pretty hysterical and irrelevant, in the best Tablet tradition. More interesting is the fact that almost exactly the same passage had appeared in an article, also denouncing Mr. Roosevelt, published in the December issue of the Flammenzeichen, a Nazi paper published in Stuttgart. Except for a few minor discrepancies the passages are identical in wording and sequence. These word-for-word parallels—this is the third—are not psychic phenomena; and they become even more striking when the Tablet, directly beneath the passage mentioned above, publishes a protest against the persecution of Catholics in Germany. We think that the Tablet ought to explain. So, incidentally, should Father Coughlin, whose silence in the face of similar challenges has been deafening.

*

WE NOT INFREQUENTLY READ OF FREE citizens of these United States who commit some petty crime for the sole purpose of getting into jail, knowing that there, at least, they will find food and shelter. In Europe in the last few years we have seen the inhabitants of whole countries submit to servitude for similar reasons. We may shout bravely, "It can't happen here," and protest that our democracy is proof against dictatorship. But if it is to remain so, we must put our house in order, guarding it not only against external aggression but internal decay. The series of articles by Eliot Janeway which begins in this issue provides an analysis of our position in a world where the fascist tide is running strongly, and suggests means both for checking the menace of foreign aggression and for reconstructing our economy on democratic lines. Mr. Janeway, of course, speaks for himself. With parts of his diagnosis and with some of his remedies The Nation disagrees for reasons which will be advanced in later issues. Nevertheless, we feel that the wealth of facts marshaled in this series, together with the provocative manner in which they are interpreted, makes a real contribution to the most vital debate of our time.

The Reich Tightens

HITLER'S two latest moves strike at the only remaining institutions in Germany which had not been completely integrated with the Nazi machine—the Reichsbank and the army. Both indicate a heightening of tension, economic and moral, within the Third Reich.

Dr. Schacht's removal from the Reichsbank hardly comes as a surprise. During his tenure he rendered enormous services to the regime both by his versatility as a financial manipulator and by his willingness to act as a respectable front to impress foreign bankers. But he emptied his hat of economic rabbits some time ago, and he was unwilling to resort to the final trick—the release of the inflationary hare. As a last effort to hang on to office he revived and refurbished his famous ransom plan. The intention was to provide refugees with a little of their own money in return for a great deal of foreign exchange and the destruction of the boycott. This scheme was too palpably fraudulent even for the London bankers, and when it became clear that negotiations would be unfruitful, Dr. Schacht was unceremoniously dropped.

The installation of Dr. Funk in his place places the Reichsbank at the full disposal of the Nazi government, but it does nothing to diminish the severity of the economic crisis. Last year's trade figures just published show that the credit balance of 413,000,000 marks achieved in 1937 has been replaced by a deficit of 432,400,000 marks. With sources of invisible income, such as shipping and tourist traffic, known to have shrunk, a heavy draft on meager foreign-exchange reserves must have been necessary. With exports still falling, imports must also be curtailed. But food rations cannot be cut down much farther, and smaller purchases of raw materials will react unfavorably both on the armament program and on manufacturing for export. One possible economy is repudiation of all foreign-debt payments, but this would upset the trade agreement with Britain, which provides one of the few remaining sources of free foreign exchange.

The internal fiscal situation is equally unhappy. Since Hitler came to power German national income has risen some 69 per cent, but tax collections have more than doubled and the public debt has nearly tripled. Last spring Dr. Schacht, aware that with productive capacity and labor fully employed further issues of capital-creating bills must mean inflation, attempted the substitution of long-term public loans. To some extent this method was adopted, but the exigencies of the September crisis caused not only a return to bill financing but a sharp rise in currency circulation. Several long-term loans have also been issued, but the latest was only partially taken up by the public.

In this situation Dr. Funk has three methods from which to choose. He can increase taxation, thus cutting down expenditure on consumption goods and releasing productive capacity for capital goods, including armaments. Taxation of the rich, however, is said to have reached the point of diminishing returns, while further burdens on the workers are opposed by the radical Nazis. Another possibility would be to cut down armament expenditure, but this would necessitate a relaxation of aggressive diplomacy. The third choice is to maintain superpressure on the economic engine by firing it with uncovered paper money—in other words, pure inflation. The danger of bursting the boiler by this method is obvious even to Hitler, who has instructed Funk to safeguard "the absolute stability of wages and prices."

Confronted with such slippery fiscal alternatives, the German government will be strongly tempted to take another running jump into foreign adventure. However successful, this could hardly prove a cure for economic troubles any more than did Anschluss or the conquest of Sudetenland. Moreover, there are signs of deteriorating morale within the Reich. For six years Germans have been kept at emotional fever heat. Ever under patriotic pressure, forced to work harder for small returns, their every moment organized, it would be hardly surprising if they showed resistance to new stimulants, faltered in their "spontaneity." The return of the Storm Troopers to the forefront of the Nazi movement and to closer connection with the army is perhaps an effort to tighten control and combat moral lassitude. It vindicates Captain Röhm, who died attempting to achieve this very object; whether it will provide even a temporary solution for Nazi difficulties is questionable.

Vermont Prefers Floods

THE issue of states' rights has become a favorite euphemism of American politics, a high-sounding cover-up for purposes that would command little respect in the nude. Its use in the current controversy over flood control between the governors of New England and the New Deal runs true to form, though states' rights have rarely been surrounded with as much emotionalism and hollow bombast. Governor Aiken's recent message to the special session of the Vermont Legislature on flood control might lead one to believe that he was talking not from Montpelier but from Barcelona. "It is now put squarely up to us Vermonters to decide what we want," he said. "We can submit meekly, surrendering resource after resource until we are no longer self-supporting and free . . . We can fight or we can run." The terms in which he asked an appropriation to test the constitutionality of certain provisions in the Flood-Control Act of 1938 would have come more appropriately from the late Jefferson Davis. Governor Aiken said he wanted funds "for the defense of our sovereign rights—to the end that this injustice to us and our descendants be forever prevented." One almost expected the address to close with a ringing call for secession.

It is no secret that Governor Aiken has his eye on the White House and hopes that Vermont, the tail of the 1936 election, may wag the dog in 1940. He will have to get himself a more convincing battle cry. The immediate issue between him and the federal government is whether the Barkley amendment to the Flood-Control Act is constitutional. It authorizes the federal government to condemn land for flood-control purposes without the permission of the state in which the land is situated. We see no reason why the government cannot constitutionally do so. Its authority to engage in flood control is based on its power over navigable streams; its power over navigable streams was drawn by the ingenious Marshall from the vague confines of a clause permitting Congress "to regulate commerce . . . among the several states." If the power to regulate commerce includes control of navigable streams, if control of navigable streams permits the building of dams to prevent floods, if from flood-prevention dams the federal government may produce and sell power, it requires no great stretch of the imagination to believe that the condemnation of land for the erection of the dams is also constitutional. But behind this legalistic battle lies a more vital issue—the determination of New England power interests to keep the federal government from producing power in that area.

When the thirteenth New England Conference met in Boston last November with the six governors of New England attending, its chief concern was not to prevent a repetition of the floods that caused $53,000,000 in property damage along the Connecticut and Merrimac rivers in 1936. Of the five items on the agenda of the conference, attention was focused on two: "To meet the issue of federal vs. state control of our rivers and streams . . ."; and "To meet the issue raised by the proposed incorporation of New England in an Atlantic seaboard 'TVA'. . . ." Congressman Rankin had brought the nebulous states' rights question down to an even more concrete basis at the preceding session of Congress when he showed that if New England power consumers had paid TVA rates they would have saved $86,500,000 in 1936. Those of our readers who have been puzzled by the rhetoric issuing from New England on flood control are referred to a pamphlet by Judson King of the National Popular Government League in Washington, "Why the Power Joker in the New England Flood-Control Compacts?" Mr. King's exhaustive investigation reveals the power attorneys and lobbyists who have been the moving figures in what is actually a well-planned campaign to nullify the Federal Water-Power Act of 1920, which abolished state rights over power sources. The first step toward undermining the policies embodied in this act was taken in the Flood-Control Act of 1936, which was carefully framed by the late Senator Copeland and army engineers to provide for flood control only. The second step was the New England flood-control interstate compact of 1937, which Congress properly rejected because under it each state reserved the right "at its option at any time hereafter by itself or through such agents as it may designate" to develop power at the dams which the federal government proposed to build according to its $22,000,000 flood-control program for New England. The third step is the present effort to maintain a state veto over flood control—and possible power production—by denying the federal government the right to condemn land for the erection of dams. For at the dams the federal government may produce cheap power, and New England's governors prefer floods.

The Kluckhohn Case

THE Mexican government has committed a serious blunder by its expulsion of Frank L. Kluckhohn, correspondent of the New York Times. In recent years the deportation of foreign journalists whose views did not coincide with those of the rulers of the countries to which they were assigned has been characteristic chiefly of fascist Italy and Germany. The Cárdenas administration does itself an injustice by descending to that level. With all due recognition of the fact that in Mr. Kluckhohn's case the provocation was great, it would have been the part of wisdom to have put up with his hostile and misleading dispatches rather than be classed with the oversensitive fascist tyrannies.

Mr. Kluckhohn now claims that an example was made of him as a warning to the other foreign correspondents stationed in Mexico because he "knew too much" about Mexico's barter petroleum arrangements with the Third Reich. This is childish on the face of it. If he really "knew" more than he has already printed, his deportation will certainly not prevent him from making that knowledge public. Even assuming that he was formerly gagged by the "control" of the press about which he has frequently written, it is the Mexican government itself which has now removed the gag; if the object was to silence him, this seems a very curious way of going about it. As for the other correspondents, there appears to be no evidence that Mexico has subjected them to any pressure or made demands other than that they observe an elementary respect for the facts.

The main burden of Mr. Kluckhohn's writing about Mexico in recent months has been the alleged increase of Nazi influence on the Mexican government as a result of the oil deals. It is true that an increase of trade between a dependent country like Mexico and an aggressively imperialist nation like Germany is bound to be accompanied by a corresponding growth of the latter's influence. It may well be doubted, however, that this process, deplorable as it is, has gone as far as Mr. Kluckhohn suggests. The fact is that Mexico continues to be the only country outside the Soviet Union which faithfully complies with the obligations due the Spanish Republic under every concept of international law and common decency; that Mexico is even now arranging to grant asylum to 1,200 members of the International Brigade of anti-fascist volunteers whom democratic France has refused to admit; that in the League of Nations Mexico's voice has been one of the few raised in defense of the rights of weak nations victimized by fascist aggression; and that the Mexican government has consistently gone out of its way to demonstrate its profound opposition to fascism.

If the United States is concerned over the increase of German trade with Mexico, the remedy lies ready to hand. President Cárdenas has repeatedly affirmed his country's preference to sell oil to the democratic nations. But while the United States and Great Britain, through their international oil oligarchies, have combined to impose a boycott against Mexico, the Nazis, pursuing their own advantage, have bought Mexican petroleum and helped the country to weather a difficult economic and political crisis. Under the circumstances, it would have been sheer insanity for Mexico to refuse German orders on the ground that they were motivated by ulterior purposes.

Job Insurance in Peril

QUIETLY, without the knowledge of the general public, the basic standards of unemployment insurance in New York are being threatened by employer interests. The threat is particularly serious because of the glaring defects in the law as it now stands. A very large proportion of the state's unemployment payments during 1938 were delayed for weeks. At the end of the year some 13 per cent of the total claims were still unpaid. At the same time some workers received much larger benefits than they were entitled to, and a number got several checks covering the same week's benefit.

Under the guise of simplification, F. B. Cliffe of the General Electric Company presented a program to the Interstate Conference of State Unemployment Compensation Agencies which has met with such wide favor among business groups that it might almost be called the employers' plan. It would make six basic changes in the New York law. Some of these, such as the establishment of wage classifications, are desirable. The majority, however, are definitely reactionary and represent a serious threat to the jobless of New York State. Should they be adopted in the form proposed, it is estimated that the average benefit will be 15 to 20 per cent lower than at present. The proposal to use annual earnings as a basis for calculating benefits instead of full-time weekly wages is particularly open to objection. As a plan it has never been favored by the Social Security Board. Full-time wages bear a definite relationship to a worker's living standard; annual earnings reflect the degree of his insecurity. The change would bear most heavily on wage-earners in seasonal occupations, who are also the ones who suffer the most severely from unemployment. Few workers know their annual wage; they would therefore be in no position to check the benefits given them by the state. This last is an important point because of the extraordinary number of errors made under the state's mechanized system of record-keeping.

Equally indefensible is the proposal to levy a 1 per cent tax on workers' wages. Since workers are in no way responsible for the insecurity of our present-day economic system, it would be highly ironical to impose upon them the cost of alleviating this insecurity. Already they bear a considerable part of the burden indirectly, since pay-roll taxes tend to be passed on in the form of increased prices or reduced wages. Several of the states which originally required employee contributions have withdrawn them as a result of widespread protests.

If the Cliffe proposals are incorporated in the recommendations of the State Advisory Council on Unemployment Insurance, organized labor will have to bear a large share of the responsibility. For neither the C. I. O. nor the A. F. of L. has prepared a program for the revision of the New York State unemployment-insurance system. Yet a thorough overhauling is clearly necessary if only to make sure that the jobless receive benefits within a reasonable period of time. The present system is so complicated that errors are inevitable. Decentralization would help. So also would a wage-classification system similar to that proposed by Mr. Cliffe. But more important than either would be the introduction of a stamp-book system which would simplify employers' reports, cut administrative costs, and permit each worker to check his employer's contribution and calculate his own benefit rights.

The Social Security Board's recommendations for revision of the federal Social Security Act, made public last week, contain little that bears on the major problems before the states. No changes are suggested for simplifying the state laws or liberalizing the system of benefits. Nor is any action proposed for outlawing the highly dangerous merit-rating provisions due to come into effect in many states next year. Even more serious is the evident intention of the board to retain the cumbersome federal-state system instead of proposing a unified national program of unemployment insurance paralleling the old-age system. The fact that employers can lay plans to undermine the New York law without arousing much attention illustrates the danger of leaving matters of this type in the hands of the individual states.

WPA—or the Dole

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

Washington, January 23

THE savage attack on hundreds of thousands of destitute jobless which takes the form of a drive to slash the President's deficiency relief budget is the handiwork of just one group—the reactionary Democrats. The Republicans have lent a willing hand, but only after their Democratic tory brethren made it easy for them to do so. Much as the G.O.P. boys wanted to wield the ax on WPA funds, they were too fearful of political repercussions to take the initiative. In secret caucuses they decided that taking the responsibility for a relief cut in midwinter was too risky for a party trying to stage a comeback, and that the thing to do was to withhold their fire until the regular WPA appropriation came up in the spring. In the meantime they would follow the lead of the Democratic-controlled appropriation committees. If the committees approved Roosevelt's figure, they would go along. If the committees slashed the budget, swell. The Democratic Party would get the blame from the hungry, and the Republicans could claim they had no choice, while at the same time they could tell business men they had struck a blow for economy. This was sound strategy, for the tory-dominated committees rushed in where the Republicans feared to tread.

While these diehards prated about "economy" and "balancing the budget" they seemed totally unaware that the pitiful livelihoods of millions of men, women, and children were at stake. That there was any relation between human beings and the relief issue apparently never entered their minds. All they could see was the dollar sign. The same moronic obtuseness characterized their economic reasoning. Despite the lesson of the 1937 recession, when the ill-advised cutting down of government expenditures caused a business nose dive from which the country is still suffering, the reactionary cabal insisted that a deflationary economy policy must be enforced and that a good place to start the pruning was in relief.

Vice-President Garner, between frequent half-tumbler "blows for liberty," demanded that the President's figure of $875,000,000 be slashed to $500,000,000, which would have meant the dismissal on February 1 of more than 2,000,000 WPA workers. Despite the desperate warning of Mayor LaGuardia of New York and telegrams from scores of other city officials that their municipalities were unable to assume any new burdens, "Cactus Jack," rollicking owner of two banks and thousands of acres of Texas land, blandly insisted that these authorities were stalling and that they should be forced to carry a larger share of the relief load by paring WPA to the bone. Senator Carter Glass, Senator Alva Adams, Representative Clifton Woodrum, Representative Edward Taylor, chairmen of the appropriation committees and subcommittees that handled the relief budget, all wealthy men, and others of their kind in the two chambers fully agreed with Garner. But they feared that such an extreme course at this time would play into Roosevelt's hands, and therefore held the cut down to $150,000,000.

Even this slash, however, drew such a barrage of telegraphed and written protests that worried Senators began to scurry for cover. And when Borah indignantly announced that he would fight the reduction, the Democratic hatchet crew realized they had rough going before them. For one thing the Senate is not the House; for another, the Republican minority in the Senate is much smaller and not quite so machine-ridden as in the House. More ground-giving was in order, and in this pinch Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi, chairman of the powerful Finance Committee and intimate pal of Bernard Baruch, undercover master-mind of last year's successful raid on the undivided-profits tax, came to the rescue. Pat proposed a "compromise": that the $725,000,000 budget fixed by the House Appropriations Committee be retained, but with a provision that not more than 5 per cent of the workers be dismissed from WPA during the next two months; that is, only a mere 150,000 were to be thrown out on the streets during the cold-weather months. After that, during the remaining three months of the fiscal year, the WPA Administrator could discard the other million that the $725,000,000 appropriation would require to be let out—all at one time or gradually, as he saw fit. Not being a member of the Appropriations Committee, Pat was unable to have the honor of offering this generous scheme himself. Senator Jimmy Byrnes of South Carolina, chairman of the Committee Investigating Unemployment and Relief, did it for him. And a good job he did of it, too. Senator Gerald Nye, North Dakota's "progressive" Republican, who a few days previous had echoed Borah's demand for a full relief budget, executed a complete somersault and landed squarely in the Harrison-Byrnes camp.

Behind the campaign against WPA now in progress on Capitol Hill is just one thing—a ruthless attempt to destroy the President's work-relief program and to substitute a dole system instead. That's the whole story. The hullabaloo about "politics in relief," boondoggling, and the other pious complaints is just a smoke screen to mask the real objective—the destruction of WPA and the foisting of a soul- and body-wrecking dole on the unemployed. Privately the tory leaders admit this; a few of them go farther and joke about the "politics in relief" uproar. Of all the red herrings dragged out during the past six years this is the most sordid. As Senator Norris pointed out during the debate on Hopkins's confirmation as Secretary of Commerce, the only one guilty of politics in relief is Congress. Every effort that has been made to ban political meddling in relief has been balked by one or both of the chambers. At the very time that the appropriation committees were riddling the WPA budget they were also writing a provision into the bill overriding the President's action last fall in placing WPA administrative personnel under the Civil Service. And the men who perpetrated this boodle raid are among the foremost yammerers about "politics in relief."

The fate of Donald W. Smith, whose reappointment to the National Labor Relations Board is being strongly opposed by William Green, is still hanging in the balance. A few weeks ago Roosevelt decided not to renew Smith's recess appointment and to name someone else. But since then a flood of telegrams and letters from A. F. of L. unions and central labor councils indorsing Smith has caused the President to backtrack again. Smith's friends are exerting pressure on the White House to withhold final decision for a while in order to give them a chance to do some proselytizing in the Senate. The latest inside report is that certain Senators who had been opposed to Smith are now, after examining his record, for him, and that the line-up is very close. Smith's supporters feel that if they are given sufficient time they can win over enough votes to assure his confirmation. Meanwhile there is a merry undercover scramble for the job. One of the most active aspirants is Mrs. Cornelia Pinchot, wife of the one-time "progressive" Republican Governor of Pennsylvania. The chances of Mrs. Pinchot being named, should the President in the end decide to drop Smith, are remote.

America in the Post-Munich World

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

I. America Has the Power

IN 1929 the United States stopped growing. In a geographic sense, of course, we had stopped growing long before. But in 1929 our economy stopped growing; and for ten years the country has faced the enormous problems of oppressive unemployment, of increasingly acute farm crisis, and of general industrial stagnation. To business man and New Dealer alike, 1929, as it recedes into the distance, has taken on more and more the tinge of a Golden Age. Because 1929 has remained the top on so many charts—of production, of employment, of investment—we are likely to overestimate what a return to its rate of activity would offer to the United States of 1939. Even if our productive output were to regain the peak reached in 1929, and even if capital were to go back to work as energetically as in that golden year, unemployment would remain oppressive and the farm crisis acute.

Productivity has so increased in the past decade that to achieve a 1929 volume of employment we should have to attain a volume of production far surpassing the 1929 record. But if production is to soar to new heights, there must be a resumption of capital investment in building, in railroad and utility equipment, in expansion and renovation through the whole of industry. The achievement of such investment is the problem that the New Deal must solve if it is to score a victory in the time left to it. Physically, geographically, there are no new outlets for our already vast productive capacities. Our economy must develop through raised living standards, not through an increase of population. If the New Deal, or a subsequent Administration, does not have the courage and imagination to put into effect a program of increased employment through enormously increased production, that bastard of capitalism and socialism known as fascism will see that it is done—as it has seen to it in Germany.

And here, with the mention of Germany, we come to the second great change which has made the world of 1939 alien to that of a decade ago. In 1929 the United States lived in a relatively cooperative world where nations satisfied one another's needs through international trade. In 1939 international trade—what is left of it—has become gun-running. With the development of blackmail as a political weapon, world trade is giving way to autarchy and barter. Europe, the great importer, no longer buys foodstuffs and commercial raw materials in the volume of the twenties. Crisis in the farm areas of the Americas and the rest of the crop-exporting world is the result. Now the products most desired by Europe and Asia are machinery and materials for making munitions. Instead of sending to Europe commodities to feed and clothe its people, we are exporting articles which are helping fascism to transform the economic life of Europe and Asia.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

At last, out of the fog of depression and unsustained recovery, these two problems—the one domestic, the other foreign—have clearly emerged. If the New Deal is to survive, it must reconstruct our domestic economy so as to resolve the three crises of unemployment, farm surplus, and investment stagnation. But, first, it must withdraw the support it is furnishing to fascist schemes for the reorganization of Europe and Asia. We must look beyond the acts of open aggression which further that reorganization. The web of a new society, totally opposed to our own, is being spun continuously. Its makers employ now direct military methods, now economic, diplomatic, and psychological pressure. Whatever the means, the end is the same—the tightening of the fascist grip. This is a process which we, as a matter of national policy, must oppose. Fortunately the way is still open to us. The Pax Germana (or Japonica) cannot be fully realized until the dominated area is industrialized on a mass-production basis. The United States is the only country in the world which has developed the mass-production technique. And this technique, so necessary to the countries of the axis, we are helping them to reproduce. The axis powers—even Germany—are too small, too poor, too weak industrially to generate by themselves, and quickly enough, the machine power they need. Without this machine power, that is, without the United States, the axis cannot master Europe and Asia. The purpose of this series is, first, to describe the relationship of the United States to the fascist reorganization of Europe and Asia; secondly, to show how in our own farm crisis, and in the crisis of Latin America, axis economics has already cost us dear; and, finally, to elaborate a program of democratic reconstruction for this hemisphere—for, whether by democracy or by fascism, we are in for reconstruction.

To say that the United States is more powerful industrially than any other nation is to indulge in understatement. It is more pertinent, and more impressive, to compare the United States to all the areas now dominated, or even remotely likely to be dominated, by the dictatorships. I shall include all Europe and Asia—Germany, Italy, the British, French, Belgian, and Dutch empires, Japan, Poland, all the Ruritanias, and Russia, too—in this statistical comparison. I shall exclude only Latin America and Canada, whose conquest by the fascist powers is least likely.

In comparing productive capacity inside and outside the United States, let us forget that much of the best and most modern plant of Japan, Germany, and other industrial countries came from the United States, and depends upon our products and technology for continuous and efficient operation; and that most of the plant here is large-scale, built for mass production, while much of that abroad is antiquated, marginal, and unsuited for assembly-line production. The American steel industry can at capacity produce 72,000,000 tons of ingots a year. In 1937, when the armament race was driving the rest of the world to work its steel mills to the limit, total foreign production came to no more than 76,000,000 tons. This foreign capacity is slowly being increased. In the United States, on the other hand, there is no present incentive for an increase in basic ingot capacity. But with our engineering resources we could, with sustained prosperity, bring it up to 100,000,000 tons within two years. Moreover, for general industrial and many armament purposes the most important steel product is sheet and strip, such as is produced by our continuous mills. We have 13,000,000 tons of capacity in our continuous mills, which are about a hundred times as efficient, fast, and accurate as the hand mills in operation through the rest of the world. We have sold some of these continuous mills abroad, but no other country has as much as a million tons of capacity in operation or building. The possibility that other countries may soon design and construct their own continuous mills is utterly remote; Germany tried for a year to pirate our models before admitting defeat and paying cash. The American firm installing these models abroad says that it experienced more difficulty in introducing its methods in Japan than anywhere else except in England—the last stronghold of handicraft technique.

If steel is the basis not only of industry but of armaments, the test of a modern army is the degree of its motorization, and that of a modern industrial organization is the development of mass-production facilities in the scores of industries which make possible automobile manufacture. In 1937 the rest of the world combined produced slightly more than 1,300,000 cars of varying quality. In the same year Detroit, shut down first by strikes and then by recession, produced more than 5,000,000 cars without taxing capacity.

Omitting details of our preponderance over the rest of the world in general capital-goods production, power use, and so on, we can take one more example—oil, the production of which is a measure of fighting ability, and the consumption of which is a barometer of industrial advance. The United States in 1937 produced and consumed about the same proportion of world oil output, that is, just a little less than two-thirds—the manufacture of synthetics abroad being included. If Latin American production is added, in consideration of President Roosevelt's recent reference to hemispheric defense, American output becomes 77 per cent of the total.

As it dominates world production, the United States also dominates world finance—or what is left of it. We hold 60 per cent of the world's monetary gold supply in our coffers—a fantastic arrangement, and one we shall regret. We may bury our bullion in Kentucky rather than use it in any productive way, but that does not alter the fact that it gives us a potential whip-hand in the world's money markets as long as other countries continue to rely on it. Its value will diminish, however, as the power of fascism grows.

Finally the United States occupies a key position as a consumer of industrial raw materials. The colonial empires, on which the power of the Western democracies has so long rested, find here their greatest and most reliable cash customer for rubber, tin, cocoa, and many other products. Our purchases of such staples outweigh those of the rest of the world, and general commodity prices abroad tend to follow the course of American business. No matter to what extent the British and French may desire, or be compelled, to align themselves with the axis, they must cater to the American market as long as they retain their empires.

Thus as producer, financier, and consumer America exerts an influence greater than that of the rest of the world combined—an influence to which Realpolitik must adjust itself. The rest of the world knows it. The United States apparently does not. But it is not a secret that can be kept. Sooner or later, as fascism becomes an integrated world system, the United States will be compelled to use its power. The question then will be who, what group, will use it? Will an American democracy act in time to turn it against the growth of fascism, or will it fall into the hands of an American dictatorship?

It is certainly time that a reckoning be asked of the New Deal's custodians of foreign policy, of those responsible for the misuse and perversion of this power in the arming of fascism. If we do not demand it now, we may be sure that it will be demanded, after the consequences of our present policy have become clear, by the enemies of the New Deal—their ranks augmented by millions to whom the ineffectiveness, in a fascist world, of the fine sentiments of Mr. Hull has brought the first chill of disillusion. If democracy is to survive, it must use its own power now for its own ends. What we have been doing since the rise of fascism is to use this power against democracy. Briefly, we have been the chief exporter to Germany, Italy, and Japan of the raw materials, the capital goods, and the technique necessary for armament and, therefore, for aggression. But after the success of aggression must come the consolidation of conquests; and for this our products and engineering will be needed on a larger scale than ever.

In the years when world trade was flourishing, the exports which contributed most to our prosperity were farm products—cotton, wheat, and meat. But those exports have fallen by 60 per cent. With the increasing preference for guns over butter, Europe's purchases have changed radically in character. They may be divided into two categories, the first of which is capital goods. In 1937 the United States exported more electrical equipment and industrial machinery than the average for the boom years 1926-30, when private capital investment was developing commercial markets abroad. The customers for these exports were England, Germany, Japan, and Italy; Russia was a leading purchaser, too, but much of its buying was of replacements for machinery acquired in the pre-armament period. Significantly, our 1937 motor-truck exports were a third greater than the 1926-30 average, and aircraft exports were eight times greater. It is difficult to see how even diehard exponents of the advantages of international trade can take much comfort from this commerce. After all, these exports went largely to nations which will use them to attain military self-sufficiency, to nations against whom we suddenly find it necessary to arm. If fascist armament is really a menace to the United States, whose fault is it?

The second category of our exports includes strategic raw materials, which have gone to the same big four, Russia excluded. Crude petroleum exports have increased to three times the boom-period average; if exports of refined products have decreased, it is because we have been selling the refineries themselves to our customers. Though they have increased their purchases of steel-making equipment, the fascist powers have found their need for steel so desperate that their purchases of iron and steel products have increased by 77 per cent over those of 1926-30. Scrap purchases have increased sixteenfold. Exports of industrial chemicals have also increased. Automobile exports have fallen slightly, because machinery imports and self-sufficiency programs have been oriented toward the increase of automobile production within the arming states. That these programs have succeeded to any extent is due to American machinery.

Imports of capital goods are vitally important to the arming powers. Japan needs American motor trucks and railroad equipment if it is to conquer China; Germany needs Detroit-style assembly-line tooling if it is to industrialize inner Europe; England needs extensive industrial overhauling if it is to remain in the arms race; and, most important of all, all the arming nations need the machinery and materials which will allow them to do these things themselves. What do these exports mean to American economy?

Although exports of armament necessities reached record proportions in 1937, the course of the American business cycle was unaffected. Simultaneously with this increased export trade the United States was experiencing the sharpest production decline in its history. The very industries in which recession was most rapid and drastic —steel, oil, the automotive industries—were those to which Europe and Asia were giving their biggest orders. For big as these orders were to the countries placing them, they were small compared to the routine operating schedule required by American industry for prosperous activity. Our internal economy experienced both boom and collapse in 1937. In a typical industry like steel our exports amounted to about 7 per cent of the year's production—or about three weeks' work for our mills at the average rate of steel production. Our productive capacity is simply on a different scale from the consuming ability of the rest of the world. Only four steel companies bother with orders for export at all. Steady and increasing production depends on domestic orders.

This is true not only of the steel industry. Oil exports to the arming powers increased 74 per cent last year over 1937. But this did not prevent a price war and production curtailment, and the depression which hit the oil industry last year continues. The only industry in which export orders really managed to produce some prosperity during the disastrous last half of 1937 was machine-tool manufacture. Here the investment stagnation of the last decade has had its effect. With the shrinkage of new investment and the decline of replacement and modernization, the industry has not only failed to attain mass-production levels but has actually contracted. Should investment revive, reopening an enormous field for modernization, the machine-tool industry, like the rest of American business, would find that foreign orders were miniature and marginal.

Foreign business is too small to insure profitable operation to our industry under any circumstances. Nor can it balance the shrinkage that years of autarchy have caused in the great traditional exports of the United States—cotton, wheat, and meat. In 1936 our total exports, having recovered from depression lows, were still little more than halfway to the 1926-30 level. In 1937 they were only about two-thirds of the 1926-30 average, in spite of the boom in armaments exports. Farm exports—the only ones really important or profitable to us—had decreased twice as much as the general average. As long as the farm market fails to recover from the blow dealt by this collapse of overseas demand, no possible profits to individual manufacturers or industries can compensate our economy. This is clearly recognized by industry. The vice-president of the General Motors Overseas Corporation declared in a recent speech that "the number of motor vehicles sold in the agricultural areas of the United States is far greater than the number sold in all our export markets combined. We have no illusions, in the last analysis, as to where our greater interest lies." Between automobile exports and farm exports, this head of an automobile export division said, the automobile industry will choose farm exports every time. From a commercial standpoint, then, industrial exports are a doubtful proposition, as industry itself is ready to admit. From the standpoint of the national welfare they are highly unprofitable.

[This is the first of a series of four articles intended to show the economic role of the United States in a world drifting toward fascism and the potential ability of this country to check that drift. Next week Mr. Janeway will show how the foreign trade of the United States is strengthening its possible enemies.]

That Franco-Soviet Pact

BY GENEVIEVE TABOUIS

Paris, January 10

MANY Frenchmen say that their government, through its shortsighted policy toward Germany, is responsible for Hitler. Many Germans, if they were permitted to express their views, would say that Hitler is responsible for the Franco-Russian pact, the only political alliance which inspires any fear in the Führer. As a matter of fact, the idea of making this pact was born in a line of "Mein Kampf": "We will never allow two Continental powers to exist in Europe. It is our right and even our duty to prevent by all means . . . even by force, if necessary . . . the maintenance of a military power on Germany's frontiers." As long as the Franco-Russian pact remains in force, Germany must anticipate a war on two fronts, that is, under the same conditions as those in which it was beaten in 1918.

It took certain factions in France years to understand that a Russian-German alliance would put France and England in a position in which it would be impossible for them to maintain their places as world powers; and the Franco-Russian alliance of May 2, 1935, from the beginning encountered heavy opposition. This became particularly marked after the Popular Front came to power. The new and militant attitude of the working masses embarrassed the more conservative supporters of the alliance. The presence of the red flag and the resounding strains of the "Internationale" at official gatherings made the financiers, the big industrialists, and the aristocrats think that France was moving toward communism and that the Franco-Russian pact was the instrument which would bring about social revolution. They did all they could to discredit the alliance in the reactionary press. Aided by German propaganda, and the disfavor with which the English always viewed it, they made it impossible for the government to strengthen the pact by military or other conversations. Soon many who had favored the pact could no longer stand the idea of being "sold to the Soviets." Finally the Popular Front leaders themselves, under pressure from the big financiers, without whose aid not even their government could carry on, were forced to allow the agreement to sink into the lethargy in which seemingly it languishes today.

Many reasons were advanced for condemning the Franco-Russian alliance, beginning with the argument that its effectiveness depends on the Council of the League of Nations. It was pointed out that the Council includes members of small countries which are rapidly coming under the influence of the authoritarian states and so might be considered anti-Russian. Almost from the signing of the pact, its opponents demanded its abrogation on the fallacious pretext that it prevented the reconciliation of France and Germany. They argued that as the Franco-Russian alliance of 1892 had brought about the war of 1914, the pact of 1935 would surely lead to another world war. Delbos, the Minister of Foreign Affairs from May, 1936, to March, 1938, adhered to a policy which can only be characterized as "timid" toward Russia, and his successor, M. Bonnet, has always considered the Franco-Russian pact an obstacle to a four-power pact, which is more to his taste.

As for the Moscow end of the agreement, the external policy of the Soviets is surrounded with so much mystery that only its broadest outlines can be seen. But the firm attitude of Russia during the last crisis indicates that its policy has nothing in common with politics as played by other nations. It seems clear for one thing that the Soviet government does not believe that any European war can be localized. It wants peace passionately, and diplomatically it fights with energy to maintain it. In pursuing this policy Soviet diplomacy gives proof of a profound understanding of the realities of the situation and an extraordinary agility. Above all, it stands by the principle that it must never submit to the "blackmail" threat of war which has coerced France and England.

In 1927, after the official break between Russia and England, and in the middle of the Franco-Russian crisis, Stalin wrote in the Izvestia, "The Soviet government must pursue its policy of peace without taking any notice of the pinpricks which may hurt its prestige." With French foreign policy in the hands of those who, like M. Bonnet, would like to escape the traditional forces which make friendship between the two countries indispensable for each, the U. S. S. R. has had to suffer many of those pinpricks. France, for example, has never taken the trouble to inform its ally of the diplomatic decisions it was making. The U. S. S. R. was not even told the text of the Franco-German accord until the evening it was signed! Nevertheless, the Soviets have been a faithful ally. Diplomatically they have consistently sided with the French, even when French policy conflicted with immediate Russian interests.

Certainly in the crisis over Czechoslovakia the Soviets stood ready to abide by their obligations. On September 21 M. Litvinov declared that Russian "military authorities were ready to take part at once in a conference with the military chiefs of France and of Czechoslovakia . . . to consider the measures which should be taken in view of the situation." And on the fateful evening of the Munich agreement M. Litvinov again warned the powers: "It will not be in the spirit of the League to avoid today a problematical war in order to have a definite one tomorrow—above all, when the appetite of insatiable aggressors is to be satisfied at the price of annihilation or mutilation of sovereign states." In ending he added. "The Soviet government is proud that it has nothing in common with this kind of politics and has no intention of deviating from its policy in the future, being convinced that under the conditions which exist today it is impossible to guarantee a true peace by leaving this path It is to this road that we invite the other nations to return." The Russian advice was rejected, and the Soviets were not even consulted in the new partition of Europe; nevertheless, they did not renounce the French pact.

Since Munich the Germans have done their best to kill the pact once and for all. When Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop came to Paris on December 6 to sign the Franco-German agreement, his hidden purpose was to bring about the annulment of the Russian pact. But such is its potential strength that even those French ministers who like it least must maintain it to preserve the balance of power in Europe. These ministers have hoped at times that their behavior toward Moscow would force the Kremlin to denounce the understanding. But the Russians are too canny. Ribbentrop returned to Berlin without having obtained a "free hand in the East." And this may check Hitler's plans to organize a campaign against the Polish and Russian Ukraine.

On November 26 Poland renewed its non-aggression pact with Moscow. What is more, arrangements concerning armaments were concluded between the two countries. For the first time a French Foreign Minister saw Poland reconciled with the U. S. S. R. Here was a golden opportunity for France, but the Quai d'Orsay turned a deaf ear. The industrialists, financiers, and aristocrats now found another slogan—"If Germany is occupied in the East, it will not attack us on the Rhine." Thus the Polish ambassador pleaded in vain with M. Bonnet to negotiate a spectacular renewal of the Franco-Polish alliance.

For all of the French failure to seize the opportunity, the Poles did not give up. On January 5, 1938, after six weeks of strain in German-Polish relations, Colonel Beck went to Berchtesgaden. He persuaded the Führer that war would be inevitable if the Reich attacked the Polish Ukraine, that the U. S. S. R. would defend Poland, and that France could not in such an eventuality adopt the same attitude it had taken toward Czechoslovakia. Since Ribbentrop had not brought back from Paris the certainty that France would not honor its pledges to Moscow and Warsaw, Hitler was after all compelled to give way before the Franco-Soviet pact. Instead of moving east he may find himself compelled to turn his attention toward the Mediterranean and the colonial question.

Thus, whether certain French ministers want it or not, the Franco-Russian pact, invisible but ever present, dominates the European situation. It may well be that it will save the peace. The French people are unanimous in wanting to fight for their colonies, even those received by the Treaty of Versailles. If Germany presses its claims to the utmost, it will have to attack France on the Rhine, and that will call the Franco-Russian pact into effect. It is therefore entirely possible that after a lively campaign of "blackmail," reinforced by mobilization of air, naval, and military forces, Germany, seeing that France is determined to fight, will renounce its claims out of the old fear of becoming engaged in a world war in which it would have to defend itself on two fronts.

Must Democracy Use Force?

II. PEACE AND THE LIBERAL ILLUSION

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

THE capitulation of Munich was obviously caused in part by the fact that the oligarchy which holds the strategic positions in our capitalistic democracies does not really intend to protect democracy against fascism if such a defense would lead to the destruction of fascism and a consequent social revolution. On the other hand, the tory oligarchs, for whom Chamberlain, Daladier, and Bonnet were the typical spokesmen, could not have succeeded in an essentially treasonable policy if a healthy spirit of opposition to their program had not been enervated among the general populace by political and moral confusion. These confusions, which are, broadly speaking, liberal confusions, have their source in the basic cultural presuppositions underlying democratic life. The crisis of Munich therefore raises the question whether democracy as a political technique has an adequate cultural foundation for meeting the challenge of fascism.

The cultural foundation of fascism is Nietzschean romanticism, with its glorification of force and vitality as self-justifying, combined with primitive romanticism, with its substitution of racial and tribal particularism for liberal universalism. The cultural foundation of Western democracy is eighteenth- and nineteenth-century liberalism. This liberalism rests upon rationalistic optimism. It believes that it is comparatively easy to "substitute reason for force" and that mankind is embarked on a progressive development which will substitute "free cooperative inquiry" for political partisanship and social conflict. It regards the peculiar ambitions and desires of races and nations as irrationalities which must gradually yield to universal values, generally recognized and established by reason, that is, by some kind of discarnate reason of pure objectivity. Democracy, in other words, rests upon a faith in the essential goodness of man and the possibility of completely rational behavior. Is it possible to meet the challenge of a civilization which glorifies force if the relation of force to reason in political action is understood no better than liberalism understands it? Is it possible to maintain any degree of universalism against tribal fanaticism and particularism if the relation of the organic unities of race and nation to a civilization which transcends them is not comprehended in more dialectical terms than it is by liberalism? Is it possible to resist a civilization organized for war if the forces which seek to guide mankind to a pacific way of life do not understand that political tension and friction between contending political wills are normal, or at least inevitable, characteristics of national and international life? Is liberalism, in short, not too simple a creed to suit the complexities of our tragic era?

It would be sad indeed if democracy in political life were to succumb to fascism because the liberalism which supports it creates confusion in critical hours. For democracy in politics is a perennial necessity; and liberalism may prove to be no more than a passing middle-class illusion in a brief period of expanding capitalism. Democracy is a perennial necessity because justice will always require that the power of government be checked as democracy checks it; and because peace requires that social conflict be arbitrated by the non-violent technique of the democratic process. Democracy as a political system is important precisely because liberalism as a culture is not based on truth, that is, because its interpretation of human nature is fallacious and too optimistic. Power must be held under democratic restraints because irresponsible power is always dangerous. It is dangerous because a dominant oligarchy always pretends a false identity between its interests and the general welfare. Methods of arbitrating conflicting social interests must be found precisely because various social groups cannot be expected to have perfect, rational conformity of interests. A non-violent expression of the claims and counter-claims of politics is important precisely because political arguments are never merely rational arguments. The threat of force against recalcitrant minorities is always implied in them. If this is not understood, the liberal is in danger of betraying the essentials of a democratic civilization for the sake of loyalty to democratic principles, that is, for the principle of arbitration with the foe. If the foe happens to represent a civilization which incarnates war as the ultimate good, the liberal may sacrifice the institutions of peace for the sake of a peaceful settlement with a foe who intends to destroy them. Thus peace is lost for peace's sake, because it is not understood that there are moments in history when the covert threat of force which underlies all political contention must be brought into the open. If it is brought into the open by a foe who may be weaker than you but who glories in the threat and pretends to desire overt conflict, he will have the advantage of you despite your greater strength. If you have given publicity to your moral scruples and your political confusion, he will have the greater advantage. He will make impossible demands because he knows that you have been foolish enough to draw an absolute moral distinction between the threat of force which underlies all political conflict and the overt use of force into which it will occasionally develop.

It is necessary to repeat that we do not accuse Chamberlain and Daladier of having worked under the disadvantages of such scruples. But it is apparent that they could be celebrated as apostles of peace and of the "Christian method" only because such confusion existed. Throughout the crisis the London Times, for instance, accepted the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia with equanimity. Indeed, it suggested the idea of such a settlement at a time when the governments were not ready for it. But it insisted that Hitler would have to enter Czechoslovakia in a gentlemanly and decent fashion. "To the nations of the free Western tradition," it declared, "no solution is tolerable except the way of reason." By this it meant nothing but a demand that the victor hide the nakedness of his sword as he brandished it over the vanquished. Hitler must enter the prostrate democracy according to a time table. Political realities, such as the shift of power which would result from the dismemberment of the unhappy nation, were obscured. The Times called for a "judgment upon the plain merits and demerits of the German demands" and insisted that this judgment, to be "utterly realistic," must exclude "speculative opinions whether Herr Hitler can be made to yield without fighting and whether his regime can face the strain of a war." The Times, in other words, believed, or pretended to believe for the sake of its moralistic readers, that there is a transcendent perspective in politics, fortunately located in Britain, where the "plain merits and demerits" of the case could be judged; and it also pretended to believe that the assessment of German strength and weakness which occupied every chancellery of Europe was an irrelevance. The Times hailed the peace of Munich as a triumph of "reason over force." It grudgingly recognized that this political argument was not an exercise in pure persuasion. "The gathering urgency of persuasion," it admitted, "was reinforced with unmistakable proofs of resolution for defense"; but fearful lest this admission of the horrors of politics might spoil the picture of triumphant reason, it hastened to add, "These things were not a threat, nor is it to be supposed that the German Chancellor would yield to threats; but there is no doubt that the evidence that Mr. Chamberlain offered concession from strength and not from weakness won him respect that might not otherwise have been accorded."

It would be unfair to regard the Times as a typical spokesman of the liberal creed. Its blandness is too perfect to be honest; and its function as voice of the British aristocracy suggests that it was consciously hiding the political realities of Munich rather than unconsciously obscuring them. But the letters which poured into its correspondence columns prove that among its readers were many who honestly believed that Munich represented a triumph of the methods of peace, of democracy, of civilization over the threat of war. Meanwhile Czechoslovakia lay prostrate under the heel of the conqueror, and a few days after Munich, Hitler spoke at Saarbrücken and thumbed his nose at the democracies, who were supposed to have won his respect because they made concessions from strength and not from weakness.

The liberal culture which is unable to assess the relation of force to reason, to understand the coercive element in all political life, and to appreciate the "ideological" taint in all human reason when the interests of the reasoner are involved is compounded of the characteristic prejudices of academics and business men. In this compound is usually an admixture of denatured Christian perfectionism. This religious perfectionism has reduced Christian pacifism, which in its pure form knows martyrdom to be its end, to a counsel of prudence. It promises that the way of non-violence will in the long run gain a more certain victory over your foe than the way of violence. But it is indefinite about the length of the run. This kind of Christianity prompted the Archbishop of Canterbury to hail the victory of Hitler in Austria because it was "bloodless."

To the culture of liberalism eighteenth- and nineteenth-century academics—and many belated colleagues in the twentieth century—contributed the idea of an increasingly discarnate rationality which would finally rise above the welter of human conflict and decide all contentious issues according to the "plain merits and demerits" of the case. The business men contributed to the illusions of liberalism for two reasons. For one thing they were the first oligarchs who held their dominant position in society by the exercise of covert, or economic, rather than overt, or military, power. As Bertrand Russell has recently observed, economic power does not kill but merely starves to death. Thus it meets the Archbishop of Canterbury's test of bloodlessness. Secondly, in the last two hundred years the wealth of the industrial nations increased and their political influence expanded so greatly that the realities of social conflict were obscured until the decay and contraction of this latter day set in. For the same reason the illusions of liberalism are more stubborn in America than in any other country, with the possible exception of Britain. The wealth of this nation and its geographic isolation have contributed to illusions which prompt our statesmen to lecture Europe on the advantages of "reason over force" while building a larger navy.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

There are those who insist that Marxism has added to the confusion created by liberalism and who even believe that Marxist parties helped to enervate the resolution of the democratic nations in their recent hour of trial. This charge must be refuted, at least in part. The inadequacy of a man like Léon Blum in the crisis obviously stems from his liberalism rather than from his Marxism. Marxism has in fact been denatured to a considerable degree by liberalism in all Western democratic nations. The fact is that Marxism, in its pure form, has been the most potent critic of liberal illusions. Who understands the pretensions of "rational objectivity" in social conflict better than a real Marxist? Or for that matter the invalidity of an absolute distinction between the covert and the overt use of force? Yet it must be admitted that the provisional realism of the Marxists may quickly result in new illusions and confusions. Since capitalism is regarded as the root of all injustice—rather than as what it is in fact, the most potent source of economic injustice in contemporary society—the Communist Marxist inclines to regard Russian diplomacy as, by definition, a force of pure disinterestedness in international affairs and to dismiss charges of political injustice in Russia with incredulity. The Socialist Marxist, on the other hand, seeking to take the position of uncompromising opposition to capitalism vacated by the Communist opportunists, insists that since all evil comes, by definition, from capitalism, it is an error to make any distinction between British imperialism and German fascism. Thus he makes common cause with the liberal who will not defend democracy because it would cease to be democracy if he defended it. The Socialist will not defend democracy because it is not pure democracy but is corrupted with capitalistic injustice.

If to the liberal illusions of the middle classes and the simplicity of Marxist judgments we add the dishonesties of the capitalistic oligarchs who prefer fascism to an extension of democracy, we have a cultural situation which, if not corrected, is bound to lead to the complete triumph of fascism. It is certainly the principal explanation for the fateful inability of democratic civilization to resist fascist aggression up to the present time.

Nietzschean morality perversely transposes all values and raises the disease of social life, conflict, to the eminence of the criterion of all values. If it is to be defeated, the civilization which defeats it must be informed by a culture which understands that though disease is not normal, its perils are constant, and that some of the best medicines are poisons taken in moderation. A liberal culture does not understand man in the unity of his body and soul, in the urgency of his physical needs, in the interestedness of all rational processes when they are concerned with his vital wants. It does not understand, therefore, the necessity of coercion for the sake of securing social cooperation and the necessity of resistance to power for the sake of securing justice. It habitually hides its covert brutalities from its own conscience and sickens at the thought of protecting what is still valuable and genuine in its culture from the overt brutalities of a resolute foe.

It may be that democracy is too intimately bound up with these liberal prejudices to survive their destruction. This is a pity. For if democracy dies it must be born again. There is no way to justice without it.

[This is the second of a series of three articles on the role of force in the preservation of democracy. The anti-pacifist position was set forth by Aurel Kolnai last week, and the peace-at-any-price argument will be offered by Bertrand Russell in an early issue.]

Study in Relief

By McALISTER COLEMAN

ON the morning of February 25 last, J. Romeo Scott, lieutenant of police of Hoboken, awoke and ate a hearty breakfast. He spelled out an article in the local paper stating that New Jersey, and Hudson County in particular, was showing the rest of the country how to run relief. In Hoboken, thanks largely to the economizing policies of Harry Barck, overseer of the poor for the past forty years and now in charge of direct relief, hundreds were being dropped from the rolls. There was an estimate that Barck had cut the number of recipients from two thousand down to a few hundred. This good work was submitted as a standard for other relief agencies. No one was being coddled in Hoboken.

On that same morning, in an old two-story frame house in the Italian section of Hoboken, Joseph Scutellaro awoke to face anew a desperate situation. He was an unemployed carpenter thirty-seven years old, a frail little man only five feet high and weighing 110 pounds. He was afflicted with encephalitis, the brain ailment which entails delusions, fears, apprehensions—what Scutellaro called "funny ideas," such as various ways of committing suicide. He was living with his wife and two children, Marie, aged seven, and Joseph, aged four, in a house that belonged to his father, where the older people also lived. The depression had struck fiercely at the Scutellaros. The old man, who had been a small contractor, lost his business. The son could find no steady work. By doubling up, the two families had managed to hang on to the house. But on that morning the father had but $20 in the bank, and the son had no money at all. In a way it would have been better if they had not owned the house, for the story had gone around Hoboken that the Scutellaros were not so badly off. Didn't they have the house and wasn't it likely that the old man had stowed away something? This story had reached the ears of Barck. He accepted it, without investigating. That made it harder for the Scutellaros to get relief.

The carpenter went down to the cellar to chop up a wooden basket he had found near the empty coal bin. There had been no coal in the bin for a long time. Nor was there any gas or electricity in the house. There was one bottle of milk, and the driver had said he wouldn't deliver any more until the back bill was paid. Scutellaro borrowed 50 cents from his father, bought three rolls, and gave the change to his wife. Then he heated some coffee for himself and his wife over the kindlings from the basket, gave the milk to the two children, who were in bed suffering from colds, and started off on a trip he had taken many, many times. It was to the office of Harry Barck in the City Hall.

A month ago that office had mailed the Scutellaros a check for $5.70. But on his recent visits Scutellaro had received nothing but application blanks to fill out. Barck had yelled at him, as he yelled at most applicants who were not in the good graces of the administration, to "watch the mails" for another check. Some time back, Scutellaro, surmising that the overseer believed the story about his father's hoarded wealth, had brought his good-looking young wife down to Barck's office to confirm the story of their destitution. Barck had said at that time that Mrs. Scutellaro should be riding in a baby-carriage and that she had better not give any cash to Joseph because he would be spending it for guinney wine.

That was the way the overseer had with the poor people who came to him for help. Barck was seventy-two years old, a bitter and arrogant old man, with a deep contempt for reliefers. The men were to him "goddam guinney loafers, kikes, and mokies," and he told them so. The women were easier to look at, and Barck looked, but they were undoubtedly prostitutes at heart. Barck reveled in the power he had over these people, who had no one to turn to but him. He was proud of his purging tactics. He gloated over his reputation for being the most hard-boiled poormaster in Jersey. One of his favorite lines was to tell the women that if they wanted money they should go out on the streets and solicit.

The men hated Barck and the women feared him. All sorts of fights went on every day at the office. Barck could still handle himself all right. He was six feet tall and weighed 210 pounds and was handy with his fists. But for extra precaution he had a policeman stationed at his office door, and he bought a police whistle to blow in emergencies.

When Scutellaro took his place in the line in front of Barck's office, there was a fight going on inside. Presently the policeman came out, wrestling with a woman who was screaming with rage. Barck had practiced his wit on her, and she had spit in his face. The poormaster was wiping off the marks of the struggle when the little Italian came in alone. "Watch the mail, watch the mail," Barck shouted without looking up. "Next applicant, next applicant," he went on. And then, as he saw it was Scutellaro, "Tell your wife to go swing her bag."

Scutellaro said at his trial in Jersey City that, hearing these familiar words, he struck at the overseer, who rose behind his desk and reached out to seize the Italian by the lapels of his coat. Scutellaro said that he backed away and that the old man, still pawing at him, fell over the desk, impaling himself on a spindle on which he filed rejection papers. There was no one else in the room at the time. People running in from other offices found Barck crumpled up behind his desk, dying from a wound in his heart. The twisted spindle was lying near him on the floor. Scutellaro was sitting in front of the desk staring straight ahead of him.

Now Lieutenant J. Romeo Scott took Scutellaro in his big hands. The officer testified at the trial that he was not in the building when the fight occurred, but that he heard about it and went up to the chief's office, where they were questioning Scutellaro. The little Italian was repeating over and over in a flat monotone that Barck had fallen on the spindle. "He's lying," said Chief McFeely; "take him away, Romeo."

Lieutenant Scott took his prisoner down to a long dimly lighted corridor in the City Hall basement. There he put the nippers on his prisoner. These consist of a single handcuff on a chain, with a little bar at the end which can be twisted to tighten up the cuff.

Samuel Leibowitz, lawyer for Scutellaro, had Scott sweating when the latter testified at the Italian's trial in Jersey City two weeks ago. Scott denied that in that dark corridor he had twisted the nippers, and that he had shouted, with his fist under Scutellaro's jaw, "You goddam guinney, if you don't come through like the chief said, I'll knock all your teeth down your throat." He swore that Hoboken police never give suspects "the business," that he was not in charge of "bulldozing" relief applicants and the underprivileged generally around headquarters, and that he had never seen a Hoboken cop treat a prisoner rough.

Scott took Scutellaro away at ten in the morning. Five hours later, upstairs in the chief's office, Scutellaro, dragging his legs, mumbling incoherently, "in a fog," as he said, "from all that suffering," signed a statement that he had stabbed Barck with the spindle. Scott stood beside him when he scrawled his name on the paper handed him by the police stenographer. After he had signed, Scott threw an arm over Scutellaro's trembling shoulder. "Good boy, Joe," said Scott, "you done what the chief told you."

At his trial Scutellaro was a poor witness for himself. He seemed in a daze. When he looked at Scott and Chief McFeely sitting in the front row near him, he wept. And under cross-examination he fainted dead away. He was found guilty of manslaughter.

I commend study of the full record of the Scutellaro case to those who would take one million Americans off the WPA rolls and turn them back to the mercies of local authorities.

In the Wind

SO FIERCELY and insistently have fascist propagandists proclaimed that President Roosevelt is a Jew that they have apparently convinced themselves. The daughter of George Roosevelt (he's related to F. D. R.) is married to an Italian nobleman and resides in Italy. Recently a fascist official told her she would have to withdraw her daughter from the school she was attending because of the new anti-Jewish decrees. Bewildered, she asked the officials how the decrees affected her child. "Well, aren't you a relative of President Roosevelt's?" the official retorted.

IT'S NO secret that Supreme Court Justice McReynolds has never been friendly with liberal court members, and an encounter which he had with Felix Frankfurter many years ago is not likely to alter that attitude. McReynolds, acting as government prosecutor in an anti-trust case, was arguing a technical point of procedure with his associates. Young Frankfurter—then Henry L. Stimson's "bright boy"—was called in, and he sharply criticized McReynolds's position. "But I wrote the law governing that point," insisted McReynolds. Whereupon Frankfurter demonstrated that Justice McReynolds was misconstruing the law which he had written himself.

THERE IS no doubt that Secretary Ickes erred in charging that the whole press had boycotted the report of a Johns Hopkins biologist on the harmful effects of smoking. Some of those most critical of Ickes's speech, however, are on shaky ground. The Washington Star, for example, boasts that it did not exclude the tobacco story from its columns, but though the Associated Press released the story on February 24, 1938, the Star first mentioned it on March 29, and then in a column headed: "Stars, Men, and Atoms."

IN PARIS they are saying that France is now safe—because this time M. Bonnet has been bought by the French government.

THE INSTITUTE for Propaganda Analysis, which has just published a summary of native fascist activities, has obtained possession of a private letter written by George Deatherage, leader of the American Nationalist Confederation, in which he says:

> . . . We are delaying further reorganization in the hopes that we can get General George Van Horn Moseley, recently retired, to head a national Christian organization that we can all back. If all interested will write him requesting such action, it will help a lot. . . .

SIGN IN a Prague store window: "We exchange gas-masks for German dictionaries." The New South Wales Labor Council's radio station has been closed down because it carried appeals for a boycott of Japanese goods. . . . If the Dies probe goes on, it is expected to direct heavy fire against the new "Films for Democracy" project, sponsored by many liberals. . . . To protest against the proposed Chaplin film caricaturing Hitler, Chaplin's spokesmen reply: "Chaplin has had this character since 1913. It's Hitler who looks like Charlie." . . . The aluminum trust trial is receiving virtually no press notice; meanwhile the Aluminum Company of America has signed contracts with sixty-six Sunday papers for a continuation of its "institutional advertising"—launched almost simultaneously with the government prosecution.

NAZI PROPAGANDA by German exchange students in this country has been frequently exposed. In recent months, however, at least three German students have turned anti-Nazi and refused to return to Germany.

A PRIVATE letter to an American from a Prague resident furnishes this light on the "new" Czechoslovakia:

> German-speaking citizens of Czechoslovakia, asked to exchange residence with Sudeten Czechs, have shown no disposition to do so. . . . On the other hand the pride of Czechs remaining in the Sudetenland is humiliated by not receiving the honor of being enrolled in the German army. . . .

MARIAN ANDERSON, distinguished Negro singer, was scheduled to appear in Washington, D. C. In anticipation of a large audience, her sponsors sought to rent Constitution Hall, the only spacious auditorium in the city. They were informed that the owners of the hall would not rent it for a performance by a Negro. The hall is owned by the Daughters of the American Revolution.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I HAVE been reading William Allen White's "A Puritan in Babylon: The Story of Calvin Coolidge" (Macmillan) with profound interest. I am greatly impressed by the labor and research which have gone into it. Mr. White has had the use of the unpublished William H. Taft correspondence and has diligently corresponded with men who contributed to the rise of Coolidge and were associated with him. In addition, he gives us the benefit of his own knowledge of Coolidge and utilizes still other new data. His effort to write the definitive life of Coolidge is plain.

What we have in this solid volume is not merely his interpretation of Coolidge but a painstaking and faithful picture of the social and economic and political scene in Massachusetts during Coolidge's rise from obscurity to the governorship and then, on a broader canvas, a portrayal of the swinish, orgiastic rush for wealth during the "Coolidge prosperity"—a prosperity unparalleled in history and bringing in its train dire disaster from which the innocent are still suffering more than the guilty. Both back-drops are painted with greater care and success than I have seen anywhere else. Throughout the book Mr. White considers Coolidge "a perfect throwback to the primitive days of the republic, a survival of a spiritual race that has almost passed from the earth." But he is not consistent there, for he also calls him "a Yankee throw-back to McKinley's era," and it is hard to see how Coolidge could have been both.

That he was contradictory and enigmatic goes without saying. Mr. White once dared to ask Coolidge if he might peek under the mask he wore and see the man behind it. Mr. Coolidge replied: "Maybe there isn't any; I don't know." It is extremely doubtful if there was. Yet he had flashes of wisdom and of a thin New England humor much magnified in the retelling. If he said anything humorous or worth repeating, people marveled much as Samuel Johnson did when he saw a dog waltzing on his hind legs. When something came out of nothing, it was a phenomenon, a marvel. Mr. White leads me to believe that this timid little Mr. Milquetoast among Presidents cultivated his taciturnity as assiduously as he penuriously saved his pennies—in order to avoid the mistakes of the loquacious. He also proves that while Coolidge's rise was favored by luck to an astounding degree, he was uncannily shrewd in playing his cards and as selfish and self-centered and "sot" in doing so as it was possible for a human being to be.

Not only has Mr. White illuminated the man and his time; his kindliness has made him say everything favorable to his subject that it is possible to record. No future biographer can treat him more generously. I, for one, could never write about Coolidge with such Christian forgiveness or put him under a miscroscope with such detachment. Not that Mr. White does not seek to be both judicial and objective; he obviously tries to be both. I cannot agree with his conclusions as to Coolidge's attitude toward the Boston police strike, but I admit that Mr. White has gone into this important question with far more care than I. Also I miss any reference to that vicious series of articles signed and sponsored by Mr. Coolidge when Vice-President, portraying the alleged red menace in our colleges. It would be valuable to know who wrote them and how much Coolidge received for this prostitution of his name and office.

Yet Mr. White does not gloss over Coolidge's obvious faults and sins. He admits that he stood in with lobbyists and accepted their aid and favors, though not their cash, that he rose by grace of big business and cultivated those rich men who could help him to rise. He had spasms of wishing to aid the welfare of the workers, but as Mr. White says, he was essentially middle-class and never once showed that "he was conscious of any other class than the middle class." Still, Mr. White feels that he was "never the conscious protagonist of the predatory powers." To which my reply is that those powers today are entirely correct in praying for the reincarnation of this "unconscious" protagonist of theirs. Had he been consciously their ally, what would have been left of America? He himself was completely satisfied by society as it was. He encouraged stock speculation—through dumb ignorance of what he was doing—as no other President ever dreamed of doing, and after he left office his mean, grasping, penurious soul rejoiced when he was put on one of J. P. Morgan's favored lists and allowed to make a lot of money by buying stock well below its market value.

I repeat, Mr. White has done a very valuable job—even if he is repetitious in places. I wish he had been able to include in his book Mrs. Coolidge's remarkable confession to Henry L. Stoddard (in his "It Costs to be President") that he, Stoddard, knew her husband better than she did on his political side. To me Coolidge remains a sinister, repellent, utterly cold, stupid, unenlightened President, whose regime did the country infinite harm economically and spiritually and precious little good. An example for American youth to shun.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Pure in Heart

THE DEATH OF THE HEART. By Elizabeth Bowen. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

MODERN fiction of the subtler kind when written by women is likely to depict at length the trouble resulting from unsuitable and complicated people falling in love. The stays and obstacles once provided by difference in social position, family feuds, missent letters, and trumped-up misunderstandings have narrowed into drama arising from the fact that the lovers have neuroses that do not match, are in love for the wrong reasons, in love too late or too soon, or are incapable of love at all. Elizabeth Bowen in her previous novels has described such combinations, and Madame Colette has worked with them for years. Miss Bowen has also probed with great thoroughness into the reaction of sensitive children, sometimes the offspring of mismatings, thrown into situations of which they hold only one or two clues. "The House in Paris" successfully brought off an atmosphere of emotional tension, resulting when the past, present, and future converged on such a child, who was caught, between journeys, in rooms full of the tragedy to which he owed his being. The present book turns on a girl of sixteen, the product of a misalliance, who, when introduced into the "edited life" of her half-brother's smart London household, throws upon it the full glare of her innocence, breaks through its surface, and shows the lack of human feeling on which it is based.

Miss Bowen's young Portia Quayne is the daughter of a late second marriage, following an impulsive liaison, between a middle-aged conservative Englishman and a silly but warm-hearted widow. The first Mrs. Quayne with rather mean nobility divorces her husband and casts him off. Mr. Quayne, cut loose from his pleasant country moorings, is forced to live shabbily on the Riviera with his new family. After his death and that of Portia's mother, his son Thomas takes the child into his home, knowing that his father wanted some settled, decorous English experience for her. Portia, still feeling grief for her mother, enters a household built up with great taste and care by Anna, Thomas's wife. Everything in the exquisite house overlooking the park—the aquamarine curtains, the furniture rubbed "so that you can see ten feet into the polish," the ritual of beautiful food, the series of delightful effects—depends upon Anna. Even the family friend—called St. Quentin and a novelist—is choice and seems picked to match the wallpaper. Portia's brother, sunk in the depths of passionate cravings which marriage has not solved, is Anna's. And Eddie, the neurotic, charming young hanger-on, to whom Portia gives the full weight of her innocent affection, is Anna's—not her lover, but her amusement and her foil. It is Anna who at once instinctively ridicules the child, as she ridicules anyone of awkward human worth. Portia, learning of an ultimate betrayal, runs first to Eddie, who of course, although he has worked off some of his warped tenderness on her, rejects her; then to Major Brutt, another misfit in Anna's décor. Major Brutt telephones the house and tells Thomas that Portia demands that they come to some decision about her. In a masterfully done scene the three disabused adults—Anna, Thomas, and St. Quentin—thrash the matter out at the dinner table. ("This evening the pure in heart have simply got us on toast.") They come to a decision. They send a servant, Mrs. Matchett, Portia's only confidant in the household, to fetch Portia back in a taxi, as one would send for a lost parcel.

Miss Bowen has elsewhere spoken of "the limitations of English narrative prose, with its longueurs and conventions dangerous to truth." In her novels she has taken every precaution to reduce these conventions to a minimum. The strokes come close, and every stroke tells. Miss Bowen is particularly good at reflecting one character in another, always making it clear that some see things partially while others take in every detail. Matchett, the self-contained upper servant, with her toughened sympathy and snobbery and her pride of the good artisan, sees everything. Eddie sees everything—in his way—and himself, "at once coy and insolent," only too well. Matchett can sum people up. Of the "sacrificing" first Mrs. Quayne she says: "I couldn't care for her; she had no nature"; of Anna: "Oh, she has her taste and dearly loves to use it. Past that she'll never go." Eddie says of Anna: "She loves to make a tart out of another person. She'd never dare to be a proper tart herself." Thomas has an occasional moment of insight into the society about him: "self-interest, given a pretty gloss." But Portia, not yet absorbed into "the guilty plausibility of the world," sees more than everything. She detects the impossibility of a natural human relationship between these people who write letters, go to dinner parties, talk at tea—always "stalking each other." She watches "thoroughly"; she tries to shake some human response out of Eddie; she importunes; she nags with the implacable fury of first love. At the end she gives the show away to simple, kind Major Brutt. "Anna's always laughing at you. She says you are quite pathetic. . . . And Thomas thinks you must be after something. They groan at each other when you have gone away. You and I are the same."

Miss Bowen's talent is so rich and so searching, and this novel stands so far outside the class of novels which resemble packaged goods put up for the trade, that one is tempted to give her nothing but praise. She sees deeply, but not widely enough. Corruption has not lately entered the class of which she writes; the heart is not dying in these people; it never lived in them. And her tone, too keyed up, never lets down for a moment; the longueurs are deleted to such an extent that they are missed. Beautifully done descriptions of times of day and the weather edge the action—to a tiresome degree. The backgrounds for emotions are chosen with care: one, an empty seaside boarding-house on a Sunday morning, is almost unbearably appropriate. Miss Bowen can cook the vulgar English to the same crispness to which she treats their betters. But "The Death of the Heart" is too packed, too brilliant, for its own good. What Miss Bowen lacks is a kind of humility. She has forgotten more than many novelists ever knew, but what Turgenev, for example, knew, and was chary of expressing, she cannot quite deal with. Once in a while the reader hears the accent of self-satisfaction, if not display, in the novelist. But for all that, "The Death of the Heart" deepens our view of the horrors experienced by open innocence up against a closed world.

LOUISE BOGAN

Medical Care in Britain

HEALTH INSURANCE WITH MEDICAL CARE: THE BRITISH EXPERIENCE. By Douglass W. Orr and Jean Walker Orr. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THE authors of this revealing book had the wit to go direct to the producers and the consumers of medical service—rank-and-file British doctors, workingmen and their wives. Even the investigations of two royal commissions which have issued elaborate reports on health insurance during the twenty-five years of its existence never included direct testimony from those whom the British call its beneficiaries and the American Medical Association would describe as its victims.

> The social worker would call on Mrs. Caldwell whose husband works for the L. M. and S. Railway, and Mrs. Caldwell would serve a cup of tea while telling the story of her family's experiences with sickness and with national health insurance. The doctor would meet a group of employed men at one of the settlements and get a discussion started on the whys and wherefores of the "panel system." The men enjoyed it because they in turn could bombard us with questions about Chicago and Hollywood.
>
> Of course we interviewed doctors as well, doctors in private practice as well as doctors in official positions and officers of the British Medical Association. Nor did we neglect civil servants, members of Parliament, and others.

British workers say, "Yes, and more," when asked if they want medical service and health insurance. "Yes," they like what they get now, incomplete as it is. They want "more" care, a fuller service.

British doctors also say, "Yes, and more," when asked what they think about health insurance. This testimony came from everyday doctors and is also the officially expressed opinion of the British Medical Association. Considering that the American Medical Association has for twenty years portrayed health insurance as a failure from the standpoint of the British physician as well as of the public, this testimony is pertinent and overdue.

Official and other literature is drawn on for an account of the structure, history, and problems of British health insurance, tax-supported medical services, hospitals, clinics, and public-health work, but the meat and spice of the book lie in its accounts of what doctors and patients say. Dr. Orr, a young Western physician, did the work on a fellowship from the National Federation of Settlements; his wife, an experienced social worker, shared his responsibilities in collecting information and writing.

Their work is careful although impressionistic, with enough history to give perspective and enough forecast to stir the imagination. British health insurance is a very partial answer to the problems of medical care in Great Britain because it covers only the services of general practitioners, not specialist or hospital care, and only employed persons, not their families. Moreover, a network of tax-supported medical services, voluntary and governmental hospitals, school medical services, and public-health work has also grown up under local and national auspices in Great Britain. The result cannot be called a system because neither is it organized as a whole, nor are its parts coordinated with one another. The Orrs' last chapter, summarizing the British experience and suggesting some applications to our own country, assumes too much and demands too little. It is not enough that we avoid Britain's mistakes. In the United States we can start from a higher level of facilities and resources toward a better goal than the "general medical service for the nation" now proposed by the British Medical Association.

MICHAEL M. DAVIS

Capitalism: A Diagnosis

SEEDS OF DESTRUCTION. By John Blair. Covici-Friede. $4.

THIS sober and careful analysis of the functional weaknesses of capitalism is an admirable index to its subject. Mr. Blair has assembled a massive body of evidence to show that capitalism breaks down because of its inability to observe four axioms. It fails to maintain the army of the employed, and reduces the wages of those whom it continues to employ. It raises prices without a proportionate increase in wages. It distributes too great a proportion of the national income to those in the upper brackets. It needs a power to expand continually which it is unable to achieve. In a sense, Mr. Blair's account is a magistral statistical demonstration of the well-known thesis that while capitalism has solved the main technical problems of production, it has proved unable to solve those of distribution. To prove his point, he has ransacked the available literature for illustrations, so that his volume really becomes an invaluable guide both to the government documents of the last twenty years and to the large number of commentaries with which the economists and statisticians have provided us.

Mr. Blair considers in some detail the methods by which the proponents of capitalism seek to meet the difficulties involved. He rightly emphasizes the fact that their care is the need on the one hand to lower prices and on the other to raise wages. But he shows, I think conclusively, that what he calls the "aggravating trends"—the costs of distribution, for example, the centralization of capitalism, and the disappearance of frontiers—make it extraordinarily unlikely that these difficulties can be transcended. He arrives, in fact, by a route akin to that which the orthodox economists follow, at the conclusion that the contradiction at the heart of capitalism is too profound to be surmounted. The pathology of the system has become so integral a part of its life that the normal concepts of which its exponents dispose have neither relation to nor validity in the system viewed as a going concern. This, of course, raises the essential question of the power of capitalism to survive; and it is, I think, a fair inference from Mr. Blair's impressive evidence that this is not merely highly dubious but, even more, a prospect which offers us the certainty of continued, and even of increased, social tension.

Mr. Blair would, I imagine, be the last to claim either that his thesis is new, or that the manner of his argument is in any sense novel. Its value lies rather in the massive detail by which it is surrounded, and the care with which he has tested the classical assumptions on their own ground. From these angles, the virtue of his treatment is great. He is skilful in the selection of his data and careful in his arrangement of them. Writers like Professor Robbins in England, or Professor Viner in this country, are here presented with a pattern of actuality which calls into fundamental question the validity of the ground they have chosen to occupy in their defense of the existing order. To have done this so clearly and so persuasively is a great merit. It will be interesting to watch the course of the debate to which Mr. Blair's timely volume is bound to give rise. HAROLD J. LASKI

Painter of Pittsburgh

SKY HOOKS. The Autobiography of John Kane. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.50.

SOME day Carl Sandburg should write a poem on John Kane, the workman-painter whose autobiography, "Sky Hooks," is now presented four years after his death. An Irishman born in Scotland in 1860, Kane began to push cars of shale in the mines when he was only ten years old. When he emigrated to America ten years later he again found employment as a miner. He was also a steelworker, a street-paver, watchman at a railroad crossing, construction-gang foreman, munitions worker, master carpenter, and fist-fighter of some renown. It was in the midst of these various occupations that he resumed the drawing a harsh schoolmaster in Scotland had interrupted many years before.

In his early thirties Kane lost a leg in a switchyard. Unwilling to sue, he continued gamely to seek his living with his own hands. He became a house painter; hence the title, which is derived from the grapnels by which a painter's scaffold is fastened to the side of a building. In this pursuit—indeed, it was while he was painting freight cars on his first big contract—he suddenly began to make landscapes which he later covered over with another coat. More and more of his time he gave to drawing. Sundays he painted for his own enjoyment. His interest in painting was enhanced by his sorrow for the death of his only son. During the severe depression of 1907 Kane wandered through Ohio and Pennsylvania, enlarging and tinting photographs. But always he returned to his beloved Pittsburgh and particularly his home in the "Strip," the city's worst slum. Here he did the views of cobbled streets, smudged brick buildings, busy bridges and gray rivers and puffing smokestacks for which he is best known. "Why shouldn't I?" he once retorted. "I helped to build Pittsburgh's mills and homes; I paved its streets, made its steel, and painted its houses. It is my city; why shouldn't I paint it?"

In 1927 the Carnegie International hung one of his industrial landscapes. Soon the dealers came. But Kane continued to be an "outdoor painter" almost to the end of his life. His work is chiefly dependent upon subject matter, though a combination of Gaelic fancy and a most touching wistfulness almost imparts life to his forms as such. A strong, hard, simple man, fighting his way along, he has left at any rate a beginning of the translation of "smoke and steel" to canvas. His book is therefore a significant document in the story of democratic culture. JEROME MELLQUIST

Marxist History of England

A PEOPLE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. By A. L. Morton. Random House. $3.

MR. MORTON has written a Marxist interpretation of English history. Marxism is both a science and a metaphysics. As a science it explains historical phenomena in terms of systems of production and class conflicts. As a metaphysics it goes beyond the facts by assuming that causation in human affairs is, in the last resort, always economic, ideological factors being derivative; and it interprets history teleologically, regarding it as a process toward the predestined end of communism. Marxist science provides the historian with a method of great value; Marxist metaphysics, on the other hand, results only in propaganda. Both these aspects of Marxism are exemplified in Mr. Morton's book.

This is probably the best one-volume popular account of English political and economic history which has appeared. Its style is forceful and vivid, it is based on the most recent research, and it is refreshingly free from that air of patriotic self-congratulation which most British historians assume when they approach such sacred themes as the empire and government by Parliament. Mr. Morton is aware of a number of facts—such as the long oppression of Ireland—which rarely find their way into the official histories; yet at the same time he does not succumb to the temptation to shower abuse upon any character who does not happen to belong to the proletariat. He does not lean too heavily upon the prophets of the Marxist faith; he dutifully inserts a few long quotations from Marx or Lenin, but having paid his respects to holy writ, he then proceeds to ignore it. The only instance in which he allows himself to be led astray is in his repetition of the theory, borrowed by Marx from David Urquhart, that Palmerston was in the pay of Russia. For the most part Mr. Morton takes his facts from competent authorities; and by interpreting them in terms of class conflicts he succeeds in illuminating many episodes in English history—the dictatorship of Cromwell, for example—which, in the hands of more conservative historians, have seemed almost unintelligible.

But if this book exhibits the value of Marxism as a science, it also illustrates—though less obviously—some of the dangers of Marxism as a metaphysics. In the first place, it deals exclusively with politics and economics. Ideological influences are ignored. Mr. Morton devotes one paragraph to a description of Puritan theology, but he says nothing about the social implications of Puritanism or the reasons why Puritanism became the creed of the English bourgeoisie. The great exponents of bourgeois liberalism—John Locke, Adam Smith, Jeremy Bentham—are not even mentioned. Mr. Morton's Marxism is too often of that vulgar variety which treats human beings as governed directly by economic motives; he displays no comprehension of the importance of climates of opinion, which may be strongly influenced by economic factors but are never wholly determined by them; or of how these climates of opinion may often be so pervasive as to govern the behavior of individuals even in violation of their economic interests.

In the second place, Mr. Morton brings to history a theory of value. Certain forces—the bourgeoisie in the seventeenth century, for example—are praised as "progressive"; other forces not so. The Marxist criterion of progressiveness is economic productivity, and this conception unduly narrows the scope of history. Certain non-economic achievements would appear also to be worthy of commendation, even though they cannot be fitted into any chain of events having communism as its end-product. Thus the English bourgeoisie of the seventeenth century was not only economically progressive; it also created a system of individual liberties, based on the rule of law, which appears—now that it is in process of being destroyed—as one of the essentials of civilized living. To this, however, Mr. Morton makes no reference. He mentions the Habeas Corpus Act only to call attention to the fact that early in the nineteenth century it was temporarily suspended. H. B. PARKES

Philanthropic Money

MONEY TO BURN. By Horace Coon. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

MR. COON'S subtitle reads "What the great American philanthropic foundations do with their money," and this phrase is an accurate description of the contents of his essay. The title "Money to Burn" has almost no specified meaning, and is merely another example of how an author may write a book for one purpose and select its title for quite another purpose. There is nothing extravagant about Mr. Coon's facts, his contentions, or his interpretations regarding the way foundations use their money. The total amount appropriated by foundations in each calendar year is not large. I doubt whether it has ever gone beyond one hundred million dollars even when amounts donated by those foundations which appear to operate in semi-secrecy are included. One-tenth of a billion dollars is a comparatively small amount of money in these days. But the problem of philanthropic foundations is important regardless of the comparative size of their capital funds or their disbursements. Mr. Coon's book indicates where this importance lies, and his essay is by all odds the most comprehensive treatment of this problem which has thus far found its way into print.

Why, if the quantitative factor is waived, are foundations important? A complete answer to this query would constitute a critique of American society, and consequently I shall select only a few items for special emphasis. In the first place, foundations and their expenditures reveal something of the quality of mind of the great accumulators of wealth. It is important to know how Messrs. Rockefeller, Carnegie, Russell Sage, Duke, Milbank, Rosenwald, Harkness, Davidson, Filene, Baker, et cetera, have acquired their fortunes, but it is much more important to know what conception of social value dominates their minds. If one disagrees with their interpretation of American life and its underlying values, one does not thereupon raise a personal issue with any of these gentlemen, nor does one resort to the childlike procedure of personal blame-fixing. On the contrary, one assumes, as does Mr. Coon in most instances, that these men are the products of a complex national economy, and that consequently if this economy remains what it is, there will always be men who will interpret life and values in their manner.

In the second place, foundations are important because of their direct and indirect influence upon the policies of educational, social, and religious institutions. The amount which the foundations may contribute to these agencies may be small in comparison with total budgets, but the foundations' appropriation is not scattered; it is an aggregate and it invariably arrives at a strategic moment. Also, foundations make a practice of contributing, not to the whole program of an institution, but rather to a selected fraction which represents the foundations' interests. In this manner foundations exercise an influence upon these agencies which is far out of proportion to the size of their contributions.

Foundations are important, in the third place, because many critics, among them Mr. Coon, appear to believe that they constitute an undemocratic "lump" in American society. To claim the right of doing what one pleases with vast accumulations of surplus wealth which could only have been produced by the labors of many persons seems to these critics to be an unjustifiable presumption. If these large surplus accumulations are to be allowed to continue, so say the critics, then the disposition of such funds should be made through taxation and governmental programs of public welfare, or the foundations should submit to democratic methods of control. Still another of the undemocratic consequences of foundations results from the fact that they so largely control social and economic research. Those who believe in democracy assume that one of its basic necessities is free access to relevant facts, but this cannot be the case if the major research undertakings depend upon foundation grants.

These three spheres of importance do not by any means exhaust the tabulation of reasons which should impel serious students of American society to give attention to philanthropic foundations. As intimated at the outset of this review, anyone who attempts to understand these American foundations and their role will find himself wrestling with the deeper paradoxes of American culture. When, as in the case of Mr. Coon, he discovers how much good has been done by foundation grants, especially in the field of health, he will find clear-cut judgments difficult to make. Mr. Coon, who is certainly one of the severest critics of foundations, their donors, and their executives, closes his essay with a paragraph which begins thus, "There is no point in trying to pass a moral judgment on foundations." And the paragraph ends with this sentence, "It is, in short, a question for public opinion to decide."

Mr. Coon's book should then be viewed in the light of these two summary questions. He is occupied first of all with presenting to the public the essential facts about the larger foundations, and in this respect his performance is excellent in spite of his obvious bias. He offers no proposals for the future control of foundations, although he assumes that they will increase in numbers and influence. He believes that foundations represent primarily a device for protecting

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame

the privileges of the rich or for evading taxation. Mixed with these two incentives are valid intentions of doing good, and in spite of the suspected motives much real good results. This conclusion may seem to some readers to be equivocal because it appears to say that good ends justify their means, but as a fellow-inquirer in this area of mixed motivations, I ask such readers to suspend judgment and read Mr. Coon's essay in the mood which he suggests, namely, as a prelude to a more enlightened public opinion.

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN

Shorter Notices

THE CARNIVAL. By Frederic Prokosch. Harper and Brothers. $2.

In one of his stanzas Frederic Prokosch writes:

> And so on this windless morning, forgive,
> Lord, my superfluous words and narcissus
> Athletics. Hunger, control, the Eye, and the endless
> Longing to love and discern: let these be my power.

Perhaps the Lord will forgive him, but there is no apparent reason why critics should. He is so completely a literary poet, facile to no end, without any clear vision, and certainly without any distinction or originality of style, that one can only put him down as decadent and romantic. In poem after poem he has a chance to be something else than narcissist, but he remains that and nothing more. The sad young man on the flying trapeze of rhythm and rhyme is anything but unique today. And consider this approach to the modern world:

> The burglars in the prison
> And the beggars in the park
> Drew their arms across their faces
> And cried into the dark
> "O love whom you wish, no matter,
> Love is a silver stream
> That leaps and finally wastes away
> On the wrinkled sands of dream!"

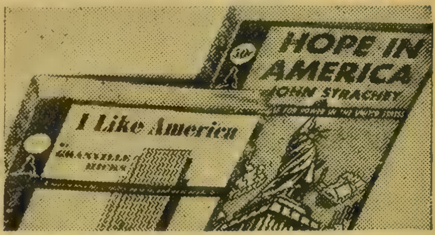
Every phrase is trite, an echo of a vague, decadent romanticism—with the sound but not the significance of poetry.

THE OLD CENTURY. AND SEVEN MORE YEARS. By Siegfried Sassoon. The Viking Press. $2.75.

For a young English aristocrat the Edwardian period must have been one of the nicest if not the best of all possible worlds. In "The Old Century," the first volume of his autobiography, Siegfried Sassoon writes the mellow story of a good boy, a happy society, a fortunate era. Was it all really, the author somewhat uneasily asks, so amiably experienced? "And I feel the unbending visages of the realists reproving me for failing to imitate their awful and astringent example." Confronted by an attitude so disarming, a polished craft, a sensitive if not always a strong artist, one cannot quite level criticism at this pleasant garden of English sensibility. To complain about "The Old Century"—with its horses, tutors, and cricket matches, its pre-Raphaelite paintings and distinguished family connections—would be to display ourselves as strangers at a literary banquet which is, in fact, beautifully served. Yet such a stranger at such a banquet,

MODERN AGE
OFFERS THE BOOKS OF THE DAY AT A PRICE YOU CAN PAY

50c EACH



1. HOPE IN AMERICA
by John Strachey. They wouldn't let him talk, but you can still read his study of the struggle for power in the U. S. "Thousands of people will want to read it."—N. Y. Times. 50¢

2. SCHOOL FOR BARBARIANS
by Erika Mann. Thomas Mann's daughter tells the frightful facts about education under the Nazis and what it is doing to Germany's children. "Sensational but documented."—Time. Introduction by Thomas Mann. 50¢

3. I LIKE AMERICA
by Granville Hicks. A native sees the country he loves as it is, and as it might be. A moving and thoughtful book. "Should be read by student, politician and housewife—regardless of political creed."—St. Louis Post-Dispatch. 50¢

4. ONE-FIFTH OF MANKIND
by Anna Louise Strong. The story of China's heroic struggle for freedom. "The best short account of the war in China to date."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. 50¢

75c EACH

JAPANESE TERROR IN CHINA
Investing in Disaster
E. A. Gilbert
Introduction

5. LIFE INSURANCE: Investing in Disaster
by Mort and E. A. Gilbert. It tells what's wrong with the insurance racket and what you can do about it. Introduction by Arthur Kallet. 75¢

6. JAPANESE TERROR IN CHINA
by H. J. Timperley. Not an atrocity tale but the authentic documented accounts of neutral eyewitnesses who reveal in the day by day accounts of rape, robbery, murder, the meaning of modern war. 75¢

7. SPECIAL 95c

For the use of medical and allied professions only
PRACTICAL BIRTH-CONTROL METHODS
by Norman E. Himes, Ph.D. A practical manual prepared with the medical collaboration of Dr. Abraham Stone. Introduction by R. L. Dickinson. Foreword by Havelock Ellis. 95¢

FREE EXAMINATION: If you aren't delighted with these books you can return them within 5 days for a full refund.

MODERN AGE, 432 Fourth Ave., N. Y.
Please send me the books encircled below:
1 2 3 4 5 6 7
Name ....
Address ....
☐ I enclose............(10¢ extra per book for shipping.)
☐ Send me a complete list of books.
N2

might he not mutter to himself that this meal is mostly appetizer and dessert? Lacking the vitality and wit which distinguish the best of his previous work, Mr. Sassoon's new book is almost too unassuming. Appearing so sedately and politely amid our other contemporary chronicles of turbulent adolescence, "The Old Century" reminds us of nothing so much as Mr. Pinkerton among the young Lonigans.

THE SILVER BRANCH. By Seán O'Faoláin. Viking Press. $2.

"These fifty-odd poems"—drawn from Irish medieval literature—"are but a tiny proportion of masses of technically admirable but otherwise inconceivably dull, dish-waterish drivel such as can have pleased no one but the pedants," says Seán O'Faoláin in a brief but leisurely introduction. They were a product of the bardic schools where poets underwent a training of from five to fifteen years; and by their quiet intimacy they overturn a good many theories. Surely such poetry, so rich, so secure, must have come from a broad movement; it didn't. Schooling must have killed the poetic impulse altogether, particularly since the poems were concerned mainly with nature, but the impulse survived. Seán O'Faoláin says that this was the first poetry west of the Danube to treat of nature as a friend, and he contrasts its objective qualities with the broad symbolism of English verse. The argument might be carried farther, but no one will contend against such poems as The Sleep Song of Diarmuid or The Blackbird of Derrycairn or the sequence on Sweeney the Mad, which makes a miniature cycle. This is not a bold but a tempered poetry, achieving its effect syllable by soft syllable without apparent effort, sturdy, dramatic even, yet undramatized in the conscious, heroic modes.

DRAMA

Cucumber Sandwiches

"THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST" has reached that dangerous age at which literary works are unmistakably outmoded without having become, so far at least, unquestionable classics. It has, however, just received an elaborate revival at the Vanderbilt Theater, and it survives the test rather remarkably well. The audience was not—if I am any judge—an audience of literary historians, and it sat rather dubious through the opening scene during which Algernon and Jack exchange epigrams. But before the evening was over, it was laughing that laugh of pleasure which is so easily distinguishable from the laugh of those who are performing their cultural duties. And that, after all, is the test.

Estelle Winwood, who plays Lady Bracknell and who staged the piece, seems to have approached her job with a clear perception of what the difficulties are. On the whole, the epigrams may be left to look after themselves, since time has tarnished them remarkably little. But the danger is that a modern audience may disallow even the slender claims which "The Importance of Being Earnest" makes to being a play, and that it will become no more than a series of bright remarks. If it is to be saved from this fate, it must be given an artificial style; but if it is also to be saved from another and worse fate, this style must be recognized as one inherent in the play itself, not one imposed in condescension by a modern director.

One cannot, in other words, successfully play it as a period piece. Oscar Wilde is "sophisticated" or nothing. He cannot be made quaint and survive; any tendency to laugh at rather than with him is utterly fatal; any silliness must be obviously the kind of silliness he intended. For all of these reasons there are dangers inherent in giving the play in the costumes of the period, and I was, in fact, seriously alarmed when the first full-bodied laugh of the evening was won by the riotous pattern of the trousers assigned to Clifton Webb in the role of Jack. That way, I said, lies disaster. But that way is not followed; there is no attempt to spoof the play; and it gets its effects by remaining what the author intended—a "smart" fantasy which provides its precious dandies with the only kind of world in which they could successfully function.

Wilde played at being a socialist. "The Importance of Being Earnest" is fantasy rather than satire in the graver meaning of the term because Wilde, like Congreve before him, had a sneaking admiration for the dandies whom he ridiculed, and infinitely preferred such irresponsible exquisites to dull though useful citizens. The fact, nevertheless, remains that the charm of his fools and the charm of all the dandies from Congreve on is subject to an economic interpretation. The privilege which they enjoy of "treating serious things trivially and trivial things seriously" is the result of the enviable freedom which their security confers upon them. If (pace Veblen) one wears gloves to indicate that one does not have to work, one talks nonsense to prove that one does not even have to think. Wilde's greatest achievement in this particular play consists in his perfect imaginative realization of the ideal toward which the fashionable exquisite is tending and his creation of a realm in which his dandies can flutter through life successfully.

If this seems no very difficult achievement, try to remember other comedies in which the trick has been turned with complete success. I can remember but one successful play since Wilde's time which belongs to exactly the same genre—Benn Levy's "Springtime for Henry." And that reminds me that though the present production is rather remarkably well played by Miss Winwood, Mr. Webb, Hope Williams, Derek Williams, and Florence McGee, I still cherish a desire born at the performance of "Springtime for Henry." I should like to see Nigel Bruce, as Jack, playing opposite Romney Brent, as Algernon.

"Dear Octopus" (Broadhurst Theater) is a spacious, rambling, and somewhat drafty family play by Dodie Smith, the Englishwoman who was responsible for the highly successful "Call It a Day" of a few seasons back. That play, it will be remembered, held its episodes together by assuming that each was participated in by a member of a family which had been struck all of a sudden by the awakening of spring. "Dear Octopus" is also about a family, but this time the three generations of its members gather for a golden-wedding celebration and stay long enough to give everybody a glimpse of their history as well as to reveal their characters. Nothing is so very different from what one would anticipate. For instance, one of the daughters has grown fat and motherly, one has been living uncomfortably with a married man who cannot get a divorce, and one has got a bit neurotic by devoting herself too whole-heartedly to a career. Neither is the thesis very surprising, since it boils down to the contention that if families are not quite what they used to be they haven't changed so very much after all. The play is, nevertheless, entertaining enough provided one is in the mood for a tranquil evening, and it is well acted by a large cast of well-known players, among whom the most striking is certainly Lucille Watson as the bossy but sensible matriarch. Lillian Gish is also well cast as a mousy "companion" to the old lady and gets in the end a proposal of marriage from a bachelor son—to the great surprise of no one except the young man himself.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

IF YOU approach the Columbia record ($1.50) of an excerpt from Berlioz's "Childhood of Christ" with the accepted notion of Berlioz as a sensation-monger who used noise to cover up melodic sterility, you will be surprised by the delicacy of this music, the rich, sustained flow of what is not the less melody for being highly individual in the way that Berlioz's musical thought is. The playing of the Paris Symphony and the singing of Planel under Ruhlmann are excellent (someone who knows the work very well has pointed out that the two allelujas sung at the end by Planel should be sung by chorus); and the record is accompanied, as every single record should be, by a little sheet with an English translation of the text, but without the original French that should have been given as well.

A few Victor single records are also noteworthy. One ($2) gives Toscanini's delightful performance with the B. B. C. Symphony of Rossini's Overture to "La Scala di Seta," which falls considerably short of his miraculous performance with the New York Philharmonic. Another ($1.50) gives Mozart's youthful Overture to "La Finta Giardiniera," in which there is the same extraordinary rush and impact as in the youthful letters I referred to in my review of Turner's book, and which is well done by the Vienna Philharmonic under Walter, with the mature but less interesting Overture to "Titus" on the reverse side. Then there is a version ($2) of that soprano's battle-horse, "Ozean, du Ungeheuer!" from "Oberon," which acquires distinction from the way it is done —the superb playing of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy in support of the singing of Flagstad, whose musical feeling and taste are as impressive as ever, and whose voice is still remarkable though not what it was. Play one of her first records—e. g., the finale of "Tristan"; and though it does not fully reproduce the splendor of the voice of four years ago it will enable you to hear in the record of "Oberon"

FAULKNER'S
most startling theme — and his most interesting heroine

The WILD PALMS

By William Faulkner

This is the story of two lovers who traded grief for the memory of flesh, and regretted no part of their bargain. Charlotte's story may shock a few people, for its unusual theme as well as its honest language, but it will be greeted by most readers as the first clarion statement of the world's epidemic of lovelessness. Faulkner tells this powerful story against another which interlocks with it in theme—that of a convict swept free of a prison camp by flood, struggling to get back to the "safety" of prison walls and so rejecting women and freedom alike. "The impact is terrific."—John Chamberlain, in Harper's. 340 pages, $2.50

The BEST SHORT PLAYS of the SOCIAL THEATRE

Edited, with an Introduction

By William Kozlenko

The complete and unabridged texts of ten important plays: Waiting for Lefty, Bury the Dead, Hymn to the Rising Sun, The Cradle Will Rock, Private Hicks, Plant in the Sun, This Earth Is Ours, Give All Thy Terrors to the Wind, Running Dogs, The Dog Beneath the Skin. 456 pages, $2.50.

Just Published

THE MAN WHO KILLED LINCOLN

The Story of John Wilkes Booth

By Philip Van Doren Stern

Mr. Stern treats the story of Booth not merely as history, but as drama—and as a study in the psychology of murder. The result is grand, exciting reading. 384 pages, $3.00.

Now in its FIFTH printing

MAN'S HOPE

By André Malraux

is the outstanding WAR NOVEL of a generation. It is selling at the rate of nearly a thousand copies a week. $2.50.

RANDOM HOUSE 20 E. 57 St., N.Y.

If Plato were alive what would he have to say about today's problems?

PLATO TODAY

By R. H. S. CROSSMAN

The teachings of Plato have never ceased to interest intelligent men and women, primarily because the very questions which interested him are to a great extent still alive today. The author has taken Plato's teachings and applied them directly to today's political gospels and leaders: Democracy, American Politics and Education, Fascism, Communism, Roosevelt, Lenin, Hitler, Stalin, etc. The result is a most stimulating and thought-provoking volume. $2.50

THE MEDITERRANEAN IN POLITICS

By ELIZABETH MONROE

Is the Mediterranean rapidly becoming Europe's next danger point? Who wants what? Why? This volume, not so much a history of the relations of the great European powers, as a survey of the motives which determine their policies, will enable every reader to read behind the lines in today's news. $2.50

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

2nd Annual Dance for Spain
MECCA TEMPLE
133 West 55th St.
SUNDAY Eve. at 8:15, Feb. 5th
Maria GAMBARELLI
MARTHA GRAHAM
Doris HUMPHREY - Chas. WEIDMAN and Dance Group
Arthur MAHONEY · Thalia MARA
Juan MARTINEZ & ANTONITA
EDWIN MICHAELS of "Pinocchio"
HAL LEROY ANNA SOKOLOW TAMIRIS
FELICIA SOREL'S "Railroad Dance"
from Marc Connolly's play "Everywhere I Roam"
Tickets: $2.20 $1.65 $1.10 85¢ 55¢ Box Seats $5.50
At American Dance Association, 1580 B'way (46th St.) Med. Bur. & No. American Committee, 381 4th Ave. (27th St.). Workers Bookshop, 50 East 13th Street. Leblangs, B'way at [illegible] Street and all University Bookshops
Sponsored by American Dance Association
Benefit MEDICAL BUREAU & NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY

NOW you may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

how much that voice has lost through the excessive use it has been subjected to by managers' greed and Flagstad's recklessness—such things as the four Wagner performances in seven days, the three in three days, as compared with the two performances a week that Caruso never exceeded.

In Strauss's Symphonia Domestica—and in the brilliant recording by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy (five records, $10)—one has dazzling evidence of the prodigious technical powers which, after "Don Quixote," continued undiminished while the quality of the musical thinking they served deteriorated in appalling fashion. In contrast to this decay clothed in luxuriance is sterility clothing itself in the liveliness and other mere externals of inner vitality: Hindemith's String Quartet Opus 22, well played by the Coolidge Quartet (three records, $6.50). And in contrast to both works, in its charmingly melodious expression of genuine feeling, is Smetana's "Die Moldau," of which Victor issues a new recording in a set (three records, $5) with "From Bohemia's Meadows and Fields," another beautiful work from the same symphonic cycle. The performances are by the excellent Czech Philharmonic, conducted not too effectively by Rafael Kubelik.

The new Victor set of "La Bohème" (two volumes, $19.50) gives you Gigli, with iron replacing the velvet that is gone from his voice; it gives you the acidulous Mimi and Musetta you are likely to hear nowadays, and a good Marcello; it gives you a performance with no style other than the mannerisms of Italian singers uncontrolled by a Toscanini. Or even a Beecham, whose version of Act IV not only is better sung and played but bears the impress of a distinguished and forceful musical intelligence. The brilliant dances from Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" are brilliantly played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler (two records, $2.50); Cortot does a good job with Liszt's "St. Francis Walking on the Water" ($2), which I find a negligible work; and Elisabeth Schumann's singing of passages from "Hänsel and Gretel" ($1.50) is charming. As for Hertha Glatz, her contralto is not one of great sensuous beauty, but its limitations are less apparent in Schubert's "Frühlingstraum," which she sings with greater taste and restraint than his "Gretchen am Spinnrade" ($2).

Even the early arranged portion of the Benny Goodman Orchestra's performance of "My Honey's Lovin' Arms" (Victor) is delightful in pace and style (except for the meaningless and irritating staccato interjections by the brass that are part of the Goodman formula); and in the second half good solos by Goodman (particularly his second entrance) and Bud Freeman lead into an extended development of the tune by Stacy that becomes exciting as his invention becomes richer and more intricate. And "Farewell Blues" on the reverse side has a fine solo by Goodman. Altogether it is an outstanding record; and another that is quite good offers performances of "Louise" and "It Had to Be You."

Stacy's emotional soundness and health and rich imagination are to be enjoyed in his solos in Commodore's "Swingin' Without Mezz" and—on another record—"Blue Room" and "Exactly Like You"; but with them is too much playing by Freeman—straining improvisation by a man without ideas. Very fine is Commodore's "Three Keyboards," with Stacy, Willie Smith, and Joe Bushkin. B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Lift the Embargo—or Else

Dear Sirs: At a moment when all Spain is making the supreme effort for the defense of its integrity, it seems incredible that its friends in the United States should deliberately make its sacrifices futile. Yet this is happening—and it seems impossible to stop it.

Lifting the embargo in the United States is the key to the defeat of fascism in Spain. By itself, this single act will enable the Loyalists to neutralize Franco's great superiority in airplanes and armaments. Nothing else will do the trick.

For a variety of reason the White House has been the main force in inspiring and continuing the embargo. It was a special Presidential message to Congress that evoked the almost unanimous approval of the Embargo Act of January, 1937; the embargo was continued in force through the Administration-sponsored Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937; finally, when an aroused America demanded the lifting of the embargo in May of 1938, the entire campaign was smashed by Secretary Hull's letter to Senator Pittman demanding that the embargo be continued.

Any campaign to lift the embargo must face these facts and be guided by them. Rockwell Kent summed up the situation bluntly at the Washington Conference to Lift the Embargo when he declared that it was about time that the advocates of lifting the embargo announced that, unless action was forthcoming, the support they had given to the Administration would be withdrawn.

Nothing like this has been done. From those strange friends of Spain who have their axes to grind comes the hysterical cry, "We must not embarrass the President! The President will lift the embargo; let us not embarrass him!" Let us be honest enough to recognize that a "Lift the Embargo" campaign conducted with the idea of exerting real pressure and forcing action from the White House will embarrass the President only if he does not intend to lift the embargo. Let us be honest enough to recognize that we are sacrificing the Spanish people so that we may not "embarrass the President."

SAMUEL ROMER

New York, January 18

Good News

Dear Sirs: It is not often that I write in to The Nation, and still less often that I find occasion to write in a festive or happy mood concerning any event of importance, but I know you will not mind my rejoicing with you over the freedom of Tom Mooney. Indeed, there has been such a succession of good news—Frankfurter, Governor Murphy, the President's utterances about the Boches, and now Mooney—that a belief in Santa Claus is entirely justified.

The Nation has played a big part in this happy ending to the Mooney story—your many articles have carried proofs of his innocence that have been the basis of thousands of arguments on the part of your readers, and have been responsible for much of the money contributed to the cause. It affects me, personally to the extent that I shall now enjoy a visit to California, having long ago sworn never to set foot in the state so long as Mooney was in prison.

It is gratifying to read in the kept press of this country that not once is the least question raised of any possibility that Mooney might have been guilty, and even the Paris edition of the New York Herald Tribune gave him the first three columns of its front page.

Let me take this opportunity to wish The Nation a very happy and influential New Year. I have been with you for many years now, and I have yet to see you on the wrong side of any question.

C. C.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, January 9

Obituary of a Jew

Dear Sirs: The Italian publisher, A. F. Formiggini, committed suicide on December 1 last by leaping from the Ghirlandina tower of his native city, Modena. In his pockets were found 30,000 lire, which he bequeathed to the poor, and several notes of biting irony against the regime.

Formiggini was never a conformist. A man of independent spirit, a humanist whose smiling skepticism concealed a frank and often ingenuous goodness, it was inevitable that he should clash with the regime's intolerance and corruption. All his editorial enterprises, aiming at the defense and elevation of Italian culture, found in fascism either open opposition or insidious resistance. From his "Chi è?" the Italian "Who's Who," he was ordered to suppress the name of anyone whom fascism considered persona non grata. Several volumes of his collections of literary studies, "Profili," were removed from circulation. Publication of L' Italia che scrive, Italy's outstanding bibliographical magazine, which he founded in 1918, was made increasingly difficult.

Although all this had embittered him, he was not completely disheartened. The crowning blow came with the anti-Semitic campaign, the artificial character and ignoble baseness of which filled him with revolt.

His death was a protest against the senseless brutality of racial persecution. But no newspaper dared to print the news of his death, for the names of Jews, even in obituary notices, must no longer contaminate the columns of the Fascist press.

MICHELE CANTARELLA
MAX SALVADORI

Northampton, Mass., January 17

Seldes vs. Villard

Dear Sirs: The same conspiracy of silence which followed the publication of Mr. Sinclair's "Brass Check" in 1920 follows my "Lords of the Press." Of the more than a hundred big papers criticized only one has published a fair review, and only two or three have mentioned the book in terms of abuse, self-defense, or evasion. On the other hand, a hundred of more liberal-left-labor publications have published fair and honest reviews.

Mr. Villard's review in The Nation (January 7) is more puzzling to me than the silence of the big press or the praise of the liberal press. It does not make sense. It consists of three paragraphs. The "lead," in which Mr. Villard expresses "disappointment" and cites the case of David Stern and the November, 1938, Pennsylvania elections, is obviously unfair, if not ridiculous. The book was in The Nation's office before November 1; it had been completed in August, and although Mr. Villard mentions the probability of it having gone to press before the election, he still in the main part of his review deals with an episode which occurred after it. Is this fair newspaper work? Incidentally he says the book "is composed in part of articles contributed to magazines." This is not accurate. The two chapters on Scripps-Howard are different from my New Republic article; the Treason on the Times chapter is double the magazine article; the Journalistic Noblesse chapter, which appeared in The Nation, has a new beginning.

Paragraph 2 accuses me of using the attitude of the press to the New Deal as a measure of liberalism and reaction. This is not quite so. The book states that the press has attacked every liberal, progressive, and reform measure, and especially every law and idea which might reduce its cash profits. The New Deal is one example; there are many others. The cockeyed quotation in this paragraph is from the Baltimore Sun although in the review it appears to be mine. Mr. Villard complains that there is no factual description of the collapse of the Hearst chain. Hearst was held down to a short chapter because he has been overdone in the magazines. Mr. Villard says he missed the story of the "marked decline of the Scripps-Howard dailies." He should have read the two chapters, pages 76 to 103, the longest single subject in the book.

In paragraph 3 Mr. Villard quotes me as saying that my ten tests of a free press came "on the spur of the moment" and suggests that others "might suggest themselves after more deliberation." Why did not Mr. Villard continue reading down to the bottom of page 388, to this paragraph: "The following tests of a free press have been suggested by newspapermen, editors, and school-of-journalism professors who have read this manuscript"? There follow five more tests of a free press. A score of notable persons in journalism contributed to this chapter, and a hundred newspapermen helped supply the book's stories, facts, and documentation. Mr. Villard's remark about "more tests after more deliberation" is so unfair that he should apologize or explain.

GEORGE SELDES

New York, January 16

Dear Sirs: I am sorry to have puzzled and disappointed Mr. Seldes, whose studies of the American press I value highly and have often praised, but I cannot alter my review. I even dissent from his new charge that the entire press "has attacked every liberal, progressive, and reform measure . . . which might reduce its cash profits." There are fine exceptions. I did read the pages he cites. That "scores" aided him does not change my opinion that more tests of a newspaper could be worked out after further study.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

New York, January 18

Dr. Langford's Advice

Dear Sirs: In a letter published in your issue of January 14 Professor John L. Childs says: "Dr. Langford publicly admits I was asked to discuss union problems [meaning problems of the Teachers' Union—H. D. L.] with Mr. Earl Browder and Mr. Clarence Hathaway." I have nowhere admitted any such position; I have never stated it or held it, either publicly or privately.

In view of Professor Childs's reiterated personal attack I am obliged to restate the gist of my conversations with him, in order to clarify my position beyond the possibility of misinterpretation. It should be made clear from the start that in my conversations with Professor Childs I was not acting as the official representative or envoy of any group, but as a private individual, engaging in a friendly conversation.

Categorically, I did not say or imply to Professor Childs (contrary to his statement in the New York Post of December 29) that a "factional bloc" existed in the Columbia chapter of the Teachers' Union. Secondly, I did not ask him to discuss Teachers' Union problems with the Communist leaders. I did suggest to Professor Childs that since he had questions as to how Communists work in trade unions generally, the best way to clear up his doubts would be to go to original sources, just as someone seeking authoritative information about the Republican Party might be directed to Hamilton or Hoover.

I neither stated nor implied that Professor Childs should discuss Teachers' Union affairs with Mr. Browder and Mr. Hathaway.

HOWARD D. LANGFORD

New York, January 16

Excitement in Vermont

Dear Sirs: Much excitement is raging here in Montpelier, and doubtlessly throughout the electric-power industry of the state, over the prospect of a flood-control dam being constructed by the federal government within the bounds of this state that might be utilized to produce electric power for public consumption. I can see no real cause for excitement other than that such a piece of engineering might slightly lessen the income of the Green Mountain Power Corporation, a subsidy of the New England Power Corporation.

If the government can build a flood-control hydroelectric structure in this state, or any other, and obtain efficiency in both these directions; sell the electricity produced at one-third to one-fifth what we now pay for it; and make the enterprise pay for itself in a few years—well, to me it is inconceivable that an intelligent person would object.

They did it in the Tennessee Valley—why can't it be done here? The real trouble is that "certain ones" are afraid it will be done here.

RICHARD W. CRANE

Montpelier, Vt., January 19

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT S. ALLEN is coauthor with Drew Pearson of the syndicated newspaper column Washington Merry-Go-Round.

ELIOT JANEWAY has just completed a survey of manufacturers and industries doing business in war supplies.

GENEVIEVE TABOUIS is a well-known French newspaperwoman.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is the author of "Reflections on the End of an Era" and "Beyond Tragedy."

McALISTER COLEMAN is a New Jersey journalist.

LOUISE BOGAN is the poetry critic of the New Yorker.

MICHAEL M. DAVIS is chairman of the Committee on Research in Medical Economics.

HAROLD J. LASKI, on leave from the London School of Economics, is teaching at the University of Washington.

H. B. PARKES is a member of the History Department of New York University.

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN is the author of "Wealth and Culture."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs, Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 4, 1939 NUMBER 6

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 133

EDITORIALS:

- AFTER BARCELONA? 135
- OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE 136
- NOT-THE-LAW HAGUE 137
- LABOR'S FIFTH COLUMN 138

AMERICA IN THE POST-MUNICH WORLD. II. AMERICA ARMS ITS RIVALS by Eliot Janeway 139

BEWILDERED BRITAIN by Aylmer Vallance 141

THE BALTIMORE SUN GOES DOWN by Willard R. Espy 143

LIVING PHILOSOPHIES. IX. ONLY SYMBOLS MATTER by Emil Ludwig 147

POCKET GUIDE by Helen Woodward 150

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 151

IN THE WIND 152

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

- FEROCIOUS FAULKNER by Robert Morss Lovett 153
- PERSONAE AND MASKS by Horace Gregory 153
- FRIEND OF RULERS by Rustem Vambéry 154
- HISTORY OF LABOR by Philip Taft 155
- PERSONAL LEGEND by Morton Dauwen Zabel 156
- DRAMA: CLIO AND THALIA by Joseph Wood Krutch 157
- FILMS by Franz Hoellering 158

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TVA IS BEING established on a piecemeal basis. In 1936 the Supreme Court, with Justice McReynolds alone dissenting, held that the TVA was within its rights in acquiring the transmission lines of the Alabama Power Company, and that the federal government might sell electricity developed as part of a flood-control, navigation, or national-defense program. By a vote of five to two, Justices Butler and McReynolds dissenting and former Solicitor General Stanley F. Reed abstaining, the court has now ruled that private utilities in the TVA area have no right to protection from government competition. Justice Roberts, speaking for the majority, said that "local franchises, while having elements of property, confer no contractual or property right to be free from competition either from individuals, other public-utility corporations, or the state or municipality granting the franchise." In answer to allegations made by the fourteen private power companies which brought the suit, the Supreme Court upheld the finding of the District Court that the TVA "has not indulged in coercion, duress, fraud, or misrepresentation in procuring contracts with municipalities, cooperatives, or other purchasers of power; has not acted with any malicious or malevolent motive; and has not conspired with municipalities or other purchasers of power." The court declined to enjoin the TVA from building more dams, generating more power, or marketing power in the territory of the plaintiffs. There was a time when the Supreme Court could be depended upon to provide a convenient legalistic stockade against projects such as the TVA. That time is no more. Mr. Roosevelt's court battle was lost, but it begins to look as if a war had been won.

*

THE SENATE TORIES HAVE TRIUMPHED OVER the President and the unemployed and are now basking in the sunshine of press approval. It is true that in upholding the $150,000,000 WPA cut they added two conscience-saving amendments. Dismissals during the next two months are to be limited to 5 per cent of the rolls on February 1; and the President may apply for an additional appropriation if he can show that an emergency exists. Neither of these amendments suggests that the economy bloc has great faith in its claim that private industry will provide new jobs exceeding WPA dismissals. Business, it is argued, has received from Congress the gesture it has been awaiting and will now go ahead with expansion plans. We hope this forecast proves accurate, but we note with misgiving that since January 1 the recovery curve has flattened out. Moreover, a spring recovery will hardly be assisted by the dismissal of hundreds of thousands of relief workers in April and May, as must occur under the amended terms of the appropriation. Analysis of the Senate voting lists on the cut reveals some interesting facts. The actual population represented by the majority was some 8½ millions less than that represented by the minority. The Democrats who deserted to the tory ranks were nearly all from farm states. We wonder if they were wise to use the overweighted representation of the rural areas to attack the unemployed, and whether their zeal for economy will still be manifested when farm relief comes to a vote.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

BOTH ON ITS MERITS AND AS A SIGN OF THE President's state of mind, the nomination of ex-Congressman Thomas R. Amlie to the Interstate Commerce Commission is an encouraging event. The picture of Mr. Roosevelt as a fellow-traveler consorting with like-minded leftists has been luridly drawn by his enemies; it is a grossly inaccurate one. In fact, while groping toward economic reconstruction the President has often been surrounded by aides as treacherous as they were half-hearted. In his recent appointments, culminating in the choice of Amlie, one detects a belated but serious attempt to rally a corps of associates who have manifested a consistent faith in New Deal objectives. The anti-New Deal coalition, so fierce in its denunciations of the White House "purge," is therefore renewing its own "purge." Against Amlie it has invoked the customary charge of communism, an accusation which any reader of the Communist press would find especially grotesque. The Wisconsin legislature has embodied this falsehood in a special resolution of protest, an extraordinary sign of the reactionary undertow in that state. The fight against Amlie's confirmation will undoubtedly be more ruthless than that against any other recent appointee; the vote will be a token of Administration strength.

*

WE GO TO PRESS WITH THE ECHOES OF Hitler's speech still sounding on the air waves. It was not an easy speech to follow. The Führer talked for almost two and a half hours and covered a vast area of boasts, future plans, vague threats, and defensive arguments. Out of the sea of words a few major points emerged; others will probably bob up to the surface during the next few days. Hitler asserted flatly that he would support Mussolini in any war in which Italy might be involved; he did not tell how far he would back Italian demands that might lead to war. He also announced his determination to get back the former German colonies. They were not, he said, of major importance to the country before the World War; now they are necessary to supply the Reich with raw materials which it cannot buy. In the face of foreign doubts he asserted the soundness and stability of the Nazi economy; but in the next breath he admitted that the German farmer had about reached his productive capacity, that the Reich would have to import food, and if it could not buy it for lack of foreign exchange, the German people would take it by force. He did not specify when or from whom. He sneered at democracy as a dying system. He hailed the "victory" of fascism in Spain, but did not discuss his own future relations with Franco. The cultural agreement just signed by Germany and the Spanish rebels indicates clearly enough, however, the degree to which a fascist Spain would be expected to gear into the Nazi system. His speech as a whole was that of a dictator who is feeling his oats. Without announcing any definite program of action, Hitler managed to be both truculent and threatening. Those newspapers in France and England who have already announced their gratification at his "moderate" tone are, we think, either fooling themselves or their public. We find no hint of appeasement in his speech anywhere.

*

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR OFFICIALS last week rewarded William Randolph Hearst for his long years of service to the anti-labor movement. The Chicago Federation has now undertaken the organization of "scabs" into an exclusive club called the Chicago Editorial Association, designed to put a crimp in the Chicago Newspaper Guild strike on the Hearst papers. Achievement of this organization took some months of effort, but the labor was rewarded when the Hearst-owned Chicago Herald and Examiner benignly signed up with this group. A similar suicide pact for labor is now being prepared on the Chicago American. Naturally the event has stirred rejoicing among publishers everywhere, inspiring many of them to break the long silence maintained by their news columns on the Chicago strike. These shabby moves of the Chicago Federation should not be given exaggerated significance, for the strike's status is virtually unaltered. Hundreds of men and women remain out, Hearst's Chicago circulation is falling, advertisers have been persuaded to withdraw, and popular sentiment in behalf of the strikers is impressively strong and representative. More than ever it is clear that Chicago is a testing ground for a national publishers' offensive against the Guild. It is also a laboratory for one of the A. F. of L.'s most brazen experiments in dual unionism.

THIS IS THE ERA OF THE LIE. GOING ON THE theory that the more outrageous the deception the more surely people will imagine that it has at least a kernel of truth, the Fascists and the Nazis lay down an incessant barrage: democracy is decadent and crooked; only dictatorship is truly democratic; only the saber-rattlers want peace; food sent to the Loyalists is insolent intervention in the Spanish war, while the boasted participation of armed Italian legions is non-intervention. But the lie has not triumphed yet, and it may not triumph at all if the people of the democracies recall the truths on which political democracy rests and make them their guiding principles. To stimulate this "quickening impulse" the Survey Graphic has just published a special issue entitled "Calling America." Under the editorship of Raymond Gram Swing, this issue is divided into three sections: Consequences of Modern Despotism Abroad, Tests of Democracy at Home, and Democracy in America. Mr. Swing and his colleagues are clearsighted enough to realize that democracy will not be saved by rhetoric but by concrete social and economic achievement—"Its health is its only propaganda." But they know too that no one can prepare a blueprint for democracy, that democracy is "an attitude, not a solution." The will to save it must come first. We congratulate the Survey Graphic and hope that this excellent issue has the wide distribution it deserves.

*

THE DEATH OF WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS AT seventy-three ends a career as distinguished for preeminence in his special art, poetry, as it is astonishing for its versatility. For the historian, his intimate connection with the Irish nationalist movement, not only in literature but also in politics, for he served as Senator, will buttress the intensity and magnitude of his poetic achievement. Having founded, with Lady Gregory, the Abbey Theater, Yeats was for thirty years its mainstay, as much through his vital influence on Synge as through his own plays. His other literary activities, in philosophy, in essays, in autobiography, are witness to a life spent in constant and passionate toil, without compromise or concession. Publishing verse over a period of fifty years, Yeats never exhibited any complacency. A survivor of the nineties and the Yellow Book, he kept ahead of each successive movement, and the best poets in this country and even in England now acknowledge his leadership. Although his first style was well formed soon after 1900, he remodeled it during the following period when the Nobel Prize came to him in 1923. "The Tower" in 1928 and "The Winding Stair" in 1933 represent the height of his achievement. But he continued with undiminished powers to the very end; two of his finest poems, "Parnell's Funeral" and "A Prayer for Old Age," appeared when he was seventy. Yeats was the greatest poet of our time; he takes his place "with Landor and with Donne," as long ago he hoped he would.

IT TAKES TEMERITY TO DISAGREE WITH omniscience, but a sense of virtue lends us courage. On Monday, Walter Winchell announced in his most categorical manner: "The editors of The Nation have checked and learned that their recent blast at Ambassador Kennedy (for being anti-this or that) was 100 per cent wrong." In equally clear terms we must assert that Mr. Winchell is 100 per cent wrong. The Nation's dispatch describing Ambassador Kennedy's apathetic attitude toward the refugee problem was written by an experienced correspondent who had every opportunity to know the facts, and the facts as he gave them have never been refuted.

After Barcelona?

WITH the fall of Barcelona the fascist powers passed another milestone in their drive for world dominance. The significance of this milestone seems to have been appreciated much more clearly in Rome than in Paris, London, or Washington. The crowds that milled around the Palazzo Venezia cheering the Duce and clamoring for Corsica and Tunisia correctly appraised it as Mussolini's greatest triumph since the League's abandonment of sanctions after the capture of Addis Ababa. For those who cling to a belief in law and justice, the loss of Barcelona was a major setback, second only to Munich. In terms of human lives, the Barcelona disaster was greater. But at least there was resistance, and the fight still goes on despite overwhelming odds.

The fall of Barcelona threw financial circles in London and New York into panic, not out of sympathy with the Spanish people, but because it was felt that the event would mark the beginning of a new stage of the fascist offensive. Everyone is asking where the dictators will strike next. In anticipation of Hitler's Reichstag speech, speculation ran rife. It was suggested that he would demand immediate colonial concessions, that he would ask for a return of the ten billion dollars paid in reparations, that he would announce an immediate drive for Ukrainian "independence," or pledge his support of Italy in its demands on France. He did in fact demand colonies, and he proclaimed a virtual military alliance with Italy. While he made no immediate threat, there was nothing in his speech to calm the fears of a jittery Europe.

It is probable that no drastic action will be taken until the fascists have obtained undisputed mastery of Spain. Mussolini indicated as much when he urged his followers to put away their flags until after the fall of Madrid. Once the remainder of Loyalist Spain is crushed—as it will be unless support comes from the outside—Mussolini may be expected to push his demands against France. He will almost certainly act while his troops remain in Spain. Just how far he will go is difficult to say. He can scarcely expect to obtain Nice, Savoy, and Corsica together with Tunisia and Djibouti. But he will doubtless demand all that he thinks he can get without war.

Hitler's statement that Germany will fight in support of Italy is scarcely news. The axis stands as the basis of German foreign policy. We can be sure that Germany's military might will be at Mussolini's call when the time comes to cash in on Italy's investment in Spain, especially since Hitler also has some promissory notes to collect. These claims, in most instances, must ultimately be paid by France. Not four months have passed since France repudiated its treaty with Czechoslovakia on the ground that the German demands against that country did not immediately threaten French security. Today it is French territory that is endangered, and France has thrown away the assistance of thirty-four divisions of Czechoslovakian troops, and may be confronted with a hostile army on its frontier in the Pyrenees.

That England will do nothing to aid its ally may be inferred from Chamberlain's amazingly inept Birmingham speech. It is true that the British Prime Minister echoed Roosevelt in declaring that the democracies must inevitably resist a demand to rule the world by force. But the very formulation of what was interpreted in the press as a stern warning to the dictators indicates that Britain has no intention of opposing the fascist policy of gradual encroachment. It will be recalled that a similar "stern warning" preceded capitulation at Munich. Britain's lack of concern over the threat to France is startling in view of the long-established Franco-British alliance. It can only mean that Chamberlain is willing to let France become useless as an ally, and is pinning his hopes for the security of the empire on agreements with the fascist states—assuming that they will strike toward the east. Insane though this may seem, it is fully consistent with the policies pursued by Chamberlain in the past two years, especially at Munich.

Despite the wire-pulling of Mr. Chamberlain, France has not yet been finally defeated. Nor, for that matter, has Spain. As long as the Loyalists have a veteran army of four to five hundred thousand men well intrenched in Madrid and Valencia, European democracy has a fighting chance. Even the defeated Catalonian armies could be saved and reestablished if France would lift a finger in its own defense. Daladier's victory in the Chamber last week appears to preclude such action, but there have been times when it seemed as if the least push would unseat him. Where that can come from is difficult to see. Hope may be found in Ribbentrop's failure to win the Poles to the support of the axis. If a firm stand is ever to be made against the fascist advance, it is important that it be made while Poland and Rumania are still free from German domination.

It is evident, however, that the resources of democracy are running dangerously low in Europe. Unless some dramatic reversal occurs within the next few weeks, both Spain and France will suffer the fate of Czechoslovakia. The event best calculated to revive democratic strength would be the lifting of the American embargo against Spain. For American action would not only make possible direct aid to republican Spain but by destroying the farce of non-intervention enable France to act in time to protect its own frontier. Lifting the embargo would also counteract the disgraceful outcry over the sale of American airplanes to France and give the European democracies reason to hope for prompt revision of the Neutrality Act. It is too late to save Barcelona. But it is not too late to save Spain, Europe, and the world from fascist domination. Another six weeks, and it may be.

Our National Defense

IN HIS first article on America and the post-Munich World, in last week's Nation, Eliot Janeway illustrated the extent to which American economy overshadows that of the rest of the world; in his second he shows how that economy is being placed at the service of our potential enemies. We are feverishly engaged on a new arms program—admittedly inspired by fears of Japanese, German, and Italian aggression—but at the same time we blithely supply these powers with the machinery and war materials they need to build up their armaments and turn their conquests to account. If there is a threat to the security of this continent sufficiently serious to warrant our rearming, then surely we must be insane to help make it more formidable.

Unhappily this is not the only example of self-frustration suggesting that our conduct of foreign affairs is solely regulated by slogans and traditions which tend to cancel each other. The most poignant illustration is the way in which we have recently campaigned against fascism in South America while helping it to obtain in Spain a base for new transatlantic adventures. With our right hand we attempt to take the dictators by the scruff of the neck; with our left we bestow a blessing.

The basic principles of our foreign policy, such as it is, are, first, the avoidance of foreign entanglements and, second, the Monroe Doctrine. From the one springs the Neutrality Act; from the other the Presidential declaration of hemispheric defense. Throughout most of our history there has been no great conflict between these two main principles, but when they are put in juxtaposition to make a policy for 1939 they invoke thoughts of bows and arrows rather than of bombers and submarines. Most Americans have developed since Munich at least a presentiment of increased external danger. They are alarmed by the rise of powers bitterly hostile to democracy, fanatic in their efforts to spread their doctrines, intent on the magnification of the state both as a supremely desirable end and as an organic necessity. Any physical threat by such states to America may still appear remote. The more immediate danger is their attempt, by propaganda and the contagion of superficially successful ideas, to undermine our democracy—to them both an irritant and a subversive example.

Speaking at Munich on March 14, 1936, Hitler said: "I do not believe there can be peace among the nations until they all have the same law and system of law. That is why I hope that one day National Socialism will extend all over the world. This is no fantastic dream but an achievable object." It is only the fascist apologists in our midst who claim that democracies and totalitarian states can exist peacefully side by side. Dictators know that if the world is to be made safe for autocracy the germs of liberty must be stamped out.

To ideological onslaughts on our system arms are an ineffectual barrier. Our democracy will best protect itself by providing security without curtailing liberty; by devising means whereby the full use of our resources will make possible a full life for all. If it can do this it need not fear the infiltration of alien dogmas. But the fear that prompts our armaments is of more than fascist ideas; it is fear of eventual direct assault on the integrity of this continent. If this fear is baseless, there is no justification for our present arms program; if it corresponds to a realistic appraisal of the facts, it suggests that our foreign policy is woefully inadequate.

At its present strength our navy ought to be able to ward off the attack of a single power. The danger for the future is possible simultaneous action by both Japan and the axis either against us or against Latin America. That cannot happen until Japan completes its conquest of China and the axis consolidates its power in Europe. Clearly, then, we have a direct interest in the failure of these aggressive powers to achieve their immediate objectives. Nevertheless, we pursue an economic foreign policy which brings that achievement nearer.

Again it is obvious that fascist domination of Europe to an extent dangerous to us will come only when Britain and France have been either defeated by the axis or bulldozed into joining it. It is here we part company with Mr. Janeway, who assumes that these countries are already in effect linked to the fascist system. True, Chamberlain and Daladier have consistently played the axis game, but can they make further concessions without risking overthrow at home? Democracy may be ailing in Britain and France, but it still lives. Our interest is to see that it recovers its vitality, remembering that so long as Western Europe provides a buffer there can be no military threat to the integrity of this continent. Mr. Janeway's proposal to boycott Britain and France as well as the fascist powers seems the surest way to force a coincidence between the Paris-London and the Berlin-Rome axis and thus create the very situation which we ought to strive to prevent. It would be more realistic to offer Britain and France economic assistance while refusing further aid to the fascist war machines.

Isolationists of all stripes will assert that any such intervention in European affairs involves us in the risk of war. We do not deny this. But we would remind those isolationists who are in favor of a great arms program that the threats they visualize can only mature after fascism has won new victories in Europe. Is the risk we would run by throwing our economic weight against aggression now as great as that we will incur by letting it advance unimpeded?

This argument will not appeal to believers in unarmed isolation. We would remind them that the present popular demand for armaments is the consequence of Munich. Can they imagine how much louder that demand would be were Europe to become a solid fascist bloc?

The Nation does not believe that in the world today pacifism is practical politics or that America can afford to neglect its armaments. But we have two other lines of defense. We can strengthen our democracy by making it more of a reality at home: we can make the full weight of our economic power felt abroad. While these weapons remain to us, to put the whole stress of our defense policy on armaments is as dangerous as it is unintelligent.

Not-the-Law Hague

THE victory over Mayor Hague won in the Circuit Court in Philadelphia will be nullified if Jersey City's dictator succeeds in having one of his own men appointed to the vacancy left on the federal District Court by the elevation of William Clark to the Circuit Court. The enforcement of the injunction obtained by the C. I. O. and the Civil Liberties Union against the Mayor will be in the hands of the new judge, and if he is as completely under Hague's thumb as most of New Jersey's state judges, the injunction may well prove worthless. Norman Thomas, in a letter to Attorney General Murphy, has called attention to the importance of the appointment, which will be a real test of the New Deal's sincerity and courage. An obscure gentleman named Walker is Hague's candidate.

Meanwhile the higher this case goes in the courts the more drastic are the defeats suffered by Mayor Hague. Judge Clark's opinion in the C. I. O.'s appeal for an injunction to enforce the Constitution in Jersey City was a rather equivocal document that would have permitted the establishment of censorship by Hague's police. The Clark decree wisely discarded this innovation in American constitutional law and gave the C. I. O. an almost complete victory. The Circuit Court in Philadelphia has now gone a step beyond Judge Clark. Indeed, if the New York Times report is to be believed, the Circuit Court has even gone beyond the expectations of counsel for the C. I. O. and the Civil Liberties Union. Judge Clark's decree did not hold Jersey City's street-meeting ordinance unconstitutional, but merely enjoined Hague's police from refusing permits to the plaintiffs unless they were prepared to forbid meetings of any kind on any of the public thoroughfares. The Circuit Court ordered this qualifying clause struck out of the Clark decree and held the ordinance unconstitutional. The clause struck out, according to the Times, was written by counsel for the C. I. O. and the Civil Liberties Union.

The forceful language and reasoning of the Circuit Court will certainly be upheld in the Supreme Court. It disposes finally and authoritatively of the peculiar doctrine by which both the Jersey City police and Judge Clark in his original opinion would have established a right to gag or censor speakers. The street-meeting ordinance says that permits may be refused only "for the purpose of preventing riots, disturbances, or disorderly assemblage." Judge Clark's opinion suggested that police might require submission of speeches in advance in the case of applicants for permits who had previously held meetings marked by breaches of the peace. The Circuit Court holds this whole idea unconstitutional since it permits "the imposition of previous restraint" on the right of free speech and assembly; it declares that the ordinance, if strictly applied, would lead straight to one-party rule, and points out that the function of the police "is not to prevent speakers from presenting their views, but to preserve order while they speak." Judges Biggs and Maris took a realistic view of these "disturbances" in Jersey City. "Mayor Hague and his associates, reversing the usual procedure," they said, "troubled the waters in order to fish in them." Judge J. Warren Davis, who did his best to set up a five-man court in Philadelphia that would have been more favorable to Hague's case, dissented.

Labor's Fifth Column

THE future of the New Deal may hinge on the battle opened by the introduction of Senator Walsh's bill to amend the National Labor Relations Act. Whatever the intentions of Senator Walsh and the leaders of the American Federation of Labor who are supporting him, they have made themselves part of a well-planned campaign to gut the New Deal under the pretense of making a few modifications in the Wagner Act. This effort to emasculate the act is a logical aftermath of the New Deal's reverses at the polls last fall; it is notice of the opposition's intention to turn the Administration's setback into a rout.

In permitting themselves to be used as a front for reactionary business interests the A. F. of L. leaders are betraying their own followers. The evolution of the A. F. of L.'s attitude toward the Wagner Act shows how far events have driven them in an anti-labor course. On December 20, at a meeting of legislative representatives of the A. F. of L. and the railroad brotherhoods, it was decided to ask for two amendments of the act. One would deprive the Labor Board of the power to decide the unit for collective bargaining; the other would take from the board the right to invalidate contracts between an employer and an independent union. Representatives of the A. F. of L. had opposed inclusion of the first restriction in the act when it was being written. Francis Biddle, chairman of the old Labor Board, summed up the case against it when he said it would "invite unlimited abuse and gerrymandering" and "defeat the aims of the statute." As for the second provision, the A. F. of L. convention in 1937 had voted it down after J. Warren Madden, chairman of the board, showed the delegates that it would create a "happy hunting ground for the company union."

The leaders of the A. F. of L. were not satisfied with the decisions of the December conference. On January 8 it was revealed that they would ask seven more amendments of the act. These were procedural proposals that seemed of minor importance, though it was obvious that they might be used to hamstring the work of the board. It was also clear that general rules laid down by the courts already provided ample protection on these points. But the amendments introduced by Senator Walsh on January 25, with the support of the A. F. of L., went far beyond the proposals of January 8. The new amendments in the Walsh bill are openly designed to protect employer interests and do not have the remotest connection with the controversy between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. The most important of these innovations are (1) the amendment permitting employers to express opinions "on matters of interest to their employees or the public, provided such opinions are not accompanied by acts of discrimination or threats thereof," and (2) the amendment permitting a district court to take jurisdiction in any case and issue writs compelling "the board, or any agency or agent thereof, to perform its functions and duties." The former might permit an employer to "persuade" or even to "coerce" an employee in union matters so long as he did not "discriminate" against him or threaten to do so. The second would certainly permit the federal district courts to intervene at any point in a Labor Board proceeding, thus breeding interminable litigation and providing the delays that are the employer's strongest weapon. There will undoubtedly be further amendments in committee and from the floor, now that the A. F. of L. leaders have themselves let down the bars.

America in the Post-Munich World

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

II. America Arms Its Rivals

FOR the first time in years national security has become an issue in the United States. The army and navy are asking for a defense program that will make this country stronger than any possible combination of enemies striking simultaneously across the Atlantic and Pacific, and the country apparently supports them. We are laying down battleships to be launched in 1943. We are planning to double our air force—this will require at least two years. But even while such plans go into operation we steadily continue to export to the rest of the world—and principally to the fascist powers—munitions and machinery for making munitions which are nearly as efficient as our own—and much more efficient than the products of these countries themselves. As long as we do this we can know no real security.

We may well ask, Is there no regulation of the munitions trade? Are manufacturers allowed to export their products without regard to the ultimate effect upon the safety of the country? The truth is that such exports are regulated, and surprisingly enough by the same army and navy which clamors for more armaments at home. This policy of military regulation was begun after the war, when many munitions makers went out of business. The military and naval services, justifiably enough, were concerned to maintain the nucleus of a munitions industry capable of expansion to meet war-time needs. The easiest way seemed to be to encourage private manufacturers to enter the export trade in order to keep them in business; particularly since Congress refused to approve funds for "educational orders." With the recent changes in the world's political balance one would expect restrictions to be placed on these exports, especially as educational contracts have now been sanctioned and, in addition, real orders for armament have been greatly expanded. The approval of munitions exports, however, still continues. Last June, for example, the joint Aeronautical Board issued a statement on "Release Policy for Aircraft and Aircraft Equipment" in which the War Department regulations were clearly set forth. A few of the more recent designs for army and navy equipment are withheld for a certain length of time, but the manufacturers are encouraged to export the general run of their products. The services have assumed the right (under the Espionage Act of 1917) to veto the export not only of aircraft, an official munitions category, but of all other machinery—even though it is not officially "munitions"—the export specifications for which are held to duplicate too closely the models used for our own armament. Actually, the army and navy are somewhat inconsistent in their vetoes: planes having a cruising range of 2,000 miles may not be sold to Japan, but machine tools and alloyed metals for building planes with a cruising range equal to that of our best models may be exported. And in spite of the money spent on anti-espionage, foreign inspectors supervising work on orders for their countries have access to plants where highly confidential production is under way for our own use.

With "war babies" booming on the stock market in anticipation of orders from our army and navy, it seems absurd to continue to act on the theory that exports are necessary to keep these same "war babies" in business. Moreover, why should only the newest and most efficient equipment be denied to our rivals? Why should we not keep our margin of superiority as wide as possible by refusing to export any machinery or materials which will in any way increase the efficiency of these powers?

The results of our present policy are painfully clear. The war in China is our baby. The story of how we fueled Japan's war machine during the conquest of coastal China has been told before. Most of Japan's steel shortage is made up by United States shipments. All of its special steel alloys come from this country. We supply over 90 per cent of Japan's oil, copper, and scrap imports. Its 1938 scrap purchases, thanks to 500,000 tons bought after Canton fell, will closely approximate the 1937 record of 2,000,000 tons. Its copper buying in ten months of 1938 exceeded that for all 1937. Its oil purchases were three times as great. The lubricating oil needed to run its complex, high-speed American machinery, like the high octane fuel required by its American airplanes, cannot be bought or refined in Japan; we have not yet sold our latest refining equipment, which derives airplane fuel from low-grade crude oil like that available in the Netherlands Indies.

Now that Japan is trying to absorb and industrialize half of China, it needs us more than ever. Unless it can obtain from the United States machinery for the manufacture of steel and automobiles, to name only two kinds that it needs, its dream of a modern continental empire must be long deferred. Japan cannot manufacture this machinery itself; before its recent purchases here it had not even facilities for making steel sheets wide enough for automobile bodies, much less for increasing its steel capacity. It cannot obtain such machines from its ideological ally, Germany. In 1937 it bought six times as much machinery from us as from Germany, and in 1938 Germany experienced shortages that made it refuse to export the kind of machinery that Japan wants. But we have been furnishing Japan the means of armament—high-speed metal-working tools—at a rate 75 per cent above the 1937 record. Japan has been lucky indeed to have obtained such cooperation in its effort to turn China into a private preserve.

The year 1938 also saw the United States emerge as a basic prop of the new German empire. Our contributions to Nazi armaments in earlier years, aside from raw materials, consisted largely of patents for airplane motors,* electrical equipment, chemical processes, and machine tools. But Germany, like Japan, is now facing the problem of developing a continental empire. Hitler's achievement, before Munich opened up the vista of an elastic frontier for German industrialism, was to put industry to work within the narrow confines of the Reich by his armament program. Before the end of 1937, however, the pace of armament production had proved too hot for German machines. It was then that the Reich began to turn to us. It has never been dependent upon us in the sense that Japan has been; even today, so long as it stays within its present confines, our aid is not absolutely essential. But the continued strength of National Socialism depends upon continued expansion, and that threatens to overtax the capacity of German industry. Existing production schedules have been geared too high, and if the burden of absorbing and arming first one and then another backward country in Southeastern Europe is added, Germany must either find outside help or collapse into industrial chaos under the weight of its own ambitious schemes. It can only function on the new scale required by its imperial program if it multiplies its capacities until they really begin to rival our own. We are assisting it to do this.

We are making available plans and parts for our continuous strip mills. The famous "people's auto," so much publicized as promising "strength through joy" to loyal Germans, is to be made by American machine tools, like the Opel cars and the motorized trucks for the infantry; German buyers have been active in Cleveland and other machine-tool centers for several months. In spite of credit difficulties orders have already been placed for nearly a million dollars' worth of high-speed special-purpose equipment. With an ideal of a people as well as an army on wheels, Germany requires increasing quantities of gasoline. It is producing about half of the oil it needs, synthetically, from coal, but this domestic product is low-powered, inefficient. To process it into adequate high-powered gasoline, Germany has now purchased from us a complete oil refinery. If Hitler succeeds in absorbing Europe, we shall be responsible.

Meanwhile, the Reich is purchasing here not only machinery for the expansion of its industry but also the raw materials which it needs to carry on at present. Its oil takings have increased; the monthly rate of its copper buying has more than doubled, the Guggenheims participating with the others in the trade. German industry must gear itself to produce on a scale that present European supplies cannot satisfy. It is therefore installing in the Hermann Göring Werke equipment to utilize low-grade sandy iron ore. By this means it expects to obtain half of its iron ore from domestic sources, instead of only 16 per cent. The equipment is being provided by the Brassert Company of Chicago. Pending completion of the installation, Germany's purchases of scrap from us have leaped from nothing to half a million tons a year. It has been buying on joint account with Italy and England, and many of our sales of war-scare days, supposedly intended for England, are now being passed on to Germany.

It is high time that we ceased to accept uncritically the assumption that in the battle between democracy and fascism we shall find England "on the right side when the day comes." Many people apparently believe that the survival of democracy in the United States depends upon our supporting England against the axis. Yet, we may well begin to wonder whether England will ever give us the opportunity to come to its aid against the fascist powers. May it not have been a suspicion of this kind which prompted the President's alleged retort to the enthusiast who remarked that we might soon have to send an army to march down Unter den Linden—"We'd have to get past the British fleet to do it"?

Any prospect of a change in policy through the advent to power of Anthony Eden is extremely nebulous. The dashing Captain was so far misinformed about the attitude of one high American official toward the Chamberlain policy as to tell him in confidence that the Premier's policy was the only one for England to pursue, that there was no real opposition to it on the part of Eden or his friends, that Chamberlain would continue to retreat, and that he, Eden, would soon be back in office. There is apparently no anti-appeasement movement in England able to overthrow Chamberlain.

It is to be hoped that the tragedy of Spain will dispel any illusion we still have about the wisdom of following England's lead. Spain was the victim of a deal, pure and simple—embargo here, "non-intervention" there. No matter how complacent the British lion may feel, we should take more seriously the loss of Gibraltar's effectiveness. For with fascism established in Spain—already there are rumors, from military sources, of a German naval base in the Canaries—the German threat will become something more than a bogy. German domination of the South Atlantic would be really menacing. If we are to have the national security which is the only justification for armament, we must be prepared to offer opposition to fascism by ourselves.

---

* See "We Built the Nazi Air Force," by M. M. Fagen, in the New Republic for November 23, 1938.

Committed as it is to a policy of non-intercourse with Russia, its only possible ally, except France, against Germany, it is reasonable to suppose that England does not want to stand up to Germany. For if Germany's is a small-scale economy beside our own, it is an industrial colossus beside England's. Germany's aircraft production is so much greater than England's that it will shortly have several thousand planes more than England. Its steel capacity is nearly twice as great, and its engineering and machine-tool industry is so much larger and more efficient that until it ran into its present shortage crisis it was refitting many of England's key armament plants. Compared to Germany, and certainly to the United States, England's entire industrial structure is antiquated and hopelessly inefficient; right down to the spark plugs on its automobiles and the engines and frames of its bombers English industry is incapable of producing on a standardized and mechanized basis. To be of any use to the general staff, English industry must be rebuilt from scratch.

Considerable rebuilding is in fact taking place today under American engineering auspices. England is buying two continuous mills, duplicates of one of the largest in this country. It was our largest purchaser of machinery and machine tools in 1937, and its orders were even larger last year. We are providing talent, equipment, and patents for reorganizing the English automobile, aircraft, and oil-refining industries. England bought 400 planes in one batch last year, and has been inducing American aircraft and engineering firms to set up branches in Canada, as in 1917.

Our foreign trade is really a war trade arming our enemies. Although our foreign policy is oriented toward maintaining a market for our exports of the traditional wealth-creating type, we are actually underwriting the fascism which is closing the world market to free trade. If this insane foreign policy continues, democracy must realize that it is cutting its own throat. Fascism in Europe and Asia is closing to the outside world impressive colonial areas which it promises to develop with American industrial methods into integrated economic empires that will really threaten the supremacy of the United States. When we have helped fascism to do this we shall wake up to the necessity of playing power politics. The New Deal now has its last opportunity to use the economic power of America. Our exports of raw materials and capital goods to the axis and its backers can be stopped. The corporations carrying on this trade sell far more to the United States government than to foreign governments, and they dare not risk losing the good-will of this large and, with rearmament, ever more important customer for the sake of a marginal export business bringing them into public disrepute. Let the government see to this when contracts are awarded under the new armament schedule.

[The third article of Mr. Janeway's series, on our relations with Latin America, will appear in an early issue.]

Bewildered Britain

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, January 18

THE British public's reaction to the negative results of Chamberlain's visit to Rome has been that of a young lady saved from paying too heavy a price for a lapse from virtue. At any rate there have been no "consequences"; relief—pathetic or comical, as you please—is widespread that Mr. Chamberlain made no fresh surrender and that the Duce apparently refrained from embarrassing his guest with point-blank demands. No great cause for cheers? Granted. The subdued gratification felt at this diplomatic exercise in political birth control is significant in that it reveals the extent to which popular faith in "appeasement" has evaporated since Munich. Few people in this country believe any longer that Europe can be genuinely "pacified" by negotiation. The question which exercises the mind of the man in the street is how tactical policy should be directed in the face of the imminent menace of general European war.

Italy is not regarded here as the potential aggressor-in-chief or, indeed, as a formidable opponent on its own account. In the clubs and the "pubs" alike, opinion is unanimous that the Duce is a very junior partner in the axis, and that the decision as between peace and war lies with Hitler. Belief is general that Germany is planning a fresh external adventure in the spring or early summer of this year. What worries people here is that there is nothing to show whether the coming move will be eastward or westward.

The riddle of the Führer's intentions remains anybody's guess. All that the average, politically inexpert Britisher knows is that, after Munich, the Prime Minister promised him that "it will be all right now," but that Civilian Defense Minister Anderson has just declared that "the government is working on the assumption that there is a risk of war within a comparatively short time." Pardonably, the plain citizen is bewildered. He does not trust Hitler, and his belief in the durability of peace is rapidly diminishing. But though Mr. Chamberlain's political stock as the prophet of appeasement has fallen, it would be an error to suppose that the position of the government is precarious either in Parliament or in the country.

In the face of a fifty-fifty chance of European war this year, foreign policy has become for Britain an issue in which party allegiances are inextricably confused. In the Chamberlain camp there is a curious medley of forces, deriving both from the right and from the left. First, one can discern the small but economically influential upper-class group, the "opposite numbers" of M. Flandin and his friends in France, who really believe that security can best be found for Britain—or, say rather, for their own social class—by enrolling in the anti-Comintern front. Obsessed by the "menace of Bolshevism," they cling to the idea that an accommodation can be reached between Britain and the axis powers—at a price worth paying. A few colonial concessions to Germany would doubtless have to be made—preferably at the expense in the main of Portugal and Holland—and, to facilitate agreement, some modification of "democratic license" might have to be accepted in British institutions. But between the ruling classes in Berlin and London, they argue, there is a fundamental solidarity of purpose. Wishful thinking? Of course; but these people are quite sincere, and it is oversimplification to call them "traitors," as the left is inclined to do. They are merely being loyal to their prejudices and their own narrowly conceived interests. Mr. Chamberlain, more democratically minded but equally hostile to the U. S. S. R., goes perhaps half the way with them.

Next, in ascending order of importance, come the advocates of "no war at any price," divided into three distinguishable groups: (1) the pure 100 per cent pacifists, who regard with aversion the rearmament aspect of the government's policy but would rather have a hundred Munichs than one war; (2) the anti-imperialists (represented, for example, by the Independent Labor Party), who would use arms only in the defense of socialism and would applaud "appeasement" if Mr. Chamberlain gave away the entire British Empire; and (3) the isolationist followers of Lord Beaverbrook, who would fight, at need, for the empire, but would have Britain remain neutral even though the swastika flag flew in every European capital. Diametrically opposed to one another on most political issues, these three groups unite tacitly in preferring that Mr. Chamberlain, rather than a Churchill-Eden "stand-up-to-dictators" administration, should be in Downing Street. Chamberlain, they agree, is at any rate less likely to involve them in a war of which, for different reasons, they would disapprove.

By far the most numerous section of Chamberlainites, however, is made up of those whose desire is, not to "surrender" or pay indefinite damages, but simply to put off the evil day. The policy for Britain, they argue, should be to gain time. Germany may march east and become embroiled in a ruinous struggle with Russia; the economy of the axis powers may crack under the financial strain of armaments; dictators are mortal; given another two years, Britain's defenses may be made impregnable; and until it happens war is never inevitable. In a plebiscite this body of opinion would probably be the largest in Britain today and the most solid. It is divided only by degrees of insistence that the present somewhat leisurely tempo of British armament must be accelerated.

In the opposite camp there is, first, the comparatively small but resolute phalanx of militant anti-fascists who hold that the second world war began long ago in China and Spain, that it is a fight to a finish between irreconcilable political ideologies, and that the only thing for Britain to do now is to join in the fray—side by side with the U. S. S. R.—before everything worth fighting for is lost. It is a point of view which commands respect—the more so as many of its adherents have laid down life for it in the Spanish republic's International Brigade—but it is not the attitude of the majority of the Prime Minister's opponents in relation to foreign policy. The main body of the opposition—comprising dissident Conservatives mobilized by Mr. Churchill, the remnants of Liberalism under the leadership of Mr. Lloyd George, and the "official" Labor Party forces—takes its stand on the thesis that concessions to totalitarian blackmail do not pay, and that with each surrender the democracies grow weaker and lose friends, while the dictatorships wax stronger and greedier in their demands. The case for a "firmer" foreign policy is argued by its various proponents in differing tones. Some still make a shibboleth of the blessed words "collective security" and would have Britain believe that, with bold leadership, a new League, or rather Group, of Nations could be recreated sufficiently powerful to curb the aggressor states—particularly if, as they hopefully hint would happen, the United States joined the "active" democratic front. Others admit that the League idea has sunk beyond hope of salvage, but contend that a compact Anglo-Russo-French alliance would still have a sufficient preponderance of resources to call the dictators' bluff. Others, again, no longer attempt to dispute the strength of the axis powers' position, particularly in the air; nor do they deny that "firmness" would probably precipitate general European war. Their argument is that, with every month that passes, the democracies are allowing the dictatorships' military superiority to increase, and that since a conflict is ultimately inevitable, it is better to make a stand, refuse any sort of concession, and risk war at once, before Germany has obtained control of Rumania's oil, and before submarine bases in Spain, the Canaries, and West Africa have fatally jeopardized Britain's sea communications.

This school is gaining recruits. The man in the street is profoundly uneasy at the appearance of governmental drift, and is shocked by the discovery that Czechoslovakia is now, to all intents and purposes, a German colony. But this is not to say that these anti-Chamberlainites are near getting a majority of public opinion behind them. There is far too much jealousy and suspicion as between their various political leaders: Churchill, Lloyd George, and Attlee make an ill-assorted team. The peace-loving citizen, who hopes to see the roses in his suburban garden bloom next June, does not believe that "firmness" at this stage could successfully call Hitler's bluff; and to vote for a "preventive" war—which is what the opponents of Chamberlain are accused of meaning—requires a high degree not merely of courage but of conviction that the cause is just and that it will triumph.

In Britain today it is difficult to find either the courage or the conviction. This is not true of the "man in the pub." He is increasingly ashamed of what was done in his name at Munich, and is getting, vis-a-vis the dictators, into very much the same angry mood as that in which his forbears defied Napoleon. But Britain, for all its trade unions and its big Labor Party vote, is still a remarkably feudal country; the influence of the higher bourgeoisie is enormous. And in that social stratum the spirit of defeatism is dominant. The crisis of last September shook to the core the "comfortable" classes in this country. They are well aware of the danger to British interests of axis domination in Spain; and they view with dismay the destruction of British trade in the Far East. In their own minds, however, the recollection of their Rolls-Royced evacuation of London four months ago is so painful that, psychologically, they are not prepared to go through another crisis at any price. Their psychology is infectious; under its contagion mass opinion in Britain is perplexed, irresolute, and more than a little frightened of what the future may hold. John Bull is essentially a sane, kindly, and courageous person; but at the moment he is in danger of becoming the victim of jittery bewilderment.

The Baltimore "Sun" Goes Down

BY WILLARD R. ESPY

"DEMOCRACY?" said H. L. Mencken, "I never have believed in it. I wrote a book against it fifteen years ago, and I'm not the sort of man to change my mind." But he does believe in free speech, he went on, and in limited government; and anyhow his anti-democracy in no sense reflects the views of the Baltimore Sunpapers, with which he has been connected for thirty-two of his forty journalistic years.

Mencken is a bright-eyed, graying, broad-grinning little man, astonishingly Hooverish-looking. The extent of his explicitly anti-liberal influence on Sun policies is of interest because the Sunpapers have long enjoyed an international reputation for progressiveness. It was the Evening Sun that tore the hoods off the Ku Klux Klan, poked fun at the anti-red campaigns of post-war days, and sent the Socialist New York Call $500 for legal defense when Postmaster General Burleson barred it from the mails. The humanitarian ideals of John Haslup Adams, editor of first the evening and then the morning Sun from 1910 to 1927, created a legend that is still current. The alliance between the Sun and the Manchester Guardian is part of that legend. A Sun telegram urged Governor Fuller of Massachusetts to appoint an impartial legal committee to study the Sacco-Vanzetti case just three days before the two men were executed. Publishing minority opinions has been a Sun tradition.

There are those who charge that after 1930, and most flagrantly after 1936, this background was betrayed. Since Roosevelt's reelection, in which the Sunpapers opposed him, they are said to have become second only to the Chicago Tribune or the Los Angeles Times in their anti-Administration hysteria. It is charged that they have been consistently anti-labor, especially anti-C. I. O., and that their baiting of red-baiters has been replaced by an attitude which found expression in their adjuration to the Dies committee of January 8 that "of the extremist groups the Communists are incomparably the most important," and their objectivity in foreign affairs by the bias of Mencken's remark in the same issue that "it must be a dreadful jackass indeed who believes that . . . the gang of Communists, anarchists, and other such vermin now operating in government Spain is democratic." Nor have they hesitated, the accusation runs, to pervert or suppress news in furtherance of their altered aims.

Any clarifying evaluation must decide not only whether the Sunpapers are anti-liberal now but whether their present policies belie their history, and if so, what factors have impelled the change.

Historically, the morning Sun is a conservative news organ. When Arunah S. Abell published its first penny issue on May 17, 1837, the bank riots had given Baltimore a dread of democracy that it was long in losing. Abell's journal avoided politics like the plague. Except for objecting in 1856 to the "wilful and impractical theorists" who asserted that slavery was a national issue, it took no sides on public matters until the War between the States, and then its sympathies were with the Confederacy.

Even the stink of Baltimore bossism in the seventies could not interrupt the Sun's post-war political indifference. Only when Arunah's son, George W. Abell, grew to be the dominant figure on the paper did it plunge into local politics in the 80's, crippling the Gorman-Rasin political machine and initiating Maryland's remarkably high judicial standards. Again in 1895 the Sun, shamed into disowning the corrupt Democratic state machine, was instrumental in disabling it. Nationally, however, the Abells were content to back Cleveland for twelve years as a man who could be "trusted." They supported McKinley in 1896 because of Bryan's sixteen-to-one heresies, and again in 1900 because they suspected these heresies remained in the back of the peerless leader's mind, not to mention his socialistic advocacy of government ownership of railroads. When the first Roosevelt was the liberal and Parker the conservative, in 1904, the Abells backed Parker, as in 1908 they stood behind Taft. After that the majority ownership changed, and in 1912 the Sun and Bryan together were largely responsible for Wilson's nomination. From 1912 through 1932 the Sunpapers supported every Presidential nominee of the Democratic Party.

During most of this period the principal editorial writer was John Haslup Adams, a thoroughgoing liberal who, according to "The Sunpapers of Baltimore," a Mencken-edited history, "saw a great modern newspaper as largely, if not mainly, an engine for rectifying injustice." Van Lear Black, genial business man who took charge of the Sunpapers in 1914, let his editorial staff strictly alone except to throw rip-roaring parties for them. Adams died in 1927, and Van Lear Black disappeared from his yacht at sea in August, 1930. The Abell Company's twenty-year experiment with liberalism was drawing to a close.

In a front-page editorial printed on September 11, 1936, the Sun revealed that it would not support Roosevelt for reelection. The editorial declared in part:

> The Sun stands for competitive capitalism. It is the system which most effectively uproots the unfit, the unworthy, the lazy. It is the system which gives place to the vigorous, the competent, the purposeful. . . . When government controls one's property, government controls one's vote. It is the economic freedom of competition which guards political freedom.

From that day on the constructive aspects of the New Deal ceased to interest the Sunpapers, which saw in it only the evils of unbalanced budgets and bureaucratic centralization.

This enmity has brought about not only perversion of news but reversal of traditional loyalties. In 1910 the editor of the Sun persuaded David J. Lewis to run for Congress, and in 1916 the Sun supported him for the Senate. When he was defeated in the latter race, he received, said the Maryland Merry-Go-Round for last August 13, a telegram which read, "Never mind, Davey, you'll come back." It was signed by Frank Kent and John Owens, the same Kent and Owens who in 1938, as chief political writer and chief editor respectively, knifed Lewis in his campaign against Senator Millard Tydings, one of their chief targets all through the twenties. When state police estimated the attendance at a Lewis rally at 3,000, the Sun estimate was 1,400. When a New York Times editorial criticized Roosevelt's intervention in Democratic primaries, the Sun reprint omitted the first sympathetic paragraphs. A Lewis statement detailing alleged financial links between Tydings and certain of his campaign subscribers was ignored. A Sun reporter, Louis O'Donnell, won the confidence of Lewis men by indicating his desire to quit newspaper work and go into politics as a Lewis protege. Using their friendship to discover where possible replacements in the Maryland federal set-up were contemplated by Lewis, O'Donnell—whose nephew, it was charged later, Tydings had appointed to Annapolis—wrote a story of a projected Maryland "purge."

On the refugee problem, as generally on straight questions of civil liberties—for example, the dictatorship of Mayor Hague—the Sunpapers remain progressive. They attack lynchings unrestrainedly—Mencken's description of the members of an Eastern Shore lynching party as morons who loved the smell of burning Negro flesh lost the Sun, temporarily at least, thousands of Eastern Shore subscribers—and have reluctantly favored some sort of effective anti-lynching law. Until recently, however, no photographs of Negroes were allowed to appear in the Sun. When the "Sunspot" column, which was singling out prominent local citizens for feature stories, ran out of worthy whites, a reporter was sent to interview some distinguished Negroes, but before any of the sketches appeared the Sun mysteriously abandoned the idea, and the reporter had to telephone apologies to each of his subjects.

The Sun has been noticeably hostile to the C. I. O., whose statements and public letters, according to Frank Bender, regional director for Maryland, "are as often suppressed as printed." Bender told me, too, that the Sun seized on a street bombing and tunnel explosion as excuses to attack the C. I. O., though no evidence was ever adduced to connect it with either occurrence. The Sunpapers' accounts of the recent C. I. O. crab-pickers' strike at Crisfield were practically incitements to mob violence against the strikers.

"I believe good reporters should get more money than they do," Mencken told me, "but I don't see why they should fuss over the wages of understrappers." Mencken was negotiator for the A. S. Abell Company when it presented its unit of the American Newspaper Guild with a contract that would have prohibited political activities on the part of employees. This move, it may be said, was probably impelled as much by the Sunpapers' traditional paternalism as by any desire to thwart the Guild. Under the Abell regime it was understood that employees, failing some horrendous sin, held lifetime tenure; and the salaries of ill employees continued sometimes for years.

At the time of the Guild's formation, Mencken, returning from a European trip, graciously approved the new union and went so far as to say he would join it if asked. He was sent a membership card afterward, and held a series of telephone conversations on the subject with a Baltimore member. Jovially, bit by bit, he hedged. "I'm no Communist, you know," he chuckled over the 'phone. Assured that his interlocutor was no Communist either, he then expressed doubts as to his own eligibility. "When I was a starving reporter," he said, "the Sun gave me a little stock instead of a raise, thinking it wasn't worth anything; but it fooled 'em." He ended by writing a letter refusing to join.

About a year after the birth of the National Labor Relations Board, the Sun pressroom formed a local organization. It faded away, but not soon enough to prevent the Abell Company from being haled before an NLRB examiner on the charge of sponsoring a company shop. The Sun and the Los Angeles Times are, incidentally, the only large news enterprises still failing to recognize the International Printing Pressmen's Union.

The position of a newspaper may remain idiosyncratic, and therefore incomprehensible to the dogmatist, until an issue meaning life or death to it is involved. A Maryland Congressman complained to me, "The Sun's always been liberal until it came to the pinch; then some mysterious, faceless being taps an editorial shoulder, and the policy shifts." The sources of these significant shoulder-tappings may be tangled, but they are hardly mysterious.

About a quarter of Baltimore is Catholic. Among that quarter are the descendants of Arunah S. Abell, himself a Protestant. Cardinal Gibbons, the gentle old Archbishop of Baltimore, whose very enemies loved him, was a close friend of the Abells, and often spent his summers with one branch or another of the family. Malcontents whispered that the Sun ran the archdiocese. But on the accession of Archbishop Curley in the early twenties, the picture changed. Curley believes that cooperation with outsiders is a device of the devil, and that the madder the rest of the world gets at the church the better it is for the church's unity. He resented the influence of the Sun in local Catholic circles, and from time to time his discontent emerged into print.

In 1934 S. Miles Bouton, a Mencken find who as Sun correspondent in Germany had been Hitler's friend in the beer-hall days, quarreled with his erstwhile intimate, and left for Baltimore under a Nazi cloud. As Mencken tells the story, Bouton soon was commissioned by the Sun to do a series on Germany. In one article a paragraph six fathoms deep compared Hitler's fanaticism to Ignatius Loyola's. The analogy prompted a mild complaint from the Jesuits, but an editorial letter soothed them. Then Curley, who had been away nursing (in Mencken's phrase) "plethoric shingles around the belly," was apprised of the insult. The Archbishop burst into a thousand blazing little pieces. He demanded an immediate and utter apology, and when every formula that the Sun put forward failed to satisfy him, he had the journal denounced from all the parish pulpits in the archdiocese and initiated a Catholic advertisers' boycott. The attack continued for months, until—on the hinted advice of a Washington priest that there was no statement the Sun in self-respect could make that Curley would approve if consulted—the Sun issued an unapproved apology, going as far as it could; and the furor died down.

The incident allowed the Sunpapers to feel painfully the weight of the church's hand. Though Mencken declares that subscriptions slumped very little and that only one minor account was dropped by a Catholic advertiser, other estimates set the circulation loss at 50,000. Since 1934 the Sun has dealt tenderly with the Catholic church. A Protestant minister complained to me that the Sun gives from two to four times as much space to Catholic activities as to Protestant. Part of this disproportion may be because the Catholics, for their number, are more active.

It is reasonable to assume that the Curley attacks of 1934 may have affected Sun policy on the Spanish civil war. Shortly after the revolt started, a Sun man wrote an article in which he assessed the opposing forces greatly to the moral detriment of the rebels. From Catholic pulpits and from the columns of the Catholic Review, warning shots were fired across the Sun's bows; and a few days later the editorial staff received from the hand of John Owens a note signed by Paul Patterson stating that henceforth articles on Spain must be read by Mr. Owens (read Patterson) before going into print. This order, ending the Sun boast of free expression among its competent and informed staff, aroused a bitterness that has yet to vanish from the editorial rooms. Sun columns since that time have displayed pro-rebel sympathies, and Mr. Mencken has outdone Coughlin himself in excoriating the "Barcelona convent-burners," the scoundrels "imported from Moscow" by "Red Spain."

Fear of the Catholic church only partly explains the spots on the Sun. It is after all a virtual monopolist in its field, facing only the competition of Hearst's News-Post, and it could, if it chose, ignore the Catholic pressure without fatal results. Still another explanation lies in the interests and connections of those who control the enterprise. A search for the persons behind the views of the Sunpapers narrows quickly to five men: Frank Kent, political columnist; John Owens, editor-in-chief of both dailies; Harry C. Black, who owns the largest single block of stock and is also chairman of the Maryland Fidelity and Deposit Company; Paul Patterson, president of the A. S. Abell Company and publisher of the Sunpapers since 1919; and H. L. Mencken, who admits to holding no editorial position whatever.

The views of Kent, one of the first vociferous deserters from Roosevelt (a wealthy man in his own right, he aroused criticism during the last Roosevelt campaign by broadcasting political comment under the aegis of a Baltimore bank), obviously coincide with the Sun's, as do the views of Owens, who is a tired liberal but a civilized gentleman. Neither of them is in a position to impose policy.

Before Van Lear Black's death, the stock interest in the Abell Company owned by Harry C. Black, his brother, may have passed 30 per cent, and even if part has been sold, it is now doubtless more than that. But Harry Black is of the same stripe as his brother, who was a close personal friend of Roosevelt. He may be anti-New Deal, but not in the hysterical fashion of his newspapers. Like Van Lear before him, moreover, he leans backward to avoid influencing editorial policy.

The dictator of the A. S. Abell Company is Paul Patterson, who worked up through one newspaper after another until he was made managing editor of the new-born Evening Sun in 1911. Eugene B. Casey, a Washington contractor who opposed the Sun's policies in the election campaign, said over WBAL last September 9:

> Patterson used to tell his friends that the secret of successful news publishing was in being independent, in having no stock ownership in the paper. But when Van Lear Black died, Paul Patterson borrowed from the banks a total reputed to be $3,000,000 in order to buy out Van Lear Black's stock. This ranks Patterson with Harry Black as the biggest stockholder, and it also puts him under tremendous obligation to the banks.

It is certain at least that while under Van Lear Black's will his Abell Company stock was left to his brother, Paul Patterson was given control through a voting trust. Shortly after his accession to power one of his star reporters, Drew Pearson, was relieved of covering a Senate banking investigation when his stories began to carry a sting, and in 1931, when he reported the freezing of Chase National Bank and other credits in Germany, the Sun gave a two-column spread to Aldrich's denial, though events were to prove that Pearson was tragically right.

The last of the five suspects is muddled, fascinating H. L. Mencken. Mencken is pervasive on the Sun. He is a member of the board of directors. He has no editorial post, yet he sits in on every important editorial meeting. Mencken, Patterson, and Harry Black were the committee that reorganized the Sunpapers in 1919-20. Mencken and Miles H. Wolff were the original members of the liaison committee that was formed in 1934 between the morning and the evening Sun. Mencken and the chief editors of the morning, evening, and Sunday Suns faced the Newspaper Guild negotiators. Mencken listened to the 1934 Catholic grievance committees. So ad infinitum.

When Paul Patterson entered the office in 1911, his desk adjoined Mencken's. The two men became friends. Patterson not only is fond of Mencken but believes him to be a genius. Moreover, Mencken is a celebrity, and the publisher, like many another small-town-boy-who-made-good, to the tune of $85,000 a year, beams on celebrities. In the Sun office Mencken's pungent comments on the social scene live again a few days later on Patterson's lips. Disclaiming editorial influence, Mencken remarked to me that after 1910 he served a while as a "kind of prime minister without portfolio." A more exact summation of his present position could scarcely be voiced.

In the last analysis recent alterations in the tenor of the Sun don't go below the second or third layer of skin. The Sunpapers of the twenties were as vehement as the Sunpapers of the thirties against laws, state or federal, to limit child labor. On the other hand, the Sun of 1938 is still able to approve Hull's liberal tariff policies. In its palmiest progressive days the Sun abhorred woman suffrage, holding that ladies wouldn't vote and women who weren't ladies shouldn't. Centralization of government, government extravagance, and soak-the-rich taxes are no more of a bête noire now than they ever were. The Evening Sun in 1925 objected:

> Observers sometimes make the mistake of referring to the Evening Sun as liberal. This the editors emphatically deny, for according to their definition, "A liberal is one who stands for more laws, more jobholders, higher taxes, and, in consequence, less liberty." They maintain rather that the Evening Sun is an old-fashioned conservative. . . . In line with this conservative policy it howls against "spies, snoopers, and agents provocateurs," and deplores the Paul Pryism of income-tax publicity.

From time to time the Sunpapers, and even H. L. Mencken, would put in a lick for reform in the good old days when reform and communism weren't synonymous, and whenever practicable they still retain their traditional respect for civil liberties. But Sunpaper liberalism, like the magic ass's skin that shrank each time it was wished on, has come to cover a very small area indeed.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Living Philosophies

IX. ONLY SYMBOLS MATTER*

BY EMIL LUDWIG

I BELIEVE in the wisdom and beneficence of nature; but she does not give everything to all. I believe in the power of the gods; but they give the main chance to the strong. I believe in the dictatorship of fate; but fate favors the creative man.

To clarify this statement I must first sketch the path by which I came to this belief. Son of a naturalist and humanist, I was brought up neither by the precepts of Moses nor by those of Jesus. I learned the Ten Commandments, indeed, but the foundation for a respectable way of life was laid in the example of my parents. The widest tolerance toward all forms of belief was exemplified in my father, who as physician devoted himself to his fellow-man and as scholar trusted nature well. He showed his children that over us rules a power which is always the same, though called by many names. Brought up to distrust force and to reverence the spiritual and beautiful, I learned to venerate, besides the Greeks, two prophets—Goethe and Beethoven.

At the same time I learned responsibility. We did not acquire the habit of taking refuge behind the Fatherland or behind our race, least of all behind the suffering of a prophet said to have died for us all. The whole structure of my world would break down were I to believe that another than myself could save me.

And why salvation? From what? The thought of man's fall and his original sin as the medium between God and me, as well as the whole conception of a transfigured Son of God who will save me from the hell burning beneath paradise, is alien to me. I have never disturbed this belief in others, nor have I envied them it. To me Jesus—whom I was later to represent as a great fighter and prophet—is as worthy of reverence as Socrates, because he died for his truth, as men are doing again today.

All development since my youth I owe to one alone. Goethe has served as my leader not only in all the realm of thought and deed but throughout the different decades of my life. Goethe and Nietzsche remain the only philosophers whom I have read; none among my contemporaries is known to me. My philosophical studies, thus limited, set my feet in the right path and left my mind free to approach God through contemplation of his works as found in nature, in music, and in great characters.

Problems of guilt and expiation have no meaning in my life. My point of view is that we sin in falling short in the efficiency which nature can expect from us according to her gifts to us. On this account I do not believe that there is such a thing as thwarted genius, or that a man may die before his time. Nature soon recalled great creative geniuses like Mozart, Schubert, Byron, and Giorgione when they had given all that lay within them. Goethe, Beethoven, Shakespeare, and Leonardo were given a longer time, in order that they might complete their work according to the more measured tempo of their lives. I have no sympathy for the baffled poet or statesman who blames the misunderstanding of the rest of the world for his failure.

In fact, my sympathy for the higher forms of mankind steadily wanes, while my sympathy for the animal world increases. I cannot feel for a vanquished dictator, but my sympathy goes out to any dog struck down by an automobile. However, I do not hold the exercise of sympathy to be a service for which anyone may recommend his soul to God. Nature puts upon no man an unbearable burden; if her limits be exceeded, man responds by suicide. I have always respected suicide as a regulator of nature. But a believing or philosophic man who has pondered upon God should call upon the sympathy of man, or upon that of God, only when in the direst extremity. When I do this, I am unable to determine whether my prayer may still be termed monotheistic.

But it is of little importance, for whether I pray to a single power or to the many manifestations of it, the difference is not great enough to warrant the war of words or weapons that men have waged. What I worship is the creative power, and that alone. Goethe called it Gott-Natur, seeking a way out by this compound expression. In the prime of his life, Goethe voiced this concept in an ode. For twenty years it has hung on the wall beside my bed.

> Nature! By whom we are surrounded and enfolded, powerless to step without her limits, impotent to sink deeper within her. Unbidden, she takes us up and carries us along in the cycle of her dance, until we weary and fall from her arms. . . . Although we continually influence her, we have no power over her. She is manifest in her countless children—this mother. . . . She is pleased with illusion; she punishes, like a harsh tyrant, him who destroys it in himself or in others. But him who follows her trustfully she presses close to her heart. Her children are without number. She is miserly toward

---

* Translated by Grace McConnaughey.

> none, but she has favorites on whom she spends lavishly and for whom much is sacrificed. Her protection is given to the great. Her drama is ever new, because she continually provides new spectators. Life is her most wonderful invention, and death a master-stroke whereby she may have much life. She envelops man in darkness and spurs him eternally toward the light. She makes him dependent upon the earth, slow and heavy, yet always is stirring him up. . . . She is generous; praise be to her and all her works. She is wise and calm. . . . She has brought me thus far; she will lead me out. I place myself in her hands without reserve. Do with me as she may, she will not spite her own creation. All lies at her door. She alone is culpable, and she alone is deserving of credit.

Since I have not the systems of the philosophers and lack the commentaries of the theologians, I can reconstruct my faith only from the feelings which possess me when I contemplate God's works. It seems possible, indeed, to draw near to him without a systematized belief or form of thought. Goethe has said it in the cold sentence: "Let us seek nothing behind the phenomena; they themselves are the lesson."

This acceptance of the world through the sensuous apperception of it is possible and bearable only to one who is daily conscious of the reality of death but nevertheless makes out his program for days and years to come, as if he were immortal. This paradox is similar to that in which we stubbornly postulate freedom of the will and at the same time believe, perforce, in a fate which must some day cross its path. It was only by virtue of these paradoxes that Goethe justified to himself his constant activity as an escape from demoniacal powers. Belief and accomplishment were so closely allied in him that at eighty years of age he spoke the daring words, "The conviction of my continuation after death springs from my belief in action. For if I work ceaselessly until my death, then nature is obliged to give me another form of being when the present one can no longer house my spirit."

The force of this argument impressed me even in my youth, and I have arrived at similar sources of a faith which rests, fundamentally, upon realistic forms. On this account my belief is all the more easily associated with a pantheism which sees God in all manifestations of nature, whether it peoples nature with discrete gods or sees one all-inhering spirit. Nature seems to me to be filled with a universal rustling which I need not personify.

From so deep a feeling of the animate quality of all things there comes of itself a belief in the symbolism of all being. The symbolic character of every happening shines with overwhelming power into the heart of him who sees each creature as the representative of others and to whom all appearances are but the varied play of the same creative will. Here, for me, ends every question into the future.

Goethe's final wisdom, "All mortality is but a symbol," gives me a similar feeling of peace, for it takes the shock from occurrences without destroying their illusory charm. When I have learned to see the negative and unsuccessful aspects of my work, my environment, or my country as symbolic, then I have learned to bear them. When we look upon the events of our life, in their rise and fall, their ripening and withering, their success and failure, as among the experiments of one and the same creator with millions of his creations, we cannot but feel ourselves encompassed by a circle of circumstance which we cannot break through.

The more definitely a belief in the wisdom of nature took shape in me the less I admired the ascendance of one man over another and the more I admired man's victories over the elements, which I attempted to portray in writing. Not only my excursions in history but those through the woods and mountains have essentially changed in character. The thirty years of my life spent in the country brought this about.

Out of such feelings I have come, in the historical world also, to be conscious of an unseen destiny, of a necessity. It is this that I have tried to express in my biographical studies. One should never represent a man simply as an individual but always as the symbol of a human type, an aspiring child of the gods in battle with himself. To me, at least, individual destinies are interesting only as such symbols. For character is nothing other than the Biblical pound which the master gave to his servant that he might invest it. The amount of the gift is less important than the purpose and strength to make something of it. In my researches, whether in the immediate present or in the past, I have always found more talent that rusted through lack of character than strong characters that failed to advance through lack of talent. Out of this has developed my moral concept of history as opposed to the modern "dynamic" or economic interpretation.

Never, however, have I taken the way of the psychoanalysts, who, it seems to me, overshadow the colorful abundance of life with their systematized doctrines until it is a sorry figment indeed. Contradictions are to be found in every human soul, beyond question, and whoever attempts to unravel them by some abracadabra only destroys their fascinating configurations. That childhood and sex are fundamental experiences of mankind was known and shown by Plutarch, but in no one attribute or stage of development have I found the key to character. Sex and ambition are important motives of action, but the play instinct is just as vital, whether in men of action or in men of reflection. It is the interplay of motives that is decisive; from this springs the morality of a person.

A man's contribution to human welfare is important in the light of history, the forum of humanity, but before God the greatest is he who brings his abilities to their highest point, he whose personality penetrates most deeply the lives of others. Out of this contradiction there has arisen for me a problem which I have been unable quite to solve.

While I pay homage to the man who, through ingenuity, healing, and helping, adds to the happiness of mankind, and while the conquest of cities and countries seems to me to be unimportant for the land of my birth or for any other country known to history, nevertheless, I am most strongly attracted by powerful creative natures, the men of action and the Platonic, who know how to enforce their will upon others and so to raise themselves a step nearer to divinity. The creative power of conquering heroes is not negated by a thousand deaths for which they may have been responsible upon their way, for such men, as Goethe says, "step beyond morality; they are elemental forces like water and fire." So it is that I am ever more drawn to those who are heroes in the old sense of the word, and that my interest in the saints lessens, although it is the latter, not the former, who contribute to human progress.

But neither by this romantic preference for the great adventurers nor by a recognition of the symbolic am I led to approve the amoral activity of our times. Conquest of lands and peoples has lost its beauty. The mastery of time and space accomplished by technical advances has made the subjugation of one people by another absurd. Mechanized warfare and conscription have similarly rendered absurd the pathos of classical heroism. I grew up in a land of inborn obedience, but even as a youngster I could not but recognize the madness of modern war. I saw the union of peoples, of all Europe, as a necessity demanded by the interdependence of all upon all, just as the radio, bringing us news of the most distant occurrences, instantaneously unites our intelligence.

It was the war that really brought home to me the decadence of our social system. What I saw in Germany of the shallow vanity, arrogance, self-interest of the ruling classes fostered defiance against everything supported by the inheritance of rank, title, or money. For me the only hero to emerge from this war was the Unknown Soldier. Yet here, too, arises a contradiction. An individualist, anarchical by nature, feels himself in opposition to the friend of man who is always working for justice. This contradiction, familiar to Nietzsche, allows me to feel the power and beauty of masterful, highly gifted characters who dominate in the world of men just as there are certain outstanding individuals among animals and plants. But I feel that there are limits to an aesthetic view of the world, and I am dedicated to the destruction of all false privilege, based on inheritance or cunning, until society be so completely reconstructed that everyone has the opportunity to reach the goal to which he is entitled by talent and character.

For the sake of this reconstruction, this equalization of classes, there must be sacrificed from time to time a bit of personal freedom, but never at the arbitrary command of a state. With world commerce making neighbors of the chief cities of rival peoples, the epoch of the national state enters its decline. The sacrifice of the life and peace of a people to so-called national honor or greatness is absurd today, for no people disputes the honor of another, and "great powers" no longer exist, in the higher sense of the term. Since culture has become accessible to all peoples, the question what flag waves over a government building is far less important than what is being done in that building toward the equable distribution of goods. I do not like this leveling, but I bow to a new necessity in the faint hope that a world once made free will afford the spirit more room and peace in which to spread its wings.

But I do not perceive in this struggle the essence of the age, nor would I in any sense sacrifice my life to it. Necessary as it is, and much as I agree with it in principle, yet I know that only the material fortunes of men will be improved as a result of this battle of the classes. The chance which we would give the poor and lowly to learn and to become what they will is bound to raise the average, but it cannot advance the highest achievements, which in all times have had their source in gifted and creative characters without distinction of birth or possession. No more than any one race has any one class a monopoly of the finest exploits of mankind. For among the creative and enlightened figures of history, the great prophets and artists, philosophers and inventors, popes and emperors, there are those who were born slaves, bastards, sons of peasants and the proletariat. The spirit is always autochthonous and not to be brought into being by breeding or by the elevation of a class.

And only the spirit matters, for it is that alone which connects us with God. The smallest discovery in nature is of more importance than a shifting of the balance of power in Europe. Biologists, physicians, and engineers, the true builders of our age, compete to outlaw sickness, to master the elements, and to lengthen life, ever striving toward, and in some degree achieving, the very opposite of that effected by the statesmen preparing for war. And even when nothing practical is accomplished, when only new knowledge of the nature of the stars, or of the ocean depths, or of the atom is won, we come nearer to God.

Therefore, I do not believe in the ideal state, since the ideal can never be sought in the state. I do not believe in salvation through an idea, because every idea must perish as it succeeds. But I do believe that the imagination and the thirst after knowledge have the power to bring me closer to the wonders of the world as symbols of the Godhead.

I recognize God in the construction of a crystal, no less than in that of a Bach fugue. I see Him in the revolution of our times which seeks to wipe out old injustices and in the end achieves a modicum of justice. I see Him in the master-hand of Leonardo, as he fixed an unearthly smile upon the lips of his divine creation, and in the caricatures which he made of men's features. I recognize God in the inspiration which He sends me as if in a dream, and in the long labor by which I must carry it out.

Pocket Guide

CO-OPS AND COMMON SENSE

ARDENT faith is beautiful to see, but it is not much help in running a retail store. To build up a cooperative you need the same equipment that you need to run any independent retail store. You've got to know the ropes, you've got to count the pennies, and you've got to like fussing with details.

That truth jumps out at you from two new books about the cooperatives, probably the best that have yet been written. Ellis Cowling's "Cooperatives in America" (Coward-McCann, $2) is short and compact. "Consumers' Cooperation in Great Britain" (Harper, $4) is long, thorough, and scholarly. The story of the cooperatives in America has been one of dramatic ups and downs. It has seesawed with prosperity—up when times were bad, down when times were good. Now it is going up and going up fast, and on a sounder basis than ever before.

Mr. Cowling is an evangelist for the cause. He thinks the cooperatives will cure everything. For him labor unions and the ballot count little. He is so sure that cooperatives are a universal panacea that the reader is tempted to jump to the other side and think that all they can do is reduce the cost of living, make wages go farther. Mr. Cowling himself says of the movement, "It does not offer labor an immediate defense against wage cuts, lengthened hours, or bad working conditions—it doesn't offer the farmer an immediate relief from low prices for his farm produce."

He believes that cooperatives are not socialism nor communism nor a middle road between the two, but that they work toward a better social system by teaching people how industry is run—and by making the ordinary person a property owner. When you own property, people will listen to you. "Those who own—control." In short, it is not the aim of the cooperatives to fight against capitalism or for socialism but to fit the working class into the present order.

In a general way the authors of "Consumers' Cooperation in Great Britain," a group of twelve well-known economists and writers not connected with the cooperative movement, agree with Mr. Cowling. It happened that I read Mr. Cowling's book first and the other later, and I think that is the right order. The British book is packed with information—facts and figures.

All the figures about the British cooperatives are dazzling. Their wholesale system is the largest single food-distributing business in the world. Their flour mills are the largest and most modern in the British Empire. Their banking department is second in financial strength to the Bank of England. They do one-sixth of England's retail business.

The American cooperatives of course make no such exciting picture—the chains and the department stores got in ahead here—but they are at the moment in a better position than ever before. They will profit from the quarrel between the chain stores and the independents. They have the advice and help of the Cooperative League of America. And they have learned that a cooperative business, to succeed, has to stick rigidly to certain rules. Every cooperative in Great Britain that didn't stick to these rules failed. I have room to mention only three of the most important.

The first is that cooperatives must not cut prices in competition with other stores. Instead, they must use the rebate system—that is, give the profits back to the customer at the end of the year. The next is that no matter how many shares of stock a person owns he must have only one vote. The reason for this is obvious: it is the only way to keep democratic control. The third is that money must not be used for outside political and organizing purposes.

Until recently the most successful cooperatives in the United States have been in the Middle West, and have been those which deal in gas, oil, farm supplies, lumber, and staple groceries, products unaffected by fashion, taste, or whim. Now there are rapidly growing cooperatives in other fields, and the fastest growing ones are in the East. They are even beginning to do well in New York City. The first national grocery cooperative in this country, the Great Lakes Central Wholesale Grocery Cooperative, does a business of $3,000,000 a year and has 140 retail outlets.

But the movement still faces great dangers, and what some of them are is made perfectly clear by these two books. Both agree about the tough problem of wages and hours. How can cooperatives pay higher wages than private industry and shorten hours and yet compete? Except in Scotland British cooperatives do not pay higher wages or have shorter hours. But they would like to be able to, and they know that the only way they can do so is by forcing wages up and hours down in whole industries. This they are trying to do by legislation. As to their attitude toward labor unions, in the 1926 general strike the co-ops were forced to be on both sides of the fence. Many of their own employees were striking, while they were supporting other strikers. But there is this to be said—the chances for promotion and the conditions of employment are far better in English cooperatives than in privately owned stores. In England as in the United States the co-ops encourage unions among their employees.

Another danger: it is easy to oversell a community on the idea of a cooperative when the push comes from the outside. The healthiest cooperatives are those which grow out of a local need. In Madison, New Jersey, according to an article in Fortune, a group of people got tired of paying too much for coal and out of this grew a healthy cooperative.

It may seem to you that I'm pointing out too many weaknesses. But this is a movement that can be made successful only by those who go into it with their eyes open. J. P. Warbasse, president of the Cooperative League of America, says that in proportion there are more failures in private business than in cooperatives. Certainly the cooperative movement, whether it is going to lead to Utopia or not, is growing faster in the United States today than ever before and on a more solid basis.

HELEN WOODWARD

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

I HAVE just returned from a visit to Washington, where I was startled to find a general feeling of depression and discouragement, particularly among New Deal officials, such as I had not noticed since 1932. For example, I talked with two friends who hold important offices, though not of first rank. Their first question was, "What do you see ahead for us?" They looked gloomy and they were gloomy, and I could not add very much to their cheer, for I was depressed by what I had heard, in the course of a flying trip to Ohio, about the conditions in Cleveland and in Kentucky. Cleveland, with 200,000 people still out of work, is an alarming spectacle; the financial resources of the city are practically exhausted and the authorities are at their wits' end to know what to do. From Kentucky comes the report of a considerable increase in petty crime due to hunger and suffering; one judge is said to have refused to jail a man of otherwise excellent reputation who had broken into a store to get food for a starving wife and children. The Mayor of Chicago has telegraphed to Washington that there will be "chaos" there if the city's WPA appropriation is cut. It seems to me that the last outburst of spending has not produced the results that were hoped. I know there are some encouraging figures, such as increased car loadings and much improved railroad earnings. Still, one hears everywhere of the large army of unemployed and of the failure of new industrial enterprises to appear.

But to return to the New Deal. The discouragement in Washington is due to a number of things besides the slow return of prosperity. The Administration is worried about the growing breach with Congress and the latter's refusal to vote the necessary sums for the WPA, which in my judgment it will have to vote later if it does not do it now. The anxiety is also due to the European situation and the lack of vigorous leadership in the White House. It is in part due to dissension within various departments and a general feeling of weakness of administration, not to say maladministration. There is no doubt that the government has the jitters about the situation in South America, even though the consensus of opinion is that something was actually accomplished at Lima—non-official observers hold the contrary view. Finally there is the outlook for 1940. The men I have talked with are seriously and honestly concerned about the continuance of a liberal government. They do not wish to violate the third-term tradition, and yet they are more and more compelled to fall back upon Franklin Roosevelt because of the lack of promising material in the party. All the people I talked with are bitterly opposed to the Paul McNutt boom. They know that the President does not have control of the National Committee and that he could not possibly put over Ickes or Hopkins or Wallace—Hopkins continues to be his favorite. Everybody seems befogged as well as worried.

One of the curious stories I heard was that Farley is working for a Hull and Farley ticket for 1940. Some think that would make Farley the next President of the United States; at least there are many who feel that a man of Mr. Hull's years and not over robust physique would be likely to go down under the terrific burden of the Presidency. The lesser New Dealers, by the way, are convinced that Mr. Hull is no more in sympathy with the New Deal as a whole than is Vice-President Garner. One still hears a good deal about the Garner boom, but that is obviously a smoke screen, and what people are eager to find out is who is being groomed for the Presidential race under cover of the Garner boom. Senator Clark tells people that he is not and will not be an active candidate, and it is true that he is following some lines of procedure which will detract from rather than add to his popularity in Missouri.

The sad thing is that the responsibility for the lack of efficiency in Washington goes straight back to the White House. The President's followers are uneasy because his wobbling on policy is more in evidence than ever. For example, a year ago he was demanding a two-ocean fleet; after abandoning that, he toyed with the idea—though he denies it—that we should have a tremendous armament program. Now he is limiting himself to a demand for 8,000 airplanes in army and navy, but no one believes that he is interested in that chiefly because of our own needs. It is believed that he wants these airplanes in order to have them on hand for the use of the Allies if they are suddenly attacked, for Washington doubts very much whether England and France will ever be able to catch up with the Hitler lead in the aviation race. In this connection I have seen a letter from an unusually able and intelligent American who has been spending months examining conditions in England. He finds that the heads of great plants believe that it will take England from two to three years to be fully prepared, and they expect a war much sooner. So apparently does the President. It is the hour for bold leadership in Washington, and it is not forthcoming.

Serge Koussevitzky

Leopold Stokowski

The World's Greatest Artists are on Victor Records

HAYDN SYMPHONY No. 102 in B Flat by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

One of Haydn's famed "London Symphonies," that has never before been recorded, is now immortalized on Victor Higher Fidelity Records. It is gay and sunny music, warmly reflecting the joviality, sparkle and charm of the great composer. This recording, under the great Koussevitzky, will receive wide acclaim for its brilliance. Album M-529 (AM-529, automatic) 6 sides $6.50

You can buy RCA Victrolas on C. I. T. easy payment plan. *Prices f.o.b. Camden, N. J., subject to change without notice.

OVERTURE and VENUSBERG MUSIC and PRELUDE TO ACT III from "TANNHÄUSER" by the PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA Leopold Stokowski, Conductor

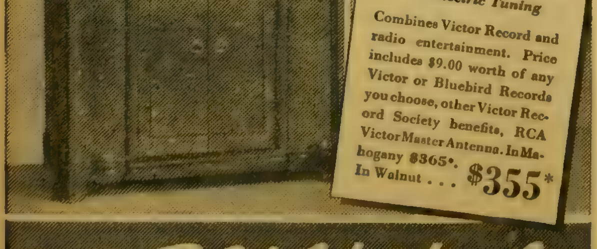
The story of Tannhäuser's pure love for Elizabeth, temporarily supplanted by his unholy passion for Venus . . . his expiation, and final pardon at Elizabeth's bier . . . are told in music full of passion, melodic beauty and rich, harmonic color. This amazingly natural Victor Higher Fidelity recording fully reveals Stokowski's marvelous virtuosity with a great orchestra. Album M-530 (AM-530, automatic) 9 sides $9.00

Listen to "Magic Key of RCA" Sundays, 2 to 3 P. M., E. S. T., NBC Blue Network.



RCA Victrola U-134A with Automatic Record Changer and Electric Tuning

Combines Victor Record and radio entertainment. Price includes $9.00 worth of any Victor or Bluebird Records you choose, other Victor Record Society benefits, RCA Victor Master Antenna. In Mahogany $365*. In Walnut . . . $355*

RCA Victrola

Combines Record and Radio Entertainment

A SERVICE OF THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

In the Wind

UNNOTICED BY the press, one of Hjalmar Schacht's most intimate friends slipped into the United States about a month ago. To private groups here he confided that he had fled in despair, and he forecast Dr. Schacht's troubles, which had not yet become front-page news. He said that Schacht's parting words to him were: "I'm glad you're getting out now. When I finish my work I don't know whether they'll build a monument for me—or a scaffold."

MOST NEW DEALERS regard the Strecker case, in which the government is pleading for deportation of an alien Communist, as an explosive affair. If the government wins, the New Deal probably loses, since the victory may unleash a large-scale offensive against pro-New Deal labor "militants." A reported dialogue between Attorney General Frank Murphy and Solicitor General Robert Jackson reveals the uncertainty in official circles. On assuming his new post Murphy expressed eagerness to argue a case at once. Jackson is said to have replied hastily, "Why not start with the Strecker case?" In equal haste Murphy explained that he was very busy. Jackson is arguing the case.

ON THE campus of Northwestern University Edward G. Woods, Chicago counsel for Hearst, and H. Richard Sellers, international representative of the American Newspaper Guild, were bitterly debating the merits of the Guild strike in Chicago. When Sellers denounced the management's use of thugs against the strikers, Woods lost his poise and his logic. He roared back, "We have never hired thugs—and furthermore they're all discharged now."

APPEARANCE OF a six-page newspaper edited by anonymous Communists on the staff has created a flurry at Time, Inc. It is called High Time, contains considerable "inner office" dope, even private memos by executives, and includes the following story. Before leaving for the opening night of "Kiss the Boys Goodby," a play by Clare Boothe, who is the wife of Henry R. Luce, publisher of Time, Louis Kronenberger, dramatic editor of Time, said to his associates sadly: "If I don't like the play, I'll call my review 'Kiss the Boss Goodby.'" After the review was written it was sent up to Luce's office, and didn't come back for three days. When it did, this memo was attached: "H. R. L. has not read this."

IN INFORMED political circles it is said that two recent blasts against Mayor LaGuardia's administration are traceable to last fall's campaign for the governorship of New York. One was the attack on the police force by Councilman Joseph C. Baldwin; the other was Thomas E. Dewey's charges of tremendous thefts in the subway turnstiles. Designed to show the "inefficiency of LaGuardia's rule," both charges are reported to have been inspired by the anger of the Young Republican organization at LaGuardia's failure to indorse Dewey for governor. Both attacks, it appears, have backfired.

[We invite readers to submit material for In the Wind. The $5 prize for the best item submitted during January goes to Ruth Rosenwald of Washington, D. C., for the item about the Kansas City Star published two weeks ago.]

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Ferocious Faulkner

THE WILD PALMS. By William Faulkner. Random House. $2.50.

RECENT developments in fiction show various attempts to escape from the basic characteristic of the novel, its linear narrative form. One example is the structure which Professor Beach calls "breadthwise cutting," practiced by Waldo Frank and John Dos Passos, in which a number of characters and series of events are connected only in time and place to give a cross-section of life, instead of being strung on a single thread, or several threads combined in a plot. Another is Aldous Huxley's calculated violation of the chronological order in "Eyeless in Gaza." In "The Wild Palms" William Faulkner's experimental genius devises a pattern consising of two stories, entirely unrelated in substance, presented in sections, which the publisher describes as an orchestration of the "major themes of flight and refuge." The reader must be grateful for a clue to a pattern which otherwise would remain in doubt until the last word.

As a composer or orchestra leader Mr. Faulkner relies chiefly on the brasses. There are few passages of tenderness or sympathy which might be assigned to the strings or woodwinds. Seduction, adultery, starvation, abortion, death, are the phases through which the young interne Wilbourne and Charlotte Rittenmeyer pass in their flight; high water, the rescue of a pregnant woman, landings forbidden by shooting, childbirth on a muddy flat, naked battles with alligators, are the episodes in the search for refuge of "the tall convict," otherwise unnamed. Wilbourne is seduced by Charlotte, and later in their distress is persuaded to perform a criminal operation on her, for which he is sentenced to prison for not less than fifty years. "The tall convict," sent on a rescue mission, wanders for days on the face of the waters in the unwelcome company of a woman and her baby, to find refuge at last within his prison walls. On a last ironic touch of Southern justice he is given ten more years of prison for attempting to escape. " 'Women—!' the tall convict said . . ."

The artistic intention, as always with Mr. Faulkner, pervades the entire book. Of the characters Charlotte is drawn in the round, physically and mentally, a fully realized woman who takes Wilbourne for the joy of "bitching." She is explained by her husband, Francis Rittenmeyer, who stands as a flat symbol of the meekness and forbearance that is more terrible than violence. His appearance to plead for Wilbourne in court, and finally to supply him with poison, puts himself in jeopardy. " 'I'm not doing it for you,' Rittenmeyer said. 'Get that out of your damned head.' " Wilbourne remains throughout undeveloped, a blank wall on which Charlotte writes her lovely but fatal hieroglyphs. He explains his helplessness by the fact that he restrained his sexual impulses until he was twenty-seven years old, too late to understand or control them. In the other story "the tall convict" shows the same ineptitude in crime as Wilbourne in love. His crude attempt to rob a train he vaguely attributes to a desire to decorate a sweetheart as well as to reading legends of Jesse James; his failure to make a good opportunity of escape excites the mirth of comrades and jailer alike. Nevertheless, he has a personality formed within prison; so that the environment is necessary to his self-consciousness. A Thomas Fuller might describe him in the character of The Good Convict. He too has his foil in "the short plump convict" who acts as interlocutor. The woman remains just that and nothing more.

The symmetry of this arrangement of characters is carried out in the natural background. The active fury of the flood which sweeps the tall convict and his unknown protege for days amid the flotsam and jetsam of the ruined countryside is balanced by the passive fierceness of the cold in which Wilbourne and Charlotte endure a winter at the mining camp to which poverty sends them. In these descriptions Mr. Faulkner's power is seen at its highest, portraying the grim cosmic ferocity of nature against which the pitiful melodrama of human life seems more than ever vain and futile. It is possibly a sign of his contemptuous realization of this contrast that leads Mr. Faulkner to tell his story in a style that suggests at times the inchoate turbulence of nature, and again a burlesque of Henry James.

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

Personae and Masks

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS. The Macmillan Company. $5.

DESPITE the chronological order of W. B. Yeats's autobiographies, and despite the unity of their smokily undulating prose, they tend to scatter into the separate forms of "reveries," anecdotes, personal recollections of men and places, diaries, and occasional essays. Perhaps the only actual unity to be found in this latest collection, which includes the recently published "Dramatis Personae" (1936) and starts with the earliest of the childhood reveries, is the all-abiding presence of Mr. Yeats's genius. I use the dreadful word "genius" advisedly, because it may be applied to the writing of W. B. Yeats with greater appreciation of its original meaning than to the work of any other contemporary poet. Even his prose, which carries within it the lambent phrase and imagery of his early verse, and which bears few marks of the development that distinguishes the lyrics of "Words for Music Perhaps" from the poems included in his cycle of "The Rose," is sustained by it.

Much has been said of W. B. Yeats's individuality, much that is pertinent and true of his essentially protestant attitude in a country dominated by the spirit and temper of the Irish Catholic church. Yet the "Autobiography," as well his later "Collected Poems," contains more markedly the many aspects of his personae, and the key to their multiplicity may be found in the twenty-third selection he has made from his diary of the year 1909: "All my life I have been haunted with the idea that the poet should know all classes of men. . . . He will play with all masks."

We need not be surprised then at the many choices and rejections which are implied or made explicit in the fifty-odd years that he brings to mind in his autobiography. We need not be surprised at his entry into politics when he and the Gaelic League were young, and his withdrawal from them, or at the wide discrepancies in his appreciation of painting, architecture, and philosophy, his contemplation of Blake's system for a universe and his rejection of Hegel, his turning an edge of malice against George Moore and finding praise for Oscar Wilde. In his verse perhaps no living poet has inhabited or at least walked through so many schools and movements to his own advantage. It may be said that at one time he was a disciple of Mallarmé, another time of Pound, quite as in his younger days he wheeled from the influences of the extreme Blakian spectrum of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood to the extroverted, athletic medievalism of William Morris, and then turned back again. Traces of Lionel Johnson's diction may be found in his elegy "In Memory of Major Robert Gregory" and the poetry following it, and his reentry into political thinking, if not practice, is in his introductions to "Wheels and Butterflies" and "The King of the Great Clock Tower." As he predicted in 1909, "he will play with all masks," and all masks are fitted to the resources of a felicitous imagination.

In the "Autobiography" there is always present that side of W. B. Yeats which veered so closely to the very image of charlatanism and yet escaped that charge by the true merit of his poetry and the power of his imagination. How far his prejudices may be said to have distorted facts can be seen by comparing his commentary on George Moore with Mr. Hone's admirable "Life." It would be a mistake, I think, to regard Mr. Yeats's recollections of his long life as a record of his experiences: it is the quality of each experience that Mr. Yeats remembers and not its literal being as it may exist in memory. Perhaps it is his tendency to write prose with a touch of ornament that is at once the mark of a style and the sign of a mannerism which so often makes his autobiographies lack the reality to be perceived in the best of his poetry. Almost every anecdote that he tells has its reality in a truth understood by readers of his verse, a truth in which the mask he wears is one of the several personae of his being. His prose, relaxed from the discipline he has imposed upon his verse, "stern color and that delicate line/That are our secret discipline," suffers its lack of specific name and place and time; only the remembered sounds of its noises, only the selection of its more abstract lines and colors, only the fragments of its conversations remain.

All this is not to say that Mr. Yeats's "Autobiography" has forfeited the kind of honesty peculiar to all his work: here again we see, if we do not fully realize, how his imagination so often leaped ahead of and sometimes usurped the powers of his intellect, how he was among the first to hope for an Ireland "freed from provincialism by an exacting criticism, a European pose," how he possessed through his wide acquaintanceship and reading an early knowledge of the importance of Ibsen, Madame Blavatsky, Fabian socialism, symbolism, Shaw, and W. E. Henley to the closing years of the nineteenth century. The conflicts and doubts occasioned by Mr. Yeats's traveling with both hare and hounds are clear enough to everyone who has eyes to read. And I know no better example of its kind of literary history than Mr. Yeats's chapter on The Tragic Generation, that generation which came of age in the eighteen-nineties and was to extend its influence throughout Europe until after the World War.

We leave Mr. Yeats full of as many of his seventy-three years as he chooses to remember, and if his quarrel with George Moore does him little honor, since Moore is dead and cannot answer him, the comparative dignity with which he accepted the Nobel Prize in 1925 restores that quality of mind which has made him one of the most distinguished spokesmen of his own "tragic generation." Now that his autobiographies are bound together in one volume, it is to be hoped that an index will be made for them and that a one-volume edition of all his prose will be forthcoming.

HORACE GREGORY

Friend of Rulers

THE CAPTAINS AND THE KINGS DEPART: JOURNALS AND LETTERS OF REGINALD, VISCOUNT ESHER. Charles Scribner's Sons. Two Volumes. $7.50.

IT SCARCELY does justice to the memory of Reginald Baliol Brett, second Viscount Esher, to call him an éminence grise, as Professor Laski does, or to underrate the power of his personality by naming him a go-between, as another less merciful reviewer of his "Journals and Letters" has done. He was, no doubt, an éminence; but far from being gray, he was a multi-colored and multifarious personality with definite views which he never concealed either from his sovereign masters or from the king's ministers and paladins. Issue of an old family, Lord Esher was made Deputy Governor of Windsor Castle and Keeper of the King's Archives in 1901. From the memoirs it does not appear whether it was his office which made him a friend of two rulers and of nearly all leading post-Victorian statemen and generals or his inherited family position. But whatever pushed him into prominence, his ability as an officer, his great knowledge, his undeniable charm, wit, and humor, and, before all, his unselfish patriotism made him well deserve these friendships.

Refusing successively the Secretaryship of War, the Viceroyship of India, an earldom, the editorship of the Daily News, in short, everything that would have given him command over men, he used his great influence always for someone, never against. And he used it, regardless of personal friendship, for what he thought was best for the country. Though he served for a while (1880-85) as a liberal M. P., he could rightfully claim that he never had been a "party man." He was a Tory in his social leanings and thought democracy "just a rhetorical expression, a word of passion," yet in the coal strike he sided with the miners because the coal-owners were "fighting only for their high rates of interest." And he believed that the "middle class which came into power in 1832 had its day. You cannot mop up the tide of the workers."

In spite of Lord Esher's unbending character and his harmonious life, the personality emerging from this self-supplied evidence is not entirely devoid of contradictions. Recognizing that "individual and personal liberty both of thought and speech has been the fountain-spring of England's growth into a worldwide empire," Lord Esher complains, nevertheless, of the undue power of the press and has but little respect for "popular government" as a safeguard of civil liberties. In his opinion politicians ultimately depend on soldiers, yet he believes in civil power controlling the military. Probably the duality of his ego explains these contradictory views. By reason of his birth and education he became a refined type of literary gentleman whose skeptical mind was at variance with his military training.

During the war blundering diplomats strengthened his belief in the superiority of generals. "All that can be said for them [the statesmen] is that they possess the gift of putting into words, eloquent and heartstirring, their reasons for not doing the most obvious things." He expresses nearly unlimited respect and sympathy for Lord Kitchener, though admitting Kitchener's failures in his judgment of men, and the most unkind criticism of President Wilson, whom he calls "the seagreen incorruptible character that produces cataclysms," "an idealist, vain and 'swell-headed,' who thinks he can succeed where Buddha and Christ have failed." He is much more lenient in his estimation of Hindenburg, who is "a fine old boy" and "one of the real 'characters' of the war"—an excusable opinion since in 1920 Lord Esher could hardly foresee what this "fine old boy" would do in 1933.

The most conspicuous trait of Lord Esher's character is his faithful devotion to his royal masters. However, far from being a courtier, he was always frank and outspoken.

Even more interesting than his personality, as thrown into relief by his journals and letters, is his "inside history" of the World War. Whenever in Britain or France a personal conflict of leading statesmen and commanders-in-chief occurred, Lord Esher, because he stood high in the confidence of the parties concerned, acted as an intermediary. His record of the endless intrigues and rancorous schemes will forever remain an unparalleled source of information; later events in most cases confirmed his opinions. ("War is a tragedy," he wrote in 1918, "Peace Congress the farce that follows." The Paris conference, he said, at any rate succeeded in this, "that a future war upon an even bigger scale becomes inevitable.")

His views about the League of Nations in 1919 have been similarly corroborated by the pitiful agony of this misborn body:

> The more I think of the League of Nations the more hopeless it seems to impose this political arrangement on European nations unless you cut deep into all pre-conceived notions, that is, monarchy, hereditary aristocracy, military ascendancy, "patriotism" (meaning some nation or other über alles).
>
> However impracticable, some serious effort should have been made to organize a League Police Force.
>
> Human nature cannot be controlled by documents to which a Great Seal is attached. Only the Franciscan monks, barefooted and ascetic, can lure the wild animals to sit on their shoulders.

All this he wrote a good many years before the ascent of "the wild animals" to power. And Chamberlain lures them in vain. If statesmen would read or scholars could act, Lord Esher's memories might become a most useful first reader. History, according to Hegel, is the schoolmaster of mankind, but so far as we can see, it has had very inattentive pupils.

Notwithstanding this regrettable fact, Lord Esher's son, who edited the first two volumes of his father's memoirs (not published here), and his brother, who edited the last two (the first of these, by the way, is marked Volume III), cannot be blamed for disregarding the author's "wish to leave no record." No modesty or other desire to shun publicity would justify the withholding of these masterpieces from posterity. Odds and ends of the "Journals and Letters" are similar to fragments of a mirror reflecting the universe. They reflect the author's universal knowledge, the clarity of his spirited mind, his sense of beauty, in short, the divine spark which never fails to evoke the delighted response of those who indulge in the real pleasures of life. Whatever else Viscount Esher was—a statesman, a highly educated soldier, an author, a court official, a witty critic—his memoirs reveal him as artist. "The captains and the kings depart," but an artist's work is immortal.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

History of Labor

AMERICAN LABOR. By Herbert Harris. Yale University Press. $3.75.

AN AUTHOR who tries to compress the history of American labor into the pages of a medium-sized volume faces insuperable obstacles. Inevitably important events will be casually treated, and many groups and movements scarcely mentioned. This is the principal defect in this lively, intelligent, and objective study. The first ninety-five pages are given over to a general description of the history of the labor movement. Many of the high spots are touched, but many others are left unnoticed. The next seven chapters trace the rise and progress of seven different unions, presumably on the theory that they represent typical groups. These chapters are in general very well done, but in many spots they are too sketchy, and they occasionally fail to deal adequately with union institutions. Also the steel industry deserves more than casual mention, and the virtual neglect of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers may only be justified on the theory that this overadvertised union has already received more than its share of space. Yet this represents a serious omission, for the problems of the Amalgamated are quite different from those of the other great garment union, the International Ladies' Garment Workers, which receives an entire chapter. One might also take issue with Mr. Harris's opinion on the causes of the failure of the I. W. W. to establish a permanent organization. It seems to me that this question requires further examination. The difficulties of the "wobblies" were perhaps due to the specific industrial environment and the type of worker they were seeking to organize. In fact, the T. W. O. C., with infinitely more human and material resources, has scarcely had more success in many areas in which the wobblies once had a foothold.

"American Labor" has much to recommend it. In addition to the liveliness of its style, its most striking characteristics are its balance and fairness. The author cherishes no mystical hope that unionism might be the vehicle for bringing in the new society. He is too aware of difficulties and too well acquainted with the facts to engage in leftist preachments. However, he is not an apologist for the shortcomings of the leaders of labor. In fact, Mr. Harris has few illusions, even about the more recent heroes. He shows the various leaders in their union setting, reacting to the wishes of the members. Even Hutcheson of the carpenters, though his conduct and character are described, is treated with justice. With characteristic fairness the author fails to join in the charge that the labor movement is beset by widespread racketeering. He recognizes that the evil is largely confined to certain trades and is a result of peculiar conditions.

I noted only one minor slip. Mr. Harris implies that David Dubinsky led the fight against the Communist wrecking crew out to capture his union in the twenties. Mr. Dubinsky is rightfully praised for his altruism, ability, and farsightedness; but his role in the struggle against the Communists was secondary to that of the veteran Morris Sigman, whose heroic efforts saved the union from destruction. The author recognizes that then, as now, left-wing factions were a serious internal problem, and he points out that such groups by their energy and eagerness create a whole set of difficulties in labor organizations which have very few politically conscious members. "American Labor" is written with a recognition that the American scene differs essentially from the European, and those who object to "exceptionalism" might ponder the reason why the most highly developed capitalist nation has never been fertile ground for a labor party. Mr. Harris has done an outstanding job. His book fills a long-felt need for a readable and authoritative one-volume labor history. It deserves examination by all who are interested in the subject.

PHILIP TAFT

Personal Legend

THE FIVE-FOLD MESH. By Ben Belitt. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

IN DESCRIBING the arrangement of his twenty-five poems Mr. Belitt submits "a discipline of integration," "a problem in orientation," "a sequence which, beginning with simple responses to the natural world, moves on to an awareness of the personal identity, and attempts finally to establish relations between the personal and the contemporary world." This is not a novel program among the serious young poets of our time—or any other—but it expresses an attitude, a complexity of consciousness, and the obstacles to lyric self-assurance that are more typical of recent than of pre-war years. However much an orientation of this kind has been a recognized obligation of the romantic tradition, it has been thrown into new and dramatic relief by the disorders of the current scene, where blundering events and ideas have multiplied the poet's range of moral relationships to the point of making them either a new means of escape from selfhood or, in the guise of beliefs and cults of action, an often spurious form of responsibility that results in deceiving the poet and the public with the pretension of doctrines too ponderous or impersonal to have any exact poetic utility. But poets who are courageous enough to face their personal world and to make way through it, with its ordeals of sensibility and moral judgment, toward the acts and decisions of modern life are still few enough to make Mr. Belitt's scale an impressive one. He emphasizes the "highly tentative" character of his notations, "the expanding record of change" into which his present lyrics may ultimately fit. In doing so he admits the empirical nature of his problems. He also shows the humility of knowing what severe labor and self-criticism they may entail and how distant may be the final results of his search. Meanwhile he has published a book of serious and, in its best pages, impressive poetry, less inclined than the usual first volume to trade on the styles and mannerisms of current verse, and showing both in its difficulties and merits a critical intelligence that should enable him to grow out of his uncertainties without allowing his positive merits to suffer the ingrowth and humiliation that often go with such discipline. He has the advantage of seeing maturity as a mark to be aimed at, not as an assumption to lay claim to at the outset of his career.

The poems in "The Five-Fold Mesh"—whose title is an initial error—are printed in two groups of lyrics and two of speculative verse. The speculations easily show the pitfalls of the author's approach and method. The first group—five sonnets called "In Time of Armament"—deals with a kind of oracular abstraction that encourages rhetoric and easily lapses into trite sententiousness; the scope of the idea is so general that exactness and sincerity of feeling must struggle to be heard and usually end by compromising on wordy adjectives and nouns. The second—"Many Cradles," a more poignant and atmospheric personal legend—is threatened by another kind of rhetoric, that of homiletic pathos and memory, interrupted by a passage of stanzas in the charged style of Rimbaud and Crane, two masters who alone among modern poets succeeded with this type of disciplined violence and whose model shows up too obviously behind Belitt's lines. It is "Many Cradles," however, that defines the experience out of which his book has come and suggests the phases of personal growth that may be traced in his lyrics.

These lyrics are of sharply varying quality. Some—Orlando's Song, Song of the King's Huntsmen, John Keats, Surgeon—tend toward a literary preciosity that perhaps marks a period of juvenile poetic enthusiasm and seldom rises above cliché of style and rhythm. Others—Scherzo, From Towers of Grass, This Our Grief, The Duel—combine hortatory devices with fanciful imagery in a way that makes for an inert sort of lyric dignity, stiff with obvious stanzaic design and formal emphasis. A similar derivative restraint appears in Canticle for Innocent Comedians, a poem of subtle perception made awkward by too much straining for style and metaphor. There are sensitive lines and figures in these lyrics, but they too easily fall into pastiche or harden into didactic effort, and it is not until one reads the book's finest achievements—the lyrics Colophon, Tarry Delight, Charwoman, and especially Death as Basilisk—that one finds these virtues meeting their real test and vindication in four poems of true and credible intensity, where ecstasy and terror condense into exact allegory and find their proper images and their true form. These lyrics are the heart of Mr. Belitt's book, and from them he must step forward, out of his derivations and prophecies, into the specific labor that will gain his the sight of a baby being born but have nothing against cho nspiring influence of wholesale massacres, may be only no mptom of the cultural level on which the great industry wo its mentors operate. Provided it is hypocritically dis-mo ed, the appeal to the lowest instincts is still legitimate an ness.

here is only one plausible character in the picture—the ers are inhuman dummies—Gunga Din, the dumb water-carrier whom the Hollywood merchants of death borrowed from Rudyard Kipling's poem. Sam Jaffe plays him with the touching smile of the stupid Hindu who falls for the "regimentals" of India's oppressors. One would like to see more of him, but Gunga Din does little more than give a name to the picture and provide an anticlimax. It is not only a bad joke to have Kipling, who saw his first battle as Boer War correspondent in Africa, appear at the end and write his poem in time for the commander to recite it over poor dead Gunga Din; it is a cynically intended, pseudo-serious trick that puts over the whole fraud.

So much for the content of "Gunga Din." In form it is a technically perfect show (directed and produced by George Stevens), in which fist fights, cavalry charges of thousands of riders, and artillery barrages are flawlessly represented.

The same company, RKO Radio, provides entirely different fare in the production of "Boy Slaves" (direction: P. J. Wolfson, script Albert Bein and Ben Orkow). A proletarian youngster runs away from home in order to make money which he can send back to mother. On the road he is forced to join a gang of homeless kids, neglected victims of society, who steal to keep alive. They are caught and handed over to an honest citizen who gives them jobs on his turpentine farm, where he works them to exhaustion. The kids revolt and are only saved by state troopers from being killed by their exploiter in defense of his property rights. After the final trial an enlightened judge sends them to an institution where they will be educated, and puts their accuser in jail.

I sketch this vague outline of an excellent script deliberately so as not to give away a story which is full of life and more exciting in its dramatic developments than a dozen adventure pictures. The theme is timely—the deadline for this column coincides with the deadline for three young boys in Sing Sing; it is true; and it concerns us all. Moreover, it is treated with honesty and real feeling, and is played in an admirably realistic style; the youngsters are better than the "Dead End Kids," not touched yet by Broadway. Special mention should go to Roger Daniel, James McCallion, and Anne Shirley, who escapes seduction and tells a lot with chaste reticence. Certain shortcomings, especially the lack of explanation for the inhuman behavior of the boys' exploiters, could have been easily overcome if more producer's zeal and money had been invested. Nevertheless, this Class B picture triumphs over the Gunga Dins with real suspense, tragedy, and appealing hope. Every friend of the movie art should see it—for his own good and to encourage Hollywood to do more honest work of this kind.

"The Great Man Votes" (RKO Radio) rises above Hollywood stereotypes, but only on feeble wings, ending its flight before it really gets started. John Barrymore gives an interesting comic character study.

FRANZ HOELLERING

TRAVEL

EUROPE • MEXICO
• SOVIET UNION •

You see how life is really lived—you meet the people—you travel with companions of your own mental age in a small informal group—those things best done together are done cooperatively; otherwise you pursue your own interests—services are generously inclusive.

COOPERATIVE EUROPE. Auspices Cooperative League of U. S. A. Leader Dr. Henry Carpenter. Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Norway, Scotland, England, France. Switzerland. Sailing July 2, Back September 3. $675

■

PUBLIC HOUSING IN EUROPE AND THE SOVIET UNION (4th season) under leadership of Irving Brant, Vice-Pres., National Public Housing Conference. England, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, France, Holland. Sailing June 22. Back Aug. 10. $598

■

SCANDINAVIA, SOVIET UNION, BALKANS under leadership of Julian Bryan. London, Sweden, Aland Islands, Finland, Leningrad, Moscow, Kiev, Rumania, Bulgaria, Dalmatian Coast, Venice. Sailing July 3. Back August 31. .... $765

■

THE SOVIET UNION (third season) under leadership of Robert Magidoff, an American writer resident in the Soviet Union for the past five years. London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Ukraine, Caucasus, Black Sea, Crimea. Sailing July 1. Back September 5. .... $498

■

MEXICO IN PROGRESS (second season) under leadership of Herbert Weinstock. An unusually complete survey. Sailing July 6. Back August 15. ...... $468

Steamship passage Third Class except for "Mexico in Progress." For information regarding itineraries, social and cultural programs, etc., on these and other trips, address:

THE OPEN ROAD
8 W. 40TH ST.
NEW YORK
Department C

Cooperating in the Soviet-Union with Intourist

BOOK

The Best Handy-Sized Dictionary—Completely New

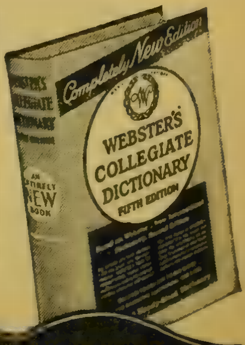
THE largest, latest abridgement of the new Merriam-Webster, WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY, Second Edition; characterized by the same outstanding scholarship. 110,000 Entries; 1,800 Illustrations; 1,300 Pages. Thin-Paper Style, Indexed: Cloth, $3.50; Fabrikoid, $5.00; Leather, $7.00; Limp Pigskin (dark blue or natural), $8.50. Purchase of your bookdealer, or send order and remittance direct to the publishers. Write for New Quiz and Picture Game—FREE.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO.
247 Broadway, Springfield, Mass.



The New FIFTH EDITION
WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE

LECTURES

Term Beginning
FEB. 6
RAND EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTE, Inc.
7 East 15 St.
AL 4-3094
Send for Bulletin A

Propaganda Analysis and Public Opinion
Prof. Harwood L. Childs, Howard Dietz, Arthur Kallet, Sydney M. Kaye, Ferdinand Lundberg, Prof. Clyde R. Miller, Prof. P. H Odegard, Leland Olds, Dr. Hans Spier. Prof. Robert K. Speer.

Race Theories and Democracy
Dr. Otto Klineberg, Prof. Jacques Barzun, Dr. Alexander Lesser, Dr. Geza Roheim, Dr. Paul Schilder, Dr. Max Yergen, Oswald Garrison Villard, Dr. Eduard C. Lindeman, Rabbi J. X. Cohen, Lester C. Granger, Dr. Johan J. Smertenko, Dr. Edgar J. Fisher, Dr. Siegfried Lipshitz, Roger C. Roy, Dr. S. P. Rosenthal.

Letters to the Editors

Would Have Us Go Farther

Dear Sirs: Michael Williams's letter in The Nation for January 21 struck me as being just about as confused as any defense of the Catholic church, especially during the present world crisis, is likely to be. But The Nation's reply to it seemed to me to be equally, and a good deal less pardonably, confused.

One does not have to be much of a Marxist to realize that the position of the Catholic church, particularly in regard to social and political affairs, has always been determined by policies of expediency. With this in mind, it is not difficult to understand how the Pope can issue encyclicals against Hitler at the same time that he is sending messages of encouragement to General Franco. The Catholic church will support any regime, fascist or otherwise, which does not seek to destroy its power or to curtail its financial resources. According to The Nation, "the Pope's stand on racism has been magnificent." But we can all be sure that if Hitler, tomorrow, were to order every German citizen to become a member of the Catholic church, Nazi storm troopers could beat up all the Jews in the country without fear of another "magnificent" reprimand from the Pope.

You state that you are compelled "to condemn specific offenses, while making it clear beyond doubt that [you] are not attacking the body of Catholic laity or the church as a religious institution." How can you possibly make such a distinction? Do you believe that these individual Catholic officials and laymen whom you rightly condemn have been speaking only for themselves? Of what significance are their utterances unless they are supported by the policies of the church itself? And how many among the laity or the priesthood have come out in open denunciation of these policies? Those who have deviated in any respect from what we may call the Catholic "line" have in no way influenced that line; those, for example, who have openly supported the Loyalist cause have not prevented the Pope from rendering spiritual, or the majority of lay Catholics throughout the world from rendering material, assistance to Franco. No, it is not individual laymen, priests, and bishops but the church itself which must be attacked and exposed, over and over again, if certain ideals are to be realized and certain causes are to survive.

HELEN NEVILLE

Brooklyn, January 26

A Service to Religion

Dear Sirs: It is very disturbing to observe a continuous don't-dare-criticize-us attitude among prominent clergymen and laymen of the Catholic church.

Since the early days of the joint Nazi-Fascist military assault upon the Republic of Spain statements and opinions concerning that affair by persons belonging to the Catholic church have displayed unconcealed fanatical hostility toward all whose views do not happen to be in full accord with their own.

Another characteristic of the writings of these persons is a clearly distinguishable bias in favor of fascism, which they rarely condemn and then only with obvious reluctance.

The editors' reply to Michael Williams's letter of protest in The Nation of January 21 deserves the warmest approval from every fair-minded person. By promising to fight those whom they regard as enemies of everything they value, they are rendering a great service not only to the Catholic church but to religion in its universal and most noble sense, which, in agreement with Thomas Paine, I take to be: "Believe in one God, and no more; hope for happiness beyond this life; believe in the equality of man; believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy."

A. GARCIA DIAZ

New York, January 24

Welcome Aid

Dear Sirs: The delegate of the Sanitary Services at the Central Armies has just received from the representative of the C. S. I. the ambulance sent by the readers of The Nation.

I am glad to write again to thank everybody for their valuable help. Any material that contributes to the welfare of our men is a most useful gift. They are fighting very hard for the liberty of Spain, and the aid of our friends in America is always welcome.

J. PUCHE ALVAREZ,
Head of the Sanitary Services

Barcelona, December 30

World's Fair Poem

Dear Sirs: A National Poetry Contest is being conducted by the Academy of American Poets to select the official poem of the New York World's Fair. Poems submitted must be on the subject of "the world of tomorrow," the original work of an American poet, and not previously published. A first prize of $1,000 and five additional prizes of $100 each will be awarded. The judges are William Rose Benét, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, and Louis Untermeyer. Further information and entry blanks may be obtained from the Academy of American Poets, 435 East 52d Street.

MARIE BULLOCK, Director

New York, January 15

CONTRIBUTORS

AYLMER VALLANCE is a London journalist who contributes frequently to the London New Statesman and Nation.

WILLARD R. ESPY is a West Coast novelist and newspaperman.

EMIL LUDWIG is the author of "The Nile" and of many works of biography. The various "Living Philosophies" will soon be collected into a book to be published by Simon and Schuster.

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT has for many years been professor of English at the University of Chicago.

HORACE GREGORY, poet and literary critic, will shortly publish a study of the traditions behind modern literature entitled "Makers and Ancestors."

RUSTEM VAMBERY, formerly professor of sociology at Budapest, is now in the United States on a lecture trip.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL is the author of "Literary Opinion in America."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs, Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 11, 1939 NUMBER 7

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 161

EDITORIALS:

THE DOCTOR DILUTES HIS PRESCRIPTION 164
THE "FINK" RACKET 165
DECLINE OF HOMER MARTIN 166
"WAR PLOTS" AND POLITICS by Kenneth G. Crawford 167
DOPE FOR FRENCH NERVES by Alexander Werth 168
THE A. M. A. HEDGES by Dorothy Pearson 171
MUST DEMOCRACY USE FORCE?
III. MUNICH RATHER THAN WAR by Bertrand Russell 173
THE NAZIS TURN TOWARD MECCA 176
IN THE WIND 177
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 178

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

BUT NEVER DULL by Louis Kronenberger 179
HIGH-PRICE INTOXICATION by Keith Hutchison 180
THE MEXICAN COMPLEX by Harry Block 180
JOHN WILKES BOOTH by Emanuel Hertz 181
THE MAID by Louis B. Salomon 182
A PONY TO PARNASSUS by Paul Rosenfeld 182
IN DEFENSE OF THE LABOR BOARD by Benedict Wolf 183
DRAMA: "VIRTUE IN THAT FALSTAFF" by Joseph Wood Krutch 184
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 186

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART
I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE COLLAPSE OF LOYALIST RESISTANCE IN Catalonia came with such tragic suddenness that it is impossible to guess what the next few days will bring in Spain. Negrin and Del Vayo, in conference with the British and French ministers, have drawn up peace terms for submission to Franco, but as we go to press, it appears certain that the rebel command will hold out for unconditional surrender. In that case resistance in the Madrid-Valencia sector may go on. It is reported that the army and the trade unions are opposed to yielding. We doubt, however, that their stubborn courage will prevail in the face of the disaster in Catalonia and the peace negotiations already under way. But if Franco refuses even the minimum demands of a humane settlement, if he insists on carrying out reprisals against his defeated opponents and refuses to guarantee the expulsion of Italian and German forces and agents, then the war may go on. In that case it will become, more than ever, democracy's war; but we have no confidence that Great Britain and France will recognize it as such.

* * *

ONLY AN OPEN, AGGRESSIVE STAND BY THE axis powers would be likely to convince Chamberlain and his French satellites that their very hope of existence lies in resisting rather than conniving at fascist encroachments in Spain—as elsewhere. Mussolini came close to taking such a stand when he allowed the Popolo d'Italia to proclaim Italy's determination to keep its forces in Spain until a political as well as military victory was completely assured. While no official reaction has come from the British Prime Minister, he is reported to have found the news disquieting. His assurance that "any threat to the vital interests of France" would evoke British "cooperation" is a reluctant acknowledgment of the danger. But meanwhile in Spain the fascist lines move swiftly toward the French border, and little time remains to translate fear into effective action. It seems likely that again the Western democracies will allow the destruction of a vigorous ally in the hope of appeasing an implacable foe.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

THE NEXT BRITISH GENERAL ELECTIONS, almost certain to be held this year, will be a turning-point in this generation's history. If Chamberlain maintains his supremacy, the result can only be disastrous. So plain are the alternatives that growing numbers of British anti-fascists are desperately striving to rally a common front of anti-government forces, embracing Laborites, Liberals, Communists, and even dissident Conservatives. That such a coalition would encounter manifold hazards is widely appreciated; but no other proposal has been put forward which seems as realistic or as satisfactory. Yet the leaders of the British Labor Party continue to maintain an unyielding and intolerant opposition to such a course; the executive committee has now expelled Sir Stafford Cripps, one of the staunchest advocates of a unified opposition. When the party officialdom spurned his newest appeal for unity Cripps submitted a detailed and persuasive memorandum to local party branches, where the urgency of the crisis is more deeply felt. His move was a violation of party discipline perhaps difficult to condone in ordinary times. But it is the essence of Cripps's stand that these are not ordinary times. In expelling him, the National Executive denounced those heretics who urge a common front and expressed anguish at the thought of "diluting" the party's "socialist program." Such protestations, coming from the cautious leaders of the Labor Party, sound singularly unconvincing. Their rhetoric merely obscures the crucial argument advanced in Cripps's memorandum, which is that labor's chances of winning a majority without allies in the next election are almost non-existent. Do the party leaders hope to do better in the 1945 elections—if there are any?

*

THE PURPOSE OF TVA, IN MR. ROOSEVELT'S vivid language, was to provide both a yardstick and a birch rod. Under the new agreement reached between the TVA and Commonwealth and Southern, it will still be a yardstick with which to measure the rates charged by private utilities but no longer a rod with which to discipline private companies. In buying Commonwealth and Southern's electric properties in Tennessee, the TVA has taken another step in the direction of replacing government competition with government ownership. It does so under pressure, not from socialistic theorists but from the utility industry, whose leaders, like most of our business men, would rather talk about the virtues of the competitive system than exercise them. There is much to be said for the relative efficiency of an outright government monopoly, but there is little excuse for giving Wendell L. Willkie more than his properties are worth. He asked for $86,300,000; TVA offered $55,000,000; the sale is now made for $78,600,000 in cash and $3,000,000 in other assets, enough to pay off bonds and preferred stock at par and still leave better than fifty cents on the dollar for the book value of the common. This involves recognition by the TVA for the first time of such slippery metaphysical terms as "good-will" and "going concern." Under the former Mr. Willkie included "the value of having the highest ratio of household usage and the lowest domestic rates in the United States." He neglected to add that his Tennessee properties possess these valuable assets only because they had to lower their rates in order to compete with the TVA.

*

M. MILAN STOYADINOVICH, YUGOSLAVIA'S Premier since 1935, has not been able to enjoy very long the electoral victory he won in December. Faced by insurrection within his own Cabinet over the Croatian question, he has resigned and been replaced by Dragescha Sevtkovich, who has formed a mixed ministry in which seven Serbs are offset by two Croats, two Slovenes, and two Mohammedans. The Croats, however, are apparently not members of the Croatian Party headed by Dr. Matchek, who commands almost unanimous support in his native province, and it remains to be seen whether Matchek will be willing to cooperate with the new Cabinet. To satisfy Croatian aspirations, more than petty reforms are needed. Revision of the constitution on federalist lines to give a large measure of autonomy to the Croats and other minorities is needed; and this would necessarily end the semi-dictatorship which has ruled in Yugoslavia since 1929. Solution along these lines may conflict with the foreign policy pursued by M. Stoyadinovich, who sought to maintain a precarious balance between the axis powers. Recently, alarmed by the German drive toward a trade monopoly in Yugoslavia, he has been cooperating more closely with Rome. Count Ciano visited Belgrade last month for one of those shooting parties which form such a favorite and appropriate background for fascist diplomacy. One result was a movement toward reconciliation of Yugoslavian and Hungarian differences which, if successful, will bolster Italy's waning influence in the Balkans. As the new Foreign Secretary at Belgrade has been Minister to Berlin and was formerly at Rome, he may be expected to carry on the balancing policy. But the Croats and other democratic parties are more favorable to the Western powers, and if they succeed in their domestic aims, they will probably also attempt a reorientation of foreign policy.

*

IT WOULD BE HARD TO THINK OF LESS auspicious circumstances for launching a conference of reconciliation than those which attend the opening of the Arab-Jewish parley in London. So fierce is the antagonism that the two delegations will be kept apart, with the honest brokers of Britain shuttling back and forth with proposals and counter-proposals. There is no sign of a truce in Palestine even during the discussions, and the delegations are all set to insist on the most extreme and uncompromising demands. The Arabs want permanent stoppage of Jewish immigration and of land sales to the Jews, complete abandonment of the idea that Palestine can ever become a national Jewish homeland, and an autonomous Palestine governed by Arabs with minority status for the Jews. All that the Jews ask, on the other hand, is complete adherence to the Balfour Declaration, with Palestine to be regarded first and foremost as their national homeland, abandonment of even temporary restrictions on immigration, full freedom of land purchase, and assurance that they will never be forced to accept a minority status. To add to the dismal prospects, there is nothing like unanimity even within the respective delegations. Zionists and anti-Zionists will represent the Jews, each in their own way; and as for the Arabs, it will be all the British can do to keep the terrorist followers of the Mufti, some of whom come straight from the penal colony on the Seychelles Islands, from the throats of the more moderate members of the Palestine Defense Party. Chamberlain plans to allow only a few weeks for the discussions. Viscount Gort, chief of the Imperial General Staff, is already busily establishing a new military base in Palestine, and in the remote contingency that no peaceful solution is reached in that time the British will forget all about appeasement and force their own Palestine plan on Arab and Jew alike.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

*

IN ANNOUNCING THE THIRD FIVE-YEAR PLAN with a new emphasis on consumers' goods at a moment when most countries are immersed in rearmament programs, the Soviet Union has struck a blow for sanity in a world rapidly going mad. When the First Five-Year Plan was released some ten years ago, it was greeted with a storm of derision by the outside world. Experts of all varieties rushed into print to assert that it was utterly impracticable and unattainable. The Second Five-Year Plan, calling for even more striking advances, was received much more respectfully but with a certain anxiety by the capitalist world. By now we have become so accustomed to the Soviet's spectacular economic growth that it is no longer news. But it is a testimony to the Soviet Union's growing sense of security that for the first time a significant degree of attention is to be given to the light industries as well as to those turning out producers' goods. Altogether industrial production is scheduled to advance 88 per cent from 1937 to 1942. Output in the capital-goods industries is to rise 103 per cent, that of the consumers'-goods industries 69 per cent. Agricultural output is scheduled to be increased by more than half. Much more emphasis than ever before is placed on means of improving both quality and productivity of labor. While he would be a rash prophet who would assert that the Soviet Union is certain to have five years of peace to work out its plan, it is encouraging to find that the government is still willing to build on this expectancy.

*

A POLITICAL EARTHQUAKE MAY BE THE END result of the physical shocks which have taken such a frightful toll in Chile. The new government was faced with unprecedented tasks of relief and restoration only a month after it took office. The first reaction of all parties was one of support. For a time it looked as if the common disaster had softened political antagonisms. But this mood was short-lived. Already the parties of the right—which control both houses of the national congress—have rebelled against President Aguirre Cerda's announced plan to raise 2,500,000,000 pesos to reconstruct the devastated provinces and get production under way. On the left, Jorge Gonzales von Marees, leader of the new Socialist Vanguard Party—formerly the Nacistas—has demanded that foreign-debt payments be suspended immediately so that the necessary funds can be raised. Other left groups favor heavy taxes on income and profits and a levy on the gold reserves of the Bank of Chile. The immediate issue may be compromised. But the earthquake has precipitated a sharp political struggle which in any case could not have been long delayed.

*

THE DUPLESSIS GOVERNMENT IN QUEBEC continues to emulate if not quite to equal the methods of its Nazi model. On January 17 Colonel P. A. Piuze, Provincial Commissioner of Police in Quebec, sent a letter to Louis Fineberg of Montreal, informing him that if the apartment occupied by his son-in-law, Taub Muni, a member of the Communist Party, was not vacated within four days, the whole tenement, of which Mr. Fineberg was the proprietor, would be padlocked. Under the provisions of the padlock law any premises used for the purpose of disseminating Communist propaganda can be peremptorily padlocked without court order. Until recently the police have been content to shut down meeting halls, printing plants, and organizational offices; while private homes were raided and ransacked, the right of the occupant to his place of dwelling was not challenged. The first eviction from a private residence occurred last July when François Xavier Lessard with his wife and two children was forcibly ousted from his home by the Quebec police. Lessard and a comrade were later arrested and convicted for reentering the premises. The police have now refined their technique. Instead of enforcing the evictions themselves, they send notes of warning to landlords whose premises are occupied by radicals or trade-union leaders. The case of Taub Muni is only one of many. That the people of Quebec are not quite as enthusiastic about the padlock regime as Quebec's little Führer would have us believe was demonstrated in the recent Montreal elections when the Duplessis candidate went down to ignominious defeat. The federal government has refused to disallow the padlock law or to refer it to the Supreme Court because it does not wish to alienate the Catholic church.

*

HOLLYWOOD HAS TAKEN THE LEAD IN WHAT promises to be the most vigorous peace drive this country has seen in recent years. Aroused by the recent invasion of the community by two fascist representatives—Vittorio Mussolini and Leni Riefenstahl—and by the sight of cargoes of scrap iron and oil leaving San Pedro harbor to arm the fascist powers, a Committee of Fifty-Six has drawn up a "Declaration of Democratic Independence" for signature by the people of the United States. Composed of leading producers, directors, actors, and actresses, the committee calls upon the President and Congress to sever all economic connection between the United States and Germany "until such time as Germany is willing to reenter the family of nations in accordance with humane principles of international law." Committees of Fifty-Six—the original number of the signers of the Declaration of Independence—are being formed in cities and towns throughout the United States with a view to obtaining twenty million signatures as rapidly as possible. Nor has Japan been overlooked. A group of forty-four leading actors and actresses, including many members of the original Committee of Fifty-Six, have dispatched a telegram to President Roosevelt urging an embargo against Japan as a violator of the Kellogg-Briand pact. Circulars have been issued calling for the boycott of silk and other Japanese products. Nothing that the American people can do will rally the forces of democracy more effectively than to back the movement so vigorously launched in Hollywood.

The Doctor Dilutes His Prescription

THE present world situation is too tense for us to continue to pursue an ambiguous foreign policy. It is time we made up our minds as to whether we can safely remain indifferent to what happens in the outside world or have a direct interest in preserving European peace and, if that proves impossible, in insuring that the fascist powers do not win control of the Continent. There are many signs of a growth of public sentiment in favor of taking the second position. But if the issues are to be clarified, leadership is required, and since Mr. Roosevelt is known to have formed definite opinions on the part America should play in world affairs, we have the right to expect that leadership from the White House. Instead, every time the President has stated a firm and clear policy he has quickly nullified it by explaining he meant something rather different. What effects he intends to produce by such wavering we do not know; its actual result is to confuse the public mind and afford aid and comfort to the enemies of democracy at home and abroad.

Most of the furor over the case of the French air mission might have been avoided if the matter had been handled in a simpler and more straightforward manner. It was a mistake in the first place to attempt to keep the mission a secret. Such secrets are hard to keep, and their premature leakage inevitably gives them a sinister air. This aspect of the affair, however, was undoubtedly seized upon and exaggerated by the opposition. Clearly the President did nothing he was not fully entitled to do. A much greater error was made when the President summoned the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate to the White House for a conference without making clear how secret the proceedings were to be kept. If he did ask for pledges of silence, it is incredible that he should have believed they would be observed. He ought to know his Senators and their inability to resist reporters better than that. The legitimate inference was that he wished to follow Hitler's speech with the strongest possible warning to the dictators. In the light of subsequent events one can only conclude that he was equally concerned with leaving open a line of retreat.

The general tenor of Mr. Roosevelt's remarks to the committee seems tolerably clear. He told them that the situation in Europe was dangerous—which any intelligent newspaper reader knows. He impressed on them the obvious fact that our interests would be seriously affected if Britain and France were overwhelmed by the fascist powers. He suggested that it would be a wise policy to give these countries all the economic support possible, and perhaps added that it would be well if the Neutrality Act were revised with this end in view.

If after the meeting Mr. Roosevelt had issued a summary of his talk in some such terms it would have taken the wind out of the sails of his political opponents, prevented that distortion of his remarks of which he now so bitterly complains, and had a most salutary effect in Europe. Even as it was, the leakage from the Senate brought a hysterical reaction from Berlin and Rome, indicating quite clearly a fear lest an American stand against aggression force them to make serious revisions in their plan of attack.

But once again, after waiting three days, the President decided to dilute to the point of vagueness his realistic prescription for a foreign policy. Such tactics must have a deplorable result in Europe, encouraging the dictators to believe America politically divided on foreign issues and unlikely to interfere with their adventures. The manner of the Presidential climb-down was undignified. The press is often enough unfair to Mr. Roosevelt, but on this occasion there is no reason to suppose that it inaccurately reported the Senators from whom it obtained its information. If the Senators garbled his remarks, it is partly his own fault for giving them the opportunity. His attack on the press was all the more uncalled for because his general line of foreign policy—when he sticks to it—receives a great deal more newspaper support than his domestic policy.

Much more serious was his restatement of foreign policy in four points which not merely seem to deny what he is said to have told the Senate committee but were much weaker than the passages on the same subject in his New Year's message to Congress. On that occasion he said that we can and must avoid "any action or lack of action which will encourage, assist, or build up an aggressor." If, starting from this point, Mr. Roosevelt has the courage to pursue a policy designed to put the economic weight of this country behind the defense of democracy, we believe he will obtain general support. Given strong leadership, we see no reason why revision of the Neutrality Act—admittedly futile in its present form—should not be carried through Congress. But shilly-shallying will inevitably play into the hands of the isolationists at home as well as into those of the aggressors abroad. We cannot evade the fact that we have great power in the world—by far the greatest economic power. By the exercise of that power we have a more than hopeful chance of avoiding the necessity of converting it into military power and engaging in war to save our independence. It is in no spirit of knight errantry that we should take steps to check fascism in Europe. We are prompted to do so by a realistic appraisal of our own welfare and future safety.

The "Fink" Racket

IT IS doubtful whether any Congressional investigation has ever uncovered a more fetid situation than that revealed in the report on strike-breaking prepared by the La Follette Civil Liberties' Committee. That professional strike-breaking agencies exist is not in any sense a new discovery. But the report of the La Follette committee shows that they carry on a racket of almost incredible proportions which is closely tied in with legitimate business. The report mentions more than 108 plants at which strike-breakers of one type or another have been employed in the past five years. The profits of the business are huge. Remington Rand paid $145,000 for "services" in the 1936 strike. No fewer than thirty-five regular strike-breaking agencies are listed; some of them, such as Bergoff's, the William J. Burns International Detective Agency, Pinkerton's, and the employers' associations, Associated Industries and the National Metal Trades Association, are organizations of considerable size. An appendix lists the names and criminal records, where known, of some 150 strike-breakers or strike guards, the agencies for which they worked, and the strikes in which they participated. Some of these men are known by affectionate nicknames—"Chowderhead" Cohen, "Boilermaker" Williams, "Snake-Eyes Kid" Steinie, and "Stinkfoot" McVey. About a third of the men have criminal or arrest records, their crimes including burglary, rape, larceny, and other assorted acts of violence.

Three distinct categories of operators are listed—ordinary strike-breakers, or "finks," who take the jobs of the strikers; strike guards, who are hired ostensibly to protect the property of the company but whose actual function is in most cases to stir up violence; and "missionaries," or word-of-mouth propagandists, whose job it is to break down the morale of the strikers by spreading confusion and dissension among them. The tactics used by the "missionaries" are revealed in a letter of solicitation from W. Howard Downey and Associates to the Republic Steel Corporation. On paper with the letterhead "Specialists in word-of-mouth propaganda since 1915," the firm announced, "We have a whole kit of expressions and remarks accumulated by us in the last twenty years that have proved themselves in the handling of industrial disturbances time and again. . . . After hearing a few remarks that we have up our sleeves you should see how apprehensive a striker becomes." The committee found that strike-breakers are rarely bona fide workers, and that "guards" are seldom interested in protecting property. The sole function of both these groups is to break strikes, and there is a heavy premium on their using violence to achieve this purpose.

Sixteen states have attempted to curb these practices by legislation, but the results have been far from satisfactory. The Colorado law, for example, did not prevent the Ludlow massacre. Strike-breaking is an interstate business connected with large corporations which are themselves often interstate in character. It can only be controlled effectively on a national basis. Regulation of the strike-breaking industry through registration and restrictions on detective agencies and employers' associations would necessitate extensive and cumbersome administrative machinery. For this reason the La Follette committee very properly believes that the most feasible approach to the problem is through legislation forbidding employers to engage agencies which resort to the methods described above. Such legislation would naturally fall within the sphere of the newly established civil-liberties section of the Department of Justice and should be relatively easy to enforce. It would not interfere in any way with the right of an employer to provide legitimate watchmen or guards for his premises. But it would subject him to heavy penalties for acts of terrorism, intimidation, and deception such as have been almost accepted practice in American industry. Congress has a chance to make at least partial amends for its disgraceful action in knuckling to Dies by immediately enacting into law the proposals now being drawn up by the La Follette committee to curb these outrages.

Decline of Homer Martin

NO MAN ever deserved a vacation more than Harry Bennett, Ford's personnel manager, and the growing uproar in the United Automobile Workers of America must provide a pleasant accompaniment to his present trip to South America. For the third successive season the Ford company has managed to escape an organizing drive, and no small part of the credit goes to Mr. Bennett's skilful manipulation of factional differences within the union. When the sitdowners came out of the General Motors plants in February, 1937, they carried banners reading, "G. M. Today, Tomorrow Ford"; but tomorrow is still around the corner. The beating of Richard Frankensteen and Walter Reuther at the gates of the Ford plant in Dearborn in the fall of 1937 focused public attention sharply on the totalitarian methods that govern the factories of our foremost collector of early Americana. A return engagement was scheduled, and plans were made for a great Ford organizing drive to reach its culmination in January, 1938, at the peak of the production season. But it was clear that whoever organized the 80,000 employees of Ford's River Rouge plant would probably control the U. A. W. A., and jealousy came to Ford's rescue. Homer Martin and his supporters called off the distribution of leaflets and passed a motion instructing Reuther to remain in Milwaukee at an executive-board meeting on the day the return engagement had been scheduled to take place. The drive was wrecked.

With the other major motor companies asking, "Why don't you organize Ford?" new preparations were made for an organizing campaign this winter. The C. I. O. stepped in and arranged a peace—or at least a truce—between the contending factions in the U. A. W. A. The C. I. O. convention in Pittsburgh voted to boycott Ford if he refused to recognize the union. The U. A. W. A. on the advice of the C. I. O. set up a Ford organizing committee consisting of Reuther, Delmond Garst of St. Louis, and Charles Millard of Canada. Six million pieces of Ford boycott literature were prepared and printed. Once more internal dissension saved Ford, but this time it is clear that the weakness of the union lies not merely in political "factionalism" but in the egotism of Homer Martin. That Martin ignored the Ford organizing committee and his own executive board in meeting secretly with Bennett is clear, though the Martin and the anti-Martin forces differ in their accounts of how the meetings were brought about and what happened at them. Testimony before the Dies committee revealed disquieting relations between Martin and the anti-labor demagogue Coughlin; and the forces opposed to Martin suggest that the radio priest was the intermediary who brought Bennett and Martin together. The Martin version is hardly less damaging, for on his side it is claimed that the go-between was John Gillespie, former Detroit chief of police, a curious figure who seems to appear and reappear in Ford labor negotiations, making agreements on behalf of the company, only to be disowned by it later. It is significant that Martin's desire to keep his relations with Coughlin and Bennett secret, at least for a time, was betrayed by both. The first had stenographic reports made of what he had promised Martin would be "off the record" talks before meetings of priests. At the "secret" meetings between Bennett and Martin, a suspicious coincidence occurred: reporters happened accidentally to be at just the right place in the well-guarded Ford plant at the moment when Ford himself accidentally dropped into Bennett's office while Martin was there.

The relations between Martin and the Ford company have now been made the occasion for charges filed with the National Labor Relations Board. The Ford company, Harry Bennett, John Gillespie, Homer Martin, and his four supporters are accused of unfair labor practices in that they acted to convert the union "into an organization supported, controlled, and dominated by the Ford Motor Company, Harry Bennett, and John Gillespie, their agents and representatives." The account given by Percy Llewellyn, president of Ford Local No. 600, of what took place is most disquieting. According to Llewellyn, Bennett offered to place the notorious Ford Service Department at Martin's disposal, to rehire only workers who swore allegiance to Martin personally and could prove they were not Communists, and to deal with the union only through Martin. Company unionism pure and simple is no longer possible in the automobile industry; Ford needs an "independent" union that he can control.

Countering the NLRB charges, Martin has filed a bill of complaint with the Detroit Circuit Court accusing John L. Lewis and other C. I. O. officials of conspiracy to destroy the U. A. W. and take over its membership. He also charges his opponents on the executive board with plotting to turn the union over to the Communist Party.

Martin, who had an overwhelming majority of the executive board with him a year ago, is slipping badly; the prestige of an honest agreement with Ford is his last hope of remaining a power in the labor movement. It will be interesting to learn what really happened between them.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

"War Plots" and Politics

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, February 6

TO A considerable section of the press, domestic as well as foreign, President Roosevelt marched to the Rhine last week and then beat a hasty retreat back to the Potomac: first he authorized the sale of bombers to the French and then repudiated the notion that he had entered into some sort of secret European military alliance that would take the United States down the path to war. That there is a difference between a military alliance and a decision to sell, for cash, desperately needed defensive equipment to one of the menaced European democracies failed to penetrate the intellects in editorial front offices, or if it did, the distinction was deliberately ignored, as it was by leaders of the Senate isolationist bloc. In any event, the public here and abroad was informed by the President at his press conference on February 3 that he was still against entangling alliances.

Actually, the President's four-point pronouncement on foreign policy changed neither his position nor his direction. He had said in his annual message to Congress four weeks earlier that he proposed to give force to American ideals by action stronger than words but short of war. He had informed members of the Military Affairs Committee at a private conference on January 31 that he intended to sell planes to France. As far back as his Chicago quarantine speech in 1937 this policy had been in process of formulation. Only a few weeks before the historic press conference, it had been invoked in both a positive and a negative sense—by the sale of fighting planes to Great Britain and by public exposure of an airplane company which sold equipment to Japan in the face of a request not to. There can be no doubt that the President will go through with the French plane deal, exercising his authority as commander-in-chief of the armed forces and his constitutional prerogative of dealing with foreign powers. His Senatorial critics may tear their togas to ribbons in protest, but they cannot stop him.

Why, then, the commotion? Most of the explanation emerges from an examination of its sources. Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota was the first to get his breath after the President had given the lie direct to the "boob" responsible for the story that he (Roosevelt) had spoken of the Rhine as our new defensive frontier. Nye was one of the five Senators through whom the story of what went on at that conference leaked out, but he was not responsible for the application of Stanley Baldwin's phrase to the Roosevelt policy. (No one in Washington was responsible. It first appeared in dispatches from Europe giving the reaction to the news of the secret conference.) Nye's somewhat self-conscious answer was the counter-question: Where, then, is our new frontier? It must be remembered that the North Dakota Senator is a professional neutral. He lectures on the subject throughout the country, and it is good advertising for him to jump into every controversy over it. Only once since he made himself famous as the munitions investigator has he abandoned strict isolationism. That was just before his 1938 campaign when he advocated lifting the Spanish embargo, aroused Catholic opposition, and thus created an issue which helped him win reelection.

With Nye stands Bennett Clark of Missouri, a more consistent and able isolationist, who dreams of pushing Roosevelt into a Wilsonian position and riding past him into the White House. Clark seems to be willing to stake his political future on the bet that public opinion, in a showdown, would support isolationism as against cooperation with the democracies to check the Western dictatorships. Third in the triumvirate of isolationist leaders is Hiram Johnson of California, who suffers from severe nostalgia for the days when he amounted to something as one of the little band of wilful, finally victorious, battlers against Wilson and the League of Nations. These leaders have gathered to themselves most of the Roosevelt haters, who will join any opposition claque.

William E. Borah of Idaho has been removed from the scene temporarily by illness, a circumstance that accounts in some measure for the confusion on Capitol Hill. George Norris of Nebraska, another survivor of the League fight, one of the two men left in the Senate of those who braved ostracism to vote against war in 1917, has indorsed the President's policy without reservation. Why not equip the French and British to resist Hitlerism at the Rhine? he asks. How better can this country fight the Nazi fire, which he considers far more devastating than the imperial German kind? How better prevent war in the first instance and American entry in the second? His example is having its effect on Senatorial opinion.

Just how public opinion divides no one quite knows, not even the President. While he gave no ground in his press-conference statement of policy, he did give the impression of partial surrender by bowing to the Senatorial demand for clarification of his policy. Contrary to the interpretation some newspapers placed on the affair, there was nothing impulsive about his talk to the correspondents. He was cool and deliberate, particularly in delivering his sharp rebuke to the press, which, by and large, had not been particularly unfriendly to the democracy-arming project. Roosevelt is determined to keep the newspapers in the opposition camp, where they will not be mistaken for neutrals or heeded as non-partisans. He knows they will be against him 90 per cent of the time anyway. Having lost his power over Congress in domestic affairs, he is playing for control in the foreign sphere. At his Friday press conference he was again the leader.

If there was fumbling at the White House, it was in the over-cautious moves leading up to the declaration of policy. The accident which revealed the presence of an official of the French Air Ministry aboard a Douglas bomber imparted an air of secrecy to the airplane deal. This was thickened by the subsequent delay in informing Congress and by circulation of the unverified but generally credited story that Chief of Staff Malin Craig opposed sale of the bomber to France because such a transaction would violate the War Department rule against selling a newly designed military plane to a foreign power until a year after the second of its kind had been produced. Criticism might have been silenced by arguments for selling to France planes of a design that would equal German ships and for giving to Douglas experience in mass production before the start of the American rearmament program. But these arguments were withheld from the public while the isolationists dinned into its ears their charge that France was receiving unprecedented and unjustified preference. (Even the British bought only planes of a type already in production.) The final mistake was in trusting a full Senatorial committee to let the substance of a White House discussion leak out in ungarbled form.

At his press conference the President resumed command of a situation that had got out of hand. There is every indication that he will continue to run the foreign-affairs show in his own way. He may change the tempo occasionally to suit public response, but the script, calling for assistance to the democracies in their efforts to arm, will be followed. There will be no quantity sales of aircraft equipment to the dictatorships regardless of how loud the Republicans shout for impartiality. The Senate will have small opportunity at this session to make effective its opposition, however strong this becomes. The President is not likely to court defeat by asking that the Spanish embargo be lifted or that the Neutrality Act be amended to give him more latitude in following his chosen course. He has all the power he needs to cope with the current problem—that of strengthening France and Great Britain in the air in the hope of averting another Munich.

Dope for French Nerves

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, January 23

GREAT BRITAIN and France sit tight, some people hoping for the best, some preparing for the worst. In the lobbies of the French Chamber of Deputies the propagandists have been preaching optimism as energetically as they can: "The Spaniards hate the very sight of an Italian. . . . The Italians are sure to be kicked out of Spain once Franco has won the war. . . . Terrible rows between Spaniards and Italians at Tarragona. . . . Spanish women emptying their chamber pots on Italian soldiers as they march past. . . . There aren't any Italian soldiers in Spain, really. Seventeen thousand. The Jour says so this morning. The Matin says so. . . . Votre Chamberlain n'est pas un imbécile. . . . Penarroya, Rio Tinto. . . . A signed agreement with Franco already in his pocket. . . . Reconstruction loan—la Cité de Londres. . . . Mussolini will want some too. . . . Once the Spanish war is over there'll be no more spitting on France. He'll eat out of our hand. The Italians are really frightened of Germany. The Brenner, the Brenner. . . . Dr. Schacht—very good, excellent. Inflation in Germany. It'll demoralize the Germans completely. A thousand million marks for a toothpick. They can't fight a war under such conditions. . . . Tout va tres bien, tout va tres bien. . . . Very sad, very, very sad about Barcelona. Such heroes! But it may be all to the good."

For a couple of days France was acutely worried. Mr. Chamberlain had just come back from Rome with nothing to show except a firm and frequently repeated promise from the Duce that his troops would be withdrawn from Spain as soon as Franco had won a complete victory. This promise was emphasized to M. Daladier with great vigor from the British end, as was also the fact that Mr. Chamberlain believed in the good faith of Signor Mussolini—even though Signor Mussolini had signed the non-intervention agreement, and had agreed to withdraw his troops from Spain, and had given a thousand other promises all of which had been broken. And now he said in effect: "I signed the non-intervention agreement, but my troops are in Spain and there they shall remain until final victory, and heaven help the French—on whom I spit—if they dare to violate the non-intervention agreement." Mr. Chamberlain no doubt agreed, and wrote to Mr. Attlee that we must all stick to non-intervention or else there would be grave danger of an extension of the conflict, and that it was no use discussing the matter in Parliament just now.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

A week ago a lot of Frenchmen were pretty worried, among them M. Daladier. Here he was, just back from Tunis and Algiers, very popular as a result of his successful tour, which had been not only a personal success for him but a brilliant demonstration of the idiocy of the Italian claims on Tunis and Corsica. Not a single Corsican, or Tunisian, or Algerian wanted to become Italian. Even the Italians in Tunisia had hastened to apply for French citizenship—25,000 out of about 95,000 in the last two months—since the row in Rome started. The French empire had never displayed its loyalty to France with greater vigor. It was a great triumph for M. Daladier. Not an inch of territory. And no legal quibbles, please, about territorial and non-territorial claims. Everybody seemed very pleased; even M. Flandin must have been pleased, for was it not he who had said a year ago that France should become an "empire power" rather than a "European power"?

And then last Sunday, the day after Mr. Chamberlain returned from Rome, M. Daladier presided over the Petit Congrès of the Radical Party. The delegates were all hot and bothered about Spain. Senator Berthod, who two months earlier, at the congress at Marseilles, had advocated a revision of the Polish alliance and the Soviet pact, and who also seemed to think that France should become predominantly an "empire power," now declared that this empire would be fichu if the Italians remained in the Balearics. The whole congress cheered with impressive unanimity. Good old Radicals! One almost expected them to shout, after the manner of the Communists in 1936, "Des avions pour l'Espagne!" They did not go quite so far. They had always been ardent non-interventionists, but now they had become alarmed and angry. A little late in the day, but still. Some of them booed at the mention of M. Bonnet, and they unanimously adopted a resolution which, among other things, said: "In spite of the obligations entered into by the Non-Intervention Committee, Italy has not ceased, according to her own admissions, to support General Franco with war material and soldiers. By establishing herself lastingly in Spain, in the Balearics, or in Spanish Morocco, Italy would constitute the gravest danger to France's Mediterranean routes; and the Radical Committee calls on the government to examine the situation with great vigilance."

Courtesy l'Humanite

Mussolini

It may be taken for granted that both this resolution and M. Berthod's speech were fully approved by Daladier. On the previous day he had received a visit from M. Blum, who talked to him about Spain; and M. Blum seems to have left with the impression that M. Daladier was not satisfied to allow events in Spain to "take their course," and was at least willing to "relax" the frontier control. But there was this awkward problem of Mr. Chamberlain: for if Mr. Chamberlain wanted Franco to win quickly and get the Spanish war over, any French help to the Spanish government would obviously be in contradiction to British policy; and Mussolini would then have the satisfaction of being able to say that he had driven a wedge between England and France. Thus, while feeling very sympathetic toward the Spanish government, and perhaps willing to do a little bit for them, and also rather worried about his empire routes, M. Daladier could not quite make up his mind what to do; and at the Radical Congress he simply refrained from speaking about Spain.

Daladier

M. Bonnet, however, had no doubts on the subject. He returned from Geneva on Tuesday, after seeing Lord Halifax, who had told him all about the Rome visit. Lord Halifax was not particularly pleased with this visit. But M. Bonnet thought it was all right, and adopted whole-heartedly Mr. Chamberlain's point of view. And what is more, he persuaded the Cabinet to adopt it. No doubt objections were raised and misgivings expressed, but on the whole M. Bonnet's point of view prevailed. Only on one concrete point, according to the Jour, was he unable to get the Cabinet to follow him, and that was when he proposed the immediate appointment of a diplomatic envoy to Burgos. But there was to be no real aid to the Spanish government.

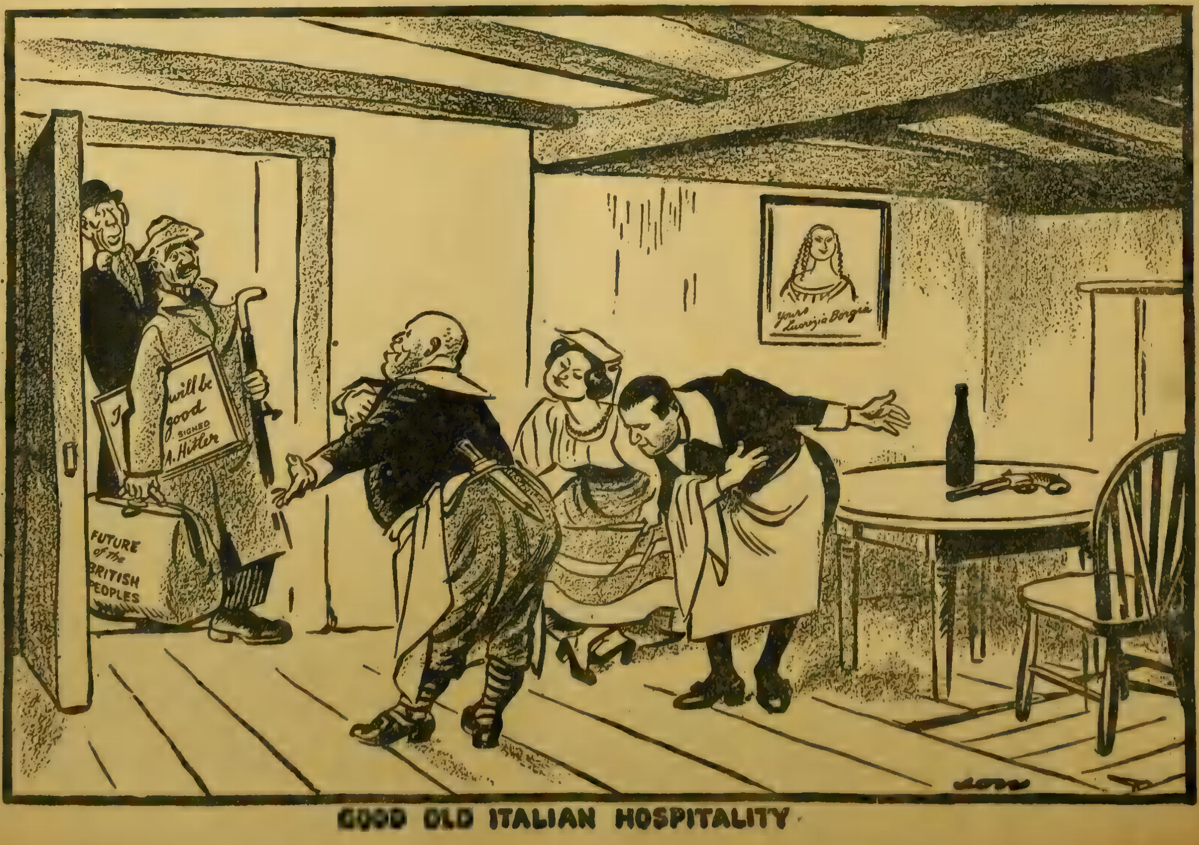
The arguments used by the officially inspired press are similar to those used by the propagandists in the Chamber lobby, which I have already quoted. Another argument is that France has no guns or munitions or airplanes to spare; and if it starts sending armaments to Spain, Italy will send twice as much and there will be no end to it; and finally a European war will develop.

Mr. Chamberlain said so. And M. Emile Roche in the République, one of the great pro-Munich papers, has been trying to show that Mussolini's Spanish war has all been due to economic difficulties: Spain is only a financial bargaining counter; he will stay in Spain until he gets enough money from London and is in a position to prop up his regime at home. According to the same writer, the anti-Jewish laws in Italy are also entirely due to economic difficulties. So all will be well.

It is only fair to credit M. Bonnet with a rather impressive consistency. It will be remembered how disappointed Mr. Chamberlain was last April and May when, partly as a result of the armaments which the French had allowed during a few short weeks to reach Barcelona, the Spanish government held up completely the great Aragon offensive. At Tortosa France got stuck. On May 20 the diplomatic correspondent of the Times wrote a very illuminating article in which he spoke about the "depression" and "anxiety" caused in British government quarters by the failure of the Republicans to allow themselves to be beaten, a failure which was jeopardizing the Anglo-Italian agreement. A couple of weeks later Mr. Chamberlain "suggested" to the French that they close the frontier properly—which they did, on June 13.

M. Bonnet has been striving ever since he became Foreign Minister ten months ago to arrive at an agreement with Italy; and, like Mr. Chamberlain, he has apparently felt that Spain was the great obstacle in the way of the Franco-Italian entente. At Genoa last May Mussolini said that there could be no agreement with France so long as France and Italy were fighting "on different sides of the barricades in Spain." Since June 13 France has not been doing any "fighting," but if Italy still goes on "spitting at France" it is because there is still danger that France may suddenly decide to help the Spanish government. And the "spitting" is a warning.

Shortly before the Czech crisis of May 21, M. Bonnet was greatly worried about the situation, and thought that it was necessary to secure Italy's neutrality somehow—for there was then the danger of a war over Czechoslovakia—and the most obvious way to do so was to stop fighting "on the opposite side of the barricades," in other words, to close the French frontier. M. Daladier disagreed with him at the time, but less than a month later the frontier was closed, upon a "suggestion" from London. M. Bonnet has not lost his belief, in spite of all the "spitting," that Italy may yet be won over—at least to some extent—if only it is not interfered with in Spain. And judging from yesterday's Temps, the objection that Italy may break its word and not clear out of Spain and the Balearics is met as follows: If Italy really fails to clear out, France will occupy Minorca and Spanish Morocco. And so the empire routes will be more or less saved. But will the French be bold enough to do it when it comes to the point?



GOOD OLD ITALIAN HOSPITALITY

As for the anxiety felt at Toulouse and other towns of France near the "third potentially hostile frontier," an anxiety loudly voiced by the Radical Dépêche de Toulouse, it is said that there is nothing to worry about; and prominence is given in the press to Franco's invitation to anyone to "go and look for German airdromes near the French border." Altogether the discreet but important role played by Germany in Spain is somehow being overlooked.

Now that things have come to such a pass, one can only hope that Mr. Chamberlain's and M. Bonnet's calculations prove correct; that "Spain for the Spaniards" will become a reality; that Italy will loosen its bonds with Berlin, and become reasonable in return for a loan in London and some "non-territorial" concessions from France, and also that the Germans will be turned out of Spain. The fact that most of the bombing of Barcelona is now done by Germans is an unpleasant reminder that they are still very much there.

In any case, the press has been soothing the nerves of the French public with this dope; my old concierge has not been affected by it—"Nous serons encore baisés cette fois," he remarked gloomily. But on the whole the dope has not been without effect.

The A. M. A. Hedges

BY DOROTHY PEARSON

ON THE subject of group health insurance the American Medical Association has planted itself squarely on both sides of the fence. The association is definitely for and against it. Several state medical societies are sponsoring voluntary health insurance and "socialized medicine," while, nationally, organized medicine continues its furious offensive against the existing group-health experiments. There were no signs, a few months ago, that the A. M. A. was anything but consistently reactionary. Group practice and group payment were "socialism, communism, inciting to revolution." This sudden change of heart—or change of strategy—coincides so neatly with the indictment of the organization by a federal grand jury for violation of the anti-trust law that it is reasonable to infer that the Department of Justice has the A. M. A. worried.

The department showed consideration for the sensitive feelings of the indicted doctors and did not issue bench warrants for their arrest. But they must appear for arraignment sooner or later. They have announced that they will fight the indictment "to the utmost, with every means" in their power. And those means are not inconsiderable. On January 25, A. M. A. counsel made a motion in federal court to question the grand jurors on the evidence presented in the nine weeks' hearings. Obviously, they would gain a tremendous advantage if they could have access to this testimony, which has been kept secret thus far. The next move undoubtedly will be to file a demurrer, on the ground that the members of the A. M. A. were not in "trade" but in a "learned" profession and therefore could not be considered in interstate commerce in the ordinary sense of the word. This question will be violently argued, for it is on this point that the whole case rests. The Department of Justice is expected to cite a British case in which a medical group was held to have been engaged in trade or commerce.

If the demurrer is sustained by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, the department will appeal to the Supreme Court. But if the lower court decides that the A. M. A. is engaged in "trade" and overrules the demurrer, a date will be set and the case will go on trial, probably sometime in the spring. The grand jury indicted the American Medical Association for conspiracy and restraint of trade, and the government has steered clear of the issues involved in the struggle between the association and the health-insurance groups. The Attorney General emphasized this when he stated, "It is not within our province to see that any one method of furnishing medical service shall prevail over another. It is our business to see that restraints of trade and coercive practices are stopped."

The Group Health Association of Washington, D. C. —whose testimony was of special importance—has had considerable experience with just such "coercive practices." It's been a battle since the day the G. H. A. opened shop. Government employees organized this cooperative to provide themselves with complete medical care, with special emphasis on preventive medicine, at a yearly cost of about $25 for each member. This group in particular has been anathema to organized medicine because the New Deal has given it material and moral support. The A. M. A., working through the Medical Society of the District of Columbia, saw to it that the doctors and the members of the Group Health Association were refused admittance to every private hospital in Washington. The argument was that the cooperative was resorting to "unethical medical practices." In the interest of "ethics" one G. H. A. member was sent home from the hospital after having been prepared for an emergency operation. Not content with such sweeping measures, the medical society singled out several of the G. H. A. doctors for special attack. Dr. Mario Scandiffio, the pediatrician of the association, was dropped from the Medical Society, and the medical director, Dr. R. E. Selders, was accused of unethical practice by the Harris County Medical Society of Texas. (Since the indictment three of the G. H. A. doctors have been admitted to the Garfield Hospital, and the charges against Dr. Selders have been dismissed.)

Other testimony, at the hearings, even though it did not figure in the indictment, carried great weight. No one is better acquainted with the obstructionist tactics of the A. M. A. than Dr. Michael Shadid, who came from Elk City, Oklahoma, to testify. The much-publicized Cooperative Hospital at Elk City, of which Dr. Shadid is medical director, has faced well-organized opposition from the start. Two thousand farmers, share-croppers, and small-town business men organized this cooperative and built a hospital—a fine modern building which has been enlarged three times. Each member family buys a share of stock for $50 and pays $24 a year for complete medical care. Glowing accounts from outside investigators tell of the remarkable success of this venture. But the stand-pat doctors in the vicinity have kept up a running fire against Dr. Shadid and his staff, and the Oklahoma Medical Society, which of course dropped Shadid from its rolls for "unethical" medical practices, is at present trying to have his license revoked. Only the fact that this group owns its own hospital has made it possible for it to continue operations.

Even the radio was pressed into service in the Oklahoma campaign. A short time ago True Story Magazine planned to broadcast a dramatic account of the Elk City Hospital over a National Broadcasting Company hook-up. Eight minutes at the end of the program were to have been devoted to a discussion of cooperative medicine by two well-known doctors—one opposed to the practice and one sympathetic. But at the last minute N. B. C. threw out the broadcast on the ground that "controversial issues are prohibited on a commercial hour." The magazine people were reasonably taken aback since they had been presenting similar programs on controversial issues for several weeks without meeting with any interference.

Testimony concerning the coercive practices of the A. M. A. came from doctors connected with the Milwaukee Medical Center, the San Diego Beneficial Society, and Trinity Hospital in Little Rock, as well as from the Washington and Elk City groups. Dr. Hugh Cabot, senior consulting surgeon of the Mayo Clinic and an authority on medical economics, came to Washington to speak for the "rebel" doctors within the A. M. A. One of the most outspoken members of this dissident group, Dr. Cabot openly favors group-health experiments.

While organized medicine is concentrating its legal forces on the court battle, this is not its last stand by any means. An adverse decision would be a severe blow, but the medical hierarchy has no intention of taking a back seat, whatever happens. The ruling clique of the American Medical Association, headed by Morris Fishbein, has been a law to itself for almost twenty years. Technically, the A. M. A. is a democratically organized group, but actually Fishbein and his supporters control the policies of the national association and the local medical societies. It is the threat to their power—and incidentally their jobs—which principally disturbs them. If pressure is strong enough they will reluctantly accept group health insurance as an unpleasant necessity; but never will they voluntarily relinquish their control of the medical bureaucracy. Already they are laying plans for a new course of action in case of a court defeat—plans which account for the group-health schemes now springing up under the sponsorship of the medical societies. If group health is inevitable, Fishbein and Company are determined to be in on the ground floor.

The Gallup polls, too, have been a factor in the A. M. A.'s about-face. Last year Gallup reported that 85 per cent of the women in this country favor some form of health insurance; that 80 per cent of the doctors believe the growth of health insurance inevitable; and that 70 per cent of the doctors are in favor of health insurance. This year Gallup reports that approximately 25 million persons would be interested in paying as much as $3 a month for complete medical and hospital protection, and that 7 million more people would like to participate if the cost could be cut to $2 a month. Anyone with an eye to business can see that here is an immense potential market for medical service, waiting only to be developed.

Having so recently embraced the idea of group health insurance, the A. M. A. has not had time to put any plans into operation, but several state medical societies have made definite proposals. On the surface, these plans seem to be exact replicas of the group health associations so violently attacked by these same societies, but careful analysis reveals many important differences.

Undoubtedly frightened by the inroads which the Group Health Association is making into private practice, the Medical Society of the District of Columbia now offers a Mutual Health Service. When and if the service is adopted, it will provide complete medical care to subscribers for about $18 a year. Medical, consultant, X-ray and laboratory services, office and home calls, and medical care in the hospitals will be included, but hospitalization itself will be extra. That's splendid, as far as it goes, but there are important omissions. No mention is made of provisions for preventive medicine, or for group practice and consultation on the part of the doctors—two of the most important phases of group health insurance. Another provision—under which any single person earning more than $2,500 will be excluded—will be definitely detrimental. People resent distinctions on the ground of income. Nevertheless it must be admitted, even though complete details of the project are not available, that the proposed service is a great concession on the part of the diehards.

Even more surprising is the Wisconsin Medical Society's proposal to collaborate with three different cooperative medical groups in the state for experimental purposes. The Medical Society has already made arrangements to work with the Cooperative Health Association in Superior, Wisconsin. Only 300 people will be accepted in this group during the experimental phase. Any doctor who is a member of the medical society in good standing can join the panel from which the patients choose their physicians. The doctors will work on a minimum-fee schedule and the members will pay so much a year for medical services, both general and surgical. It is generally believed that this venture is foredoomed to failure because the group is too small, the doctors do not function as a group, and there is no provision for preventive medicine or hospitalization. Remembering that this same medical society is still obstructing the Milwaukee Medical Center—one of the best-known of the group health associations—one is inclined to view its proposal a little skeptically. Possibly this offer of cooperation is simply part of the Medical Society's new strategy, enabling them to say, "See, we've tried health insurance, but it doesn't work."

Cash-indemnity medical insurance is the only health insurance of which the tory doctors really approve, and it is this type that has been proposed by the Medical Society of the State of New York. For a monthly fee of from $1 to $3 the subscriber would be entitled to the payment of doctors' bills of from $150 to $500 a year. "As a method of insurance," says the New York Times, it provides no hospital care at all; offers no diagnostic service beyond that which can be rendered in a physician's office; [and] permits the physician to charge all that he can against the insurance fund. . . ." Conservative doctors naturally like this scheme because it helps people to pay their doctors' bills without upsetting the medical bureaucracy or changing the fee-for-service principle.

Organized medicine now has no greater love for group payment or contract practice than it had a year ago. If the A. M. A. gets a favorable decision in court, there will be considerable backtracking on the question of group health insurance. Dr. Fishbein has been careful not to commit himself too far. "The A. M. A. House of Delegates," he points out, "continues to oppose sickness insurance. . . . The best system would seem to be one which includes voluntary insurance against the cost of hospitalization, and voluntary cash-indemnity insurance to cover the cost of medical or professional services." Cash-indemnity insurance may be allowed to stand, but any more liberal overtures made by the local medical societies will be quickly forgotten. Obviously the group health associations will suffer a severe setback if the courts support the A. M. A. Most of them are too young and too weak to buck organized medicine.

Must Democracy Use Force?

III. MUNICH RATHER THAN WAR

BY BERTRAND RUSSELL

TWO articles, by Mr. Niebuhr and Mr. Kolnai, in the pages of *The Nation have stated with great emphasis the case against Munich, and I am glad of the opportunity to state the case in favor of that much-abused pact. But before embarking upon controversy I should like to mention certain points on which I agree with my opponents.

I agree, in the first place, that the preservation of democracy in the world is of immense importance. I am not prepared to deny that if democracy can be defended by war, and cannot be defended in any other way, then war may become necessary. I accept Mr. Niebuhr's analysis of the case for democracy as resting, not upon the essential goodness of man, but upon the fact that "power must be held under democratic restraints because irresponsible power is always dangerous." I agree also that no government, however democratic, can dispense with the threat of force against recalcitrant minorities. But these abstract truisms seem to me to have very little bearing upon the actual situation.

Both articles, while they inveigh against the "prejudices of academics," appear to me incurably academic and remote from concrete reality. During the Great War the immense majority of professors, both in Germany and among the Allies, showed a bloodthirstiness which at the time astonished me. This is still true of those who expect to be remote from the actual theaters of war. They still think of human beings, not as concrete developing individuals, but as unalterable embodiments of ideological forces. A German is just a soldier fighting for fascism. An Englishman or Frenchman should be just a soldier fighting for democracy. An American should be a recruiting sergeant and a merchant of death. All this forgets the dynamic character of human passions, as well as the fact that politics is not the whole of life.

---

*In the issues of January 21 and 28.

"War," says Mr. Kolnai, "has settled many problems in history." I do not deny it, nor do I deny that a war between fascism and democracy will settle a problem. Unless it is shorter and more easily won than we have any right to expect, I fear that it will settle the problem in favor of fascism, whichever side is victorious.

The view that a great war is likely to lead to fascism, even if the present fascist powers are defeated, is one which is met by Mr. Kolnai with anger rather than argument. "It is the hallmark of civilized man," he says, "not that he is unable to use barbarous weapons, but that he is able to use them in a restrained, governable, exterior, and transitory fashion." If this is a definition of "civilized man," I have no quarrel with it; but if it is intended to imply—as it obviously is—that there are at present nations composed of "civilized men" in this sense, then I do most emphatically deny it. After the Germans had been defeated in the last war, they were still treated barbarously, until their own "barbarous weapons" began to inspire fear. "None of the fascist dictatorships," says Mr. Kolnai, "especially the chief ones, have been born of war." This is totally untrue of Hitler, who is a logical consequence of Versailles and its aftermath. He is the result of our victory in a war to defend democracy and destroy militarism. If we win another such war, Hitler will be succeeded by someone as much worse than he as he is worse than the Kaiser. To suppose that we shall have learned anything from our previous mistakes is totally unrealistic.

The argument from history is very apt to be fallacious as applied to modern conditions. War is a more serious matter than it used to be. War can still settle problems, but it can only settle them the wrong way. Consider the war in China: it is still possible that the Japanese may ultimately be defeated, but only if the Chinese lose all their best qualities, and become almost as ferocious as their enemies.

"It does make an enormous difference," says Mr. Kolnai, "who wins and who loses a war." This is an optimistic delusion, a relic of eighteenth-century rationalism, no longer held as a creed concerning mankind at large, but only applied to the "virtuous" nations. Nations are "virtuous" in proportion to the paucity of their war experience. The most "virtuous" nations are Norway and Sweden, which have had no war since 1814. Whatever virtues the English may possess are due to the fact that they have not been invaded since 1066. The next war will fundamentally alter their character; if they are victorious, they will be found to have become hysterical and cruel. As for America, those who remember the reign of terror against radicals during and after the last war for democracy will not be unduly optimistic.

I am surprised to find, in both the writers who attack Munich, a proneness to rhetorical expressions which tend to obscure the facts. "Czechoslovakia lay prostrate under the heel of the conqueror," says Mr. Niebuhr. Anyone would suppose from this phrase that if England and France had gone to war instead of coming to a settlement at Munich, the fate of Czechoslovakia would have been less unpleasant than it has been in fact. But it is obvious that England and France could not, in the event of war, have prevented the Germans from overrunning Czechoslovakia. The difference would have been that the Germans would have occupied the whole country instead of only parts where there is a large German population, and that in the course of conquest they would have destroyed Prague and killed vast numbers of the opposing forces. Perhaps, at the end of a long war, the surviving Czechs would have been able to return to their devastated areas, but in the meantime they would have suffered a hundred times as much as they are suffering.

Those who censure England and France for weakness toward Germany are apt to forget that most of what Germany has done externally has been a forcible remedying of injustices perpetrated at Versailles. The reoccupation of the Rhineland ought to have taken place by agreement long before it actually occurred. The Anschluss was forbidden by England and France while Germany was democratic; when it took place, there can be no reasonable doubt that the majority of Austrians welcomed it, whatever they may be feeling now. The Sudeten areas in Czechoslovakia were originally taken from Austria and Germany simply as a punishment, and many of those who now protest against their incorporation in Germany recognized, in 1919, the injustice of subjecting them to a government that they disliked. In all these three cases the mistake was in not voluntarily conceding justice to pre-Nazi Germany. The mistake was not in making concessions, but in making them too late and under threat of force. Even so, however, it was better to make them than to plunge Europe into war for the purpose of perpetuating injustices.

When Munich is attacked in America, it is attacked as a rule on the ground that it was England's duty to the world to crusade for democracy. It may, of course, be said that British interests were sacrificed, but as to that the British must be allowed to judge for themselves; and in any case, if that were the objection, it would not justify moral indignation. Moral indignation, of which America is full, can only be justified on the ground that the interests of mankind demand war against the Nazis. But if that is the argument, it applies exactly as much to the United States. Yet I never hear it said, in America, that the United States has "abdicated." I do not myself feel any inclination to blame America for its neutrality. But I think the arguments that justify American neutrality are the same as those that justify the British attitude at Munich. They are less strong, because the United States would suffer less in a war than England would, but they are to my mind equally cogent. They are, however, not available for those who think that England ought to have fought. It is difficult to feel much respect for those who say: "This is a holy cause, therefore you ought to fight, but we ought only to look on and make money out of your necessities."

It is difficult to understand the difference between the attitude of Americans to Czechoslovakia and their attitude to China. China has more than ten times the population of Czechoslovakia; it is suffering far more horribly, and on a vastly larger scale, than all the victims of the Nazis put together; and Japan has no vestige or shadow of justification for its invasion. Everyone knows that Japan is allied with Germany, that what strengthens Japan strengthens Germany, and what weakens Japan weakens Germany. Most people who have gone into the question are of opinion that Japan could be quickly crippled by economic measures alone. In spite of this, not only is Japan allowed to proceed unhampered, but Americans—individually, not governmentally—do far more than any other nation to help the Japanese to victory, by supplying them with oil and motor transport and by buying their silk. When I hear this conduct defended by those who are full of moral horror about Munich, I confess that I am completely bewildered.

Moral indignation, unless severely controlled, is seldom a source of wise conduct. Take the position of the Jews in Germany at the present time. I will not for a moment admit that those who feel that this is a reason for war have any greater sympathy for the Jews, or any greater horror of the cruelties to which they are subjected, than I have. But I cannot help realizing that in war time Jews would be accused of treachery and of the inconceivable wickedness of desiring the defeat of their persecutors. Under the influence of war hysteria they would be subjected to much more severe persecution even than that now being inflicted on them. If our object is to help German Jews, not merely to enjoy the satisfactions of revenge, it is perfectly evident that war is the worst method we can possibly adopt. From the point of view of humanity, the only hope, as things stand, is to get the Jews out of Germany, even if it should involve paying blackmail to their jailers. If our vindictive feelings must have some consolation, we can reflect that the loss of the Jews will very greatly weaken the German nation, and will make it, if war does come, much easier to defeat than it was when the Jews were an integral part of the community.

It is a mistake—more common nowadays on the left than on the right—to think of military power as alone important. At the time of the Munich crisis the German nation, no less than the French and the English, showed unmistakably its aversion from war. Most eyewitnesses are agreed that the intensified persecution of the Jews has been unpopular with the bulk of the population. Economic difficulties and curtailment of food supplies must inevitably cause discontent. The desire for a quiet life and a diminution of strenuousness must sooner or later become overwhelming, particularly if the external dangers have quite obviously diminished. There is no sound reason to suppose the Nazi regime eternal, or to believe that it can only be destroyed by external war. I am not positively prophesying that the Nazis will fall as a result of an internal revolution, led perhaps by the army; I am saying only that this is by no means an impossibility, and that the great war, if postponed sufficiently, may never take place. This is a powerful reason for accepting even painful compromises in the meantime.

Assuming that the Nazis remain in power, there is still every reason to expect that their international position will grow weaker. The situation now is very analogous to that of Napoleon in 1809. Success will make Hitler rash, and not sufficiently conciliatory to his allies. He has lately lost Poland; he is almost certain before long to lose Italy. The inevitable psychology of the situation must lead him, as it led Napoleon, into some enterprise in which success is impossible. Perhaps when that time comes, his own country will desert him; perhaps he will provoke a war in which his defeat will not be very difficult. All such speculations are doubtful, but the evils of a great war are not doubtful.

The rise of Hitler, for a time, shook my pacifism, as it shook that of many others. I read many books by military, naval, and aeronautical experts as to the probable character of the next war. The one thing that seems quite beyond question is that the next great war, if the forces are at all evenly balanced, will destroy civilized life throughout Europe, leaving no possibility of any government except a military tyranny, because the universal destitution will promote brigandage and every kind of anarchic disorder. Populations maddened by hatred, terror, and hunger will demand vengeance upon somebody, and will seize upon the nearest victims, who are likely to be those retaining most of the vanishing civilization. It is the horror of this prospect that is the basis of European pacifism. America, no doubt, will emerge intact, and therefore to an American the pacifist argument is less compelling. But Europeans, naturally, think first of their own continent, and for Europe nothing but disaster can result from war.

[This is the last of three articles discussing the role of force in the preservation of our democracy. A rebuttal by Mr. Niebuhr will be found in our letter columns on page 187.]

The Nazis Turn Toward Mecca

[News reports of the National Socialist Party Congress at Nürnberg last September made brief mention of the presence of a sizable group of Arab sheiks. The following letter, written by the nephew of one of those sheiks to Al-förd ibn Roos, who translated and passed it along to us, sheds light on their mission to Germany and on the activities of the Nazis in the Near East. We have had the original document, written in Arabic, carefully examined by a competent scholar and feel assured of its authenticity. While we cannot vouch for the information it presents, the letter seems important if only for what it reveals of the attitude and expectations of the Arabs themselves. The only changes made in the original text are the suppression of certain place names that might help to reveal the identity of the writer and the deletion of a few purely personal passages.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Writ at the Wells of Zezaarft, Hejaz, this 23d Day of the Month of Jumada II in the Year of the Hejira, 1357, by Ibrahim ibn Jast, Pious in El-Islam, to His Brother in the One True Faith, Hajji Al-förd ibn Roos, Devout in the Faith, at the City of Vanadium, Sanjak of New Mexico.*

NOW I must tell thee of many things that have come to pass since last I wrote thee, for affairs of Islam speed on ever and ever faster. My uncle, the Sheik . . . who was honored together with more than a hundred others of all the dar al Islam, hath returned from a visit to the ruler of the Germans. And they did sit in council with the viziers of the ruler, and when my uncle related the great things that were arranged there I was permitted to sit in the ring of the elders of Bir el Melosah. And we all rejoice to know that the High Vizier of the Germans, one Yussuf Goebbels, gave assurance that the ruler Hitler and all the viziers and the sipah-silar [army commanders] have accepted the tenets of the Prophet, upon whom be blessings, and are actually true believers, though for purposes of state and temporarily this has not been promulgated in their country but must be disseminated throughout Islam. All Islam rejoices to know that Allah hath inclined the hearts of the Germans to accept Allah's Prophet and become believers, just as he inclined the heart of the ruler of the Sons of the Wolf in the land of the Italians; so that now we have two former infidel rulers who are vowed and committed to champion our cause of justice.

There in the land of the Germans my uncle beheld a vast sea of warriors before the rostrum and at other places, and he was made to know that this was but as a grain of sand to the number of warriors that lay close to their arms, and the whole land is filled with fortresses that may not be taken, and of cannon that cannot be numbered, and all pledged to protect Islam when presently the full jehad [holy war] will be declared and Islam once more unsheaths the sword to sweep the world. And it was made known to the sheiks that the Commander and Caliph of the Germans has but to raise his voice, and the English and French tremble and become craven with fear; so that the viziers of the infidels crawl like worms to the champion of Islam.

A promise was made that if instructions were followed by us in the present partial jehad, when the day came to take the sword in full strength, which would be soon, the Germans, together with the Italians, would fill the air with such great fleets of flying war dhows that the firmament would be darkened with their numbers. Therefore we shall not be molested from the heavens while we put the necks of the English, and later the French, to the edge of the sword. And it is promised that even more of those guns will be sent us, those that shoot an endless row of bullets in belts, and more instructors will soon be sent us to add to those already training our young men, and more gold to our head men for distribution, and more cannon. But we must be careful to send men in very gradually increasing numbers to the battles in Palestine, and thus not alarm the French in Syria before the time comes. The young men of Jebel ed Druse can scarcely be restrained against the French, for they remember well the French massacre of not many years ago, and all our own young men are avid for war against the infidel English, who would give El Kuds, the Holy, to the Jews and let the Dome of the Rock be desecrated by unbelievers.

My uncle was told that all the world would be at war soon, and that the greater plan included the return of India to Islam, for which schemes are far advanced. There are only 250 English soldiers at the Island of Perim that guards the narrow sea at the Bab el Mandeb; and near Mocha, which likewise is separated from Africa by a narrow channel, forts have been made of poured rock. Great cannon are ready at Assab in Eritrea, on the other side, and these will be taken across when the time comes. Then these and the great cannon of the Caliph of the Italians at Assab will close the narrow sea to the warships of the English, and the British Empire will be severed while India grasps the weapons of war for freedom.

The emissaries of the Italians have caused the hinterland behind Aden to seethe, so that the sheiks can scarcely restrain the young men. Now my uncle has gone

---

* September 16, 1938.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

to Bir el Melosah, where he will meet with other sheiks, for there is a truce in Islam. All of the Italians will be there also, with gold and more of the magic boxes [radios] wherein dwell Djinn and Afrit. In another moon all the tribes will send chief men to the greater meeting at Cairo, where an agreement will be reached between Iraq, Syria, Hejaz, Yemen, and India.

My uncle says that a fresh levy of twelve men will go from these tents soon to cross the Jordan and come under the banner of Abdul Rahim, and these will report to the commander Abdul Kader Husseini at Jerusalem or Bethlehem. There is much dissension as to who will go, for all are eager, and I shall ask that lots be cast, for thus I may go, though my uncle wishes me to go to Sana, in Yemen, where the Germans have a school for us in the use of guns and instructors to show the way to wreck bridges and railroads. We are to send many transport camels in the month of Shawwai, as are all of the other tents, to Sekaka and El Djouf, on the western edge of the Nefed Desert. There they will be close, and the host of Islam can march down the Wadi Sirham when the forage is better, and strike quickly across the Jordan, while other hosts strike at Aden.

When last I wrote thee, the imams and the mullahs were preaching against taking the infidels to be allies, but since our chief men have returned from the land of the Germans and report that the people there and the viziers and commanders have accepted Mohammed, the Prophet of Allah, the imams and mullahs now preach in the holy mosques that these be accepted as allies. The exalted Mufti of El Kuds, Hajji Amin al-Husseini, has promulgated the consent and has ordered that the sword Dhu'l-fiquar, which the Prophet bequeathed to Ali, be lifted alongside those who were once infidels. And I would that thou would return and be with us when once again is heard the cry of "Ya mansur amit!" [the traditional war cry of the Moslems, meaning "Ye conquerers, strike!"], and all Islam marches as one man.

IBRAHIM IBN JAST

In the Wind

SOCIETY NOTES: "George Abel, Washington writer, last night played host to nearly forty persons whose announced theme was to celebrate the fall of Barcelona. Guests entering his home were directed to a picture of Stalin, Russian dictator, converted to use as a doormat." (Washington Post.) . . . "Members of the Fortnightly Club are to meet with Mrs. Dwight H. Allen February 1. Discussion—Resolved that the Spanish war is the natural outcome of the national game, bull fighting—Mrs. Seymour and Mrs. Clement." (Honeoye Falls Times.)

THE RENEWED battle between Homer Martin and C. I. O. officials has its humorous side. At the Pittsburgh convention the U. A. W. executive board presented watches to Sidney Hillman and Phil Murray in recognition of their services in bringing "peace" to U. A. W. factions. The decision to make the award was reached at the last moment, and U. A. W. officials, lacking cash in hand, asked Hillman to lend them the money to buy the watches. Now the "peace" is at an end —and Hillman, according to labor reporters, is wondering which faction will pay for the watches.

MOST HOLLYWOOD trade papers have heretofore been wary of "offending" dictator nations. When Mussolini cracked down on American film imports, however, these journals suddenly became imaginative as well as indignant. The Hollywood Reporter announced: "Dictator Dynasty Tottering as Hollywood Walks Out on Monopoly." The story reported "riots" in Italy because of the disappearance of American films, described the curb as Mussolini's "most dangerous political experiment," and explained that "Hollywood films were Mussolini's best bet in keeping the people happy and contented, but now with the large amount of enforced leisure they are clamoring for an open revolt against Il Duce's leadership."

AFTER THE Gannett-Ickes "free press" debate, certain members of the Newspaper Guild studied the treatment of the story by the fifteen newspapers in which Gannett has exclusive or majority control. They found that these papers gave an aggregate of 487 inches of space to Gannett's side, 158 to Ickes. Two of them, while playing up Gannett's address, did not even mention that Ickes had spoken; another rearranged the Associated Press story to emphasize Gannett's "explanations"; still another published Gannett's text and expressed "regret" that Ickes's text was "not available"—although it was.

A POPULAR dictionary compiled by Professor Vittorio Manfredi and widely circulated in Italy has been banned by Fascist officials. An "anti-Semite" was defined in its pages as "a poorly civilized person who is hostile toward and fights the Jews."

THE NEW YORK Herald Tribune is in effect placing a premium on censorship in its covering of Spanish news. First Ralph Barnes of the Herald Tribune's Berlin office sought a visa to rebel Spain; it was denied. Then John Elliott of the Paris office applied for a visa and met similar treatment. Now the Herald Tribune publishes a daily release from the Peninsular News Service, official Franco agency in the United States.

EXPLANATION OF THE WEEK: Dr. Alexander Hamilton Rice, ardent Franco propagandist, recently told a Fall River, Massachusetts, audience that "Franco did not take Madrid because he knows retreats of vanquished forces inevitably are attended by massacres, and he did not wish these."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

HOWEVER one may feel about the President and his stand in regard to the sale of airplanes to France and England, no one can deny that he is in a dangerously emotional state of mind. Assuming for the sake of argument that his was the proper policy, one may certainly question why he had to take the sensational course that he did and send for the Senate Military Affairs Committee to explain his reasons for encouraging France and England to buy our airplanes. As Mrs. Roosevelt has pointed out in her column, there is no law against France and England's buying airplanes. If it was necessary to give those countries a tip that they were welcome to buy all that they wanted, that could have been done through our respective ambassadors in Paris and London. The President is certainly too experienced to have believed that he could communicate his alarmist views—and they are alarmist—to the members of so large a committee and have them remain secret.

Now what has happened? He has alarmed a large section of the population. He has given Herbert Hoover and the Republicans the opportunity to attack him. He has given rise to the charge that he is carrying out a most dangerous policy of secret commitments. He has gravely disturbed men like myself who have hitherto supported him in his vigorous attitude toward the aggressors; we are afraid that by such a sudden and theatrical move he will really jeopardize our peace and endanger the achievement of his ends, precisely as his weakness as an administrator and coordinator is jeopardizing the New Deal itself. The country is admittedly in a very serious situation, and unless our Ship of State is steered carefully and dextrously, tremendous harm will result. In other words, a vast deal depends upon the manner in which things are done, almost more than on what is done.

In this case the net result is to make it possible for the dictators to declare that America is divided and that powerful men and a large section of one of the two great parties are arraying themselves against the President. That concerns me less than the President's seeking to call off criticism. The President has declared that hardly one of the newspaper stories of what took place was accurate—or correctly headlined—which is a very marked reflection upon the corps of Washington correspondents and their papers. But they all agree that he asked the Senators to refrain from criticizing him and his policy about little things. That was a very great mistake. Open diplomacy openly arrived at is what this country needs and desires, and there never has been heretofore and never will be any time short of war when a President and his policies cannot and should not be criticized. I have not taken any stock in the Republican contention that Roosevelt was trying to make himself a dictator, but he certainly lent color to that allegation when he asked that all criticism cease. The safety of any republic depends upon freedom of criticism—I think in war time as well as in peace time. Naturally this makes many of us feel a great loss of confidence in the President's judgment.

Let me illustrate what I mean further by recalling what has happened in the field of national defense. Only a year ago Mr. Roosevelt was demanding a huge fleet in both the Atlantic and the Pacific Ocean. Each was to be big enough to defend us against any enemy or reasonable combination of enemies attacking us in that ocean. That was too much for navy men, and they talked him out of it. Indeed, we have been witnessing the extraordinary spectacle of the army and navy actually holding down a too bombastic Executive. Next, we had trial balloons from Hyde Park last fall—it is only fair to add that he disavowed the authorship and said that the naughty correspondents were again at fault—which suggested a great defense program to take hundreds of thousands off the WPA and to put them on the pay rolls of heavy industry. When the public reception of this was completely unfavorable, then we were told that there was to be an enormous aviation program, no fewer than 10,000 airplanes.

Again the brake was applied, and the program stands whittled down to perhaps 8,000. Now we know that the President wants 500 airplanes for immediate delivery, not merely for our own use, but to give, lease, or sell to the Allies if they should be suddenly attacked. Similarly we are having the most extraordinary vacillation as to the fortification of Guam. The admirals say one thing; the President says another. One day it was represented that all that is to be done at Guam is the opening of a harbor for the landing of some gasoline from a collier or two. The next day naval authorities declared that the harbor we are constructing will be large enough to shelter the entire fleet! It all gives a most disheartening impression of vacillation, lack of coordination in planning, and total lack of agreement as to what our policy shall be. Certainly the net result of the President's performances during the last few days has been, in my judgment, to weaken us in the eyes of the dictators.

BOOKS and the ARTS

But Never Dull

LORD MACAULAY: VICTORIAN LIBERAL. By Richmond Croom Beatty. University of Oklahoma Press. $3.

A REVALUATION of Macaulay is hardly called for; his faults have been cried up for three-quarters of a century, and no one who has ever read him will need to be reminded of his virtues. But a restatement like the present one is thoroughly in order, for Macaulay's position in English letters is probably less central today than it has been at any time since he swung the big ax in the Edinburgh Review. For this there is good reason. There was too much in his writing which perjured and disfigured what he wrote about, and in his thinking which deadened his capacity for thought. He knew the answer to everything, and such an arrogant state of mind is even worse than the fact that so many of his answers were wrong. To the outlook of a liberal he brought all the smug absolutism of a reactionary. He employed his vast knowledge not so much to clarify and explain as to denigrate and confound. He devoted a lifetime to history, and was led to the conclusion that the Golden Age was ushered into England by the Reform Bill of 1832.

It is not easy to discover just how, in our own age, such a man can still prove of use, as Ruskin and Arnold and even Carlyle still prove of use. For these others were, at the least, haunted and agitated by human ideas, whereas Macaulay was at best absorbed by cold impersonal principles. For him the political wisdom of the ages had been turned into so many planks in the Whig platform. There was the English Constitution and, in especial, 1688—matters which impressed Macaulay almost as much as they impressed Burke. If Macaulay was far more truly a liberal than Burke, he had, on a larger scale, Burke's ineradicable feelings about boundaries and confines. He was born into an age characterized by the real triumph of the middle class, and in the end he went straight to the point of that triumph: the soundness, the sacredness, of the rights of property. Who should be allowed to vote? The man of some substance. Jews, Catholics? Certainly, if they are men of some substance. It is patently absurd, Macaulay argued, to grant unlimited power to a small band of aristocrats. Just as patently it is unthinkable to grant any power at all to the substanceless working classes.

This is not being entirely fair to Macaulay, who did, after all, strive to get rid of the abuses and anachronisms of eighteenth-century political practice; who was in his complacent way a sincere reformer; who opposed the vicious excesses of laissez faire (Macaulay cogently defended a bill making it illegal for women and children to work more than ten hours a day); who rejoiced in "progress" and wanted all classes to share in it. But his conception of progress was even more untrustworthy than his conception of liberalism. There, in that naive exultation over the peerless state of Britain in the '30's and '40's, really emerged all that was coarsest and most philistine in Macaulay's nature. Where, in all the history of the world, had there ever been such fine smooth roads, such up-to-date machinery, such swift steamboats, such incomparable railways? What wonders of postal service! What marvels of suburban libraries! What miracles of public baths! What a copy-writer Macaulay would make for Saniflush or Cellophane.

The insensibility of such a man naturally carried over into his writing. He was started off in the worst possible school, in that ruthless Edinburgh which was no ornament of art but a servant of Whiggery and which, when upstarts were to be thrashed, when enemies were to be flogged, when wrong principles were to be trounced, cared not a whit whether it was reviewing a masterpiece or an abortion. From the Edinburgh's policy Macaulay may have been seduced into hitting harder, and oftener below the belt, than he might otherwise have done. But who was it—was it not Jeffrey himself?—who, at the very beginning of Macaulay's career, wondered "where in the world he had picked up that style"? The style and all it implied were born with him. Holland House emboldened but did not form it. Butting, metallic, aggressive, it was the index to a cold, sexless, and self-righteous nature. One studied the facts of any matter, and came, inevitably, to conclusions. Once formed, the conclusions were absolute, beyond any hope or right of appeal. So, in the course of time, Macaulay was brought to believe that many men were knaves, most men fools, most scholars dunces, and almost all Tories criminals. Addison, William of Orange, Charles Fox (in spite of his dissipations), and a few other characters of history were admirable. The rest of mankind you might, by and large, cart away.

The literary judgments are the work of a man who really understood almost nothing written after the birth of Christ. The historical judgments are reached without any real knowledge—or any real need—of human psychology. Most of his contemporaries—Dickens, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Mrs. Browning, Landor, Carlyle—Macaulay could not stomach, and, to his credit, the social world which might have been expected to dazzle him left him bored and disgruntled. One must at the outset accept how wrong and arbitrary, how jaundiced and prejudiced, Macaulay could be; one must overlook the repulsive coldness in the man, the clanging brilliance of the style. After that, one can sit down in the presence of a master; for, in spite of everything, a master Macaulay is. If his use of his material is unscrupulous, it is none the less triumphant. No one has ever made sentences march with such a tread, or given to history, taken in all its congestion and detail, so unceasing a sense of movement. The battle passages are immense. The short accounts of great lives—Chatham and Mr. Pitt, Frederick and Clive—are as vivid as they are truncated. The mass of misinformation is notorious; but the mass of information is astounding. And the point of view, the Whig point of view, the middle-class point of view, had for its own time a living value; has for ours a genuine historical importance.

Mr. Beatty has rehearsed his subject with skill and care, and been at the greatest pains to preserve balance. He has lacked the background to make Macaulay, as he intended, a pivot for an inquiry into early nineteenth-century liberalism. But this is surely the best modern life of its subject. It does not, of course, supplant Trevelyan, who on his own terms produced a masterpiece. But it comes as a corrective after him, and it is possible to hope that it comes as a stimulus besides. For despite the many indictments that have been brought against Macaulay, no one has ever accused him of being dull. LOUIS KRONENBERGER

High-Price Intoxication

CAPITALISM IN CRISIS. By James Harvey Rogers. Yale University Press. $2.50.

INDUSTRIAL PRICE POLICIES AND ECONOMIC PROGRESS. By Edwin G. Nourse and Horace B. Drury. Brookings Institution. $2.50.

THE growth of the servile state in Europe has given a new scarcity value to our modicum of liberties and an improved tactical position to the defenders of the economic status quo. Even the extreme left now cries "Preserve democracy" rather than "Down with capitalism," while the middling masses observe the moral of one of Belloc's "Cautionary Tales":

> And always keep a-hold of nurse
> For fear of meeting something worse.

True, Nurse Capitalism is pretty much of a Sairey Gamp, frequently neglectful of her charges, slatternly in her habits, and addicted to speculative orgies. Yet with all her faults she seems a ministering angel by comparison with the totalitarian drill-sergeant whom we assume, perhaps too hastily, to be our only alternative guardian. We are therefore in the mood to give a ready ear to those economists who are, in the words of Professor Rogers, "seeking earnestly to discover whether the wheels of industry cannot be kept turning at approximately full capacity most of the time without the necessity of the people's surrendering a greatly increased proportion of economic power to their governments."

"Capitalism in Crisis," which attempts to answer this question, can be recommended as useful preliminary reading for those wishing to follow the deliberations of the National Economic Committee. Designed for the layman, it eschews detailed analysis and complicated formulas, is unconventional enough to cast a discussion of inflation into the form of a one-act comedy. But this lightness of touch only serves to emphasize the rather grim character of the book as a whole.

Examining the suicidal tendencies of present-day capitalism, Professor Rogers gives foremost place to price rigidity. When demand lags, he points out, it is to the apparent interest of individual businesses to curtail output and hold prices. Yet when all business follows this course it obviously means loss of jobs, shrinkage of purchasing power, and further curtailment of production. The problem is how to induce industry to look two steps ahead and see that the safest and most profitable course would be to cut prices and hold production.

It has often been noted that American capitalism has made a great success of production while making a lamentable mess of distribution. Even more than Professor Rogers, Messrs. Nourse and Drury regard the price mechanism as responsible for this state of affairs. The starting-point for their study is the conclusion reached by Harold G. Moulton in "Income and Economic Progress"—that the most promising reform in the distribution of wealth would be "the gradual but persistent revamping of price policy so as to pass on the benefits of technological progress and rising productivity to all the population in their role of consumers."

Through a close analysis of the process of price-making in many industries, they show clearly that the classical aphorism—"The market is the birthplace of prices"—is no longer applicable to a large part of our economic system. The executive of a modern corporation does not passively accept a market price. In the words of the authors, he "sets a price objective and directs a controlled productive mechanism toward attainment of that price level. . . . Much as he generally hates the phrase, he becomes in fact the economic planner of our society rather than merely the adapter of his personal affairs as best he can to a largely automatic price mechanism." This tremendous power is largely the result of mass-production methods, including technological processes, such as die-stamping, which involve a high inverse variability of costs in relation to output. If the industrial system is to yield its maximum benefits, prices must be set low enough to permit the disposal of capacity production. The industrialist who adopts such a policy gets the advantage of minimum unit costs, and while his unit profits may be small, his total profits are likely to be handsome.

Unfortunately, all too many industrialists are concerned with conserving their capital above all else. To do so they tend to fix prices at such a level that they can "break even" at a comparatively low operating rate. Thus they play safe, and if their calculations prove too pessimistic and demand is sufficient to enable production to be increased, they then reap the benefit of rapidly decreasing costs in the shape of geometrically increasing profits. Under such circumstances the self-regarding instinct exhibits its weakness as the mainspring of our economic system. The policy which seems prudent for any individual business must, if pursued by a majority, result in the restricted use of our productive capacity, continued unemployment, and a low standard of living.

The National Association of Manufacturers ought to make this book required reading for all its members. Should they take it sufficiently to heart to learn to follow a long-term vision of self-interest rather than a short-term one, old Nurse Capitalism might smarten up sufficiently to hold her job for a while. But I cannot pretend to optimism. Addiction to the "high price" bottle is not easily overcome.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The Mexican Complex

A HISTORY OF MEXICO. By Henry Bamford Parkes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

MR. PARKES has done so workmanlike a job in producing that brief history of Mexico which has long been lacking that the first impulse of the reviewer is to break into prolonged applause for his sound and unobtrusive scholarship, remarkable powers of synthesis, and a style so attractive as to make the book a joy to read. Nevertheless, this otherwise admirable study is marred by the intrusion of certain theories, particularly in the analysis of the contemporary scene, that require some comment, for in the present state of United States-Mexican relations it is precisely about the Mexico of today that the greatest enlightenment is urgently needed.

Owing, apparently, to his partial confusion of racial and class components in the Mexican complex, Mr. Parkes displays a tendency to see the movement initiated in 1910 as a resurgence of the Indians against their white oppressors and to look for a renaissance of Indian cultural and spiritual values as the basis of Mexico's future. "The reform," he writes, "proved to be Mexico's bourgeois revolution, which brought a new class [the mestizos, or mixed bloods] to power." This statement, it seems to me, is somewhat strained on two counts: first, because subsequent rulers of Mexico, while they were in fact drawn from among the mestizos, continued to rule the country in creole—that is, Spanish aristocratic—interests; second, because the reform of 1857-71, although it marked another long step in the advance toward liberalism begun by the War of Independence in 1810-21, fell far short of completing the process of fundamentally altering the class relationships of Mexican society.

The 1910 revolution was basically a continuation of both movements and not, as is frequently asserted in Mexico and too readily repeated by Mr. Parkes, something sui generis. It is still engaged in the unfinished tasks of the two earlier social revolutions—the liquidation of feudalism (and of imperialism, its modern ally), the redistribution of property, the abolition of peonage, and the construction of a native democracy—social objectives which can scarcely be considered peculiar to Mexico, however much their realization may have been conditioned by circumstances non-existent, or present only in varying degrees, in other countries. The bourgeois radicals who led the 1910 movement gradually abandoned the struggle in favor of an understanding with imperialism, as they became increasingly alarmed by the social and political implications of the mass awakening they had provoked. It is the working class, not the Indian, which has since provided effective leadership in the effort to create a Mexican nation.

Mr. Parkes's failure to assign sufficient importance to the role of the workers in the recent transformation of the country leads him, unless I misread his meaning, to another unwarranted conclusion. "The Cárdenas policy of pushing forward the revolutionary program on all fronts," he says, "involved considerable dangers." This is doubtless true, but it does not really tell us anything. The theory is gaining ground that Mexico should check the labor "offensive" against industry in order to concentrate its efforts on agrarian reform. But it should be obvious that a move to curb labor would not only upset the political equilibrium of the present government but deal a possibly mortal blow to peasant hopes as well. The direct ratio observable between the varying strength of organized labor and the zigzag curve of land distribution since 1915 amply demonstrates the necessity of a militant and progressive labor movement for completion of the land reform. Moreover, a bid for peasant support at the expense of the workers would drive a fatal wedge between city and country and open the gates to what might be termed an "agrarian" fascism, from which no one but political demagogues would derive any benefit. The Mexican revolution must either advance "on all fronts" or run the risk of being defeated on all; specialization involves more and graver dangers than those it seeks to avoid.

It is thus a real pity that Mr. Parkes did not expand his book by another fifty pages to include an adequate discussion of the development of capitalism in Mexico and its part in the transformation of the past twenty years, which he notes but does not fully account for. The result of this additional analysis might have been to lay more stress on the material progress of the revolution and less on the dubious spiritual accomplishment of having revealed to Mexico its "Indian soul." With another generation of rapid industrial development, better communications, increased mechanization of agriculture, and wider educational facilities, I suspect we shall begin to hear less about the special cultural attributes and heritage of the Indian. Aside from these shortcomings, however, which must be considered of minor importance in a book so generally excellent, and from a few slips in names and dates, Mr. Parkes's history of Mexico is the most satisfactory introduction to the country now available, and one that ought to make a considerable dent in the prevailing ignorance if it is as widely read as it deserves to be.

HARRY BLOCK

John Wilkes Booth

THE MAN WHO KILLED LINCOLN. By Philip Van Doren Stern. Random House. $3.

THIS is not just another book on Booth or the assassination of Lincoln. What Philip Van Doren Stern was interested in was to write the full, inside story of the man who committed the greatest crime in the history of the continent. He approaches the subject with no bias. He is not even indirectly related to any of the actors in the tragedy. And he is neither admirer nor apologist of Booth.

He has devoted years of work to collecting every conceivable scrap of evidence on his subject, but he has not written with the idea that his work was to be the definitive treatise on the subject. He writes a simple, unvarnished prose. The story of the preparation for the crime is well told, and with more fairness and truth than it has ever been told before. After Booth's escape from the theater the author has to rely more upon his imagination as to what Booth and the boy Herald and the few other personages who appear from that moment to the end must have said; none of those conversations were heard or taken down. Booth never ceased to be the actor during all his long agony, from the moment when the flag interrupted his spectacular leap from the box to the stage to the end in the Garrett barn. As to who was responsible for the last phase, the shooting—Booth himself or the half-crazed Boston Corbett—Mr. Stern leaves us in doubt.

Mr. Stern does not attempt to build up a far-reaching conspiracy but exposes the very simple one that really existed, a conspiracy confined to Booth and the half-dozen miserable creatures with whom he was associated. The author evidently does not believe that John Y. Beale's execution, after Booth himself intervened with Lincoln for a commutation of the sentence of that brilliant saboteur, had anything to do with Booth's decision to consummate his foul deed. He mentions Lincoln's speech at the White House about conferring the suffrage on the Negro as something which still further enraged Booth. He has wisely kept away from conjectures about the Canadian conspiracy and does not try to connect it with Booth. Even wiser is his omission of the Father Chiniquy affair.

Booth and his deed have now become a more than twice-told tale, but for once the tale has been well told, and this book is recommended to all who wish a simple statement of what happened between the tenth and the twenty-fourth day of April, 1865. In other words, the author is content to deal with the facts as they were and not with what might have been. He also indirectly disposes of the myth that Booth appeared in the flesh years after he was shot, for he shows that he was identified after his vain effort to make terms with the impatient officer and that the body was brought to Washington and buried under the eyes of the authorities.

EMANUEL HERTZ

The Maid

A GOOD HOME WITH NICE PEOPLE. By Josephine Lawrence. Little, Brown, and Company. $2.50.

"MY WIFE was one of the best women who ever breathed," confided old Haynes Baker, "but dammit, you couldn't have hired me to work for her. When it came to wages and hours for her cook, you might have thought she was running a jail." Thus a minor character voices the thesis of Josephine Lawrence's new novel: that when a woman hires a servant to "sleep in," she feels she has acquired a majority interest in the girl's time, energy, morals, and private life. If the maid of all work sits down, she is malingering; if she manages to keep her appetite, she is eating her employers out of house and home; if she fails to disconnect the electric iron on one of her dozens of trips to the front door, she is wantonly burning up money; if she objects to changing her day off at a half-hour's notice, she is a selfish ingrate; if she ever stays out after eleven at night, she is carrying on with men. All of which sounds like not merely a severe indictment of housewives as employers but a lot of preachment besides. Yet Mrs. Lawrence's people look, act, and in some cases even smell so real that they transcend their function as illustrations of a theme.

There are two contrasting types of matrons, both equally exasperating to the nerves of their "help": Mrs. Hazen, the damp, corpulent, complaining octopus who oozes pious sentiments but has hysterics if her cook attends the church Mother's Day banquet; and Mrs. National, the modern, efficient young wife who balances her own modest budget by paring the servant's wages. Both types, of course, feel a morbid compulsion to ransack the maid's slender belongings periodically to make sure that she hasn't cached any silver, butter, or stillborn infants in her suitcase. The men of the two households hold somewhat more liberal views of the feudal relationship between hired girl and housewife, but desiring domestic peace above abstract justice, they usually go on holding them. Most women will feel that the book lampoons women as employers; most men will sniff disdainfully at the milksop Mr. Hazen and the ineffectual Mr. National; but there is something about the story that makes one go on reading it just to see whether these deplorable people ever improve, or even get an inkling of the real reason why they can't keep a maid. Answer—they don't.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

A Pony to Parnassus

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE POETRY OF RAINER MARIA RILKE. By M. D. Herter Norton. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

ONE of the noble efforts of Mrs. Norton and by no means the least of them is directed to rendering Rilke accessible to English readers. Its latest representative is the present volume of translations of his verses, mainly from the relatively early "Books of Pictures" but accompanied by extracts from the "New Poems" and by the cyclic "Life of the Virgin Mary." It is with regret that we find that in this instance Mrs. Norton's effort falls somewhat wide of her splendid mark.

Wisely aware that a translator must not alter his poet's symbols, Mrs. Norton has aimed at a literal, almost line-for-line reproduction of Rilke's words and images, and striven to repeat his rhythms. In this respect she has been quite successful. True, her readings are not invariably exact. For example: in the original the lines concluding that very troubling poem about lost souls, The Olive Garden, run, "and they are abandoned by the Fathers,/and excluded from the Mothers' lap"—und sie sind preisgegeben von den Vätern/und ausgeschlossen aus der Mütter Schoss." It is probable that Rilke was employing the word Mütter in much the same sense in which Goethe used it in a celebrated scene in "Faust, Part II." Mrs. Norton sweetly but inconsiderately translates "and they are abandoned of their fathers/and shut out of their mothers' hearts." One wonders what in any case could make anyone presume the poet didn't know what he was about when he used "lap" and not "heart"? And she hasn't always gathered the significance of Rilke's word orders. His method, particularly in "New Poems," was the pictorial presentation of the object at its moment of intensest symbolism, when its form declared its essence. Thus in the tautly rhythmical Spanish Dancer he exhibits the ballerina whirling "her whole dress within this conflagration/out of which, like snakes that startle/her naked arms upstretch awake and rattling." But Mrs. Norton blurrs the charming picture by writing "out of which her naked arms upstretch/like startled snakes awake and rattling." Rilke was evoking the vision of dancing arms, not snakes. And why, oh why, one wonders, was the word order of the final line of The Carousel inverted and turned anti-climactic? Especially since meter and rhyme haven't in the least been Mrs. Norton's concern!

Still her sensitivity to Rilke's phraseology all in all is wonderful, particularly in view of the complex syntax to which he almost continually resorted for the sake of representing the fused worlds of sensations and ideas in which he dwelt. The great trouble is that Mrs. Norton has paraphrased it in an English frequently unmusical, raggedly metrical, and without much glamour. And she has almost consistently sacrificed the rhymes. Thus only with difficulty may she be said to have "translated" the poems, since formal relations—in poetry those of meter, rhyme, tone, color, and sound—are the symbols of what is most important in art. This is the non-conscious meaning. Had she attempted the reproduction of these symbols, her task would doubtless have been immensely difficult. Line-for-line translations of fine poetry representing the originals' values are not readily attainable; especially in cases where the forms are as excessively fluid as those of Rilke are. Yet since Stefan George succeeded in producing line-for-line and almost word-for-word translations of tercets by Dante and sonnets by Shakespeare and Baudelaire which well-nigh perfectly reproduce their values, it is permissible to suppose that with application an amateur of good-will like Mrs. Norton could have achieved translations of Rilke's poetry both literal and of some poetic quality. There is at least no reason for surmising she was obliged to give us lines as Boeotian as those which commence her translation of the famous verses about the panther in the Paris zoo, "His vision from the passing of the bars/is grown so weary that it holds no more"!

Fortunately, the volume juxtaposes on alternate pages the German and the English: thus it by no means is love's labor lost. It has prime value for those who have some German, desire to read Rilke's poems in the original, but are baffled by his vocabulary and intricate style. Mrs. Norton indeed has provided them with a most delightful trot: it must awaken gratitude. For it can carry its riders into the most fascinating region in "the paradise of the Idea" where Rilke thrones.

PAUL ROSENFELD

In Defense of the Labor Board

UNIONS OF THEIR OWN CHOOSING. By Robert R. R. Brooks. Yale University Press. $3.

THE National Labor Relations Act may be dubbed the stormy petrel of New Deal legislation. Around no other recent statute have the storms of contention raged as bitterly as around this attempt to protect workers in the exercise of their basic rights of self-organization and collective bargaining. When, to the chagrin of many eminent lawyers, the United States Supreme Court declared that the act was constitutional, thus in effect reversing the private Supreme Court that the Liberty League lawyers had set up for themselves, the vigor of the attacks continued unabated, but their emphasis shifted somewhat to the administration of the act by the National Labor Relations Board, and the board became the harsh tyrant which was destroying American liberties.

Millions of words have been written about the act and the board, most of them designed to prejudice the minds of the public against both the law and the agency created by it. The board itself, best qualified to answer these attacks and to clear away the misconceptions which have gained currency, has remained comparatively silent, deeming it improper for a quasi-judicial agency to engage in controversy about its own virtues.

The board has not been without its champions, however, and now Mr. Brooks comes valiantly to its defense with his new book "Unions of Their Own Choosing." Arriving just

FIGHT FASCISM AT ITS SOURCE

Help the Victims of Hitler Terror

More than 300,000 German anti-Nazis have passed through Concentration Camps up to May, 1938.

More than 300,000 families on Nazi blacklists—cut off from all means of livelihood.

Among these, Jew, Catholic and Protestant, have one common faith, to Destroy Nazi Barbarism.

THEY WILL NOT GIVE UP IF YOU SUPPORT THEM!

THEY WILL WIN IF YOU DO YOUR SHARE!

MAINTAIN THEIR COURAGE AND STRENGTH BY HELPING TO MAINTAIN

—Their Wives
—Their Helpless Children
—Their Brothers

In Germany—
In Austria—
In Czechoslovakia—

And now German refugees from Spain!

Your help is not a palliative—it is not charity—it is a capital investment in freedom!

The situation in Europe before and after Munich revealed serious weaknesses in the Nazi regime. Bold expressions of anti-war feelng, spontaneous protests against war, were heard throughout Germany. The Pogrom against the Jews was prepared largely as a weapon of intimidation against the awakening German masses.

Encourage them by aiding their families inside and outside Germany.

MAKE THEIR CAUSE YOUR OWN!
GIVE!!

FOUNDED BY Albert Einstein
Graf G. Von Arco
Eduard Fuchs
Helen Stoecker
Carl Von Ossietzky

OFFICERS
Charles A. Beard, Hon. Chairman
Sterling D. Spero, Vice-Chairman
Freda Kirchwey, Treasurer
Sheba Strunsky, Executive Sec.

FREDA KIRCHWEY, Treasurer N
INTERNATIONAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION
ROOM 310, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

I herewith contribute $.................. to aid the victims of Nazi oppression.

☐ Please send me an Anti-Nazi collection sheet for circulation among my friends.

Name ....

Address ....

when forces are being marshaled for a drive to amend the National Labor Relations Act, it is a timely document. Whether the reasoned analysis contained in the book can dissipate the emotional reactions which so many otherwise intelligent people cherish about the board and its work is a matter concerning which there must be some doubt. But there can be no doubt that Mr. Brooks's attempt is of positive value.

Specific charges have been made that the National Labor Relations Board is pro-labor, that it is pro-C. I. O., that it is un-American because it acts as investigator, prosecutor, and judge at the same time. These charges have been repeated so often that by the very repetition they have taken on some color of truth. "Unions of Their Own Choosing," calmly discussing each of these charges, demonstrating what the facts really are, showing how the misconceptions arise, proves conclusively that the allegations are without merit.

Thus we find that about 55 per cent of the cases which have been closed by the board were adjusted to the satisfaction of both the employer and the union. We learn that approximately 40 per cent of the cases closed were in effect decided in favor of the employer, since they were closed either by the refusal of the board or its agents to issue complaints against the employer, or as a result of the withdrawal by the unions of their charges after the agents of the board had indicated that the cases lacked merit. In only 5 per cent of the cases closed by the board has it been necessary to issue formal decisions. Unfortunately these are the cases which receive the attention of the newspapers, and these are the cases from which the public gets its impression of what the board is doing. Unfortunately, I say, because as Mr. Brooks demonstrates, the other aspects of the board's work are of such great influence in preserving industrial peace.

Mr. Brooks has given a good picture of the conditions which led to the passage of the National Labor Relations Act—the anti-union tactics in which employers indulged and their resentment at any government interference with their right to discharge at will. He discusses the grave administrative and public-relations problems which now face the Labor Board, and the way it meets these problems. The treatment accorded by the courts to board cases, its remarkable record of legal victories, bolsters Mr. Brooks's conclusion that the Labor Relations Act is sound and that its administration has been of a character which would meet judicial approval.

To Mr. Brooks the greatest gain which results from the protection of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively is the strengthening of democracy. Encouragement of collective bargaining not only improves the immediate status of the workers, but trains them to play a vital role in the attainment of industrial and political democracy.

Despite some minor inaccuracies, and illustrations which seem out of place in a book of this kind, "Unions of Their Own Choosing" has real value. Its discussion of the background of events leading to the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act, its explanation of the essential principles established by the statute, and its description of the method by which the board operates, presented in an interesting and lively fashion, will foster a better understanding of a greatly maligned institution. The reader who starts with any degree of impartiality is likely to conclude with Mr. Brooks that "in the contemporary conflict between democracy and dictatorship, whether political or industrial, the National Labor Relations Board is in the center of the struggle. Its influence and power are wholly on the side of democracy."

BENEDICT WOLF

DRAMA

"Virtue in That Falstaff"

IT IS no uncommon opinion that the Falstaff of "Henry IV" is the greatest comic character in all dramatic literature, and I for one see no reason for dissent. Yet so completely had this great figure been lost to the stage that never once during thirty years of assiduous theater-going had I ever until now had an opportunity to see an actor undertake it, and I must approach Maurice Evans's performance in the revival current at the St. James Theater as innocent of all standards of comparison as though New York were a backwoods town and Shakespeare's plays merely pages in a well-thumbed book. Judged absolutely for and by itself, there can be little difference of opinion: "Henry IV, Part I" as acted by Mr. Evans and his company is a lively play, and Falstaff is a delightful rogue not to be mentioned in the same breath with that libel on his character which Shakespeare himself originated when he wrote the "Merry Wives" and which too many actors have continued to propagate until honest Jack has come to seem no more than a red nose and a padded stomach. But beyond this it is extremely difficult to go, for if one may say without hesitation that the performance provides a delightful experience one can do no more than guess how far the full potentialities of the role and of the play as a whole are realized.

To know the play as literature without knowing it at all in the theater is, moreover, actually to increase the difficulty. One does not hear it innocently and judge it simply on the basis of what is heard. Instead, one finds oneself waiting for this line or that, wondering how it would sound if it were falling for the first time on the ear and asking anxiously how much of its significance is being realized, how good it would seem if it were known only in the context of this performance. Under such conditions probably no performance of any great play would seem all that one could ask for, and I must confess that I kept feeling, "Good as this seems to be, it is not so good as the text really is. Falstaff and Hotspur alike are even more dazzling persons than an audience which knows them only as they appear here can possibly imagine." There is, to be sure, enough of them to make a splendid evening and enough to cover the players with glory. But there is even more in the text of Shakespeare. In "Hamlet" Mr. Evans challenged comparison with the other Hamlets of our time; as the only Falstaff in the experience of most of his auditors he is compelled to challenge comparison, not with any other actor, but with the Falstaff of the universal imagination. And that constitutes a test which could hardly be met.

Furthermore, I am not sure that the play itself is not one in which the purely literary talents of its author were more fully developed than his sense of the specific requirements of the stage, and that for all the rush of the eloquence there is not, by the standard of the more mature plays, a failure to bring everything to a focus in single scenes. It is notable that the most famous single incident, that of Falstaff's play-acting with the prince, is the one which comes off best, and that one is aware in watching the play, as one is not aware in the reading of it, how many of the other incidents and speeches which define the character of Sir John are scattered here and there so that they come together in memory to round out a figure whose full magnificence is to be comprehended only when everything that has been said or done is recollected in tranquillity.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

Under no circumstances would it be reasonable to expect what almost inevitably one finds oneself expecting, namely, that Falstaff should fully suggest at every moment everything that, from the two whole plays, we know him to be. And Shakespeare, I suspect, has made the demand even more unreasonable in the case of Falstaff than almost anywhere else by giving him few long scenes. Falstaff is the man who has "more flesh than other men and therefore more frailty"; the man who asks "Who hath honor?" and who answers his own question with, "Him who died o'Wednesday"; the man who is "not only witty himself but the cause of wit in other men." Yet these are sayings dropped here and there and only contemplation can put together. He exists as a completed whole far more vividly than he exists at any one moment; he is more of an eternal idea than a personage acting in time. And what is true of him is true of certain of the other chief characters, at least to the extent that what they say is far more important than anything they do. Hotspur is, more than anything else, such a glorious bursting phrase as that about "living on cheese and garlic in a windmill"; so perfect a scene as that of the carters setting out from the inn before dawn is too short to be as effective on the stage as one expects it to be; and the same might be said of the interchange of memories between Falstaff and Justice Shallow which Mr. Evans borrows from Part II. "We have heard the chimes at midnight" is something to be rolled quietly on the tongue, not something the full flavor of which can be caught in the theater.

None of these reflections should, however, be taken to imply any lack of warmth in the praise due to a performance which is a pure joy in its own right and which falls short only as, perhaps, any performance inevitably would. If not all of Henry IV is actable, enough of it is to furnish an extraordinarily rich evening, and Mr. Evans as well as his director have added to the debt of gratitude which we owe them for making Shakespeare good theater again. Only rarely, I think, does their desire to do just that have unfortunate results. It is a pity, for instance, very nearly to drown out the last phrases of Falstaff's magnificent speech ending "banish plump Jack, and banish all the world" just because it seems theatrically effective to have the Sheriff knock at the door. There are two or three other moments when speeches are sacrificed to "action," and it is invariably a mistake. But this is something which it would be easy to "reform altogether"—as Mr. Evans had occasion to advise certain other actors in a different play.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Diamond Horseshoe
any night in your house

LAFAYETTE Automatic PHONO-RADIO COMBINATION

Yours can be the choicest seat at the Opera with this instrument in your home. Lafayette Model C-22 is a fully automatic combination. Listen as the superb 9 tube receiver brings you tonight's concert just as it sounds in the "Horseshoe"; or let the Garrard Automatic Record Changer (playing eight 12" records) entertain you with your favorite recordings. Lafayette is the choice of music lovers everywhere. Nowhere else could you buy such a masterpiece for as little as $112.50. (ac-dc $122.50). Send for illustrated book, or better, visit a Lafayette showroom.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.

542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
219 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

INTRODUCTORY OFFER—13 issues of the Manchester Guardian Weekly for $1

To form sound judgments on crucial events, whether in Europe, Palestine or China, you require complete unbiased news from abroad and candid interpretations prepared by the best minds in Europe.

For more than a century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English-speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on a great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific. In actual square inches devoted to editorial matter, each issue measures the equivalent of 66 pages of the ordinary American news weekly.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weeky indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of thirteen weeks for one dollar—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home.

Mail the order form at once!

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose a dollar for your 13 weeks' trial offer of THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY

2-11-39

RECORDS

IN VOLUME I of the Brahms Song Society, a subscription set now released by Victor (six records, $12), are a number of the best-known songs—"Von ewiger Liebe," "Die Mainacht," "Sonntag," "O wüsst' ich doch den Weg zurück," "Ständchen," and "Vergebliches Ständchen"; and a number of the less familiar ones—"Erinnerung," "Ein Sonnett," "Verrat," "An die Nachtigall," and the Four Serious Songs. This is one of the instances where what is best known is the best, and vice-versa, but even where one is not impressed by the song one is impressed by the way Kipnis sings it—the only exceptions being his treatments of "Ständchen" and "Vergebliches Ständchen."

Those who like Myra Hess's performance in Schumann's Piano Concerto will find it very well recorded in the new Victor set (four records, $6.50). For my taste Miss Hess's romantic style is excessive even for this romantic music, and all the spirit is taken out of the last movement by the sluggish pace of the performance and the not unrelated flabbiness of Miss Hess's own playing. Those who like Schumann's work should stick to the Columbia set.

Columbia has issued the little Concerto K. 37 for clavier and orchestra that eleven-year-old Mozart arranged from works by other composers, and that turns out to be charming as it is played by Mme Roesgen-Champion, harpsichordist, and the Paris Symphony under Gaillard (two records, $3.25). A first recording (two records, $3.25) of the highly original and fascinating music from Chabrier's "Dix pièces pittoresques" that Balanchine used in his ballet "Cotillon" offers, unfortunately, a performance by the London Philharmonic under Dorati which mistreats the music very badly. On the other hand, Beethoven's Piano Quartet Opus 16, excellently played by Schmitz and members of the Roth Quartet (four records, $6), is one of his fluent and characterless early essays in the eighteenth-century style.

Good things from Columbia are the two-record set ($4.50) of passages from "Hamlet" spoken by Maurice Evans; the single record ($1.50) of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture played by the London Philharmonic under Beecham; the single ($1.50) of the Habañera and Chanson Bohème from "Carmen" sung by Ninon Vallin with art that compensates for a voice which has lost some of its sensuous beauty.

At the outset I disclaimed any intention of doing Consumers' Union's job with phonographs—a job which I think Consumers' Union has done badly, and Consumers' Research no better. I could not undertake to judge all the constantly changing models put out by all the manufacturers, for I would then have no time and no space for my primary job, which is to deal with records. But I could, and thought I should, recommend a few machines in the various price ranges that gave what I considered good phonograph reproduction. And it must be understood that my idea of what is good in reproduction is different from most people's idea. They will not tolerate the sound of needle scratch; to eliminate it they are willing to eliminate the high overtones of the same vibration frequencies as scratch that enrich the reproduced tone and give it fidelity to the original; indeed they dislike highs—not only the overemphasized, piercing highs which Consumers' Union approves of, but even those which are merely clear and entirely agreeable. The machines that are made to satisfy these people give booming low notes, a mushy middle region, and weak high notes, and are therefore unable to reproduce what is being put on the records of today, defective as this is. What I think desirable in reproduced sound, on the contrary, is everything from high to low clear and balanced; and I have mentioned in previous issues —October 1 and 29 and December 3—the machines I have heard in which this can be had.

If you insist on an automatic record-changer, let it be a Garrard; but my advice is not to insist. You can escape the nuisance of getting up every five minutes by having your phonograph motor and pickup in a little box on a low table by your chair (a cabinet-maker built one of seven-eighth-inch-thick wood for me for $10). And if you do this you don't have to worry about a permanent or semi-permanent needle. If you are worrying about such a needle you are probably worrying about the Walco sapphire, about which I can say only that until now I have had conflicting reports which have made me unwilling to use it on my own records, and that if I get a report which makes me willing I will let you know. To what I wrote about needles in The Nation of October 1 I will add only that if you use steel, try full-tone and half-tone and adopt whichever gives better results. For a shadowgraphed, full-tone steel use the Actone 12A.

B. H. HAGGIN

DON'T YOU BE GUILTY!
RALLY to Prevent American help to Aggressors!
Revise the Neutrality Act!
Distinguish treaty-breakers from victims!
SPEAKERS: Chairman RT. REV. G. ASHTON OLDHAM, Bishop of Albany, Episcopal Church; JAMES B. CAREY, Secretary, C. I. O.; MELVYN DOUGLAS; CLARK M. EICHELBERGER, Chairman, Committee for Concerted Peace Efforts; JOSEPHINE SCHAIN, Chairman, National Committee on the Cause and Cure of War; JAMES T. SHOTWELL, President, League of Nations Association.
Auspices: Committee for Concerted Peace Efforts
CARNEGIE HALL 7th Avenue and 57th Street, New York City
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1939, at 8 P. M.
Tickets for sale—Committee for Concerted Peace Efforts
[illegible] West 40th Street, New York City
$.25 $.50 $1.00

CARNEGIE HALL Fri. Eve., Feb. 17 at 8:30
LEO SMIT
17-YEAR-OLD PIANIST
SEATS AT BOX OFFICE Mgt. R. Copley. (Baldwin)

". . . one-third of a nation . . ."
starring SYLVIA SIDNEY from the New York stage success
POPULAR PRICES
World Premiere
Friday, FEBRUARY 10 at 7:30 P. M.
UNITED ARTISTS
RIVOLI
BROADWAY
At 49th Street
Midnite Shows

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Letters to the Editors

Mr. Niebuhr's Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: Following Mr. Russell's example, I will first record an agreement between us. He declares that when he hears the American commercial support of Japanese aggression defended by those who are full of horror about Munich he is "completely bewildered." I find this inconsistency just as bewildering as he does. But I reject the implied suggestion that this inconsistency is characteristic of American, in distinction from European, political opinion. Mr. Russell makes a good deal of national bias. He thinks we are academic in our discussion because we "expect to be remote from the actual theaters of war"; furthermore, he believes that "to an American the pacifist argument is less compelling; but Europeans naturally think first of their own continent, and for Europe nothing but disaster can result from war." There may be something in this suggestion, but I doubt it. After all, Mr. Kolnai is as European as Mr. Russell; and so is Thomas Mann, who is certain that the capitulation to Hitler at Munich represents real disaster for Europe. Furthermore, the Gallup poll reveals that 45 per cent of Mr. Russell's countrymen share our, rather than his, opinion about Munich.

Mr. Russell must surely know that opinions on this issue are colored more by class bias than by national bias, and that on the whole the classes whose general social objectives he shares disagree with him. Significantly Mr. Russell accepts the tory dictum that the alternatives at Munich were either war or capitulation. Evidence continues to multiply that this was not the case, that neither Germany nor Italy was prepared for a general war, and that they would have been forced to back down if they had been offered diplomatic resistance. There is in fact some evidence that Chamberlain and Daladier bowed to Hitler's weakness rather than to his strength, fearing the consequences of a breakdown in the dictatorial states.

This question is important because, in the end, Mr. Russell offers no clear pacifist alternative to a policy which would have involved the risk of war but might have avoided a war. Instead, he holds out the hope that at some future time Hitler may be led "into some enterprise in which success is impossible. Perhaps when that time comes his own country will desert him; perhaps he will provoke a war in which defeat will not be very difficult." This hope certainly offers no pacifist alternative; for a country cannot desert a leader without the risk of civil war, and an easy defeat would spell war as certainly as a difficult one. Tyrants can go on forever if neither their internal nor their external foes offer opposition to them; and any effective opposition involves, of course, the risk of war.

Mr. Russell, in other words, has no other suggestion but that it will be easier to oppose Mr. Hitler later than to oppose him now. Such a hope is not very plausible; for each fascist victory without war gives the inadequate economic foundation of the fascist military machine a little more substance. The possibility of Hitler being deserted by his own people was certainly as good last fall as it is likely to be for some years to come. Nor is the assertion that Hitler has lost Poland and will probably lose Italy very convincing. Hitler will lose Poland if he decides to take the Polish Ukraine, and he will have Poland as an ally if he decides that he needs Polish help against Russia badly enough to leave a part of the Ukraine under Polish sovereignty. The initiative lies with him. As for Italy, thieves do not fall out while the prospect of increasing their spoils is still good. The Rome-Berlin axis will hardly give way as long as the world yields to its united "dynamism."

But whatever our judgments may be on these admittedly speculative problems, Mr. Russell has clearly left the field of unambiguous pacifist principles in searching for a way out and is wallowing with the rest of us in the relativities of political pragmatism.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

New York, February 2

"Art Is Expression"

Dear Sirs: In connection with Mr. Vivas's review of Professor Collingwood's "The Principles of Art" in your issue for January 21, kindly allow me to point out that the formula "Art is expression" by no means necessarily implies "expression of emotion." In the traditional aesthetic, art has to do with cognition, and is the expression, not primarily of emotion, but of a thesis; nor can we judge of a work of art without first knowing what it was that was to be expressed. From this point of view a well-made table and an "elegant equation" are equally works of art: a work of art in which ornament exceeds the bounds of responsibility to its burden is called a sophistry; and the "beauty" of the work is the attractive aspect of its meaning or utility, and commensurate with the perfection of the expression of its purpose.

If works of art are colored by emotion and in turn moving, it is because they are brought into being not only per artem but also ex voluntate. In other words, although on the one hand ars sine scientia nihil, it is also true that mens sine desiderio non intelligit (a truth that many "objective" scholars would do well to take to heart).

Mr. Vivas's whole discussion takes for granted a proposition ("Art is the expression of emotion") which very many of those who would agree that art is expression could not accept; for these, historically the great majority, art is the expression of a thesis. I conclude with Quintillian's Docti rationem componendi intelligunt, indocti voluptatem.

ANANDA K. COOMARASWAMY

Boston, February 3

Free Country

Dear Sirs: In Tallapoosa County, Alabama, early in October, a volunteer organizer for the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing, and Allied Workers of America, affiliated with the C. I. O., was arrested—a young Negro of seventeen, Willie Joe Hart. The arrest was made by Sheriff Corprew; the charge was highway robbery, as vicious a frame-up as has ever been heard of. The next morning the boy's father, a paid organizer for the union, appeared in the Sheriff's office to ask about his son's arrest. The Sheriff declined at first to talk about the case, but later in a back room he opened up.

According to an affidavit sworn to by Hart, the Sheriff said, "I got a list of every damn one of you . . . you're the ringleader . . . you look like a pretty intelligent nigger to be fooling around with a damn business like this . . . remember that nigger got killed right down there by you—remember old Flem Presley, how we went over and beat him up, don't you—remember Reese Gice, we had to pull him lower—you're going to be done the same way. That white man you let stay with you is going to get you into serious trouble . . . when I come down there after you we won't use pistols or rifles, this time we're going to use machine-guns and we're going to mow every God damn one of you down. . . . We're not going to have any of this Russian stuff down here—this is supposed to be a free country."

At the farcical trial Willie Joe was sentenced to fifteen years. Everyone connected with the trial knew he was innocent. The whole case was just a frame-up to stop the union's efforts to have the landlords' veto power on WPA jobs rescinded.

We need money to push the appeal which has already been started. Send any sum to R. T. Linsley, president, District 9, U. C. A. P. A. W. A., 1305 15th Street S., Birmingham, Alabama.

MILDRED LINSLEY,
Publicity and Educational Director

Washington, D. C., February 1

Work for Democracy!

Dear Sirs: May we ask the cooperation of your readers in a project which we feel will help in this critical time, when democracy is endangered on all sides? We all have a desire to do something concrete—an individual alone can accomplish little, a group of individuals can accomplish something, but a combination of groups can achieve much. Will you join this combination of groups to help keep democracy alive?

What to do?

1. Write to or interview the editor of your local newspaper, asking for a daily column: "The Things We Take for Granted," that is, our democratic way of life.

2. Write to or interview the ministers, priests, and rabbis of your community, asking them to preach the joys and privileges of democracy and religious tolerance. Make the young people and Sunday School children conscious of the great privilege of living in a democratic community. Train them to see the good in all races and creeds.

3. Commend your local, as well as the national, radio stations when they give programs stressing democracy. Ask them to do more short-wave broadcasting in Spanish for our South American neighbors.

4. Write to your favorite radio stars asking them to incorporate in their script references to the benefits derived from living in a democratic country.

5. Interest your schools and parent-teacher groups in this movement to make democracy a vital part of each community.

6. Ask the members of your groups to give of their individual time to do these five things so they too will be personally taking part in the necessary job of spreading the gospel of democracy. When press, movie, and radio realize that the public wants such action they will give it. Work for democracy!

MRS. WALTER JACOBS, President
MRS. DANIEL MALES, Secretary
Women's Conference of the Westchester Society for Ethical Culture

New Rochelle, N. Y., February 3

Oh, for a Daumier!

Dear Sirs: Margaret Marshall in "Notes by the Way" of January 14 suggested that The Nation was overlooking an important weapon in neglecting to include a timely cartoon or drawing in its weekly offerings. This lack has seemed to me the only major shortcoming of The Nation. When one examines the drawings made by Daumier for the Parisian publications of the last century, one deeply regrets that there is no modern counterpart. There is plenty of artistic talent in America today. Why can't it and The Nation get together?

ISABEL CHESNUT

New York, February 2

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD is Washington correspondent of the New York Post.

ALEXANDER WERTH is Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

DOROTHY PEARSON has been closely associated with the Bureau of Cooperative Medicine since its formation.

BERTRAND RUSSELL, well-known British pacifist, is the author of "Power," published last fall, and of many other books. He has recently been lecturing at the University of Chicago.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is the dramatic editor of Time.

HARRY BLOCK is a resident of Mexico.

EMANUEL HERTZ, author of "The Hidden Lincoln," has just published a new book, "Lincoln Talks."

BENEDICT WOLF is engaged in labor-relations work.

Correction

The Nation was inaccurate in stating that no non-Catholic spoke at the "Keep the Spanish Embargo" mass-meeting held in Washington on January 9. Irwin Laughlin, a Protestant, spoke at the meeting.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs. Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

AN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS INQUIRY under leadership of
DR. WESLEY M. GEWEHR

Interviews with politicians and independent observers in France, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, England. Sailing July 1. Back Sept. 5. Inclusive rate with 3rd Class passage $698

For further information regarding itinerary program, etc., this and other trips, address:

THE OPEN ROAD
8 W. 40TH ST.
NEW YORK
Department O

GUATEMALA—small group, interested in Mayan culture, leaving in July. Only 2 reservations still open. Box 1093 c/o The Nation.

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES:

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines

•

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, N. Y. C.
COrtlandt 7-3330

BOOKS

An Uncompromising Book! $1.00
THE QUEEN IS DEAD
By JANE BURR
(Mrs. Horatio Winslow)
Elliot Publishing Company, 33 W. 42nd St., N. Y. C.

5¢ EACH LITTLE BLUE BOOKS
Send postcard for our free catalogue. Thousands of bargains. Address:
HALDEMAN-JULIUS CO., Catalogue Dept.
Desk M-308, GIRARD, KANSAS

Keep Abreast of World Politics!
THE COMMUNIST
A Magazine of the Theory and Practice of
MARXISM-LENINISM
OFFICIAL ORGAN, COMMUNIST PARTY, U. S. A.
Single copies, 20c. Subscription, $2.00
At Workers Bookshop, 50 East 13th Street, N. Y. C.
Mail order: P. O. Box 148, Sta. D, New York City.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 18, 1939 NUMBER 8

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 189

EDITORIALS:
- THE WAR GOES ON 191
- THE DEPORTATION MENACE 192
- T. C. AND The Nation 193
- PIUS XI 194

NEW DEAL, NEW LIFE by Keith Hutchison 195

BRITAIN WINS IN SPAIN by Gaetano Salvemini 197

ARMS-MAKERS' HOLIDAY by Frank C. Hanighen 199

THE FIGHT FOR SOCIAL SECURITY by Maxwell S. Stewart 201

POCKET GUIDE by Helen Woodward 203

IN THE WIND 204

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 205

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- IN TIME OF HESITATION by Constance Rourke 206
- TRAGEDY IN MINNESOTA by Louis B. Salomon 208
- LIBERAL ENGLAND by Hans Kohn 208
- BIOGRAPHY OF BERLIOZ by Jacques Barzun 210
- ADVENTURE IN AWARENESS by Babette Deutsch 210
- DRAMA: WOE TO ISRAEL! by Joseph Wood Krutch 212
- FILMS by Franz Hoellering 213

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

IN OCCUPYING THE ISLAND OF HAINAN, Japan has shown a contemptuous disregard for French and British warnings of military retaliation. France's failure to take steps to protect its frontier when Italian troops were advancing toward the Pyrenees apparently convinced the Japanese that France would not fight under any circumstances to safeguard what after all is merely the approach to a colony. And once more they have guessed correctly. Although both Great Britain and France have filed "vigorous" protests against Japan's action, neither has shown any disposition to carry the matter farther. While the appeasement policies of the democracies have given Japan a free hand for expansion to the south and west, it has apparently struck a cropper in the north. A series of new incidents, in which the Japanese seem to have come out second best, has broken out along the Soviet border. With the Japanese government now completely in the hands of extremists, the reports of an impending attack on the Soviet Far East cannot be disregarded even though such action would be suicidal. War has threatened every spring for the past seven years in this area, but with 600,000 of Japan's best troops on the Soviet border, the threat is now graver than ever.

*

THE RESIGNATION OF JUSTICE BRANDEIS will be mourned by everyone who realizes that the Supreme Court is in the last analysis only the sum of its members. It is a pillar of human liberty or a drag on progress according to the light and leading of the men who make it up. By losing the shining liberal influence of Louis D. Brandeis the court will be greatly the poorer. But his retirement is a challenge that no President could fail to meet; Mr. Roosevelt's most recent judicial appointments have been such as to give us confidence that he will select a successor worthy of the great jurist who is leaving.

*

IN REJECTING THE PRESIDENT'S NOMINATION of Judge Floyd H. Roberts purely on the ground that he is "personally obnoxious" to its Virginia delegation, the Senate has taken a very dangerous stand. At a time when the fitness of some federal judges is under inquiry, it is of especial importance that appointments to the bench should be based strictly on merit. In the present case the Senate entirely neglected that issue. Actually the President's claims for Judge Roberts's ability and integrity seem fully justified. Certainly Senators Glass and Byrd made no attempts to impugn them. Instead, alleging that the nomination was made to annoy them and please a rival faction of Virginia Democrats, they appealed to an unwritten law of senatorial courtesy which calls for the rejection of a nominee on the request of the Senators from his state. One may doubt the strategic wisdom of the Roberts appointment, but one cannot defend the Senate's rejection of it. This particular unwritten law is nothing more than a dubious system of controlling local patronage. Not all of Mr. Roosevelt's judicial appointments have been entirely worthy, but at least his record compares favorably with that of recent Presidents. His latest nominations show a real effort to strengthen the bench. Francis Biddle of Pennsylvania, Professor Herschel W. Arant of Ohio, and Robert P. Patterson of New York, all are noted for their learning and probity. In naming the first two, Mr. Roosevelt overrode the recommendations not of New Deal opponents but of warm supporters.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

* * *

THE SENATE HAS ALSO BEEN INQUIRING INTO the qualifications of T. R. Amlie for membership on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with all the zeal that was so conspicuously lacking in its consideration of Judge Roberts. A queue of hostile witnesses crowded the hearings urging Amlie's rejection on the ground they did not like his views. Meanwhile, a large part of the press has been conducting a public trial of the nominee on charges ranging from possession of "an unjudicial mind" to belief in communism. The Wall Street Journal, which presses the former accusation, admits that Mr. Amlie's character is unassailable. It opposes his appointment, however, because it feels that the ICC, as a "quasi-judicial body," is no place for "extremists" of the "left" or, it adds graciously, even of the "right." We should be more impressed by this argument if we could remember any occasion when the Wall Street Journal employed it in opposing the appointment of an extreme reactionary. Other papers insist that belief in socialism is sufficient disqualification for membership in a body regulating a privately owned industry. Our own opinion is that Mr. Amlie's lack of orthodoxy is perhaps his best recommendation. One Socialist in a commission of eleven is not going to result in a revolution, but a fresh point of view can make a valuable contribution to its deliberations. In Britain the Socialist opposition is frequently represented on similar bodies. If Mr. Chamberlain can appoint a disbeliever in capitalism without qualms, we do not see why Mr. Roosevelt should be denied the privilege.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT HAS LOST NO TIME in thrusting back at Congress the problem of adequate provision for work relief during the remainder of the fiscal year. Immediately after signing the resolution appropriating $725,000,000 for this purpose, he sent a message asking for an additional $150,000,000 to bring the amount available back to his original figure. Leaders of the Congress economy bloc are annoyed, but they have no reason to feel surprised. In an attempt to hedge, after receiving a tremendous volume of protests against the cut, they tacked on an amendment to the appropriation resolution inviting the President to ask for more. They claim now that the emergency against which they thus provided has not yet arisen and that Mr. Roosevelt might at least have waited a few weeks before starting to bully them again. The message, however, shows conclusively that unless the additional money becomes available, WPA rolls will have to be reduced by at least 1,500,000, or to half their present total, in the three months ending June 30. Considering the slow pace at which private enterprise is absorbing the unemployed, it is no exaggeration to claim that an emergency will arise on April 1. To turn such vast numbers suddenly over to local relief will put a crushing burden on state and municipal authorities and cause tremendous distress. Early action is essential since the WPA must be given time to adjust its complicated machinery. Insistence on the cut will hinder recovery and cause untold misery. The humane, the economically wise course is to accede to the President's request. We suspect it would also be good politics.

* * *

OUR CONTROVERSY WITH WALTER WINCHELL is growing like Jack's house. First Mr. Winchell accused us of checking and learning—and then not admitting—that our "recent blast" at Ambassador Kennedy "was 100 per cent wrong." We published a polite contradiction. "The Nation's dispatch," we said, "describing Ambassador Kennedy's apathetic attitude toward the refugee problem was written by an experienced correspondent who had every opportunity to know the facts. And the facts as he gave them have never been refuted." Mr. Winchell reprinted our reply and then asserted that it was "also true beyond dispute and capable of complete verification that friends of The Nation who doubted the accuracy of the article . . . made it their business to get the facts in London. . . . They have learned that Mr. Kennedy has been both active and effective in securing the cooperation of the British government for help for the German refugees and has brought to bear both the influence of the United States government and the force of his own personality upon the British government to this end. Furthermore, Mr. Rublee has also publicly denied accuracy of the article in The Nation. . . . Now will The Nation reprint that?"

OF COURSE WE'LL REPRINT IT. WE SHALL ALSO answer it. First, just as a matter of interest, we'd like to know whether the sophisticated Mr. Winchell thinks that an official in Mr. Rublee's position could do other than deny the accuracy of criticism of the American Ambassador. He should never have been asked. Second, we'd like to point out these facts: The article in The Nation criticized Mr. Kennedy specifically for his conduct—or non-conduct—before the pogroms of November; they waked up a good many people to the full horror of the situation. "Friends of The Nation" to whom Mr. Kennedy protested did submit the story to another London correspondent, and he sent them a version that exonerated the Ambassador—and, incidentally, criticized Mr. Rublee in the same connection. Our "friends" showed us this letter, stipulating that it could not be printed or its author's name revealed. We questioned our own correspondent. He stuck by his story and still does. He is a man of absolute integrity and long years of experience. Does Mr. Winchell think that The Nation should have repudiated him on the basis of a different version in a private letter? We suggest that Mr. Winchell reprint this comment and tell us he is sorry he accused us of affirming our belief in a story we knew to be false. For our part, we'll keep an eye on Mr. Kennedy—who has undoubtedly been more "active and effective" since November 10—and give him full credit for future deeds. How's that?

* * *

THE NATION HAS FREQUENTLY URGED THAT this country should follow the example of Britain and Holland by making special provision for the admission of refugee children. This proposal now seems to have a good chance of adoption with the introduction into the Senate, by Senator Robert F. Wagner, of a resolution asking that 20,000 refugees under fourteen, of "every race and creed," be allowed entry outside the quota during the next two years. We warmly congratulate Senator Wagner on this step and also the executives of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. on their indorsement of the plan. There can surely be no responsible opposition to a project which leaves the immigration law untouched so far as adults are concerned, puts no charge on the public funds, and offers innocent victims of persecution a chance to grow up in a free and friendly atmosphere. It is unfortunate that the President's Advisory Committee on Refugees, headed by J. G. MacDonald, has not yet publicly put the stamp of its approval on this plan.

* * *

BOMBINGS AND INCENDIARISM ATTRIBUTED to the extreme Irish Republicans are continuing in England and northern Ireland despite extraordinary police activity. On the old theory that "England's danger is Ireland's opportunity," efforts are being made to disrupt rearmament work and sabotage A. R. P. (Air-Raid Precaution) activities. The end in view is to force withdrawal of British support from Ulster, thus making possible the union of all Eire. An ultimatum presenting this demand is said to have been sent to London by the Irish Republican Army, and threats have also been made against the government of Eire. Whatever provocation southern Republicans may have had from the Northern Ireland government—and its record in the suppression of constitutional rights is a disgrace—they will not achieve their objectives by terroristic methods. Such tactics will only destroy the growing fund of good-will between English and Irish. Most people in Eire, strongly though they resent continued partition, seem to be opposed to this revival of Fenianism. Mr. de Valera, whom no one can accuse of subservience to England, has condemned it in the strongest possible terms. His government has introduced legislation into the Dail for the stringent suppression of terrorism and treason. The lawfully elected government of Eire, it insists, will not tolerate any attempt to set up a secret and rival regime.

* * *

WALT DISNEY, WHO HAS THE DISTINCTION of having brought forth from the Hollywood mountain a Mickey Mouse, is Harvard's most famous M. A., but Harvard has apparently been rankling under the honor. Dr. Robert Durant Feild, who was responsible for the award, has just been dropped from the faculty of fine arts on the recommendation of a committee of members of that department. The Harvard Crimson asserts that the Disney incident was the immediate reason, though Dr. Feild's general approach to art, which made his classes so popular that not all applicants could be accommodated, was a more fundamental cause. The Crimson says that hundreds of protests have been received, and it is reported that both students and teachers at Harvard are organizing. We look forward to a good fight. The spectacle of Harvard defending its dignity against a Mouse should be almost as funny as an animated cartoon; it should inspire Mr. Disney to send Donald Duck and all his other extra-curricular animals to Cambridge.

The War Goes On

DESPITE the loss of Catalonia and the island of Minorca, it seems probable as we go to press that the Spanish civil war will continue. Rumors of an early end of the conflict have flown thick during the past week, most of them originating, suspiciously enough, in Paris. Yet it seems unlikely that the government will surrender its heavily fortified stronghold in central Spain unless it is assured that its minimum terms will be met. It has a well-disciplined army of from four to five hundred thousand men. And though it lacks supplies and the industrial base for manufacturing its own armaments, this could be rectified if the United States or one of the other democracies would lift the ban which has existed since almost the beginning of the conflict and allow the government to buy the needed munitions.

At the moment, however, it appears that France, slated to be the next victim of the fascist onslaught, has suffered greater demoralization as a result of the loss of Catalonia than Spain itself. Not the slightest effort was made to prevent Franco from occupying the strategic mountain passes along the French border. In contrast with the policies adopted after the fall of Irun, the French flatly refused to permit the Spanish army to be transported with its arms to another sector of Republican Spain. If Daladier hoped that his appeasement policy would conciliate Mussolini and thus enable France to escape further humiliations, he miscalculated seriously. The abuse of France in the Italian press has continued unabated; and Mussolini's new rearmament program was announced the same day that Bonnet warned the Spanish government that it could not operate from French soil.

If France's role this past week has been cowardly and shortsighted, Great Britain's has been crassly opportunistic and unscrupulous. Publicly Chamberlain finds it convenient to believe that the Italians will be withdrawn from Spain as soon as Franco's victory is complete. But his action in arranging for the seizure of Minorca by Franco's Spanish troops suggests that with all his protestations he has not succeeded in convincing himself that Mussolini will keep his word. The British Prime Minister has abandoned even the appearance of neutrality in the Spanish civil war, and is staking everything on the hope that he can convince Franco that Britain's financial power will be more advantageous to him in the months to come than Italian military support. His strategy is painfully obvious: to persuade Mussolini to withdraw his troops as a gesture of good-will to England, and then to bribe Franco to drop his link to the axis. Unfortunately for Chamberlain, Italy was prepared for just such a move and announced that its troops would not be withdrawn until a fascist "political" victory was secure. Unmoved by this development, Chamberlain has virtually served notice of his intention to recognize Franco even without a withdrawal of Italian troops.

Nor is the prospect of immediate American help for Spain much brighter. In response to prodding by the Lawyers' Committee on American Relations with Spain, the State Department has receded from its contention that the President has not the power to lift the embargo, but now says that since Congress is in session it should deal with the situation. Congress has been far more concerned with its own partisan purposes than with the larger issues of foreign policy on which democracy may stand or fall.

It is not too late for action. Spain fights on. It is still possible to preserve an island of democracy in Europe if we will but grant Spain the rights to which it is entitled as a sovereign nation. But this will not be done unless the President displays new understanding and courage.

The Deportation Menace

IF ANY fault is to be found with the impressive and eloquent statement made by Secretary of Labor Perkins before the House Judiciary Committee in the Bridges case, it lies in the defensive position she adopted. For on every one of the basic issues involved the men and interests who have so long urged the deportation of Harry Bridges and now seek the impeachment of the Secretary convict themselves of the grossest hypocrisy. Bridges entered this country legally on April 12, 1920; the suggestion to deport him did not come until 1934, and it came not because of any crime or illegal act but because he had played a leading role in the San Francisco longshoremen's strike in that year. Congressman Dies himself last August could produce no more tangible evidence against him than the assertions of two or three persons that in private conversation he had made derogatory statements with regard to battleships, threatening and intemperate remarks with respect to rival union factions, and contemptuous remarks about the President. The last is a curious accusation to come from Dies.

The Secretary of Labor could undoubtedly have ordered Bridges deported months ago, even on the flimsy and spurious charges brought against him. For, as Miss Perkins pointed out, the Secretary under the deportation laws has what is "in many respects the most serious and the most drastic administrative power vested in any executive officer in our government" and "stands virtually alone among executive officers in his right to restrict personal liberty and freedom of individual action of human beings." The Secretary can in certain circumstances arrest, even where there is no allegation of crime; imprison and deport, even though the Secretary recognizes that deportation may be "tantamount to sending an alien to his death." The Secretary is "investigator, prosecutor, jury, and judge." Whereas other administrative officers cannot enforce an order without resort to the courts, in deportation "no court tries the cases or can intervene except on habeas corpus, and then can only review the point of law involved, not the finding of fact." This is a power, as Miss Perkins said, "which is susceptible of exercise without adherence to those elementary standards of due process of law that are at the heart of our Constitution." Yet the same interests and newspapers which are continually talking of due process and constitutional procedure and complaining that administrative agencies combine the functions of prosecutor and judge are now trying to impeach Miss Perkins for refusing to handle the Bridges case in an arbitrary and high-handed manner.

Particularly hard to stomach is the criticism of Miss Perkins for awaiting the Supreme Court's decision in the Strecker case before proceeding with the deportation charges against Bridges. In the past and under other circumstances, those who would have her ignore orderly judicial procedure have always preached the virtue of respect for the courts. In the Strecker case the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at New Orleans refused to order the deportation of a fifty-three-year-old restaurant owner of Hot Springs, Arkansas, whose only crime seems to be that in 1932 he made a donation of 60 cents at a meeting of the Communist Party, and signed up as a member. Strecker had lived in this country for twenty-six years and had already left the party at the time of his arrest. He had his first citizenship papers and had applied for his second. He was found guilty of having been a member of the Communist Party in 1932 and ordered deported. The court, speaking through Judge Hutcheson, reversed the order and found it "a kind of Pecksniffian righteousness" to hold that because a man is a member of the Communist Party he is therefore deportable as one who advocates overthrow of the government by force and violence. If the Supreme Court upholds the Circuit Court, mere membership in the Communist Party will not be sufficient ground for deportation. And if the Supreme Court declines to order the deportation of Strecker, who admits having been affiliated with the party, it will be impossible to deport Bridges even if it can be proved that he is a member, which he denies.

But a favorable decision in the Supreme Court is not enough. We believe that all those who wish to safeguard democracy in this country must fight for the repeal of laws which permit deportation because of a man's opinions only. "If Bridges or any other alien," as Miss Perkins said, "at any time takes any action to overthrow the government of the United States by force or by violence, or if he commits any crimes, he can and will be promptly arrested, tried, and punished, or deported under the terms and requirements of law." But to permit deportation for opinion alone is to allow immigration officials to violate basic rights and suppress fundamental liberties. In the Miller case these powers were used against freedom of the press; in the Baer case, to punish the author of a sewage-disposal plan fought by industrial and lumber interests in Oregon; in the Warrmann case, against the right of assembly. At the time of the Palmer raids, as in the raids made in recent years by immigration authorities during the waterfront strike in San Francisco and the miners' strike in Gallup, New Mexico, the great majority of those arrested were American citizens. Aside from the bad habits bred in officialdom, the deportation laws are a menace to the citizen as well as the alien.

T. C. and "The Nation"

AFTER the publication last December of an article by James Wechsler entitled Twilight at Teachers College, The Nation received and printed a sharp but rather vague dissent from certain members of the faculty. Mr. Wechsler's article was a criticism of the Teachers College administration, and especially of Dean William F. Russell, for catering to the views of business interests and for systematically disregarding democratic procedure within the college. The letter of protest, which was signed by several well-known liberal educators, charged that Mr. Wechsler and The Nation were being used by a "political sect," meaning obviously the "Stalinists" in the Teachers' Union, to injure a liberal institution. Subsequently several of the signers opened a concerted bombardment in the press against the Teachers' Union, blaming the union for the Nation article and presumably "answering" that article by attacking the union—although the article itself had only parenthetically mentioned the union.

Dr. George S. Counts, one of those who signed the letter to The Nation, has now examined more of the real substance of Mr. Wechsler's article in a long rebuttal in the Social Frontier. He renews his unproved and untrue charges against The Nation. He also paints an amiable portrait of Dean Russell, for whom he displays genuine sympathy. In the course of his argument he contributes at least two points which Mr. Wechsler might profitably have noted: first, the appointment of several liberals to the faculty in recent years; second, the fact that Dean Russell had inherited a tradition of undemocratic procedure from his predecessors. Both items are part of a complete record and emphasize the complexity of the situation. They do not alter the effect of the negative testimony presented by Mr. Wechsler and largely confirmed—with numerous but rather unconvincing qualifications—by Dr. Counts himself. A large part of Dr. Counts's thesis rests upon a misreading of the Nation article. He defends Dean Russell against the charge that New College was closed because of its radicalism; Mr. Wechsler did not say that it was, but stressed the lack of democracy in the manner of its closing. Dr. Counts cites the enlightened character of Teachers College's present labor policy, as Mr. Wechsler also did; but he admits somewhat light-heartedly that the new policy was adopted only after faculty pressure, with Dean Russell "characteristically protesting all the while." Dr. Counts denies once more that several of his colleagues left the Teachers' Union under administrative duress; Mr. Wechsler merely mentioned the resignations as part of a general decline in "progressive activities" and added, "The extent to which insecurity motivates this retreat and the extent to which it reflects broader world tendencies is difficult to measure."

Although he arrives at different conclusions, Dr. Counts, in the process, fortifies Mr. Wechsler's chief theme: Dean Russell's bid for the good-will of big business, and his autocratic conduct of the college itself. Dr. Counts grants that there is "certainly truth" in the picture of Dean Russell's flirtation with Wall Street, and expresses "deep anxiety" over the formation of a Lay Council of still uncertain composition. With respect to internal democracy, he admits that "if the events to which Mr. Wechsler refers are examined from the standpoint of democratic procedure, the case of the college is much less defensible." He then advances a multitude of explanations for Dean Russell on each count and reaches a verdict of acquittal. Analyzing Dean Russell's deference toward big business, Dr. Counts observes that this is an ancient custom of college presidents. It is; and the cumulative experience of endowment-supported colleges demonstrates the dangers of such a course. Dr. Counts similarly deprecates the charge of internal autocracy by insisting that conditions at Teachers College are better than they used to be. They may be; but elsewhere he confesses that only in recent years have basic social issues invaded the college. That, too, is a crisis phenomenon, and autocratic methods which existed in the relaxed pre-depression years are far more significant in a setting like the present. In this setting it is astonishing to read Dr. Counts's off-hand dismissal of Dean Russell's authoritarian habits: "If, in the last analysis, he is convinced that he must make a decision, he scorns to hide behind the screen of democratic forms." This is the essential rationale for all totalitarianism; Dr. Counts presents it as merely a disconcerting facet of the Dean's personality. It is the rationale for the suppression of a dissident student newspaper, for the closing of New College without faculty consultation, for a sweeping reorganization of the college without faculty approval, for dismissal of a professor without a hearing by her colleagues, for inducing Dr. Counts himself to cancel a scheduled speech criticizing the American Legion.

Dr. Counts's vote of confidence seems all the more extravagant in the light of Dean Russell's latest address. He expressed his belief that the Communists are paying party members $3 a day to pose as students, to usurp the front rows in Teachers College classrooms, and to promote such ventures as "meetings on peace, the Spanish situation, or labor problems." He saluted the work of the Dies committee and urged its continuance.

No doubt the Communists in the Teachers' Union have a good deal to explain, and Dr. Counts and his colleagues probably have grievances to recite far more authentic than Dean Russell's colorful whimsies. But Mr. Wechsler's article did not pretend to explore the politics of the Teachers' Union. Dragging that issue across the trail only distracts attention from the real question of the character of educational policy at T. C.

Pius XI

NOT in many centuries has the passing of a Pope been as sincerely mourned in non-Catholic circles as the death of Pius XI. His courage in attacking Nazism and in criticizing the importation of German racial theories into Italian fascism had won him wide respect and applause. Yet it must be recognized, in all honesty, that the portrait of Pius XI as an anti-fascist is in part an optical illusion. History may well decide that the most important aspect of his pontificate was the aid he gave the first of the Fascist dictators, Mussolini, in his rise to power. If Mussolini's principal opponents in industrial northern Italy were the working-class parties, chief opposition in the south came from the peasants enrolled in Don Sturzo's Catholic and anti-Fascist Partito Populare. Pius XI, by disciplining Don Sturzo and adopting a hostile attitude toward his party, rendered invaluable help to the budding Duce. The "liquidation" of the Partito Populare prepared the way on the Catholic side for the Concordat of 1929. Mussolini made his contribution to the agreement by suppressing Free Masonry.

The concordat cost Mussolini 1,750,000,000 lire in indemnities, but it gave this former anti-clerical and atheist the blessing of the church. The Pope, "prisoner of the Vatican" since 1870, became in a more real sense the prisoner and hostage of Italian fascism, and the power of the Italian state, always a strong influence in the election of a new Pope, will undoubtedly be able to bring about the choice of an Italian Fascist to succeed Pius XI.

Pius XI himself, though he opposed fascist extremism, could hardly be called a man of progressive views. He always spoke in high terms of Mussolini, and his famous encyclical, "Quadragesimo Anno," contains nothing inconsistent with the corporative state. Although the church, under Pius, was finally reconciled with the French Republic and lent support to republican Germany, the favor shown to the Austrian regime of Dollfuss and Schuschnigg and to Franco indicates the Vatican's basically anti-democratic preferences. Though fascism logically is anti-Christian, since totalitarianism cannot permit the existence of an independent church, too much can be made of this theoretical cleavage between the church and the ideology of the axis. Pius XI long hoped for some modus vivendi with fascism. He had a pleasant little Catholic fascism of his own in Austria. He went along for a decade with Mussolini with nothing but minor clashes. He looked to the Franco regime to save the church in Spain. Pius XI, by his concordat with the Nazis, showed his readiness to compromise with them. It was the Führer's paranoid and passionate consistency, his unwillingness permanently to compromise with Catholicism or to have a totalitarianism that was less than total, that transformed Pius XI's role into that of a world spokesman against Nazism.

New Deal, New Life

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

Washington, February 10

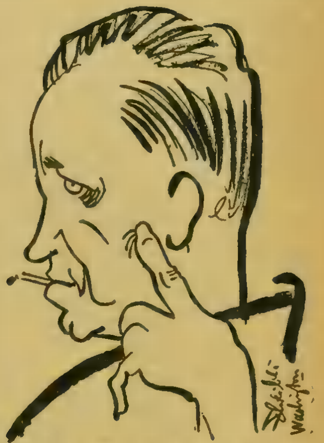
EVER since the elections editorial writers have been proclaiming that the New Deal is on the run. It has, they declare, lost the advantage of the offensive and faces a future of gradual disintegration ending in resounding defeat in 1940. Even some of its best friends, discerning an alarming loss of vitality, have assumed a bedside manner.

After a few days in Washington these fears seem to me a trifle premature. I have found few signs of defeatism and many of a revival of the fighting spirit. The consequences of the election are not indeed being minimized. But it has not caused demoralization; rather it has shaken the lethargy induced by six years of intensive work in a semi-revivalist atmosphere, and has led New Dealers to make a realistic assessment of their position and their future.

In the last few weeks the President and his most trusted lieutenants have been carefully weighing the political situation, reviewing their troops, calculating their assets and liabilities. The actions of the coalition of Republicans and tory Democrats since Congress convened have made it clear that the battle is joined for control of the Democratic convention of 1940. The New Dealers have no illusions about how stiff that battle will be, but they believe their chances of victory are good. In any case they must fight or see much of what has been accomplished since 1933 go into the discard.

Mr. Roosevelt got in an early blow by his appointment of Messrs. Hopkins and Murphy. It was his way of picking up the gauntlet thrown down by the Garner coterie. More than that, it was a rallying signal for his followers which, I am told, has already worked wonders in restoring morale. Men close to the President spoke of the importance of the appointments as a step toward integrating the inner circle of New Dealers into a cohesive body prepared to see the political fight through to the bitter end. Hopkins and Murphy are leading lights in this body and together with Ickes its outstanding representatives in the Cabinet. Some of the other Cabinet members, Secretaries Perkins and Morgenthau for instance, while regarded as absolutely loyal to the President, are inclined to stand aside from the political hurly-burly. My informants preferred not to identify too closely a third group or to analyze too minutely their allegiances.

Outside the Cabinet there are of course hundreds of people in Washington who might broadly be termed New Dealers. Of these a comparatively small number—heads of departments and advisers—belong to the President's fighting phalanx. The vast majority are technicians of all kinds, thoroughly devoted to the aims of the New Deal but intent on the definite work they are doing. They do not participate in politics nor are they expected to; their contribution lies in insuring that the activities of the government are carried out as smoothly and efficiently as possible.



Secretary of Commerce Hopkins

The general plan of campaign laid down by the President and his staff may be discerned in his messages to Congress. The two things most emphasized were the part the United States must play in international affairs and the importance of maintaining the spending policy until the national income is considerably increased. Mr. Roosevelt can hardly be accused of dragging foreign affairs into the foreground: Hitler has made it inevitable that a large part of our attention should be concentrated on them. But the international tension may prove to be an important domestic asset. Mr. Roosevelt is the one democratic leader who has really stood up to Hitler and Mussolini. We may not grant him an unblemished record in this respect, but against a background of Chamberlains and Daladiers he appears something of a giant. There is a growing feeling throughout the country, among all classes, that the challenge of fascism must be actively met. By making himself the spokesman of that sentiment Mr. Roosevelt will certainly add to his political strength.

There was little said in the message to Congress about new reform legislation. New Deal strategy for the next two years requires an emphasis on recovery rather than on reform. If victory is to be achieved in 1940, there must not be another economic landslide such as occurred in the second half of 1937. That débâcle was halted and a new recovery movement launched when the President took steps to make credit still easier and reverted to deficit financing. Ignoring bodeful prophecies of inflation he took the position that increased debt is less wasteful of the national heritage than idle labor and idle plant. For plant deteriorates even when at a standstill: the man power unemployed today is lost forever. So long as private enterprise is unwilling or unable to make use of the idle savings which are the counterpart of this idle capacity, the government must take up at least part of the slack. That was the essence of the President's budget message. He refused to reduce the deficit and made certain that if appropriations were cut the onus would rest squarely on Congress.

First round of the battle on this issue went apparently to Congress when it carried the largest cut it dared propose in the WPA deficiency appropriation. But it may prove a Pyhrric victory, for confronted by country-wide protests the Senate added an amendment inviting Oliver Twist to come back and ask for more. And Oliver has very promptly taken the hint. It remains to be seen whether the Congress majority will take responsibility for dropping a million men from the WPA rolls on April 1.

In spite of all the sound and fury about economy, New Deal strategists do not expect that in the end this year's budget will be seriously slashed. There will be many furious contests, but each time Congress really looks over the brink of the economy abyss its instinct will be to draw back, fearful lest it break its political bones. After all, in their anxiety to get back last November the Republicans incurred a good many commitments hardly compatible with balanced budgets.

While stressing the central importance of government spending in the promotion of recovery, the Administration is making greater efforts than before to persuade industry to do its share. Harry Hopkins from the moment he took over the Department of Commerce has been engaged in talks with business men designed to prove that neither he nor the President is equipped with horns and tail. According to reports, these conferences have been going more smoothly than might have been expected. The main obstacle is the tendency of business to dig in on the line "We must have confidence," and when asked what the price will be, to pitch it exorbitantly high.

The Administration apparently is prepared to make concessions. The deal with Wendell Willkie over the sale of the Tennessee Power Company to the TVA is an instance. Having established before the Supreme Court the right of the government to compete with private utilities, the Administration settled with Mr. Willkie on generous terms. Perhaps too generous. But it may be worth while if the utilities can thereby be encouraged to put through a big new investment program. The time for expansion is ripe, with power output creating new records and the magnates wondering how long, in their own interests, they can keep up the pretense that they lack the confidence to set about building new plant.

Business circles, it is interesting to note, are decidedly less hostile to the new Secretary of Commerce than are some of the politicians. They are giving him credit for ending the quarrel with Willkie and are hoping he may be open to further bargains. This hope is not without logic. With the Administration forces massed for attack on Capitol Hill, sorties against Wall Street might prove a tactical error. Better, it may be argued, to give some ground in that direction, provided a solid contribution to recovery may be had in return. Compromise is essential to the art of politics, and no politician can be blamed for resorting to it particularly when engaged in a life-and-death struggle. But compromises are bad if they are unevenly balanced and fatal when they involve the sacrifice of major principles. Friends of the New Deal will hope that Roosevelt and Hopkins in their conferences with business men will remember that Munich agreements only increase "demands for appeasement."

The President has on occasion made political swerves not even justified in terms of expediency. Playing ball with Mayor Hague did not prevent his losing New Jersey at the last elections, while it disheartened his supporters and lost him many votes elsewhere. Surrender to Catholic pressure in the matter of the Spanish embargo is another example. There can be no doubt that he himself regards the results of a Franco victory in Spain with dismay, but he could not muster the courage to tell a powerful minority that they were putting the supposed interests of their church before those of their country.

The President has important assets which can be capitalized between now and 1940, and there is no need for him to water his stock by paying undeserved bonuses to people like Hague. He still commands an immense following in the country at large and a huge majority among the rank and file of the Democratic Party. Of course when it comes to conventions political machines count more than political masses. It is rather generally assumed that in 1940 Mr. Farley and the important part of the Democratic machine which he commands will be used against any New Deal candidate. I am informed on good authority that this is by no means certain. The New Dealers do not number Farley among the deserters even though they are not sure of his support. They are convinced that he remains devoted to the President and therefore hope he can be persuaded to come into camp.

Among the chief dangers to the New Deal in the fight ahead—a danger which is not being minimized—is the growth of a spirit of intolerance, fostered, like the opposite growth of anti-fascism, by the heightened tension abroad. This spirit is being organized in Washington under the auspices of Mr. Dies. There is every reason to suspect that, whatever small fry the Dies committee may attempt to bag on the way, the quarry it is stalking is in the White House. That is why, according to the story going around, the Republicans have proposed him as an honorary member of the G. O. P.—an offer turned down on the ground that it would ruin him in Texas.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Cal.

The kind of political garbage the Dies committee is peddling has its most poisonous effects among the farmers and the lower middle classes. These are groups which the New Dealers recognize they have largely lost. They have hopes of recapturing them, but the fulfilment of that hope lies in a considerable further measure of recovery. Thus whichever way we turn in the political maze we find ourselves coming back to the economic problem. If the New Deal is to win a new lease of life in 1940 it must not only prevent another recession but hoist the national income to a considerably higher mark. Consequently, whatever strategic retreats it may make it will hold the budget salient at all costs, convinced that if the enemy can destroy that the whole line must be smashed.

Britain Wins in Spain

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

BEFORE Hitler annexed Austria, Italy had as its neighbor at the Brenner Pass the little neutralized and disarmed Austrian republic. On May 20, 1925, Mussolini made the following statement before the Italian Senate: "Italy can never tolerate that patent violation of treaties—the annexation of Austria by Germany. This annexation, in my opinion, would negate Italian victory, besides increasing the numerical and territorial power of Germany." On October 6, 1934, he said: "We have upheld and shall continue to uphold the independence of the Austrian republic." On February 13, 1936, he proclaimed that it was necessary that "the independence and autonomy of Austria be respected." Since the annexation Italy has had on its border at the Brenner Pass the powerful German Reich. And now that Hitler has also annexed the Sudeten Germans and gained control of what remains of Czechoslovakia, Italy is confronted at the Brenner with a Reich of 85 million people. It is plain that the rape of Austria and the collapse of Czechoslovakia were for Mussolini diplomatic disasters of the first magnitude. If Mussolini attempted to shake off Hitler's yoke, an alliance between Germany and Yugoslavia would bring him quickly to his senses. Hitler would march on Venice, and Yugoslavia on Trieste. In 1938 Italy no less than France lost the World War.

To be sure, Hitler has announced, I do not know how many times, and Mussolini has repeated, I do not know how many times, that the present Italian-German frontier at the Brenner is inviolable. But if a problem did not exist in that quarter nobody would take the trouble to deny its existence.

Before the World War it was said that Italy was fated to be either an ally or an enemy of Austria. Today it is clear that Mussolini must be Hitler's enemy or his vassal. He could become his enemy only if a coalition were formed in Continental Europe among France, Italy, Yugoslavia, and Russia as the main partners. Such a coalition would oblige Hitler to scatter his forces on four frontiers and prevent him from concentrating them on the Italian frontier. But for the time being there is no prospect of such a coalition. With European international relations as they are at present, the German-Italian alliance, the so-called Rome-Berlin axis, is for Italy not a bond of alliance but a bond of vassalage.

Since its territorial ambitions in Central Europe are blocked by Hitler, Italy can now expand only at the expense of France or Great Britain in the Mediterranean. At the present time it threatens France with unofficial demands for Nice, Savoy, Corsica, and Tunisia. But it is difficult to see what it can actually get from France in the way of territory without war. And that raises the question not only of how far the British are prepared to go in support of France but of what their attitude in general has been toward Italy.

During the Ethiopian crisis there was never any real clash between the British Foreign Office and Mussolini. The clash was between Mussolini and the huge majority of the British public. The British Foreign Office had to go through the motions of siding with the British public against Mussolini, but it never had the slightest intention of opposing him. It played the role of the angelic Mr. Spenlow in the British-French partnership and assigned to the French Foreign Office the part of the demon Jorkins.

As far as Spain is concerned, there has never been the slightest disagreement between the British Foreign Office and Mussolini. British non-intervention in the Spanish civil war has always been like the non-intervention of Mephistopheles in the duel between Faust and Marguerite's brother. Despite the obvious fact that Italian control of the coasts of the Spanish peninsula, Spanish Morocco, and the Balearic Islands would seriously embarrass the English navy in a war with Italy, Britain's conservative leaders fail to see a Franco victory, even with Mussolini's help, as a threat to the British Empire.

In the gentlemen's agreement of January, 1937, Mussolini promised Mr. Eden, then British Foreign Secretary, not to change the territorial status quo in Spain. On October 21, 1937, Mr. Chamberlain stated in the House of Commons that Mussolini had repeatedly declared that "Italy has no intention of making the smallest change in the territorial status quo of Spain, and has no designs upon the Balearic Islands." Last January when Chamberlain paid a visit to Mussolini, the latter gave him nothing less than "a specific word of honor" that he had "no territorial designs on Spain, Spanish Morocco, or the Balearic Islands, and, in fact, wouldn't take an inch of Spanish soil anywhere, not even if Generalissimo Francisco Franco forced it upon him in payment for all the Italian men, money, and machines that have been donated to the cause of civil war in Spain." It is likely that in return Chamberlain gave Mussolini his "specific word of honor" that if Mussolini challenged France on the Spanish issue, Chamberlain would force the French government to "appease" Mussolini "in the spirit of Munich."

To be sure, Chamberlain knows that Mussolini's promises are worth no more than those of a British Prime Minister. He knows that even if the insurgent Spanish generals do not actually cede territory to Mussolini, they may permit him to use Spanish ports as naval bases. But the British Admiralty does not seem perturbed by such a prospect. The fact is, it relies on its ability to control Mussolini by force rather than on his good faith. Mussolini, perhaps as a result of some "gentlemen's agreement," has occupied only three of the four Balearic Islands. The fourth island, Minorca, with its splendid harbor of Port Mahon, has been under the watchful eye if not the indirect control of the British and French ever since the spring of 1938. And their major concern, now that the end of the war seems imminent, is to have the island surrendered to Franco under British rather than Italian auspices. Bizerta in French Tunisia, Gibraltar at the entrance of the Mediterranean, Port Mahon in Minorca, and Toulon in southern France are sufficient bases in the western Mediterranean for the needs of English and French fleets.

Moreover, the British Conservative leaders foresee that the civil war will leave the Spanish people ruined for at least one generation. After their victory the insurgent generals will need loans from abroad in order to cope with their financial difficulties. The English will be able to offer them more of this kind of aid than Mussolini. Ingratitude is the independence of the heart, and diplomats and generals possess this noble virtue to a high degree. The Spanish generals, in British anticipations, will not be an exception to the rule. Thus Mussolini does the dirty work of intervening in Spain, the Italian taxpayer foots the bill, and the British Foreign Office will reap the profits, since—fascism or no fascism—Spain will always remain under British influence.

Here one might remark that a fascist government in Spain, allied with Mussolini, will threaten the French frontier along the Pyrenees. Why, then, does the British Foreign Office not realize that the victory of the insurgent generals in Spain will weaken the military situation of France—Britain's ally—in Europe? The answer is that the leaders of the British Conservative Party think that as long as Spain remains under British control France will have nothing to fear from that quarter, provided, of course, that France sticks to Britain. Italian soldiers, before attacking France along the Pyrenees, would first have to reach Spain by sea. The French fleet, allied with the English fleet, could easily prevent them from getting there.

.."HE TOOK WATER AND WASHED HIS HANDS"..

Joseph Driscoll, London correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, who last spring was able to foretell all the details of the Munich pact because he had been informed by Mr. Chamberlain himself about the events which were in store, has recently stated that "all indications" are that Chamberlain, Hitler, Mussolini, and Daladier will "make a deal over Spain as they did over Czechoslovakia last September." Such a deal "would involve a check on Spanish independence and perhaps a division of the country into 'spheres of interest' among the four big powers. Britain is particularly anxious to protect the present 'sphere of Gibraltar,' guarding the western gate of the Mediterranean." Mr. Driscoll did not give any other details on the "spheres of influence," but it is not difficult to guess that the French would get Catalonia, the English Andalusia and Spanish Morocco, and Hitler and Mussolini the rest of the country. In the end the French, menaced by Hitler on the east and by Mussolini in the Alps and in Spain, will have to accept the terms offered by the British. During the Czechoslovakian crisis last summer the presence of 80,000 Italian soldiers in Spain contributed no little to convincing the French that the only thing for them to do was to leave Czechoslovakia in the lurch.

In the operation of an alliance a twofold conflict takes place: one outside the alliance, between the allied powers and their common foes; the other within the alliance, between the allied powers themselves, in that each tries to prevent its ally from becoming so strong that it will no longer need an ally. A good diplomat always expects his best friend of today to become his worst enemy of tomorrow, and conducts himself accordingly. If the French have something to fear in Spain and need British help to allay that fear, all the better: French loyalty to the British alliance will be all the more unwavering.

Arms-Makers' Holiday

BY FRANK C. HANIGHEN

EUROPEAN nations—both democracies and dictatorships—are busy not only arming themselves but helping each other to rearm. The pace of this fantastic combination of cooperation and rivalry has now become so intense that it affects all parts of national economies as well as all social and political values. Today European rearmament enters a totalitarian stage which threatens the existence of democracy itself.

The sale of French iron ore to Germany offers a striking example of a democracy helping a dictatorship to rearm. For some time preceding the installation of the Front Populaire government in 1936, the left had demanded an embargo on shipment of French iron ore to Germany. This ore was obviously being used for Germany's rearmament. When Blum took office, he succeeded in having a law passed which apparently clamped an embargo on these shipments but which in reality contained a loophole in an "exceptions" clause. By invoking this clause the government permitted the ore to flow across the Rhine as before. Why the Blum government followed this curious course has never officially been made clear. But it is presumed that the government hoped to wring from Germany peace concessions —return to the League perhaps, or disarmament—by threatening to close the loophole. Be that as it may, the export of iron ore in large quantities to Germany continued until March, 1938. In this month—the month of the Anschluss—shipments fell to about 10 per cent of their former monthly average.

Had France finally wielded the club? Not at all. It was the German government which cut down the shipments. Apparently Berlin was seeking to force Paris's hand at a time when the French Cabinet was extremely shaky and the French economic and social struggle had reached a crisis. The German strategy succeeded. The owners of the affected mines, fearing loss of business, and the trade unions, fearing unemployment, asked the government to obtain resumption of the deliveries, which it did. Germany obtained an agreement by which the French government, in effect, renounced the threat of an embargo by guaranteeing shipments of 600,000 tons of iron ore a month to Germany.

Official figures show that France also shipped Germany 81,000 tons of bauxite, the ore of aluminum, in the first eleven months of 1937. Now the airplane industry uses large quantities of aluminum. It is estimated that the bauxite ore shipped annually from France to Germany produces about 10,000 tons of duralumin. If two tons of duralumin go into a plane, France, while feverishly buying aircraft in the United States, is annually furnishing Germany with necessary material for about 5,000 planes.

Nor is that all. Writers on aircraft problems in France attribute the low production of the French airplane industry in part to lack of raw materials. Duralumin is one of the most important of these materials. In a confidential report which this writer was permitted to read, a foreign expert who had investigated the condition of the French airplane industry stated that lack of raw materials and the export of certain motors and aircraft accessories had caused delays in the production of French bombers. If France had deliberately tried to make the German air force stronger than its own, it could hardly have done better.

Most of the companies which are mining iron ore in northern Spain are in the hands of English interests—among them Guest, Keen, and Nettlefolds, with which firm Premier Chamberlain has had connections. After the German-Italian-rebel capture of Bilbao it was expected that Germany and Italy would squeeze Britain out of these preserves, but Britain imported even more of the Bilbao ore after Franco's victory than before. Had Britain won? Yes—and so had Germany. For Germany also began to import Bilbao ore in increasing quantities. By the middle of 1938 it was indicated that about a million tons of Bilbao ore would go to Germany during the year. This situation apparently confirms reports that a little "Munich in minerals" had been concluded by Chamberlain and Hitler.

The machine-tool business is as vital to rearmament as ores. Large-scale production of new and complicated weapons demands engineering equipment. One should not be surprised, then, to learn that Britain has had to go abroad for many of its machine tools. The Parliamentary Select Committee on Estimate has refused to publish figures on the foreign sources of these tools on the ground that such action would not be "wise." But it is known that the United States shipped Britain more than $11,000,000 worth of machine tools in 1937 and that heavy purchases were made in Germany. A foreign military attaché in London told me that one manufacturer in Britain had outfitted his munitions plant entirely with German machine tools, and had in fact employed a Berlin engineering firm to design and build his plant. Hugh Dalton, Labor M.P., stated in the House of Commons that "some of the plant for making gun barrels has had to be bought from Germany."

French armament officials say that there was more to the Franco-German ore deal in March, 1938, described above, than appeared on the surface. When the German and French negotiators sat down to settle the matter of shipments of Lorraine ore, the Germans held a high card. The semi-nationalized French airplane industry had failed to produce planes at a normal schedule because, among other reasons, machine tools necessary for large-scale production were lacking. The French machine-tool industry is weak; Germany's is the strongest in Europe. The French negotiators asked that Germany ship them large quantities of machine tools to equip their factories. The Germans, it seems, yielded on the point. For the aviation editor of l'Intransigent stated on October 19 that part of the 300 million francs spent on equipment for airplane factories went for machine tools ordered from Germany and other countries.

Have German manufacturers, then, defied the strict control of the German totalitarian system to arm a potential enemy? Not at all. The German system regiments arms-makers as well as other industrialists. Capitalists' profits are canalized back into armaments; raw materials are rationed to industry; and arms orders have priority over others. The fact is that Germany arms the enemy only when it has to. Germany found it necessary to export machine tools to France to obtain foreign exchange. The government decides just when the German arms-makers shall be permitted to help an adversary.

The German government, in fact, is capable of making some rather nice adjustments in these transactions. I discovered in the Loyalist trenches of the Lerida front last spring a modern automatic rifle which the soldiers declared had been purchased from Germany. Loyalist authorities admitted that a large number of these guns had been purchased "clandestinely" abroad. At first they refused to deny or confirm reports that the arms had been brought directly from Germany, but Negrin himself admitted to the Cortes at Figueras on February 1 that he had bought arms from both Germany and Italy. Germany betrayed Franco for two reasons: (1) hampered by a lack of foreign exchange it was in no position to disdain the "red" gold of Barcelona; (2) it could by this maneuver bind Italy closer to the axis. If the Loyalists by putting up a stiff defense kept Italy involved in Spain, Rome would remain dependent on German help. It is noteworthy that only defensive weapons were sold. German arms makers could doubtless have made more money selling the Loyalists heavy artillery and airplanes, but this might have transferred the power of the offensive to Barcelona.

Britain and France still remain far from attaining such finely sensitized control over the armament industry. French business men make huge profits selling to Germany and send these profits out of the country for safekeeping, to the detriment of both rearmament and finances. Britain permitted the Brooke Tool Company to make 168 per cent on its capital last year and the Handley-Page Aircraft Company to pay a dividend worth about 365 per cent of shares held in 1935. Meanwhile an aircraft ring hinders the efficient production of up-to-date planes, and we find General Temperley lamenting in the London Daily Telegraph that failure to give priority to war orders has seriously handicapped British rearmament.

Can the democracies afford this muddle of profiteering and inefficiency? Apparently they are beginning to realize that real rearmament requires sacrifices, for the tide is already changing. But in Britain and France, as in Germany in 1933, the workers are to be given the first chance to make the sacrifices. British unions must allow factory owners to "dilute" their personnel with low-paid semi-skilled workers; France, according to Daladier, must be "industrious" to be "strong."

Workers in the democracies not only accept the arms business but identify it with their own material welfare. French unions in 1937 petitioned the Minister of the Navy to speed up work on the battleship Jean Bart to avoid laying off men. In England local labor organizations have frequently demanded that the government build munitions plants in their districts. Workers have come to regard armament activity as a personal benefit.

Their attitude may serve as a first wedge for fascism. For the workers, feeling as they do, are in a weak position to object when the appeal of national good is used to curtail individual good. In the fall of 1938 the French press started a vigorous drive against the forty-hour week as a deterrent to efficient rearmament. The government responded by making the forty-five-hour week compulsory in munitions factories. Labor leaders admitted to me at that time that they simply had to yield in the face of popular outcry. One month later not only munitions workers but all organized labor had to submit—with only a brief struggle—to the general abandonment of the forty-hour week. Their defeat in the general strike meant that social values won by years of hard fighting must go down before the irresistible tide of arming.

The second wedge—regimentation of industry and capital—has not yet appeared. The democratic governments apparently fear the Federation of British Industries and the Comité des Forges more than they do Transport House and the Fédération Générale de Travail. But if Britain and France take these final steps, the cycle of totalitarian preparations for war will be completed in Europe. Then "democracy" and "Western civilization" in the Old World will be sucked entirely into the whirlpool of rearmament.

The Fight for Social Security

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

VERY few persons seem to realize how far-reaching are the amendments to the Social Security Act proposed by the Social Security Board and by the Advisory Council on Social Security. If they are adopted by Congress this country will have, for the first time, a system of social insurance comparable to the better European systems.

Only one of the many recommendations of the Advisory Council, which was appointed by the board and a Congressional committee to study the problem, has received much publicity. This is the suggestion that the coverage of the old-age insurance scheme be broadened by at least six million persons by the inclusion of seamen and employees of non-profit, religious, charitable, and educational institutions, banks, and small enterprises. The council recommended further that domestic workers and farm laborers be brought in as soon as feasible. Such an extension of coverage is highly desirable. There was never any sound reason for the exclusion of these groups. But the extension of coverage is by no means the most important of the recommended changes.

The main difficulty with the old-age insurance scheme from the beginning has been that only the young obtain any real protection from it. No one who was sixty years of age or older when the act was passed in 1935 is eligible for benefits as the act now stands. Few in their fifties are scheduled to receive enough to keep the wolf from the door. A typical factory worker earning $25 a week who was fifty years of age when the act came into effect could—providing he worked every day until he was sixty-five—look forward to a munificent retirement allowance of $28.75 a month. Those who were older, whose wages were lower, or who worked irregularly—in other words, the most insecure—would get less.

Now in most cities an aged couple can barely subsist on $30 a month and certainly cannot live in decency on less than that. Recognizing this the Advisory Council suggested that a supplementary allowance of 50 per cent be paid when men have wives over sixty-five years of age to support. This represents an important advance. If adopted, it would constitute the first clear recognition of the principle of family responsibility in the American social-security system. But it obviously does not solve the problem. Most of the wives of elderly men are younger than their husbands, usually several years younger. Except in rare instances they have depended on their husbands for support for so many years that they are incapable of earning their own living. The economic status of most households is gauged, not by the age of the wife, but by the age of the husband. The plain fact of the matter is that the wives' allowance was recommended because the benefits originally scheduled were too small to support an aged couple. This is just as true when the wife is fifty-five or sixty as when she is sixty-five.

The Social Security Board has gone the Advisory Council one better. It has suggested that in order to bring the old-age benefits to a more respectable level, the worker's average wage be substituted for accumulated wages as the basis for the benefit. This would meet the problem squarely by removing the discrimination against those who are too old to have piled up any appreciable contribution since the act went into effect in 1937. Unfortunately, the board has not pushed the idea beyond the suggestion stage, and it is doubtful whether it will win much support in Congress. The President did not even mention it in his message to Congress.

Even more striking, when one considers the strength of the insurance lobby in Washington, is the Advisory Council's recommendation for protection of widows and orphans. Unlike the European social-insurance systems, the Social Security Act provided no survivors' insurance. Such aid must be obtained at present through the states, after establishing need. The maximum for a dependent child is $18 a month, while a widow shouldered with the responsibility of raising a fatherless family is not entitled to a cent. The Advisory Council recommends what is, in effect, a life-insurance policy connected with the old-age insurance scheme. Should the family breadwinner die leaving minor children, each of his children and his widow would be entitled to regular monthly benefits. No amount has been fixed for these benefits, but it is suggested that they bear some relation to the average wage of the head of the family rather than to his aggregate wages. Thus there would be no discrimination against the children of a young worker merely because he died before piling up contributions. The council also recommended that widows of insured workers receive a pension at the age of sixty-five regardless of whether their husbands died before or after reaching the age of retirement.

It is only when one contrasts the relative benefits and costs of this proposal with the benefits and costs of industrial life insurance, which is the only protection now available for most wage-earners, that its full significance is apparent. Industrial life insurance costs the workers of the country well over a billion dollars a year. The average policy of $200 or $250 just about defrays burial costs, leaving no protection for the widow and children. And the average worker loses even this protection by allowing his policy to lapse. Only about eight industrial policies out of a hundred, over a period of years, have been closed on account of death, maturity, or expiration. The survivors' insurance proposed by the Advisory Council will not cost the worker a cent more than he is already scheduled to pay for old-age protection. There will be a small lump sum to cover burial, and a regular monthly allowance to be paid until the children are sixteen or eighteen years of age. There will be no lapsing and no loss in unneeded protection while the essentials go uncared for.

Should this plan be enacted, industrial insurance will be dealt a blow from which it may never recover. Whether the insurance companies will allow it to go through remains to be seen. Open opposition would be difficult, as industrial insurance is scarcely in a position to stand much publicity. The real danger is that the companies will appear to support the proposal in public, but see to it that it is quietly killed in committee. Only widespread publicity, stressing the importance of this new protection for the rank and file of American citizens, can protect the plan against such an attack.

The Advisory Council has been somewhat less helpful on the question of protection against disability. Although it agreed unanimously that workers who are disabled by sickness or other causes before they reach sixty-five are probably more in need of help than the average aged person, members disagreed among themselves as to whether it was possible to aid such persons out of the old-age insurance fund. At present the disabled are the forgotten men in our security system. If a man is unemployed, he is eligible either for insurance or work relief; if he is the victim of an industrial accident, he may obtain workmen's compensation; if he is disabled by reason of age, he may receive either old-age insurance or old-age assistance. But if he is wholly incapacitated by sickness or a non-industrial accident, no provision is made for him.

It is generally agreed that protection against disability and old age should be closely linked. Both involve a cessation rather than a mere interruption of earning power. A man of forty-five who is totally disabled faces almost exactly the same problems as an elderly worker who is no longer able to get a job. Indeed, old age might merely be called the most frequent cause of disability. Yet total disability comes before the age of sixty-five much more frequently than most people realize. Experience in other countries has shown that from a quarter to a half of the causes of total disability occur before the age of sixty-five. Yet unless there is strong popular pressure, it is doubtful whether this session of Congress will do anything to fill in this very serious gap in our social-security system.

Another serious shortcoming in the Advisory Council's program is its failure to come to grips specifically with the reserve problem. While it did place itself on record as opposing a fully invested reserve such as is required in private insurance, no steps have been advocated for putting the system on a frank pay-as-you-go basis. Increased benefits such as have been described will probably reduce the reserves far below the amount originally envisioned. The dangers described by John T. Flynn in the February Harpers may never materialize. But the reserves remain. They may still run into the tens of billions of dollars. Extension of the coverage of old-age insurance to some millions of white-collar workers, farm laborers, and domestic help will yield new income that will offset, in part, at least, the additional benefits. Thus the Social Security Act will continue to take substantially more from the wage-earning and low-income groups of the country in taxation than it returns in benefits. As long as this is the case, its long-run economic value will be dubious.

On the other hand, the Social Security Board's recommendations with regard to the federal-state assistance programs are distinctly helpful. The long-standing discrimination against dependent children is to be eliminated by putting them on the same basis as the aged and blind. Thus, instead of a maximum $18 benefit for the first child and $12 for succeeding children, toward which the federal government contributes only $6 and $4 respectively, the maximum is to be $30, toward which the federal government will contribute $15. It is suggested also that for children in school the pension be continued until the age of eighteen. In addition, it is proposed that the federal grants for all the assistance programs be placed on a variable percentage basis, with maximum and minimum limitations, so as to take into account the varying economic capacities of the different states. This admirable recommendation, if accepted, will eliminate one of the most serious limitations in the federal assistance program, and should make for much more uniformity in the pensions paid in the various states.

Taken as a whole, the recommendations of the Advisory Council and the Social Security Board represent fully as important a stride toward genuine social security as the original report of the Committee on Economic Security which preceded the passage of the Social Security Act. The chief weaknesses remaining are in the field of unemployment insurance. Here the board made only trifling suggestions, leaving the main problems almost exactly where they were. The experience of the past year with unemployment insurance has been little short of disgraceful. In the first place, our system is loaded in favor of the better-paid worker. In addition, it has all but broken down in many states because of poor administration and undue complexity.

If the establishment of a national system to replace the present cumbersome federal-state plan, a step which many experts still favor, is not yet feasible, much can be done to simplify the present system. There appears to be no valid reason, for example, why the federal government should not collect the entire 3 per cent tax and then support the state insurance funds by direct grants to the states, as is now done with old-age and children's pensions. By the introduction of wage classes the necessity for computing the annual wage of every worker could be eliminated. Moreover, it is obvious that something will have to be done quickly if the merit-rating system—a plan to vary the tax on industries in accordance with their employment record—is to be headed off. This plan will come into effect, in most states, in 1940 or 1941. While most experts doubt whether any state will be able to cope with the complexity of record-keeping that is required by the merit-rating system, there is no assurance that states will not drift into it by default and thus wreck their entire unemployment-insurance systems. An amendment to the federal act outlawing merit-rating would prevent such a situation from arising. This action ought to be taken at the present session of Congress if we are to avoid the risk of shattering the whole unemployment-compensation plan, with its very real protection for American workers.

Pocket Guide

BLUE-PENCILING THE ADS

THE advertising business is worried about the Federal Trade Commission, badly worried. Last session Congress passed the Lea bill, which gave the FTC the power to censor advertising. This had the enthusiastic backing of the ad-men. Why? Because they had been afraid that censorship would be placed in the hands of the Food and Drug Administration. They thought they could get along better with the Federal Trade Commission. So now the FDA censors the labels while the FTC censors the ads. Both jobs require the same preliminary investigation, but business men prefer this division of authority, however much they may wail about the waste of government money.

The Federal Trade Commission, however, has been a sad disappointment to business. With the authority given it by the Lea bill it isn't as lenient with the advertisers as it used to be. It is being particularly hard on the cosmetic people. No longer can they claim that this cream or that mask will remove or prevent lines or wrinkles, lift muscles, affect contours, or nourish the skin. Of course no cream can nourish the skin. If you want something to smooth and clean your skin, then lanolin will do as well as any expensive advertised cream and for a lot less money. But bright advertising people can always find loopholes in a law, and copy can come pretty near the line without crossing.

MONEY-MAKING DEPARTMENT

Which department would you say is the most profitable in a big department store? Shoes, or silks, or cosmetics? No. Sometimes the advertising department—the place where all the money is spent—is the one that makes the biggest profit.

Even in the dismal years just passed, when so many stores showed a loss as a whole, the advertising departments here and there made money. The money came from selling nationally advertised brands. The store uses the brand name—such and such suits, such and such shoes—and the manufacturer pays for the advertising. That reduces expenses, but of course doesn't mean a profit. The profit comes in this way. The stores get a special low rate from newspapers because they use an immense amount of space and because they're good bargainers. They don't pass on this low rate to the manufacturer, though they can give him a lower rate than he gets for himself on his own comparatively small contracts. He profits from the store's prestige and this slightly lower rate. The stores, if they do enough advertising of brands, can show a profit on their own advertising.

CONSUMER GROUPS

Here is a letter from Georgia G. Pence of Sterling, Kansas, which frames some questions that I have been asked by a number of other people:

> What is the ultimate purpose of the National Consumers Tax Commission, Inc.? If it is to save the housewife money through eradicating or reducing hidden taxes, why is it necessary for it to become incorporated?
>
> Is there more to it than meets the eye—or ear? . . . Is it a group trying to discredit the present Administration? Is it a group of grocers fighting against grade labels on canned goods? Is it a group trying to lower the high standards of the Pure Food and Drug Act? Or might the munition makers be trying to divert the women while they put through Congress a tasty bill? If this commission is sponsored by business, by what phase of business?

I cannot say what the ultimate purpose of this Consumers Tax Commission is. It doesn't seem to me that the plans it proposes would save the housewife money. I don't know why it is necessary for it to become incorporated to accomplish any such purpose. Certainly it represents a group that is antagonistic to the present national Administration. It seems also to be opposed to grade labeling of canned goods. There has been some talk that it is backed by the chain stores, but the chain stores deny this.

The following is a list of excellent consumer organizations. It would be a good thing to get in touch with them.

Food and Drug Administration, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. Publishes the Consumers Guide, which can be obtained free of charge.

Federal Trade Commission, Washington, D. C. Publishes monthly report which is sent free of charge to anybody who asks for it.

Cooperative League of America, 167 West Twelfth Street, New York. In its work on cooperatives the League has accumulated a great deal of material of interest to consumers.

Consumers Union, 17 Union Square West, New York. Publishes a monthly report which is a buying guide on products.

Intermountain Consumers Service, Denver, Colorado. Like Consumers Union, but for Far West only.

Consumers Research, Washington, New Jersey. On the same order as Consumers Union but reactionary in politics and in its attitude toward labor.

American Home Economics Association, 52 Mills Building, Washington, D. C. Doing excellent work. Publishes Journal of Home Economics.

American Association of University Women, 22 East Thirty-eighth Street, New York. Works for the grading of fresh and canned foods.

National Consumers League, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York. Works only for legislation.

International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, 3 West Sixteenth Street, New York. Is becoming more and more active on consumer fronts.

HELEN WOODWARD

In the Wind

WHEN OREGON'S anti-union law was enacted last November, there was widespread talk about the financial resources used to promote the measure. Commenting triumphantly on the outcome of the fight, the Salem (Oregon) Capitol-Journal observed inadvertently that the bill had been "approved at the November election by a $50,000 majority."

ON HIS recent jaunt to Chicago, Vice-President Garner accentuated the split between himself and supporters of the New Deal. The pro-New Deal American Newspaper Guild is waging a strike there against the Hearst papers, which are violently opposed to the New Deal. Partly to offset unfavorable publicity created by the strike, the Hearst-owned Herald-Examiner, now manned by strike-breakers, put on an elaborate show celebrating the installation of four new presses. The climax of the ceremonies was reached when Garner pressed the button starting the presses.

THE LEFTIST League of American Writers recently held a meeting to discuss the adverse treatment of leftist books by reviewers on capitalist journals. George Seldes and Max Lerner were the speakers. But the invitation to Lerner didn't make clear the point of the meeting. After Seldes had related instances of the mistreatment accorded his book on the press, Lerner caused some embarrassment by declaring that his own experience was just the reverse. He said that the "unfairest" review of his book had appeared in the Daily Worker and added that one of the few publications which had thus far failed to review it was the New Masses.

THERE'S A new game current in Germany designed to encourage "racialism" among children. Called the "Jew dice game," it is played on a board along which miniature figures of Jews are moved along numbered tracks to a point determined by the throw of the dice. The end of the tracks is marked "Palestine." If on the way the figure lands in a square marked "Dachau," it is eliminated. There are penalties for landing on "Passport Difficulties" and "Currency Crimes."

THE WEST COAST'S "Golden Gate" exposition will feature a Cavalcade of the Golden West. After a preview of the performance held recently for exposition officials, one major alteration was ordered. Attacks on the dictator nations contained in the concluding speech are to be removed lest Japan and Germany withdraw from the fair.

WHEN THE House of Representatives voted to slash the relief appropriation, it discreetly avoided a record vote and revealed only the totals on the "tally-vote." The dodge was rendered ineffective, however, when Labor's Non-Partisan League checked with observers and progressive Congressmen, drafted a tentative record, and submitted it to every Congressman for correction. Now a record vote is available—from the league.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THAT the best defense for this democracy against the dictators is putting our house in order has received the clearest kind of proof from the Nazis. In their rage at the hostile attitude of the United States government toward them they have turned to our record in Puerto Rico and made effective use of it. On February 1 Das Schwarze Korps, the organ of the Black Shirts, charged that the United States authorities are using terrorism and "OGPU methods in Puerto Rico." It said:

> The miseries of the Puerto Rican population during the last ten years far exceed what another freedom-loving people, the Arabs, have had to endure under the domination of another great democracy. The methods of terrorism with which the American governor with his police attempts to hold down the national leaders of Puerto Rico's independence movement find their like only in the deeds of the OGPU. . . . Governor Winship, who enjoys Washington's high esteem, attempts to model himself as far as possible on his prototype Stalin. . . . Puerto Rico is only one of the many points where the deeds of American democrats and peace-lovers are separated by an unbridgeable gulf from their preaching. . . . One day the victims will present their bill.

The article then goes on to tell of the mass murder at Ponce on Palm Sunday, 1937, correctly charging that the police "turned machine-guns on crowds with a cold-bloodedness of gangsters," only it was not crowds but the members of a little independence parade. While there are marked exaggerations in the passage quoted at length above, in the main the indictment is a correct one. If Governor Winship is hardly to be compared with Stalin, he is none the less of the autocratic, dictatorial type in his method of government, regarding events from the standpoint of the military man who believes in meeting legitimate protests against almost unbearable conditions with an iron hand. The massacre at Ponce was largely due to the fact that he really believed an insurgent army was converging on Ponce from various points. Had he gone to Ponce in person and encouraged the few demonstrators to exercise their American right of marching in protest, while telling them that they must leave their arms at home, I believe that nothing would have happened.

But waiving the question of Governor Winship's fitness, the fact is that conditions in this unhappy island are getting steadily worse. It is admitted in press dispatches that the standard of living has never been so depressed. The huts of the poverty-stricken, unemployed people in San Juan and other towns disgrace the American flag—I speak from the personal knowledge that any tourist on the island can obtain if he only uses his eyes. I happen to know that officials in Washington concerned with conditions there are now greatly alarmed because Congress will not give them the money they need to keep numbers of people from actually starving to death. Nothing constructive is being done to remedy the fundamental conditions, which exist primarily because the United States government has from the beginning of our occupation permitted violations of the law forbidding any corporation to own more than 500 acres of land. It was a wise law and a humane one and was passed immediately after our capture of the island, but not a single President has enforced it, and the result is just what was feared. Foreign-owned companies have got possession of great stretches of land, and the peasant-owner has become the peasant-tenant or worker and is trying to subsist on wages which would be bad enough if he were employed 300 days in the year, and are horribly inadequate for canefield workers employed for only a short season. On top of this the population has increased by nearly a million. The Nazis would only have told the truth had they said that the people of Puerto Rico are far worse off than they were under the Spanish flag. There are 750,000 people in need of relief, and Congress is giving no relief.

The island is thus another illustration of that weakness of administration which is so characteristic of the New Deal and may yet wholly wreck it. I don't believe that the Administration is satisfied with Governor Winship, and I am bold enough to believe that he would have been removed before this if it had not been for the criminal attack upon him which nearly cost him his life, killed a man by his side, and has already led to the sentencing of five men to prison for life. One cannot remove an American official at such a moment. But now that these sentences have been passed, the first step toward the rescue of Puerto Rico should be the appointment of some more competent person—a Puerto Rican if a suitable one can be found. I know the name of at least one. That alone, however, will not be enough to save the Puerto Ricans and to prevent a really terrible disaster. The President must give his personal attention to this and rouse Congress to an understanding of what is happening—it is at least worth a fireside chat over the radio. Curing the sore there will do infinitely more for our national safety, honor, and prestige than a dozen battleships.

BOOKS and the ARTS

IN TIME OF HESITATION

BY CONSTANCE ROURKE

IN ONE of the many encirclements of ideas contrived within the comparatively short space of his new book,* Lewis Mumford speaks of the intellectual culture of our time as too remote from the masses to serve them satisfactorily. It is the special triumph of the program which he sets forth that it meets and uses deeply rooted popular forces, and that its terms can be promptly understood. "Men Must Act" is as direct as a good broadside. With immediacy and restrained eloquence, indeed with the effect of the spoken word, it belongs in the great pamphleteering tradition. It will sharpen wits and vocabularies, or provide trenchant vocabularies when these are missing. Yet it is not merely a tract for the times. It deals with permanent values. It defines a course of action and the enduring groundwork for that course; and it touches, with unerring clairvoyance, essential popular impulses and beliefs in the present crisis.

Since November 10 a marked transition in broad sections of popular thought has taken place; no one who goes out through the country can mistake it. Not only has fascism at last been openly condemned but the event has had an unexpected outcome. Mass-meetings which were planned as protests against the German pogrom, and which have voiced them, have also moved toward a recognition of the rising dangers of fascism in the United States, and finally, with remarkable unanimity, have included a reaffirmation of faith in democracy. One might almost say that after a long season of befuddlement democracy had been rediscovered. This progression of ideas has been striking; yet many forces still make for confusion, not least those created by the spell of the genteel tradition in politics, the spell of liberalism, with its excess of fine-spun talk, its gift for finding crucial matters "interesting," with what Mumford calls "its priggish fear of committing unfair moral judgments." During the last months and even years liberalism has, with singular self-abnegation, been occupied with the task of laying the blame for fascism at our own door, or President Wilson's, forgetting Brest-Litovsk, disregarding what Germany would have done with victory, forgetting the rising strength of the German Republic in spite of Versailles, and too much occupied by these intellectual exercises, too beautifully perfectionist in spirit, to consider hurricane signals.

Confusion, hesitation, and bewilderment still obtain, in spite of a great clarification in popular judgment. Two apparently irreconcilable impulses have become articulate; the desire to act, expressed with great immediacy and persistence by the boycotts; and the desire to maintain American isolation. Both are genuine; each is at work, not too far beneath the surface. Each is grounded in the national experience and tradition. Our ready impulse to act, with the belief that the face of things may be changed for the better by action, obviously derives from our not too remote experience on frontiers; and it is matched or offset by our long schooling in isolation, which has gained added strength from the disillusionment following the World War.

In a chapter called Civilization's Gordian Knot, Mumford reverses the habitual use of the metaphor, and makes the altered symbol a point of departure for interpreting essential differences between democracy and fascism. Alexander "solved the problem by doing away with the very elements that made it a problem: namely, the nature of the knot and the continuity of the cord itself. . . . Each generation finds itself confronted with a Gordian knot that must be untied. . . . The whole problem of political society consists in achieving order out of a multitude of conflicting interests: in achieving common purposes without annihilating individual energies and aptitudes and designs. . . . But the prime political condition of untying the knot is this: the rope itself shall be unharmed. . . ." Democracy, with its often slow and fumbling methods, seeks to preserve the continuity of the strands and to use their tensile power. Democracy, in other words, safeguards civilization, while fascism, by its barbaric simplicity, destroys civilization, and is in fact barbarism.

It is the virtue and strength of Mumford's program in "Men Must Act" that he applies this principle in the present dilemma. Neither strand of popular conviction is destroyed; both are used, both are kept intact. At the same time he provides a rationale for an inevitable position by unfolding an analysis of "the pathology of fascism" and "the potency of the pathological. . . . The fascist countries are no longer simply political states . . . they are states of mind. A government which exists by terrorism is forever hounded by a baleful shadow, the shadow of peace. . . . Its method, even within its own boundaries, is the method of the provocateur. . . . Its lust for power is insatiable: in that sense the fascist states will always be have-nots." Thus any effort to bring the fascist countries into a workable international scheme is folly; nor can one believe that the fascist forces will leave this country untouched.

---

* "Men Must Act." By Lewis Mumford. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Cloth, $1.50; paper, 75 cents.

In his recent speech Hitler ridiculed the idea of a fascist attack on the United States, thus showily using one of the straw men which have diverted attention from genuine issues. But as Mumford says, the new totalitarian war is "a war of psychic demoralization rather than of direct military attack," and its force in America, if unchecked, will be felt through the anarchical but progressive destruction of the many international relationships which, as free agents, we still enjoy. Though the means is not overt, the objective is none the less obvious. The final enemy against which fascism is remorselessly set is not communism but democracy. The anti-Comintern is shadow-boxing. The persistent attacks on the democracies in public speeches and in the German press have been taken as mere muddy effervescence, but as Mumford makes clear in a remorseless analysis, they are indications of a purposeful instinct. Democracy and fascism are incompatible, they will not mix; and we must realize the cleavage as clearly as do the dictators. Nor should this be particularly difficult with the barter system to the fore, and the program of the Fascist International fully blueprinted, glossed, and annotated.

Mumford's program is one of counter-attack. He would use our continental isolation. He gives to isolation a dynamic function. Non-intercourse is the core of this program, not the simple non-intercourse ineffectually attempted toward the close of Jefferson's Administration, but a fully oriented and implemented act which would have, within our now far more powerful empire, the chance of an overwhelming success. Our accredited representatives would be withdrawn from Germany, Italy, and Japan. The first step in that direction has of course already been taken. Our investments in the fascist countries would be liquidated: here too substantial beginnings have been made—by the fascist countries. A long list of instances could be compiled, whether one begins with the suspension of trade in China or with the refusal of Germany to service the Austrian debt. By the Mumford plan a complete embargo would be placed on trade with the fascist countries; and the entry of fascist vessels to our ports would be prohibited even when they carry cargoes of non-fascist origin. Thus we would make complete the boycotts which have been initiated, and we would withdraw our resources from fascist use, not least those provided by tourist dollars. Thus we would resolve the absurd dilemma recently defined in the columns of The Nation and clarified in detail by Eliot Janeway. We would no longer be arming against the fascist powers with one hand and furnishing them with armaments, to be used in a variety of ways against us, with the other.

At the same time we would expel fascist forces from our midst. Systematic deportation of Germans and Italians who remain fascist subjects would follow, and the privileges of citizenship would be withdrawn from naturalized aliens who maintain a divided allegiance. Presumably these individuals, too, when shorn of citizenship, would be deported.

At every salient point we would take action. Our purpose would be to isolate, not ourselves, but fascism. In this there is nothing of the messianic purpose, about which so much has recently been said on both sides of the Atlantic, as if to create another of the straw men bobbing up on all sides. This would not be an attempt "to police the world," but a hard-headed effort to provide the most effective form of self-defense. What is essential, as Mumford sees it, is that we shall act, and act alone, regardless of eventualities elsewhere. If England and France are on the way to becoming vassal states, wittingly or unwittingly, it would be against our interest to assist them with food or munitions even during an interim of apparent peace. If war actually breaks out, we should free ourselves by a suspension of the Neutrality Act to reinforce the democratic powers by supplying materials.

That the Mumford plan means war, another of the tacit wars which have become the mode of our time, is clear enough; but this is less an obstacle to its acceptance than would have been the case six months ago. The general support of rearmament is partial proof, as is the widespread conviction that if the broad clash comes we shall not be able to remain outside. The crux is not at this point but in the "passivism" which Mumford amply discusses, or in the opportunism which he calls "wishful waiting." Now that the rumor of economic collapse within the fascist states has grown louder we may await the event with a casual optimism—"Napoleon fell, didn't he?"—and without realizing that time, usually supposed to abet the righteous, may now be on the other side.

Mumford's program does more than resolve an ominous confusion; some of his best passages prove that action is essential if our democracy is to be sustained from within. The clew is in his title: "Men Must Act." Passivism means the gradual crumbling of principle. Our failure to act in relation to loyalist Spain and to China, which still lies heavily upon our consciences, may mean the beginning of a creeping paralysis. "Shrinkage and withdrawal" are forces of destruction. Indeed, this whole book may be read as an anatomy of democracy, so persuasively does it reinforce the concept that a democracy must assume fresh positive forms or perish. No doubt the frayed straw man called "war hysteria" will be set up, somewhat larger than life, to confront the Mumford program. But I think this program will sustain itself because it is simple and forthright, because it comes close to popular feeling, and because it is built upon fundamentals in our character and tradition. In the rush of dark events it provides a touchstone and a philosophy.

Tragedy in Minnesota

WIND WITHOUT RAIN. By Herbert Krause. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

ANYONE who has read Vardis Fisher's Idaho tetralogy will be reminded of the first volume of that somber chronicle when he reads "Wind Without Rain." The grim hills of Minnesota have replaced the grim hills of Idaho, but the physical and mental sufferings of Franz Vildvogel follow much the same pattern as those of Vridar Hunter; the people have the same twisted souls; life has the same bitterness. Men reap violence and death in a country where nature yields food and warmth grudgingly and lashes out only too often with lightning, tornado, or blizzard. But chiefly both writers dramatize the tragic discord between men and their own souls: the war between warm, natural desires and the blight of a religion packed with hell-fire and brimstone; the brutality of a tyrannical, hard-handed father, goaded by his own sense of guilt and frustration, embittering the lives of his entire household; the tortures of a sensitive boy in the grip of an environment that crushes even the strong.

The themes of the two books are also strikingly alike. Compare the lines which gave Vardis Fisher the titles for his series—

> In tragic life, God wot,
> No villain need be! Passions spin the plot:
> We are betrayed by what is false within—

with this reflection by the character in "Wind Without Rain" who tells the story: "I can laugh now, almost . . . knowing more about this fire added to flame, the uninvited urgings hawklike at muscle and bone; knowing, too, after these years, that the hounds of wrath within us, leashes off and merciless, are snarling a nearer doom than any Bible trumpet."

But while this quotation may well express Mr. Krause's leitmotif, it serves equally well to illustrate the principal artistic contradiction of his book: namely, the fact that the narrator, Jepthah Vildvogel, would not conceivably have written in such a style. The son of a backwoods German-American family to whom the Bible was all the reading needful or proper, he attended for a few years, quite reluctantly, a very bad one-room rural school where the dictionary was used chiefly as a missile to hurl at unruly pupils; and even the explanation that many years later, after a crippling accident, he was removed to a hospital where there were lots of books, hardly justifies the elaborateness of his very consciously wrought sentences.

Except for this one enigma, the story of the Vildvogel family is harrowingly convincing. From the memory of his own youth on a Minnesota farm Mr. Krause has drawn a thousand details of the never-ending chores, the dreadful feel of approaching storms, the bone-shaking lurch of a wagon over rocky cart tracks, the friendly yet often cruel inquisitiveness of neighbors, the heavy shadow of debt over mortgaged land. Passions indeed spin the plot; no villain is needed but the hounds of wrath within to drive these uncomprehending mortals to sorrow, madness, death. No appeal to the reader's pity is needed but the unadorned history of their blind gropings toward happiness.

LOUIS B. SALOMON

Liberal England

THE AGE OF REFORM, 1815-1870. By E. L. Woodward. Oxford University Press. $6.

GLADSTONE AND THE IRISH NATION. By J. L. Hammond. Longmans, Green and Company. $12.50.

IN PRESENTING the report on the census of Great Britain in 1871, the Census Commissioners quoted the proud words of Milton: "Lords and Commons of England, consider what nation it is whereof ye are and whereof ye are the governors; a nation not slow and dull, but of quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit; acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to." The English middle class in the seventeenth century not only had laid the foundation of England's greatness but had developed the incomparable system of guaranties for civil liberties on which civilized life in the nineteenth century could develop, liberties the whole importance of which we only start again to appreciate today when they are threatened by a new barbarism. The nineteenth century in England was an age of progressive reforms: 1815 found the nation with both central and local administration in a state of complete chaos, with most widespread corruption and family patronage, with incredible poverty, squalor, and degradation of life. A slow and progressive fight against these conditions filled the nineteenth century. It was a struggle of much confusion, but the main tendency was unmistakable. E. L. Woodward describes this age of reform in a broad and solid survey which takes into account all the different aspects of England's internal and external policy and of its social and cultural life. It is a judicious and well-balanced book; it shows not only the high hopes but the grave defects and the serious dangers still prevailing in the industrialized England of 1870, which nevertheless could claim to have laid the foundations of civilized social life.

But a new age was threatening. It was possible, as Woodward points out, to use the new productive resources to resist the social and political changes which, logically, they implied: "The failure of political liberalism in Central Europe left the way open for the unification of Germany in the interest of the class least affected in its habits of thought and scale of values by the 'age of reform.' Such a 'return of the past' was a European calamity on a scale so vast that its meaning could not be realized at the time." In this age of imperialism liberal England made one great effort to assert itself. J. L. Hammond, who has explored the social history of the early nineteenth century in several important volumes, gives us in a great and moving book, in the best liberal English tradition, an account of Gladstone's Irish policy. It unfolds an epic story of the fight of the sense for justice against the imperial sense of national egoism and raisons d'état, of the faith in moral forces against old prejudices and fears, comparable only to the Dreyfus affair in France. "In a world where armed strength was becoming more and more the undisputed master, a great statesman was asking one of the leading peoples to make its undoubted power obey the unarmed voice of justice. Nations have sometimes acted justly from necessity; but in this case a great nation was to act justly

WHICH 1939 CARS ARE "BEST BUYS"?

"Catwalk grilles," "force-back overdrives," "transverse stabilizer links," "two-speed axles," "steering column gearshifts," "dual carburetors," "floating oil intake." . . .

Just what does this jargon mean to you in terms of transportation?

Which of these terms represent essential values that you should look for in buying an automobile?

To guide auto buyers to economical and intelligent choices, Consumers Union's automotive consultants have examined the 1939 automobiles. Their findings are published in the current (February) issue of Consumers Union Reports.

Divided into nine price classifications, ranging from $400 to $2,500, over 70 models of the 1939 cars are rated by name in this report, in the estimated order of their merit. These are some of the cars included:

PONTIAC
FORD
BUICK
OLDSMOBILE
OVERLAND
WILLYS
PLYMOUTH
DODGE
CADILLAC
STUDEBAKER
DE SOTO
MERCURY CHEVROLET
CHRYSLER
PACKARD
HUDSON

These ratings are based on such factors as economy of operation, durability, safety, and mechanical soundness. Appraisals of the new features such as "force-back overdrives" are given in terms of their worth to car owners and tables are printed showing comparative gas mileage obtained from recent test runs and other comparative statistics of prime importance in choosing a car.

Read this report before you buy any 1939 car! It will help you to make substantial savings not only on the initial purchase price but on operating costs as well.

Other reports in this issue give valuable buying information on canned tomatoes, tomato juice, window shades and industries insurance (the insurance that doesn't insure!).

By mailing the coupon below, you can get this issue—followed by eleven more monthly issues. In April—at no extra cost—you will also get Consumers Union's 1939 Annual Buying Guide—a 288-page handbook rating over 2,000 brands of products as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable."

To CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.
17 Union Square W., New York, N. Y.

Send me Consumers Union Reports for one year and the 1939 Buying Guide when it appears. I enclose $3. I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

NAME..

ADDRESS..

....

2N9

from choice." In Gladstone's Irish policy the forces of liberalism and of conservative nationalism opposed each other, as they did in the Dreyfus affair. Gladstone and the Dreyfusards had to fight against an immense mass of hatred, fear, inertia, and prejudice; they had to face accusations and execrations of unprecedented bitterness. The spiritual adventure of Gladstone's crusade for the reconciling power of freedom, in which he succeeded in enlisting half of the English people, although not the vested interests of monarchy, aristocracy, and church, is told by Mr. Hammond in great detail and with a wealth of documents. Although the price of the book is prohibitive—for a larger public it may be desirable to publish a shortened and cheaper edition—the book should be widely read today. For in Gladstone's treatment of the Irish question lived a tradition of European liberalism coupled with moral courage and farsightedness which is sadly lacking among the British statesmen who at present lead the party which blocked all the efforts of Gladstone. HANS KOHN

Biography of Berlioz

BERLIOZ. By J. H. Elliot. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

THE Master Musicians Series has filled an obvious gap by adding a "Berlioz" to its list. Unfortunately the editor, Eric Blom—who is also the distinguished music critic of the Manchester Guardian—has assigned the task to his second-in-command on that paper, and in the absence of any special fitness the result is just another bad book on Berlioz.

It is easy enough, once an artist or thinker has been ransomed from neglect or abuse, to expatiate on his merits and his faults with critical poise. Hundreds of biographers are now competent to deal with Bach or Blake or Spinoza. But it took special gifts to lift these men from the company of mediocrity, for a misunderstood figure never looks misunderstood: he looks negligible or downright worthless.

Toward Berlioz the critical outlook has been changing for the last thirty years, largely owing to the writings of four Englishmen—Ernest Newman, W. J. Turner, Cecil Gray, and Tom S. Wotton. The present biographer of Berlioz, although he wrote before Wotton's and Turner's books appeared, faithfully reflects the changed attitude in his praise of many of Berlioz's works and of his "unique and many-sided genius." But it is not the allotment of praise and blame that makes a good or a bad book. It is the grasp of the whole personality of the artist, of the body of his work, of the times in which he lived, as a whole. Mr. Elliot confesses again and again that he is baffled; and by a not unnatural trick of self-deception he ascribes to his subject the contradictions and chaos which as a critic he has not been able to resolve.

The candor of this confession, together with the fact that the important writings previously mentioned were not known to him when he wrote, constitutes in fact the only excuse for the performance. Although it has been touted by a fellow-contributor to the series as the "long-awaited book on Berlioz," it is to be hoped that its inorganic construction, its lack of consistent standards, its frequent errors of fact and of typography will act as an antidote in the eyes of alert general readers. For the connoisseurs and scholars it will be enough to find recorded in the preface the author's "thanks to the editors of the Breitkopf and Härtel edition of Berlioz," which is equivalent to thanking Dr. Bowdler for his Family Shakespeare. JACQUES BARZUN

Adventure in Awareness

PILGRIMAGE. By Dorothy Richardson. Volume I: Pointed Roofs, Backwater, Honeycomb; Volume II: The Tunnel, Interim; Volume III: Deadlock, Revolving Lights, The Trap; Volume IV: Oberland, Dawn's Left Hand, Clear Horizon, Dimple Hill. Alfred A. Knopf. $10.

IT WOULD appear, if the Times reviewer is an index to literary opinion, that Miss Richardson's extraordinary novel is fated to remain the caviar of a small and scattered group of devout Richardsonians and a mere mess of salty, sticky fish eggs to the general. And yet I am as convinced as I have ever been during the twenty years in which I have repeatedly pleaded for it that this author has only begun to find her proper audience. The fact that the novel has actually been brought out in four stout volumes more than two decades after the appearance of the first "chapter," as Miss Richardson calls each book, would point to a like conviction in other quarters. Publishers do not print books for the fun of the thing. The fun of the thing—if an adventure in awareness may be so described—is for the reader. I can only hope he will at last find it.

The first volume in the series was published in England in 1915. It had been completed two years earlier, and was thus contemporary with the appearance of the first part of Proust's life work and with Joyce's "Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man." In her foreword the author mentions these experiments, and also glances briefly at such fellow-pilgrims toward realism as Balzac, Bennett, Henry James, and, without naming her, Virginia Woolf. She might, too, have mentioned May Sinclair, whose "Mary Olivier," published in 1919, is a condensed and somewhat vulgarized version of what Miss Richardson has done with exquisite subtlety on a major scale.

The special quality which distinguishes Miss Richardson from these writers is her emphasis upon the feminine consciousness. As a result she has been called, mistakenly, a feminist, or slighted, again mistakenly, as dealing in gossipy trivialities. What she has actually produced is the history of a woman's mind, in the fullest sense of that word, a history so intimate and penetrating that, were it not for the testimony of a few men—Frank Swinnerton, be it noted, along with Ford Madox Ford—one might suspect that only a woman could appreciate her performance.

It has been objected that the woman she chose to present is a person of small importance. She is a middle-class English girl who begins life, toward the close of the last century, in the serene setting of a comfortable suburban family, is early thrown upon her own resources, holds several jobs as a governess abroad and at home, settles down as a dental secretary in London, where she lives in a shabby boarding-house encountering other unimportant people and a scattering of not much more interesting intellectuals, has a holiday in Switzerland, and is last seen on her way to a retreat above Geneva, where she will presumably neither engage in any

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

MARXISM DISINTEGRATING

(Communism, Socialism)

Radical errors in the foundation of a building go clear up to the roof and make the structure untenable. Such errors have existed in Marxism from the time of the Communist Manifesto (1848). The movement, however, has influenced historians in giving a more just appraisal to economic factors of social evolution, and has been of assistance to city workers (but not the farming class) in their claim on life.

Marxism confuses economic fundamentals by attempting to put in the same category things of such unlike nature as a piece of industrial machinery (capital) and the square foot area whereon the machine rests. Thus, machinery and the ground which it occupies are called by Marx "instrumentalities of production" (Communist Manifesto, passim).

Marxism wrongly pictures modern government as resulting from the so-called "victory" of the bourgeoisie (capitalistic, business class), over the medieval ground landlord class; when, in fact, the modern democratic state is a political structure emerging from a long-drawn-out compromise whereby land was wholly or partly exempted from taxation, while the business and laboring classes, acquiring the right to vote, were saddled with increasing fiscal burdens.

As a result, the modern industrial system was put "on the spot" between the pressure of taxation and ground rent, which must be liquidated, year by year, prior to the payment of wages, thus reducing the buying power of the masses to absorb the products of industry and agriculture.

Marxism wrongly imagines a clear-cut, open-and-shut opposition between capital and labor; stressing class-war through which the proletariat evict, or expropriate, the bourgeoisie and establish the Workers' State by means of the "forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions" (Communist Manifesto). In picturing the evolution of the modern state, Marxism is wholly blind to the intervening manipulation of the Fiscal Power by the ground landlord interest, whereby land values are undertaxed and productive industry is overtaxed.

Marx therefore fails to comprehend modern democracy as an unstable political equilibrium in a process which blindly tends toward the liberation of productive industry and labor from ground monopoly by reversal of the tax-compromise between ground landlords and bourgeoisie.

After publishing "Capital" (1867) Marx continued to investigate economic history; and meanwhile, in a different economic sector, Henry George issued Progress and Poverty (1879), which has unfortunately given the general impression that its main theme is land as an exclusive subject of taxation. George, equally with Marx, had no conception of the democratic state as an unstable compromise between ground monopoly and the bourgeoisie. Hence the author of Progress and Poverty did not grasp the historic significance of his work as an item in the struggle to reverse that compromise, setting both capital and labor free from the grip of special privilege in land. He regarded democracy as a recovery instead of an achievement.

Marx accumulated material showing that prior to the machine age, the laboring masses of the people were flung off the soil of Europe by "enclosures," or plain stealing of common lands by the aristocracy; and that in overseas colonies founded by European nations, the mere ownership of machinery (or capital) conferred no power over labor unless the land and natural resources were monopolized and fenced away from the workers.

Marx by this time began to say, "For my part, I am no Marxist." His accumulated material was issued after his death as Volumes II and III of "Capital," approaching independently the standpoint of Progress and Poverty, whose author was maintaining a constant propaganda for taxation of land because its value was created by the growth of the community, and for exemption of capital equipment as "belonging sacredly to the individual." He thus exposed himself unnecessarily to Marxist critics, who pointed out that the individual owners of industrial machinery do not, from their own exertion, create the productive equipment which is legally theirs.

Henry George unconsciously avoided the problem of the concrete, historical origin of capital; and he would have been on impregnable ground if, instead of urging exemption of capital because it belongs to "the individual," he had claimed exemption for it as "the product of labor."

Marxism calls for "nationalization of land"; but Marxists inconsistently endorse taxation of ground rent and of unused land as a step in what they consider to be the onward march of their own doctrine; failing to realize that the correlative exemption of capital goods would necessarily deflect money end credit from speculative channels (especially speculation in land); while increasing the attractiveness of investment in productive machinery, merchandise and housing; the inevitable effect being to create a new demand for labor.

Disintegration of Marxism as a distinct movement is further shown by the recent Handbook of Marxism (Random House, N. Y.), which aims to be "most authoritative," and which takes material issued after the death of Marx relating to "expropriation of the agricultural population from the land," naively placing it before the summary of "Capital," Vol. I, wherein the stress is upon machinery as the basis of "wage-slavery."

(Solely responsible for the above statement: Louis Wallis, Kew Gardens, Long Island, New York. Free copies of this statement on request.)

prodigious activity nor become the heroine of any profound private drama. It is a pre-war world, and though she meets such odd people as socialists, suffragettes, and even a Russian Jew (the one implausible character), her experiences belong to that remote and placid past. Where, then, is the interest? Where the significance? What, under the sun or moon, are these nineteen hundred-odd pages about?

The interest is in the incomparable intensity and richness with which the quality of given moments is presented. The significance is that of life itself, in the mere living. "Mere existence isn't life," one of her lovers says to Miriam Henderson, making the same objection that certain critics make of her creator's material. "Why mere?" she responds. "Most people have too much life and too little realization. Realization takes time and solitude. They have neither." And it is precisely realization that these volumes are about, that, in fact, they are. One of their values is that they leave the reader with a heightened awareness of the most unconsidered elements in his own daily experience. They perform the supreme service of literature, that of increasing consciousness, even when they seem to deal with trivia. They have the virtue Emily Dickinson ascribed to letters when she said: "A letter always feels to me like immortality because it is the mind alone without corporeal friend." That is, perhaps, the nature of all literature, even where, as here, it gives so fully the sense of the corporeal, substantial, commonplace universe. There is not much time. There is almost no solitude. But they are worth the effort of achieving, in order to share this adventure.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

The autobiography of a compassionate man—the biography of a desperate generation

Pierre van Paassen's career as a journalist has taken him to the birthplaces of current history—to Paris, Berlin, Ethiopia, Spain and Palestine. He went to see and write; he stayed to raise his voice—and sometimes his fist—in protest. He knows the secret hopes of a generation which has learned to listen hopefully to false prophets and look fearfully at the skies. He has heard, he has seen, he has understood. Now he tells. . . .

DAYS OF OUR YEARS

by Pierre van Paassen

"No reviews can do this rich, well-written book full justice. I recommend it highly."
—Eugene Lyons.

FEBRUARY BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH
Hillman-Curl, Inc. $3.50

DRAMA

Woe to Israel!

FOR the third production of its subscription season the Theater Guild has chosen to offer an extremely elaborate production of Stefan Zweig's more or less Biblical tragedy "Jeremiah." To the general public, I am afraid, the name of that wrathful personage suggests little more than prophecies of woe as vague as they are terrible, but for the purposes of this drama Jeremiah has been completely rationalized and here appears as a philosophical pacifist whom none will honor until it is too late. The woe which he prophesies for Jerusalem is a woe which the Israelites bring upon themselves when they form an offensive alliance with the Egyptians, but it is also a woe which they might still have escaped had not the pride of their king, like the pride of modern rulers, preferred destruction to a loss of "national honor." Jeremiah is for peace before the war begins and for submission before it is over, but both the populace and its leaders are always one step behind him—ready for peace when it is too late for anything but submission and ready for submission only when even that can no longer save them.

According to a program note "Jeremiah" was written in Austria during the war and consciously intended as a purge for emotions which the author himself was finding intolerable. It expresses not only his convictions but, even more importantly I think, the sense which he had of being right yet powerless, a prophet who knew that he could not hope to be listened to until it was too late. Certainly the dramatic effectiveness of the play depends largely upon the situation in which the character finds himself rather than upon the actual events which take place; and the tragedy is less the tragedy of a defeated people than the tragedy of a man cursed with a knowledge and a wisdom which he knows must bring destruction upon himself while remaining useless to those before whom he cannot keep silent.

It must be obvious from even so brief an account as this that "Jeremiah" is hardly a gay piece, but it is somewhat more lively as well as a good deal more impressive than one might anticipate. However violent the "modernization" of the central character may be—and I leave the question to more competent judges—a credible background against which he can act is built up, and the expression often rises to genuine nobility. If the play does, nevertheless, lack the final touch of greatness which would make it thrilling rather than merely impressive, the fact may be in part due to the very immediacy of its relevance both to the conditions under which it was written and to the author's own mental state. There is still something to be said for passion recollected in tranquillity. Passion without tranquillity is likely to result either in unrestrained violence or, as in this case, in a restraint so carefully imposed that one gets at times a sense of artificiality and self-consciousness. Mr. Zweig seems to know almost too well what his play means and why the various utterances are significant.

The production has been beautifully directed by Worthington Miner and staged with a lavishness which seems to imply a greater confidence in its potential popularity than I fear the event will justify. Kent Smith is excellent as the prophet, Arthur Byron perhaps even better as the troubled King Zedekiah who finds it "terrible to serve a God whom no man has ever seen and who is always silent." But I am afraid that a public which would probably find the play too unrelievedly somber for its taste even if it came into the theater will even more probably be kept away by a title still more forbidding than the performance it is used to designate.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"The Gentle People" (Belasco), subtitled A Brooklyn Fable, falls between the two stools of allegory and simple realism. As the matter-of-fact story of two ordinary people who turn upon their gangster-tormentor and murder him without being caught, it is not convincing, for at several points its action becomes symbolic rather than actual, and the ending itself is arbitrary. On the other hand, the realism of most of its scenes fails to sustain any overtone of allegory. The main fault lies in the writing; but the Hollywood acting of Franchot Tone, Sylvia Sidney, and Sam Jaffe only emphasizes the faults of the play.

M. M.

FILMS

"IDIOT'S DELIGHT" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) and "One-Third of a Nation" (Paramount), the two latest Hollywood offerings of importance, have certain common features which seem to indicate that in some quarters the movie industry is entering a new phase. Both pictures aspire to be taken seriously aside from box-office considerations. Both dare to base their stories on important contemporary themes full of dynamite. Both compromise between the urge to tell a piece of truth and the use of the old tricks of make-believe and pseudo-entertainment which have been so successful on a lower level. And both avoid the deeper implications of the chosen theme: they carry messages, but the producers are still afraid to announce them openly. Considered from the point of view of moving-picture art, both wear the marks of dilettantism, yet to the eye tired of the normal run of merchandise they offer, at least in spots, an experience.

Robert E. Sherwood, author of the stage play "Idiot's Delight," in which the personalities of Lynne Fontanne and Alfred Lunt overcame the pervading phoniness of the vehicle, prepared the movie script himself, and there are no essential differences. He prefixed a long sequence showing the first meeting of Irene, the ever-pretending lady (Norma Shearer), and Harry, the small-time vaudeville performer (Clark Gable), on a stage in Omaha. This sequence is in itself a little picture, true, witty, unsentimental, with moments of poetry, especially in the central dinner scene. From this excellent opening, which provides amusing byplay later on, the script jumps to the scene and theme of the original. Irene has became in the meantime the mistress of the war-mongering munitions maker; Harry is touring the back countries of Europe with his blondes. The two meet again in a hotel on a

EUROPE • MEXICO
• SOVIET UNION •

You see how life is really lived—you meet the people—you travel with companions of your own mental age in a small informal group—those things best done together are done cooperatively; otherwise you pursue your own interests—services are generously inclusive.

SCANDINAVIA, SOVIET UNION, BALKANS, TURKEY, GREECE under leadership of Prof. Colston E. Warne. 14,000 miles: London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Kiev, Odessa, Bucharest, Istanbul, Athens, Salonika, Belgrade, Budapest, Paris. Sailing July 6. Back September 5. .... $698

●

SCANDINAVIA, LAPLAND, FINLAND. Leader to be announced. Denmark, Sweden, Norway, North Cape Cruise, Lapland, Finland, London. Optional extension to Soviet Union. Sailing July 1. Back Aug. 22. $576

■

"INSIDE EUROPE" (4th season). Auspices American Student Union. London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Stockholm, Oslo, Amsterdam, Paris. For students only. Sailing July 1. Back Aug. 22. $498

■

THE SOVIET UNION (3d season) under leadership of Robert Magidoff, an American writer resident in the Soviet Union for the past five years. London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Stockholm, Moscow, Ukraine, Caucasus, Black Sea, Crimea. Sailing July 1. Back September 5. $498

●

MEXICO IN PROGRESS (second season) under leadership of Herbert Weinstock. An unusually complete survey. Travel arrangements First Class. Sailing July 6. Back August 15. .... $468

Steamship passage Third Class except for "Mexico in Progress." For information regarding itineraries, social and cultural programs, etc., on these and other trips, address:

THE OPEN ROAD
8 W. 40TH ST.
NEW YORK
Department C

Cooperating in the Soviet Union with Intourist

STATE OF WAR PERMANENT UNLESS—

by LOUIS WALLIS

NEW and startling material about under-surface facts, little known in America, is here given for the first time. The author was on tour lecturing in Great Britain just as the recent war-scare was coming to crisis. All Europe, and eventually the United States, is moving inexorably toward war, declares Mr. Wallis, unless timely readjustments are made in the direction of economic justice.

"IN ITS stimulus to thought, the content of this book is as provocative as its title."—The Financial World (New York City).

"IT WOULD be impossible to present your case with more point and logic than you do here. Of course you are entirely right."—Professor Edward A. Ross (The University of Wisconsin).

(Includes a reprinting of the material formerly issued under the title "Safeguard Productive Capital.")

YOUR BOOKSELLER WILL GET IT FOR YOU.

OR YOU CAN SEND DIRECT

$1.00

DOUBLEDAY, DORAN & CO., Inc.
14 W. 49 St. ■ Rockefeller Center ■ New York

SALUTE TO THE CHAMPIONS OF WORLD DEMOCRACY & SOCIALISM

20TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE COMMUNIST INTERNATIONAL

15TH ANNIVERSARY DAILY WORKER

SPEAKERS
EARL BROWDER
CLARENCE HATHAWAY
ISRAEL AMTER
CHARLES KRUMBEIN
TIMOTHY HOLMES
SADIE VAN VEEN
JOHN LITTLE
CHORUS OF 200 VOICES
DIRECTED BY MAX HELFMAN

MONDAY — FEBRUARY 27th AT 7:30 P.M.
MADISON SQ. GARDEN
TICKETS $1.10, 66c, 40c & 27c AT WORKERS BOOKSHOPS

AUSPICES OF NEW YORK STATE COMMITTEE OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY

MEMORIAL MEETING
In Honor of All Americans Who Died
- Fighting for Democracy in Spain -
SPEAKERS:
ERNEST HEMINGWAY VINCENT SHEEAN
HELEN KELLER Lieut. Col. JOHN GATES
LANGDON POST, Chairman
Wednesday Eve. FEB. 22 (Washington's Birthday)
MANHATTAN CENTER, 34th St. at 8th Ave.
— Tickets: —
25c - 55c
at all Workers Bookshops
Proceeds: REHABILITATION FUND
FRIENDS OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRIGADE
Auspices: Friends and Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, 125 West 45th Street, N. Y. C.
Telephone: LOngacre 3-6214
— GUESTS OF HONOR —
500 RELATIVES OF THE MEN KILLED IN ACTION

FREE Correspondence Course in
Fundamental Economics and Social Philosophy
Write for descriptive booklet NA
HENRY GEORGE SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
Chartered by University of State of New York
JOHN DEWEY, Honorary President
30 East 29th St., New York City

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division
The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

mountain frontier, where a handful of people are forced to stay, since the frontier is closed and the outbreak of the much-talked-of war imminent. The military is already in command. A tremendous air field with underground hangars, easily and comfortably visible from the terraces of the hotel, suggests the physical dangers of war and serves to fill with elemental threats the many gaps between genuine psychological intensities. (Remember the war atmosphere of "Grand Illusion," achieved without a rifle, not to speak of bombers?)

The anti-war talk is subdued, the emphasis being switched to the personal affairs of the co-stars—Miss Shearer is even more pretentious than her pretentious part. Burgess Meredith as the anti-war fanatic gets little chance to arouse the audience, but still the impact of the impending war comes through in spite of the tendency to play it down. In particular Joseph Schildkraut, as the taciturn military commander, conveys by means of gestures of understatement what war means. I have no complaint to make about the inserted happy ending; on the contrary. The essential theme having been diluted with much cheap comedy, which is not even used to sharpen the situation through contrast, a tragic ending would only have added to the falseness of the whole. Nevertheless, there are sequences in the picture that are mature, earnest, and clean. And one could sense how the audience was arrested by these moments, how the usual passive interest was suddenly raised to intense feeling.

"One-Third of a Nation" uses the name and some of the material of the Federal Theater Project's "Living Newspaper," which presented so vividly the history of housing. The moving-picture version is wisely limited to the slums of New York in the present era. It pictures with great skill the misery of the poor and the firetraps they live in. But it adds to scenes which are true to life in every detail a dreadful love story.

A rich playboy (Leif Erikson), young, blond, the forceful polo-player type, passes a tenement fire on his way to his hydroplane in the East River. He stops, picks up a little boy who has fallen from a loose fire escape, and takes him to the hospital. He is appalled by the conditions in the slums, and when the little boy's sister (Sylvia Sidney) remarks that the owner of these neglected houses should be sent to prison he adds, "Or worse." Of course he finds out, after flying home to his Long Island estate, that he himself is the owner whom he has condemned.

His conscience awakened, he wants to do something. He appears voluntarily at the District Attorney's investigation—an excellent scene in which the social system becomes more and more the defendant with every question; he promises the poor boy's sister that he will rebuild the infected and rickety tenement houses. But it takes a second fire in which more people are burned to death to complete his education. Finally he has the houses torn down and wins the girl—an ending which one saw coming all along.

"One-Third of a Nation," like "Idiot's Delight," represents an advance in the choice of theme; it is spoiled in the same fashion by superimposed clichés and the producers' fear of their own courage. The problem which lies at the root of the difficulty is of course the well-known dilemma: how to tell the truth without being radical.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Letters to the Editors

Mussolini on Race

Dear Sirs: A dispatch from Berlin to the New York Times of January 26 quotes Roberto Farinacci as saying that Mussolini had realized "the race problem in its true significance in 1919." One must take careful note of the occasion which brought forth this misstatement from Italy's foremost anti-Semite. He was speaking from the same platform as Julius Streicher and attempting to match his Duce with Streicher's Führer. He wished to show that even though no consciousness of a Jewish menace had appeared in Italy prior to the formation of the Rome-Berlin axis, and though it took the government until February, 1938, to work up some enthusiasm for an anti-Semitic campaign, Mussolini had as early as 1919 made a note of racial theories and probably filed it away with other far-fetched but potentially useful political devices.

All of this the Duce kept to himself. A study of the rise of Italian fascism shows that, far from wishing to divide the Italian people into races, its one purpose was to unite them. In a speech at Trieste in 1921 Mussolini declared, "I have enormous faith in the future greatness of the Italian people. Ours is the most homogeneous of the peoples of Europe."

Luigi Villari, the Fascist historian, wrote in 1929, "The population of Italy, although showing considerable varieties of type, is more homogeneous than the superficial observer might imagine. It is, of course, made up of elements of divers origins, but what great nation is not?" "The makers of Italian unity," states this Fascist historian, "realized the great importance of welding the nation together and making of it one united people." Can it be that Mussolini has not read Villari?

In 1932 the Duce himself told Emil Ludwig that "anti-Semitism does not exist in Italy." He even went so far as to say, "Of course there are no pure races left; not even the Jews have kept their blood unmingled. Successful crossings have often promoted the energy and the beauty of a nation." Then came that familiar, oft-quoted statement of Mussolini's, "Race! It is feeling, not a reality; 95 per cent, at least, is a feeling." FLORENCE JONAS

New York, January 31

Costly Lesson

Dear Sirs: It is said that learning by experience is effective but unpleasant. It is also expensive. Perhaps in the year 1960 we shall all know that suppression of international traffic in munitions impels every government to set up and keep at work munitions factories sufficient not only for peace-time needs but for emergencies, and delivers the non-militaristic nations as a prey to the militaristic. But it looks as if the world might pay a heavy tuition fee for the lesson.

And when we have learned it we shall forget that at the beginning of the movement to suppress the traffic we were warned that the suppression was bound to work out to such results. We shall believe that those who learned these facts by sad experience were the first to discover them.

STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Ballard Vale, Mass., January 26

Smoking and Health

Dear Sirs: In a recent issue you state that newspapers did not give publicity to a report of a professor of Johns Hopkins University on the effects of smoking. A public service will be effected if The Nation will publish a summary of that report. H. SHEMIN

New York, February 8

[A report of Dr. Pearl's survey appeared in Science for March 4, 1938. Based on 6,813 case histories it was designed to determine whether smoking shortens life. It concluded: "The tables show that smoking is associated with definite impairment of longevity. This impairment is proportional to the habitual amount of tobacco usage in smoking, being great for heavy smokers and less for moderate smokers. The moderate smokers' lives are definitely shorter than those of the total abstainers."—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Praise from Cuba

Dear Sirs: Please permit me to congratulate your staff on the clean and decent campaign your paper has been conducting in behalf of democracy in Spain. Your last article by Louis Fischer was masterful in its exactness and its insight into the situation. It was among the best things I have read on Spain.

It is refreshing to know that papers like The Nation are being published in America. The debt we republicans of Spain owe you is immense, but I believe that you are paid by the satisfaction you experience in doing a brilliant and honorable work. I read your paper not only for information on the war in Spain but for general orientation on the problems of Europe and America. I believe The Nation is serving a fundamental purpose in America: to keep men of good faith together and bring hope to those of us who think—perhaps naively—that the world can still be made a decent place. ANTONIO J. COLORADO

Havana, Cuba, February 1

Unbalanced Biology

Dear Sirs: Dr. Darby's review of "Animals Without Backbones" in your issue of January 21 descends into a diatribe on the author's omission of the topic of genetics and on the unbalance in departments of biology in American universities, and fails to mention points surely of greater interest to the readers of The Nation. For a correct evaluation of Dr. Buchsbaum's book, it is necessary to know that it is one of the series of textbooks written and illustrated from a new standpoint of student interest—and reader interest—especially for the undergraduate courses at the University of Chicago. "Animals Without Backbones" takes its place with Croneis's "Down to Earth," Romer's "Man and the Vertebrates," and Carlson and Johnson's "Machinery of the Body." Thus we may reasonably expect a companion volume for the important field of genetics, and Dr. Darby's criticism of the omission of genetics from the work at hand is beside the mark. It should not be necessary to remind him that genetics is represented at the University of Chicago by so significant a leader as Sewall Wright.

In point of fact, the new treatment in "Animals Without Backbones" and the companion volume, "Man and the Vertebrates," exhibits a trend toward a more balanced biological teaching program. The shoe of unbalance in biological teaching is actually on the other foot. It is precisely the overemphasis on genetics and on the experimental departments of biology in general which has produced a situation in which the educated public is more familiar with the electron than with the gene. The neglect in universities of the foundation for a popular understanding of biology, namely, the systematic framework with its inexhaustibly interesting natural history of plants and animals, is the direction in which unbalance is a serious portent.

KARL P. SCHMIDT,
Field Museum of National History
Chicago, January 25

Will You Fight?

Dear Sirs: For the last twenty years I have been asking Mr. Villard the same question. He has not answered it yet. I may have better luck this time; here it is again:

If you adopt against an aggressor nation certain "measures short of war"; if these measures prove so effective that the aggressor nation will actually be hampered by them; if the aggressor nation sends you an ultimatum to withdraw those measures or fight; what will you do?

ALBERT GUÉRARD
Stanford University, Cal., February 1

Never!

Dear Sirs: My answer to Professor Guérard is that I should never fight under any circumstances, believing that the day we fight we destroy the American democracy. And I should not withdraw any non-intercourse or boycott measures to which any dictator country might object. I have not answered Professor Guérard before because I object to answering hypothetical—"iffy"—questions. His is an uncalled-for question now if only because neither Germany nor Japan nor Italy, the so-called aggressor nations, could make war upon us whatever we did to them.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
New York, February 9

Paris and Barcelona

Dear Sirs: On January 18, 40,000 French men and women crowded into the Vel d'Hiver to plead for the opening of the Spanish frontier. The fall of Barcelona was imminent, but the meeting would not admit it. Franco had taken Tarragona, but resistance was stiffening. The debate on foreign affairs in the Chamber was just under way. There was yet hope. There was yet time to help.

These 40,000 men and women were the Frenchmen who work hard for their sous, who can afford only an occasional coup de rouge at the nearest zinc counter, who have been battered by the tremendous upswing in price of the very necessities of life. They were the ones—and how well they know it—who will march in case of war, and they want to be sure that they are asked to fight for something in which they believe. Not for M. Bonnet, Lazard Frères, the City of London, or the sacred stupidities of the Cliveden set.

This meeting was ignored. As a lever on the Chamber it had no great direct effect. The debate was postponed; Bonnet, it was reported, threatened to resign if "non-intervention" was thrown over. London backed Bonnet, and Daladier gave in. Meanwhile Franco was fast approaching Barcelona.

One week later, ninety-five American soldiers, ragged in clothing and empty of stomach, left Spain behind them and crossed into Cerbère. They arrived in Paris shortly before noon the next day. As they stepped from the train to buy fruit, sandwiches, and beer and exhaust the station's supply of Ce Soir, a crowd slowly gathered outside the iron gates of the quai. These soldiers were a group of young men. Many of them, despite their makeshift clothing and their unshaven faces, could have strolled off a nearby college campus. But there was nothing collegiate in what they said or in what they were thinking. As the train pulled out, one remarked: "We're leaving one fight, but we're entering another." In the United States their presence will be felt.

And then came the final Chamber debate, the culmination of two weeks in which the press had spoken of little else but Spain and the oncoming "pressure" or "blackmail" of Italy and Germany, two weeks in which anxious groups of Frenchmen had formed noiselessly around street corners reading a manifesto signed by a group of leading French intellectuals urging immediate aid to Republican Spain. Daladier delivered a straightforward and impressive appeal. It was moving because Daladier loves his country, and he put sharply what Bonnet could not: France will not permit atteinte to her soil or possessions. On that point there was unanimity in the Chamber.

Tonight, despite the vote, despite the deputies' announced determination to stand fast against direct threat, there is little rejoicing in France. Thirty-five persons were arrested on the grands boulevards tonight for demonstrating for Republican Spain. French, American, and British committees are working overtime to raise money, to alleviate the misery and despair along the Spanish border.

Daladier met the challenge to his position; but he met it partially because France, with its paucity of real leaders, would not know where to turn in case of another real Cabinet crisis. Daladier is no admirer of Bonnet, he would like to replace him as soon as possible,—when the present crisis appears less threatening. Until he does, France cannot expect to enjoy great peace of mind.

FRANCIS G. SMITH, JR.
Paris, January 27

CONTRIBUTORS

KEITH HUTCHISON, formerly on the London staff of the Herald Tribune, is now an associate editor of The Nation.

GAETANO SALVEMINI, author of "The Fascist Dictatorship in Italy" and "Under the Axe of Fascism," is now teaching at Harvard.

FRANK C. HANIGHEN, coauthor with H. C. Engelbrecht of "Merchants of Death," recently returned from an extensive tour of Europe.

MAXWELL S. STEWART has just completed a revision of his book "Social Security" to cover recent developments.

CONSTANCE ROURKE is the author of "Audubon," "Davy Crockett," and, most recently, "Charles Sheeler."

LOUIS B. SALOMON is a member of the English Department of Brooklyn College.

HANS KOHN is professor of modern European history at Smith College.

JACQUES BARZUN is assistant professor of history at Columbia University.

BABETTE DEUTSCH is the author of "This Modern Poetry" and of numerous volumes of poems.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs, Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 25, 1939 NUMBER 9

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 217
EDITORIALS:
POGROM ECONOMICS 219
JAPAN AND RUSSIA 220
SAME OLD STORY 221
HOMAGE TO BRANDEIS by Max Lerner 222
IT'S HELL TO BE A CHICAGO LIBERAL by Milton S. Mayer 223
"GREATER UKRAINIA" by Elizabeth Wiskemann 224
AMERICANS ON ENGLAND by Robert Dell 227
LIVING PHILOSOPHIES. X. PLEASURE BE YOUR GUIDE by Rebecca West 229
IN THE WIND 232
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 233
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
THE CUTTING OF AN AGATE by Louise Bogan 234
UNROMANTIC SPAIN by Louis Kronenberger 235
CHINA AT WAR by T. A. Bisson 237
MEMOIRS OF MR. SMITH by Odell Shepard 238
NEWS INTO SATIRE by Philip Blair Rice 238
THE ARAB CASE by Albert Viton 239
THE PERMANENCE OF A PAINTER by Paul Rosenfeld 240
THE THREE CHAMBERLAINS by Arthur Rosenberg 241
A BOY'S BEST PAL by Dorothy Van Doren 242
GENERAL LAFAYETTE by Albert Guérard 242
DRAMA: UNPLEASANT PLAY by Joseph Wood Krutch 244
RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 245

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Managing Editor ROBERT BENDINER
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE
Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
*
Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

THE END OF LOYALIST RESISTANCE SEEMS IN sight—and with it the end of the brief post-Munich respite. Only the question of terms remains. The struggle cannot go on much longer unless equipment is put in the hands of the Loyalist forces, and the pro-fascist Bonnet has made it clear to Del Vayo that neither France nor Britain will help the Spanish republic to obtain arms. Both governments want the war to end quickly, and they are less interested in the terms accorded the Loyalists than in the terms they can get themselves. They hope by facilitating a complete victory for Franco and by dangling financial aid in front of his nose to induce him to forget his quite obvious obligations to his more active partners, Germany and Italy. It looks like a futile as well as a shameful maneuver. But it is the logical last act of the non-intervention farce, and Bonnet, Chamberlain, and their supporting cast seem bound to play it through to its predestined end. They are being helped by the disloyal tactics of Azaña, whose insistence that the war must end has played directly into the hands of Franco and his assorted backers. Only the courage and tenacity of Del Vayo and Negrin and the spirit of the workers and soldiers in Loyalist territory have so far averted surrender, and recognition of Franco by Great Britain and France. The longer this is delayed, the better is the chance of tolerable terms of peace. Unconditional surrender will mean death or exile for all Loyalist leaders, not only government officials but army officers, heads of workers' organizations, and active leftists generally. Franco has refused any amnesty. Will Britain and France recognize him without conditions as a final heroic gesture of non-intervention?

*

THE FACTS BEHIND THE AIRPLANE SALES TO France, and the preposterous fuss made over them, are now reasonably clear. The French wanted to buy a large number of planes, possibly as many as a thousand, in this country in order to offset Germany's superiority in the air. The French Air Mission found that there were only two types of plane manufactured here which could stand up to the fast German craft—the P-40 pursuit planes and the 7-B bombers. A certain group in the War Department wanted to prevent the French from obtaining the 7-B bombers on the ground that they were of an "experimental" and "secret" design. This group was overridden by the President with the approval of General Malin Craig, Chief of Staff, and Louis Johnson, Assistant Secretary of War. The full disclosures place the critics of the President in an anomalous position. They cannot very well object to the sale of American airplanes to France when large quantities have been sold to Germany and Japan. They certainly cannot maintain that the sale of first-class planes to France is in any sense a threat to American security. So they have attempted to blur the basic facts and issues by playing upon such words as "secret" and "foreign." It now appears that this unworthy attempt to drag partisan politics into matters of defense and foreign policy has met the defeat which it deserves.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1897.

* * *

THE NEUTRALITY ACT WAS AN ATTEMPT TO legislate this country out of the danger of war, but its end results may prove to be the very opposite of those intended. In so far as it permits potential aggressors to believe their chances of success are enhanced by the inability of their victims to obtain supplies from America, the act encourages resort to war. Since it is generally agreed that the chance of our escaping involvement in a European war would be slight, it would be intelligent to throw our economic weight positively on the side of peace instead of using it negatively in a way that favors aggressors. The amendment introduced by Senator Thomas of Utah goes some way toward meeting objections to the act while endeavoring to allay the anxieties of those who hesitate to give the President the power to decide who is an aggressor. It proposes that whenever the President finds that a nation that is signatory to a treaty to which the United States is itself a party is engaged in war in violation of that treaty, he may, with the approval of both houses of Congress, exempt the second nation in whole or in part from the embargo provisions of the act. The existence of the Kellogg Pact enables this definition of aggression to cover a large field. Even so, its adequacy to meet either the practice of undeclared war or the fascist technique of using civil war as a cover for international war is open to question. Another difficulty arises from the fact that Congress is not in session during a considerable part of the year, which might well mean delay at a time when speedy action was vital. Such points obviously need clarification.

* * *

THE MEMPHIS POWER AND LIGHT COMPANY rejected on January 20 a bid of $18,127,000 from the City of Memphis for purchase of its electric and gas properties. The company termed the offer "entirely out of line with the real value" but has now agreed to sell for $17,360,000—or $3,640,000 less than the $21,000,000 it originally demanded. The secret of the company's changed attitude does not lie in the recent Commonwealth and Southern deal to sell its Tennessee properties to the TVA. The terms of that sale, if anything, might have boosted the price. The secret of the company's surrender lies in the fact that the City of Memphis began to draw up its plans for the erection of a competing plant. The Memphis transaction, on the heels of the earlier TVA purchase, means that all utilities in Tennessee will now be under government ownership. It is not inappropriate at this time to note that the propaganda fed to the public by the power companies on the "boom" in capital expenditures by utilities to be expected as soon as the TVA made peace with Commonwealth and Southern was clever but fictitious. A story hidden away in the safe obscurity of the retail-business page of the New York Times for February 12 showed that capital expenditures by utility companies have followed the same curve as business in general, apparently little affected by the hobgoblin of government competition. The utilities spent $965,000,000 in 1930. This fell to $130,000,000 by 1933, rose to $470,000,000 in 1937, and shaded off to $450,000,000 last year. "From the utility agreement," C. F. Hughes wrote in his column "The Merchant's Point of View" on that page, "there is no immediate basis seen for that expansion of plant and equipment that was predicted by some utility leaders as bait for decisions in their favor."

* * *

HOLLYWOOD SPENT A MILLION DOLLARS TO prove that Movies Are Your Best Entertainment, but the drive could not counteract the evidence to the contrary which daily flooded the screen. Last week the industry's self-satisfaction received another jolt when the Supreme Court upheld a decision of a lower court against eight motion-picture distributors, all affiliated with the Hollywood film trust, and two theater chains in Texas and New Mexico. The distributors had forced independent theater owners to sign pacts stipulating that "Class A" pictures might not be shown on double-feature programs and might never appear in second-run theaters charging less than 25 cents admission. This arrangement confronted independents with the alternatives of raising prices or accepting a steady diet of Class B atrocities; either alternative was likely to mean their extinction. That fate has, in fact, befallen independents throughout the country, and with their disappearance the last vestiges of competitive stimulus have vanished from the industry. In condemning the Texas contracts the high court has squarely challenged the monopolistic methods which are attacked on a national scale in the anti-trust suit which was brought against the eight big Hollywood companies last fall.

CATHOLIC MONARCHS HAVE IN THE PAST often sought to dictate or veto the choice of a new Pope. But the attempt of anti-Catholic Nazi Germany to influence the election of a successor to Pius XI outdoes anything we have seen before of Hitlerite impudence. The German envoy at the Vatican took advantage of his position as dean of the diplomatic corps to make his address of condolence before the College of Cardinals an invitation to extend the Rome-Berlin axis into the Vatican. After paying unctuous tribute to the Pope who wrote the anti-Nazi encyclical "Mit Brennender Sorge" and objected to the exhibition of the swastika in Rome, the Nazi minister suggested that the cardinals name a Pope who would cooperate with the fascist states. The German spoke for the diplomatic corps. Did the French and British ministers know that this proposal to subject the Papacy to Gleichschaltung was to be made? If they did and kept silent, their recall is in order. Otherwise their governments furnish new evidence of undercover cooperation with the axis powers.

*

ITALY AND GERMANY ARE GOING TO FIGHT the next war on Soviet oil, according to a long article which appeared recently in the financial section of the New York Times. Since the Soviet Union has an adequate gold supply, its sales of oil to the fascist powers can be "only for political and nationalistic reasons," and, the article adds, are "the direct result of the Munich agreement." Although the article is nearly three columns in length, there is a conspicuous absence of figures and concrete detail. The foundation for the entire story is to be found in the sentence: "In the agreement that Germany and Russia now are reported to be negotiating, it is said that it will provide for the exchange of Russian oil for manufactured goods [our italics]." The fact is that, according to regular news reports, negotiations for continuing the existing Soviet-German trade agreement for another year are now going on. This agreement would provide for the sale of Soviet oil, the amount being indicated in the 1938 trade figures just released. During the past year the Soviet Union stood a bad eighth among the countries supplying oil to Germany, furnishing less than one-seventeenth as much, in value, as the United States, which stood second. Soviet oil exports to the Reich were 73.9 per cent less in 1938 than in 1937, the drop being in line with the general decline in Soviet-German trade and the growing consumption of oil within Russia. A new trade agreement with Italy has already been signed for the coming year. Under this pact Italy is expected to double its purchases of Soviet goods. But Italy's total purchases of naphtha, manganese, lumber, coal, wheat, and other items, including oil, will be only $52,000,000, or less than one-twelfth of Italy's normal peace-time import requirements.

Pogrom Economics

IMMEDIATELY prior to his resignation as director of the Intergovernmental Committee on German Refugees, George Rublee brought back from Berlin a plan promulgated by the German government for the orderly migration of German Jews. Although less blatant than the earlier Schacht proposals, this plan cannot be held to indicate a change of heart; at best it represents a change of method. Nor can it be properly understood if it is viewed in isolation; its significance becomes clear only when it is seen in its relation both to the domestic position of the Reich and to the international situation.

That the Nazi government should now be willing to relax even in slight degree its anti-Semitic measures is proof of the failure of the November pogrom, except as an essay in pure sadism. It was intended to rally the German people to the regime; instead it evoked widespread disapproval and served to crystallize sentiment against the government rather than against the Jews.

Economically the pogrom resulted in a heavy adverse balance. The huge collective fine levied against the Jewish community was intended to replenish the government's cash reserves and offset part of the extraordinary expenditure caused by the September crisis. But it soon became clear that insistence on cash payments would involve a collapse of the security and real-estate markets. The authorities were therefore forced to accept a large proportion of the fine in the shape of stocks and deeds which can only be very slowly liquidated. Against the comparatively meager proceeds of the fine must be set the cost to German economy of the pogrom. After their orgy of burning, smashing, and looting the Nazis awoke to the fact that even if the property was Jewish its replacement would require a draft on precious raw materials. Further it soon became apparent that forced Aryanization of Jewish businesses inevitably resulted in loss of trade connections and dislocation of production—a serious matter when capacity was already strained to the bursting-point. Worst of all, the pogrom led to an intensification of the boycott. January trade returns are alarming for the Nazis: exports have fallen 12½ per cent, forcing an even greater fall in vital imports.

From the diplomatic point of view, also, the November outrages proved a serious mistake. They aroused anti-Nazi feeling in this country to a new pitch of intensity and caused a semi-rupture of relations. In Britain they had an unmistakable effect in arousing public opinion, gave a definite setback to Chamberlain's appeasement policy, and upset the propaganda of the "fifth column" which was urging that Nazis were perfectly nice people if tactfully handled. There can be little doubt that the new plan for emigration with its collateral relaxation of anti-Semitic regulations is intended to reestablish the confidence of these friends. By suggesting that Hitler is capable of "reasonable compromises" it is hoped to strengthen believers in appeasement and pave the way for another "contest of nerves" designed to win new bloodless victories for the axis.

Of course the refugee plan can be described as "reasonable" only when considered against its background of terror and blackmail. As the New York Times has well said, it represents "a policy of reluctant and unreal conciliation which goes no farther than to 'relax' temporarily decrees that are inherently vicious." Moreover, the plan is merely a statement of what the Reich is willing to do. The Berlin government refuses to put it in the form of an agreement—either with the Evian committee, which it does not recognize officially, or with any other state—and thus provide the doubtful guaranty of Germany's signature.

In the new plan the element of blackmail is not as obtrusive as in the Schacht scheme, but it is still present. It is proposed to establish a trust fund, under Nazi control, equivalent to at least a fourth of the remaining Jewish wealth in Germany. This is to be used to finance the travel expenses of 150,000 Jewish workers, to be followed later by 250,000 dependents, and may also be drawn upon for the purchase of German goods which emigrants will take with them to help in their future settlement. This proposal, however, is seriously affected by two qualifications. If such goods contain imported raw materials, the value of those raw materials must be covered by free foreign exchange. Who is to provide this exchange? Presumably it must come from the international fund raised outside Germany to assist refugees. And since almost any manufactures of use to emigrants require such raw materials, the upshot will be a handsome indirect subsidy to the German government. Another difficulty is the suggestion that emigrants' goods be exempt from clearing arrangements with foreign countries. This means that they will form, in effect, "additional exports," and to gain this status importing countries must be induced to relax their tariff regulations.

One improvement in the proposals as compared with the present situation is that Jews are to be allowed again to earn a living, provided arrangements can be made so that they are segregated from "Aryan" workers. This generous gesture is perhaps best explained by the acute shortage of labor in Germany, which is leading to the reemployment of retired workers up to seventy. The Nazis also kindly offer to leave elderly Jews free from interference or persecution "unless something extraordinary occurs." In other words, these old people are regarded as hostages held in reserve against a time when a real or manufactured incident calls for a new "spontaneous" outbreak of Aryan indignation. If any proof is needed that the hyena has not changed his smell this amazing qualification will surely suffice.

Japan and Russia

IN WARNING the Soviet government that it is prepared to take "drastic action" unless the dispute over the fisheries is quickly settled, Japan has entered on a course that is wholly uncharted. The fisheries issue is the most crucial of the many questions that have arisen between the two countries in recent years. Hitherto the Soviet government never dared to refuse to grant fishery rights to the Japanese even though such grants were against Russia's interests. That Moscow now feels strong enough to limit these rights, despite the jingoistic character of the new Hiranuma Cabinet, may reflect a fundamental change in the Far Eastern balance of power.

Under the circumstances, the Japanese military leaders would seem little short of insane in preparing for a showdown with the Soviet Union. Things have not been going any too well for Japan in China in recent weeks. Guerrilla forces have been unusually effective in all sections of the country. The Japanese mopping-up offensive against the bases of the Eighth Route Army in Shansi appears to have been a costly failure. South of Hankow Chinese regulars have staged a counter-offensive which has carried them to the gates of Yochow. Against these unfavorable developments, Japan can claim only one important military victory since the capture of Hankow in October—the occupation of Hainan. And this is more a moral than a military triumph. Although Hainan is of undoubted strategic value to Japan in relation to French Indo-China and the Philippines, its worth in the present struggle is offset by the fact that Japan must maintain an important garrison there just when it desperately needs troops to hold the occupied areas in China.

If Japan is contemplating an attack on the Soviet Union this spring, there can be only two possible explanations for such apparent foolhardiness. One is that the extremists who are in power have become drunk with their unbroken chain of successes in bluffing the Western powers. This is not the first time that the Japanese militarists have senselessly challenged powers that were too strong for them. It is now fully evident that the incident involving the Soviet Union in the summer of 1937 and the attacks on the Ladybird and the Panay, to say nothing of the recent occupation of Hainan, were acts of deliberate provocation committed with a complete disregard of possible consequences. There is every indication that the Soviet Union is in no mood to be a subject for further experiments, but that does not mean that Japan, now more completely in the hands of extremists than ever before, may not attempt them.

A more likely explanation is that Japan is merely playing the role assigned to it by the master strategists who determine the policies of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis. The fascist tactics consist in keeping the world in perpetual jitters over the danger of war. As the game goes on, stronger and stronger threats are necessary. At the moment the real push is directed against France. But as the Changkufeng incident was utilized to distract Soviet attention on the eve of Munich, so the present crisis seems to be intended to absorb the attention of France's ally in the crucial days that lie ahead.

That it is not merely a bluff is indicated, however, by reports that Japan has moved large numbers of its crack troops, badly needed in China, to the Soviet border. "Incidents" have become an almost daily occurrence. Should Japan make good its threat of sending a naval force to protect Japanese subjects illegally fishing in Soviet waters, the Soviets would undoubtedly take action to eject them, thus bringing about a crisis that might lead to war. From this distance it is difficult to believe that Japan would thus deliberately invite catastrophe. But observers recently in Japan have commented that the nation is in a mood to commit mass hari-kiri.

Same Old Story

> Their membership is so large and their resources are so vast as to make the question of responsible control and conservative management one of extreme difficulty; and their magnitude if permitted to grow unrestricted will soon become a serious menace to the community.

THE words are those of the Armstrong committee. The reference is to three insurance companies—the Mutual, the Equitable, and the New York Life. In 1906 the Armstrong committee, under the able direction of Charles Evans Hughes, made the most thorough investigation of the insurance business this country has even seen. At that time the three companies named were the largest in the field, with assets of approximately half a billion dollars each. Today the three largest companies —the Metropolitan, the Prudential, and the New York Life—have assets of $4,700,000,000, $3,500,000,000, and $2,500,000,000, respectively. Among them they control 41.3 per cent of the total assets of all life-insurance companies. The publicity that accompanied and the legislation that followed the Armstrong investigation proved as helpless as the stern gesture of Canute. The facts now being uncovered by the SEC-monopoly inquiry into insurance companies show the old evils still existing, many times magnified.

All the companies mentioned above are, with some slight and unimportant qualification as to the Prudential, "mutual" companies. Theoretically they are owned by their policy-holders. But the Armstrong committee reported in 1906:

> Notwithstanding their theoretical rights policy-holders have had little or no voice in the management. Intrenched behind proxies easily collected by subservient agents (and running for long periods, unless expressly revoked), the officers of these companies have occupied unassailable positions and have been able to exercise despotic power.

This finding is now being underlined by evidence before the monopoly inquiry showing how insurance directors use their positions to promote their outside business interests. To leave such power in the hands of self-perpetuating cliques is as unhealthy for the national economy as it is for the morals of those who wield it.

The Pujo "money-trust" investigation in 1914 found that "so-called control of the life-insurance companies by policy-holders through mutualization is a farce . . . its only result is to keep in office a self-constituted, self-perpetuating management." Nearly 90 per cent of the assets of all life-insurance companies are now controlled by "mutuals." Those who believe that the old devices of publicity and reform legislation suffice to deal with a major economic problem will be discouraged to learn from the insurance hearings now under way at Washington that the very conditions uncovered in 1906 and again in 1914 still continue. A parade of witnesses has told the members of the Temporary National Economic Committee, as the monopoly inquiry is officially known, that it is customary for insurance agents in many offices and in many cities to forge the names of policy-holders to the proxies sent out at election time.

The President in his message on the monopoly problem asked for an inquiry into the way in which our insurance companies exercise their vast power. For they control what is probably the greatest reservoir of capital in our economy. Our forty-nine leading legal-reserve life-insurance companies hold 22.95 per cent of all railroad bonds, 11 per cent of the federal debt, almost 10 per cent of all state, county, and municipal bonds, 22 per cent of all public-utility bonds, 15 per cent of the total industrial debt, 11 per cent of all farm mortgages, 14½ per cent of all urban mortgages. These figures make it clear that Chairman Douglas of the SEC, in opening the insurance hearings, was not being rhetorical when he said that inquiry into the insurance business "takes us from Wall Street to Main Street, from the capital markets and financial centers of the East into the farm lands of the West and South." We hope that the monopoly probers, in dealing with the problem, will not forget the experience of the past, will not forget that sensational revelations may make headlines but do not necessarily make reforms. So long as insurance executives can throw the weight of huge financial aggregations into the scales, they can nullify laws passed to regulate them, and buy, destroy, or bully into silence officials set up to control them. We think this is one field in which publicity and regulation have proved their futility. The evils of the insurance business will not be corrected until government takes it over and operates it.

Homage to Brandeis

BY MAX LERNER

SINCE the World War the American legal world has had three outstanding names. They are Holmes, Brandeis, Cardozo. Of the three Brandeis is the last to lay down his work. The other two had more in common than either of them had with Brandeis. The literary skill, the philosophic sweep, the contrived simplicity, the flashing phrase, the sententious epigram, the articulateness about the nature of the judicial process—these are not notable in Brandeis. His opinions are not great writing. They lack the personal imprint of greatness that stamps Brandeis's conversation, for example. Compare Brandeis at his civil-liberties best in the Rosika Schwimmer case, for example, with Holmes in the Abrams case; or Brandeis in any social-legislation opinion with Holmes in Lochner v. New York. Read Brandeis's great economic dissent in the Southwestern Bell Telephone case, and compare it—not in its economics but in its literary and intellectual impact—with Cardozo's dissent in the Jones case, under the SEC act.

Nevertheless, Brandeis's final effect on American law will probably be more substantial than was that of either of his colleagues. Historically he has led the phalanxes that have brought the economic emphasis into legal thought. And he has evolved in the process a usable judicial philosophy and a transmissible technique for generations of judges and lawyers to come. The philosophy is that individual rights and group claims are neither absolute nor unchanging, and that they must be weighed in terms of the need for checking and democratizing our corporate capitalism. The technique is to interpret the constitutional phrase and the legal doctrine as part of the living context of legislative history and economic fact out of which laws emerge. The philosophy has basic links with the whole tradition of American democracy since Jefferson. The technique is deeply rooted in our pragmatism and our hard-headed statistical bent. Together they have refertilized American law. "The Brandeis way," to use Professor Mason's phrase, "can be translated into action not only in the judicial realm but in the rest of the state as well."

For there are two great and abiding facts about Brandeis. The first is that he has always been more than a jurist. The second is that his thought flows out of action and is directed toward action. Alone among the Big Three of liberalism he had a notable non-judicial career before coming to the bench. That was why there was so great an outcry against his appointment in 1916, as there was to be against Black's appointment in 1937. He had laid his cards on the table. Brandeis was no radical, but it was clear that he would not abide by the fake rules of the game that the corporate financiers and the corporate lawyers had laid down. Hence State Street and Wall Street alternately groaned in agony and turned their eyes piously toward a heaven of professional legal ethics. Brandeis's sin was that he had beaten the corporation lawyers at their own game of amassing a fortune in legal practice and yet was devoting an increasing portion of his time to the service of the common people in measuring and fighting the giants of monopoly.

So great has his work as a judge been that we forget how great was his work as a lawyer. He transformed constitutional pleading through the "Brandeis brief." But he also transformed legal practice by becoming the symbol of a lawyer who does not have to lay his personal idealism and practical social sense on the shelf while he is out making money. Single-handed he waged a battle with J. P. Morgan's corporations over the New Haven Railroad and won. His 1907 testimony on New Haven finance is a tour de force of statistical reconstruction. His 1913 testimony before the Pujo committee, followed by his "Other People's Money," forms one of the classic analyses of American finance capitalism. On the Supreme Court Brandeis similarly geared his analysis to economic change and his directives to social action.

The theory underlying this social action has by this time often been stated. Brandeis is an individualist in his values without adhering to laissez faire, a collectivist in his program without adhering to the bureaucratic state. In striving to maintain this precarious balance his thought often becomes dizzying. Its strength lies in its being compounded of a belief in the life of reason, an ethical fervor, a concrete and massive knowledge, enormous social inventiveness, an insistence on our limiting ourselves to what is compassable.

But here, too, one may express doubts. Brandeis is against large administrative structures as he is against big corporations—because their size takes them out of the realm of the compassable. They don't work. The human mind cannot contain them. They become tyrannical. This explains Brandeis's opinion in the NRA case, which troubled many of his admirers; as it explains also his opposition to some of the recent New Deal trends. Yet the comic fact is that if we ever achieve a planned economy, Brandeis will be known as one of its forerunners. The crux of planning lies in the training of a body of officials and experts who give to public service the energy and devotion that are now given to business. If such a body is today growing up in Washington; if its type-member is a cross between the economist, the lawyer, and the engineer; if he combines an objective temper with an eye for action; if he is turning from a passive to an affirmative liberalism—then a large part of the credit must go to currents that Brandeis set in motion. But if such men are to occupy an increasingly influential place in public life, we need more Brandeises to give them leadership.

It's Hell to Be a Chicago Liberal

BY MILTON S. MAYER

Chicago, February 15

THE Communist Party and Colonel Robert R. McCormick take great pleasure in presenting their candidate for Mayor of Chicago, the Honorable Edward J. Kelly. This, in case you're a stranger in town, is the same Kelly who had to pay $105,000 for forgetting to tell the United States Treasury about $450,000 of personal income between 1925 and 1928. It is also the same Kelly who forgot to tell the police not to shoot the steel strikers in the back on Memorial Day of 1937. Colonel McCormick is having his first experience as a fellow-traveler of the Communist Party.

The situation would be tragic if it were not so funny. And it gets funnier every day. In addition to the Communists and Colonel McCormick, Kelly has the support of the department stores, the utilities, the unions, the reactionaries, and the liberals. There has never been anything like it. The most effective and unrepenting corruptionist the town has ever seen will be renominated in the primary on February 28 and reelected in April.

The Democratic nomination in Chicago is tantamount to election. "Downstate" went Republican in the last Congressional election, but the Kelly machine saved Illinois for the New Deal. Our new New Deal Senator, Scott Lucas, has only been in Washington a month, but he has voted against the WPA appropriation and the Roberts confirmation. Now we're out to help Kelly save Illinois for the New Deal in 1940.

Since Chicago is a Democratic town, the only way the Republicans can run it is through the Democrats. New Deal Kelly is Colonel McCormick's man. New Deal Courtney, Kelly's opponent in the Democratic primary, is under the exclusive management of Colonel Frank Knox of the Chicago Daily News. The reason we liberals are supporting Kelly is that Courtney is even worse than Kelly. They are a couple of stock characters out of Tammany, crude, ignorant, and unentertaining, and nobody here has ever been able to discern any redeeming features in either one of them. Two years ago Knox realized that the only way to take the town away from McCormick was to split the Kelly-Nash machine. Courtney, who always was too big for his breeches, grabbed the bait, and the build-up began. The News discovered that Courtney wasn't as bad as the News had always said he was, that Kelly was really the nasty man in town, and, finally, that "Tom Dewey is the Courtney of New York."

We liberals didn't want any part of McCormick or Knox and we tried to get Harold Ickes to run. Ickes thought it over and decided that Roosevelt needed him in Washington. It is also possible that Roosevelt decided, about the same time, that he needed Kelly in Chicago. Hopkins, who outranks Ickes in the White House hierarchy, has always liked Kelly; Harry kind of goes for big, tough, professional politicians who call him by his first name. F. D. R. likes Kelly, too, not only because Ed will produce a Roosevelt delegation at the 1940 convention but also because Cardinal Mundelein, who was a New Dealer long before the New Deal, is supposed to be able to do a lot with Kelly.

Ickes hates Kelly, but he takes orders from Roosevelt, and PWA came through with a toy subway for Ed to run on in the current campaign. That left Kelly and Courtney, who has never even paid lip service to the New Deal; and we liberals had to take our choice. We knew Kelly wasn't going to reform. But we told ourselves that he was really a purposeless kind of sentimental Irishman who might turn out all right if he had some nice boys to play with.

We were hell-bent to stop Courtney, and well we might be. Courtney is purposeful, and his purposes are bad. Young, vigorous, and thoroughly reactionary, Courtney is just getting started and therefore more dangerous than Kelly. If Courtney knew what civil liberties were, he'd be against them. As state's attorney he never got around to prosecuting any of the municipal corruption he is now "exposing," possibly because his police force was too busy breaking strikes and unions. As mayor he would "reduce the cost of government by reducing taxes," but as state's attorney he never got around to reducing tax-fixing.

Aside from union-busting—which has united Labor's Nonpartisan League and the A. F. of L. against him—Courtney specializes in "gambling wars" on Kelly joints. For six months his police have been ax-raiding without warrants; exclusive photographs of these excursions into righteousness are printed in the Daily News, which deplores European fascism. Though Kelly hailed the South Chicago massacre [illegible] [illegible] victory for law and order, it was Courtney who discovered that the "rioters" were reds. If Honest Tom should be elected mayor of Chicago, he would produce an anti-Roosevelt delegation at the 1940 convention, and Colonel Knox would turn his hat around and be a Democrat.

So one by one we liberals lined up with McCormick and Kelly. It is well enough to talk about going down fighting and sticking to your principles, but Chicago liberals learned a lesson from France and Spain. We joined the Popular Front. With the aid of the liberals and Colonel McCormick, and with Governor Horner "too sick to talk" for his old pal Courtney, Kelly will get the Democratic nomination by two to one or better.

Meanwhile, the fake Republican campaign has been sinking to its nadir. Dwight Green, an inconsequential utilities lawyer who actually believes that his campaign is being financed by Republicans, is competing with Big Bill Thompson for the right to Keep America Out of War and stop the Roosevelt reds. The only interesting thing about Big Bill, aside from the fact that he is still alive, is that the Tribune, which deplores European fascism, has not mentioned his name during the campaign. Green's role, as an innocent auxiliary of the Kelly campaign, is to draw "reform" votes away from Courtney.

So at last we liberals are going to reform Chicago, with Ed Kelly's help. He's already promised us that he will let a citizens' committee suggest the new members for the school board, two to be appointed each year. It's true that it's just a promise, and it's true that even if Ed suddenly starts keeping promises he will still have a majority of the board. But isn't it nice that he promises us something, and calls us in for conferences, and even supports one of us for alderman?

The readers of The Nation know Paul Douglas. Douglas has been a fighting liberal since he was six, incorruptible, brilliant, and unafraid. If it weren't for a liberal president, the trustees of the University of Chicago would have run him out of town long ago. Douglas is one of those rare persons who reach the "age of discretion" without pulling in his chin. Now he is the Kelly-Nash candidate for alderman. He warned Kelly that Kelly was supporting him at his own risk. Kelly grinned and said, "Sure." Kelly wanted nothing, nothing at all.

That's what happened before the election. What will happen afterward, when the machine has put our man on the City Council and still doesn't want anything? Paul Douglas isn't corruptible. And no liberal will take orders from a corruptionist. But the machine will go right on helping us, giving us an appointment here and an appropriation there. And meanwhile the machine, which stands for rotten, undemocratic government, will grow stronger every day.

Why go on bleeding and dying and never getting anywhere? Why not be practical and get a little something today and a little something more tomorrow? "One thing at a time"—the ancient doctrine of successive justification. Some say Roosevelt's been able to do it, coming to power on the shoulders of the Old Dealers and giving the country a New Deal. Maybe we can do it in Chicago.

But the sum and substance of the current situation is that there isn't going to be any reform in Chicago. National reformism has passed its crest, leaving its mark on most American cities, even Kansas City and Los Angeles. But the worst city in America went right on getting worse and is going to get worse faster from now on. My friends, it's wicked to be a tory, but it's hell to be a liberal.

"Greater Ukrainia"

BY ELIZABETH WISKEMANN

THERE are in the world somewhere between 40 and 45 million Ukrainians. These people, before 1914 often called Little Russians or, in old Austria-Hungary, Ruthenes, are a Slavonic group speaking a number of closely related dialects. Ukrainian lies between Russian and Polish in the scale of Slavonic languages; it is closest to Russian though definitely distinct from it. Although many of the Ukrainians were until recently only vaguely conscious of their nationality, they constitute what has been called "perhaps the biggest unsolved political question of Europe today." It is a problem with which Austria and Germany used to be greatly concerned, with the idea of making difficulties for Czarist Russia. It is therefore only to be expected that the Nazi rulers, spurred by Western defeatism and their own acute needs, should be fishing in the troubled waters of the Ukrainian question today.

Before the World War between 30 and 35 million Ukrainians lived under Russian rule, and about 5 million were subjects of Austria-Hungary. About a million and a half had settled in North America—mostly in Canada—in order to escape from poverty and oppression in Europe. In Russia they were not recognized as a separate non-Russian group. The czarist authorities pursued a frank policy of russification, and Russians of the ancien régime explain to one today that no distinction can be made between the Russian and the Ukrainian language. Furthermore, although the Russian Ukraine, where most but by no means all the Russian Ukrainians lived, had the richest soil in all Russia, most of the inhabitants remained peasants who might occasionally attain wealth but not social or political advancement unless they had accepted complete russification. The big landowners of the Russian Ukraine were Russians or Poles or russified Ukrainians; business was in the hands of the Jews. Ukrainian hatred of the Jews was peculiarly bitter; there was practically no intermarriage between the two races; and the Russian secret police found it easy to instigate ruthless pogroms.

Despite the policy of the Czars the course of history has made the Poles appear to be the "hereditary enemy" of the Ukrainians. The pre-war Russian government oppressed the Poles and the Ukrainians alike, but the pre-war Austrian authorities gave their Polish subjects a fairly free hand to harass the Ukrainians, or Ruthenes, of eastern Galicia. Thus the relative mildness of the Austrian administration, which allowed some schools to be conducted in the Ruthenian language, was canceled by the severity of the Polish landowners toward the Ruthenian peasants.

In the confusion of Eastern Europe during the war and immediately after it, independent Ukrainian or Ruthenian governments established themselves for short periods in Eastern Galicia and the Russian Ukraine. It was hoped that they would be able to coalesce into a great Ukrainian state, but their neighbors felt an interest in preventing this, and the dreams of Ukrainian unity and freedom faded. A certain Petliura who became the head of the autonomous government of the Russian Ukraine was suspiciously Polonophile, and the Bolsheviks were no more willing to respect his authority than the new Polish regime was content to leave the East Galician government unmolested. The Russo-Polish war of 1919 and 1920 was primarily a war fought over the Ukrainians. In the end the Polish seizure of Eastern Galicia was accepted both by Russia and by the Western powers. The latter pressed Poland to grant autonomy to the Ukrainians, and the Poles actually agreed to this in 1919 and 1922, but they have consistently ignored their promises ever since. By the Treaty of Riga, Russia and Poland recognized the independence of the Russian Ukraine; in 1923 the Ukrainian Socialist Soviet Republic joined the U. S. S. R. Meanwhile, half a million Ukrainians in Bukovina had been transferred by the peace treaties from Hungary to the new Czechoslovakia. The latter group, like their brothers in Eastern Galicia, received a promise of autonomy.

It would be inaccurate to suggest that the mainly Ukrainian settlement areas are wholly Ukrainian. The towns of the Russian Ukraine, for instance, were and are much more strongly Russian than the countryside. Sub-Carpathian Ruthenia, where Ukrainians, or Ruthenes, have long been settled southwest of the great Carpathian mountain barrier, was perhaps the most mixed of all predominantly Ukrainian districts; its few towns were largely Hungarian, Jewish, and Czechoslovak, with the ubiquitous Auslandsdeutsche also represented. Owing to Hungarian neglect this region was also perhaps the most backward Ukrainian area, and there is fairly general agreement that the Czechoslovak government was bound to ignore its claims to autonomy until educational and sanitary reforms could make their effects felt. It is also generally agreed that the Czech authorities enormously improved conditions between 1920 and 1938.

SHUT UP! I CAN'T HEAR MYSELF!

But the corollary to Munich was the Vienna award of November, 1938, by which the more fertile southern districts of Slovakia and Ruthenia were handed over to Hungary. The Czechs have also been forced to make Ruthenian autonomy, like Slovakian, "effective," and this has delivered the rump of Ruthenia to Hungarian, Polish, and German intrigue and propaganda. The Poles and Hungarians wish to swallow up Ruthenia completely, but the Germans, who were responsible for the November amputation and its limitations, are now busily engaged in persuading the Ruthenians that they are destined to play the role of the Piedmontese in a Great Ukrainian risorgimento. This is the avalanche which Munich has released.

For all is not well in the Polish and the Russian Ukraine. The condition of the Sudeten Germans under Czechoslovak rule was a paradise compared with that of the six or seven million Ukrainians who live in Poland. In Czechoslovakia opinion was free, and, on the whole, justice and administration kept to the rules, but Poland is a pseudo-dictatorship. All officials and police in the Polish Ukraine are Polish, and Polish colonists have been settled in Ukrainian areas. Polonization is the price of all political or social advancement. The Polish standard of living is miserably low, and the Ukrainian peasantry in the eastern district of Volhynia is incredibly poor. The old pre-war demand for a Ukrainian university at Lwow (Lemberg) has been consistently ignored, and ordinary schools are either bilingual or—as in the majority of cases—conducted only in Polish. Disabilities are attached to membership in the Uniate church, to which the Ukrainians cling by way of dissociating themselves from the zealous Roman Catholicism of the Poles. At the time of the Polish-German crisis in 1934 the Polish government made some effort to conciliate the Ukrainians: police persecution was diminished and direct provocation avoided. The main Ukrainian nationalist organization accepted the Polish advances, and for the last four years an uneasy truce has been maintained.

With the partitioning of Czechoslovakia Polish-Ukrainian relations became worse. The Polish government backed Hungary's claim to the whole of Ruthenia in the hope of blocking Germany's path to the east and keeping the Ukrainians divided and in subjection. This policy the Ukrainians of Poland bitterly resented; there were mass demonstrations in Lwow, and nationalist extremists began to set fire to Polish farms again. The Poles retaliated, and Uniate churches went up in flames. When the Vienna award was announced, it was evident that the Polish government had been snubbed. Since then the Ukrainians in Poland have been following up their advantage by pressing their claims to autonomy.

The bulk of the Ukrainians are peasants living in the Russian Ukraine. Until 1930 they seem to have got on very well within the U. S. S. R. They had been glad enough to be rid of the czarist landowners, and they preferred the Bolsheviks to the liberal intellectuals who had brought the German army into the country in 1918. A Ukrainian Communist, Skrypnik, was their chief administrator, and the use of the Ukrainian language was encouraged. In 1930, however, members of an organization called the Union for the Liberation of the Ukraine were brought to trial. The organization had apparently received help from Poland, and dark suspicions now began to injure the relations between the Russians and the Ukrainians. Skrypnik committed suicide, and other Ukrainian leaders disappeared or were brought to trial and executed. Economic circumstances exacerbated the quarrel: the Ukrainians believed that the Soviet authorities, like their czarist predecessors, were exploiting the natural wealth of the region for the general advantage of Russia, leaving the Ukrainians themselves to starve. The peasants, too, were traditionally more individualistic than the Russians and therefore more bitterly opposed to the collectivization of agriculture. Thus the Bolshevik regime found itself fighting the Ukrainianism upon which in the twenties it had smiled. In the last five years, however, the standard of living in the Ukraine has steadily risen, and with prosperity the tension between the Soviet authorities and the Ukrainian population has somewhat relaxed.

The Russian Ukraine, which contains about one-fifth of the total population of the U. S. S. R., is famous not only for its rich soil and its grain production; it also contains the Donetz coal mines and supplies of iron ore rich in manganese; its salt deposits are extensive, and it grows fruit on a large scale. No wonder that the Germans have long considered the advantages to be gained by exploiting inter-Slav enmities and controlling a future great Ukrainian state; even in the Russian Ukraine there are German-language "islands" whose existence may at any time be conveniently exploited. Ever since 1900, indeed, Germans have intrigued with Ukrainian nationalists. At Brest-Litovsk in 1918 the German military authorities induced the Ukrainians to accept a kind of German protectorate and an obligation to make large grain supplies available to Germany. This agreement led to acute friction between the German army and the Ukrainian population, and when the Germans collapsed in the west, they lost their hold upon the east as well. The Weimar republic, always on bad terms with the new republic of Poland, consistently encouraged discontent in the Polish Ukraine, and Berlin has long been an important center for the distribution of Ukrainian nationalist propaganda.

After Hitler made his truce with Poland in 1934, Germany seemed to lose interest in Poland's Ukrainians.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

But the Führer had long before warned all Slavs what to expect at his hands. "If today in Europe we talk of new land," he wrote in "Mein Kampf," "we can in the first instance think only of Russia, and the border states subject to her. . . . Our mission is the industrious work of the German plow, to which the sword only has to give the soil." In a century's time there are to be not 80 million Germans but 250 million living as a prosperous ruling caste in Eastern Europe with the Slavs as their helots. In order to bring this about, German propagandists, using Ruthenia as their base of operations, are preaching Ukrainian national unity; for Ukrainian liberation would threaten both Poland and Rumania with disintegration and unbar the road to Kiev and Odessa. It has been pointed out that the Ukrainian plan for autonomy recently rejected by the speaker of the Polish Diet bears striking resemblances to those Sudeten German demands for autonomy which aimed at the disintegration of Czechoslovakia.

In spite of its success at Munich, Germany is still in economic difficulties which urge it toward a new Brest-Litovsk treaty. Chaos in Ruthenia and oppression in Poland and Russia make the Ukrainians highly susceptible to German propagandists, whether these preach self-determination or anti-Semitism. In the atmosphere of Eastern Europe today it may be easy to revive the violent anti-Semitism of the pre-war Ukrainians, though the Soviet authorities have tried to stamp out this feeling within the Soviet Union and to shut out foreign propaganda. While the Ukrainian masses west of Russia are certainly responding to Nazi activities, it is interesting to find among the leaders some who feel deep suspicion of Germany. One of these, a man named Palnski, declared only recently that "the Ukrainians know very well Hitler's derogatory opinion of the Slavs, including the Ukrainians." "No one of us has any ambitions," he stated, "to become a meal for the German Herrenvolk or fodder for the Nordic beast." It remains to be seen, perhaps very soon, whether the Germans will succeed in stifling such perceptive critics or whether they will bog themselves in the Ukraine tomorrow in much the same fashion as they failed there once before in 1918. And finally it remains to be seen whether, if Greater Ukrainia arises, it will embrace the Communist or the Nazi creed.

Americans on England

BY ROBERT DELL

San Francisco, February 10

THREE months ago today I set foot on American territory for the first time in my life. In the course of that time I have seen a good deal of the United States, for I have traveled about four thousand miles—from New York to Washington, Washington to New Orleans, New Orleans to Los Angeles, and Los Angeles to San Francisco—and during my stay in New York I paid two short visits to Philadelphia. It has been my good fortune to come into contact with many cross-sections of American society. I have met bankers, representatives of big, medium, and small business, directors, artists, and writers in the motion-picture industry from Mr. Chaplin downward, as well as the people that I might naturally be expected to meet—namely, newspapermen, writers, artists, and people of every sort interested in international affairs and belonging to the numerous organizations dealing with those affairs. Above all I have met again, in some cases after a long interval, my many American friends, who had made me love America before I arrived.

I expected to like America; I like it even more than I expected. France has for years been my second country, and before I came to America I should have said that it was the best country I knew to live in, but now I am less sure of that. At any rate America runs it close in my estimation. Never, since I landed in New York on November 10, have I felt for a moment that I was in a foreign country. If there are any people in the world as kind and as hospitable as the Americans, I have not met them.

Perfect strangers to whom I have been given introductions have treated me as if I were an old friend. Perhaps there are no people from whom I have learned more about America than from the casual acquaintances made in the course of my travels. Taxi drivers, especially in New York, have talked to me about every subject under the sun. In particular they have questioned me about economic conditions in Europe and told me about economic conditions in America. One New York taxi driver told me that he had been a textile worker and, having become unemployed, had taken to taxi driving, which was considerably less profitable. Another said that the company by which he was employed gave its drivers only 35 per cent of the gross takings and that a daily minimum they had once received had been taken away from them. If this is generally true, taxi drivers are worse off in New York than in London or Paris.

On a long American railway journey the lounge car becomes, when the ice is broken—and it is broken very quickly—a sort of family party. I made in the course of my long journeys friendships which I hope will be permanent with people I have since met in Southern California and San Francisco, and I have a whole collection of visiting cards given to me on the train by people living in various parts of the United States. On my journey from New Orleans to Los Angeles one of my fellow-travelers who lived in Houston, Texas, begged me to get out there and stay the night at his house. I was reluctantly obliged to decline his invitation.

Inevitably one's impressions after three months in an enormous country can be only superficial, but there seem to me, on the question of Anglo-American relations, to be two outstanding points of view in America. On the one hand there are the people who say that the United States must always stand by England at all costs—they often, I am glad to say, include France. On the other hand there are the people who say that England has too much influence at Washington and is always trying to drag the United States into war in defense of British interests. Now I am chary about expressing an opinion on questions of this kind. At every lecture that I have given in America somebody has asked me what America ought to do in some given case. I have always refused to reply, or rather I have replied: "That is your business not mine, and I cannot express any opinion on the subject." When I gave this reply at the University of California, where I lectured a few days ago, the chairman, Dr. Ira B. Cross, said that I was the only Englishman who had come to America without telling the Americans what to do. I hope that he exaggerated, for the Englishmen who come to America and tell the Americans what they ought to do only do infinite harm. They give a handle to the people who say that England is trying to drag the United States into war.

Some time ago my friend Sir George Paish, speaking at a meeting in San Francisco, made an impassioned appeal to America to go to the aid of the British Empire. I am told by people who were present at the meeting that he had a very bad reception. I regret it, but I am not surprised. I am sure that Sir George Paish is sincerely concerned about the future welfare of the civilized world in general, but he should have realized that such an appeal, coming from an Englishman, cannot appear disinterested to an American audience. To my amazement, an American citizen of British Indian origin said at a luncheon I attended at Los Angeles that it was the duty of America to save the British Empire. I started my speech, which immediately followed his, by saying that, if I were an American, I should not agree with him on that point. Why should America save the British Empire? Can the British Empire ultimately be saved? All past empires have disappeared sooner or later, and I see no reason why the British Empire should be an exception to the rule. For my part, I find Mr. Briffault's book, "The Decline and Fall of the British Empire," terribly convincing, in spite of a few mistakes in fact in regard to the events of the last few years, notably about the policy of the late Sir Austen Chamberlain, which was not, as Mr. Briffault thinks, the same as that of his father and half-brother, but just the opposite. Austen Chamberlain was not pro-German but intensely pro-French. He was not the author of the Treaty of Locarno, which was proposed by the German government on the suggestion of Lord D'Abernon, to prevent Austen Chamberlain from making an alliance with France, as he was on the point of doing.

And for my part I should like to see all empires disappear forever. My solution of the colonial question is to put the colonies of all countries under international mandates. To that Hitler will never agree, and for that reason alone it would be a reactionary measure to allow Germany to have any colonies, apart from the iniquity of handing over any "non-Aryan" population to Nazi control. Naturally, it would be a disaster if the British Empire fell to pieces only to pass into the hands of the totalitarian states, but even that is possible unless there is soon a radical change in British foreign policy.

Speaking from the point of view of a European, I think that both the American opinions that I have mentioned are partly right and partly wrong. Naturally, all democratic Europeans would like to see the United States actively backing the democratic forces in Europe, which does not at all necessarily mean risking war. One of the things that has most struck me in America is the failure of the majority of Americans to realize that their country is now the greatest and most powerful country in the world. When America leads, the rest of the world will have to follow. My opinion is that the future of the world is in the hands of the United States and Russia, and that sooner or later you in America will recognize this and act accordingly. There is no real difficulty in the way of an accommodation between the United States and Russia, for the Russian government is now the most realistic and, in the true sense of the term, the most opportunistic in the world.

However this may be, my opinion if I were an American would be that France is a more natural ally than England for the United States. France is much more really democratic than England, and on France more than on England the future of democracy depends. If American influence could have been used to encourage French governments to stand firm against British pressure, Europe would be in a better state today than it is in. France is the center of European civilization—Paris is the intellectual capital of the world—and if France falls, European civilization will fall with it. The worst thing about Neville Chamberlain's policy is that, although no doubt he is not conscious of it, he is on the way to destroy European civilization as well as the British Empire. Close American cooperation with the present British and French governments would be a disaster to Europe.

Those in America who complain that British influence is too strong at Washington have therefore, in my opinion, some reason on their side, for at present British influence everywhere is thoroughly bad. But the reason given for this opinion by too many of the Americans who hold it is a mistaken one. The British ruling classes are in the main anti-American. They do not wish the United States to intervene in the affairs of the world. They much prefer American isolation. How else can one explain the fact that when, in the Manchurian and Abyssinian affairs, there was an offer of American cooperation with the League of Nations, it was repulsed by the British government? The British ruling classes are jealous of the power and influence of the United States. They want to rule the world in cooperation with Hitler, and they do not want American cooperation. British influence is used at Washington to prevent America from butting in and spoiling Chamberlain's little games. Anthony Eden was probably charged with a mission to that end. In any case the purpose of the visit of the King and Queen to America is to win American sympathy for Chamberlain's policy. Chamberlain is using his sovereigns as publicity agents. If I were an American I should have been humiliated at the revelation that the British Prime Minister was able to interfere with American broadcasting through the kind offices of the American Ambassador to London. Speaking from the point of view of a European and an internationalist who has only European and international interests at heart, I say without hesitation that in present conditions the less British influence there is at Washington and the less American cooperation with the British government the better for Europe and the world.

Living Philosophies

X. PLEASURE BE YOUR GUIDE

BY REBECCA WEST

I HAVE no faith in the sense of comforting beliefs which persuade me that all my troubles are blessings in disguise. I do not believe that any facts exist, or rather are accessible to me, which give any assurance that my life has served an eternal purpose. I do not find this distressing. That is not because my life has been so happy that its superficial import strikes me as satisfactory. My childhood and my girlhood were overshadowed by the tragedies of my elders, and my twenties were a nightmare of overwork and harassment. Not till my marriage, and I married in my late thirties, did I have one human being close to me who ever thought of saving me fatigue or pain or responsibility. Now that I am at last able to take pleasure in both my family and my work, it happens that not only myself but all those whom I love may before long meet a violent death either in the course of an idiot war or at the hands of idiot fascists. There have been many worse fates than mine, but I cannot think it ideal.

Nevertheless, I feel no overwhelming anxiety to find some creed to assure me that all has been for the best and I have only to follow a particular path to be consoled by eternal happiness. It may be that I should feel such anxiety if I were stricken by a painful and incurable disease, but as yet I have not felt it. I do not even find in myself any great curiosity as to whether my soul is immortal or not. If I received definite and convincing information either way I should be very interested, though not, I think, either extremely depressed or elated; but I do not feel the lack of such information as a hardship.

I have, as I have said, no faith, in the sense of a store of comforting beliefs. But I have faith in a process, in a particular process that is part of the general process of life, though it is sometimes annulled by it. I find an ultimate value in the efforts of human beings to do more than merely exist, to choose and analyze their experiences and by the findings of that analysis help themselves to further experiences which are of a more pleasurable kind. I use the word pleasurable in its widest sense: to describe such experiences as come from good food and wine, exercise, the physical act of lovemaking, the practice of a beloved craft or art or science, a happy marriage, the care of children or the sick or the old by those who enjoy it, the service of valid ideas, or the administration of worthy institutions, or the pursuit of agreeable sensations. Trahit sua quemque voluptas. By indulgence in these experiences life is made more pleasant from day to day. That is in itself of the first importance. That end would be worth while pursuing if no other benefit were obtained. But it also serves the purpose of furnishing each human soul with access to the avenue along which it can advance farthest toward the comprehension and mastery of life. Pleasure is not arbitrary; it is the sign by which the human organization shows that it is performing a function which it finds appropriate to its means and ends. I take it as a prime cause of the present confusion of society that it is too sickly and too doubtful to use pleasure frankly as a test of value.

There is, of course, the objection that man's tastes are so inherently vicious that if pleasure were taken as a standard he would exhaust his vital powers in drunkenness and sexual license. I do not believe this to be true of humanity as we know it in our civilization. It obviously is true in certain circumstances which prevent the development of alternative amusements. Convincing evidence of that is given in John Morris's anthropological study, "Living with Lepchas," but the evidence speaks of a restriction of general appetite quite as remarkable as the indulgence of these particular appetites. I have observed human beings for a number of years in the United States and in all countries of Europe, except Russia, Poland, Rumania, and Turkey; and I do not find that dissipations of this sort are their special temptation.

The fear that pleasure is an unreliable standard because the common man will identify pleasure with debauchery has two sources, neither of which is discreditable. First, there is the recollection of the difficulty found in more elementary stages of society to distract man from concentration on the simpler forms of animal gratification. Secondly, there is the exaggerated consciousness of a real twofold difficulty in education. It is certainly not easy to convince young people that the simple and direct pleasures of "having a good time" will pale before the more complicated pleasures of adult life, which may even involve having quite a bad time. There is no way of assuring a boy of sixteen that some day he may find working in a tropical hospital just as enjoyable as speeding in an automobile, or a girl of sixteen that some day she may find just as great happiness in looking after several children on small means as she does in dancing. It is also difficult to persuade young people to undergo the preliminary training necessary for them to enjoy adult pleasures, since this is often temporarily painful. On both these sources of fear candor can shine with a helpful light. We need not be afraid that the drunkenness and promiscuity of the slums reveal the common trend of human life if we admit to ourselves that the greater decorum of the bourgeoisie is the result not of renunciation, which is indeed not a process we can count upon, but of command of more refined and satisfying means of self-indulgence. The educational difficulty is much graver. It can never be easily solved; but if adults admitted to children that they lived for pleasure, of the value of which every child has an intuitive knowledge, instead of for some undefined value which is served by renunciation, children would put much more trust in the good faith of adults and accept their advice about the most useful preparation for life.

It is of paramount importance that these difficulties should be faced and that pleasure should be recognized as a reasonable standard, because of the chaos that establishes itself if we do not. The belief that all higher life is governed by the idea of renunciation poisons our moral life by engendering vanity and egotism. But if we take gratification as our ideal we thereby impose on ourselves a program of self-restraint; for if we claim that we are under the necessity of learning all that we can about reality, and that we learn most through pleasure, we must also admit that we are under the necessity of hearing what our fellow-creatures learn about it and of working out a system by which we all curb our pleasures so that they do not interfere with those of others. If, however, we claim that it is by renunciation that we achieve wisdom, we have no logical reason for feeling any disapproval of conditions that thrust pain and deprivation on others.

But indeed we need no further argument in favor of taking pleasure as a standard when we consider the only alternative that faces us. If we do not live for pleasure we shall soon find ourselves living for pain. If we do not regard as sacred our own joys and the joys of others, we open the door and let into life the ugliest attribute of the human race, which is cruelty. I believe this vice to be as much of a shame and a doom to humanity as the original sin of the theologians; and I believe it to be the root of all other vices. I do not believe people are cruel because they are greedy; I am sure they invent greed as a pretext for cruelty. I am as sure that the sexual caprice which makes people desert still living mates or thrust their attentions on those who are offended by them has not its origin in the pure sexual instinct but is a use made of it by cruelty, seeking an instrument. I take it that cruelty is an early error of the mind, which becomes a confirmed habit before reason can disperse it. Hatred necessarily precedes love in human experience. After the tideless peace of prenatal existence the child is born into a world of uncomfortable physical experiences and terrifying uncomprehended controls. It must feel that in order to preserve itself it must lay about it; it must beat with its hands and plot evil against the aggressors. Thus a habit is initiated; thus a fantasy is engendered. It is imagined that it is right to inflict pain, which is given the most intricate and noxious ramifications by early experience. When one inflicts pain on the surrounding world one is punished, one suffers a greater pain than one inflicted, one is treated as guilty. This does not rob pain of its majesty, for punishment is pain, and punishment is acclaimed as good and holy. Is it not a way of salvation to be punished?

This last question the mind, being no fool, transforms quickly into another. If it did not do so, the human race would quickly become extinct, rushing forward to impale itself on expiatory tortures. Out of the instinct for self-preservation, and logically enough, it asks, "If it is a good and holy thing to be punished, must it not also be a good and holy thing to punish?" It answers that it is; and our earth becomes the hell it is. Thus we human beings plant in ourselves the perennial blossom of cruelty—the conviction that if we hurt other people we are doing good to ourselves and to life in general.

To destroy this cancer of our spirit is our real problem. Since its destruction means the correction of the whole structure of life down to the foundations that were laid when it first became self-conscious, it is a problem which is almost certainly beyond our power ever to solve completely. When we put our hands to this problem we must abandon all hope of success, certainly in our time, possibly in eternity. This is, however, of no importance. Any success achieved against cruelty is in itself absolute. I mean by this that it gives us and those from whom the cruel act has been averted an intense pleasure which could not be increased by a quantitative increase of the success.

It may be argued that if a need to inflict cruelty is so inherent in our nature, and its satisfaction such a stimulus to performance, there can be nothing more useless and dangerous than to interfere with it. That is exactly the issue, it seems to me, on which we have to part company with the obvious and convenient if we are to be morally respectable. It is not tolerable that humanity should continue to pay such a price for well-being. Nor is it a simple matter of continuance, for an appetite grows by what it feeds on, and there is no knowing to what hell our developed love of cruelty may lead us before the earth cools and we come to an end. There is no end to the cantrips we may indulge in if we do not eradicate this cruelty from our nature, or to the deterioration of our history that may result; for if cruelty is a stimulus to action, it also determines the quality of our actions.

There are certain general ideas which seem to me to be imposed on us by the recognition of this cruelty. One is the necessity for freedom of speech and the arts. We have to scrutinize all the advances of society to judge whether they are cruel or frustrate cruelty, and for that purpose we must hear the evidence of all persons affected by their operation and of all persons qualified by experience or learning or speculative gifts to form an interesting opinion on what those operations might be. It is therefore necessary that all classes of men should be given the fullest opportunity to express themselves without constraint, not only out of admiration for an abstraction, but as a practical measure toward human survival. It is also necessary that the artist, of whatsoever kind, should be free to anatomize the spirit, so that we can comprehend the battlefield that is this life, and which are the troops of light and which of darkness, and what light may be, and what darkness. For the essence of our human plight is confusion. Those who love cruelty dress themselves up as its enemies, and those who hate it appear to be, and sometimes are, its servants.

This deception is crystallized in its most pictorial, in its most horribly important form by the history of Christianity. The spectacle of the rise of fascism and some contact with the Eastern church, which is many centuries nearer primitive Christianity than the Western church, have made it clear to me that the life of Christ should have been an incomparable blessing to man and a revelation of the way he must follow if he is not to be a beast, and a failure at that. Christ was an incarnate denunciation of cruelty. He was sinless, he was full of love, he was ingenious in devising prescriptions of mercy; he was what the world needed, he could have taught us how to make life a perpetual pleasure. Society could find nothing better to do with him than kill him. Here was a man who could have saved his life if he had dissimulated his virtue. He unveiled it, knowing that he made himself a target for man's arrows. Just as a great artist finds the perfect myth to symbolize the truth he has discovered, that shall sum it up in a form acceptable by the human faculty of attention, so Christ by his crucifixion demonstrated exactly what the assault of cruelty on the innocent means; and the subsequent services devised by the early church commemorated the beauty of the virtue that was slain and the beastliness shown by the slayer, and reiterated the warning that this was the kind of crime man was inherently likely to commit unless he watched himself. There could be no more proper medicine for the human disease. But the church has poured as much of the draft as possible down the drain by its attempts to develop a doctrine to account for the crucifixion of Christ as an atonement for the sins of man instead of a demonstration of them. These attempts were founded on the primitive idea of the magical value of sacrifice for propitiating the powers that be, and they were initiated by St. Paul, out of the legalistic quality of his mind. They were carried further by the Fathers of the Church, and given lasting authority by St. Augustine. He was one of the greatest of geniuses and a most lovable character, but he was also a violent man, in love with violence and unrepelled by cruelty. He therefore found great pleasure in imagining a gross drama in which the devil held humanity in his power by reason of its sins and would have condemned it to death wholesale had he not killed Christ, after which he could not claim the blood of humanity since in the divine life of Christ he had been paid so much more than it owed him. This gives cruelty an honorable part in the redemption of man instead of denouncing it.

The refusal to recognize pleasure as the supreme value in human life allows man to indulge in some of his characteristically false logic. His mind, which is quite inadequate for the purpose of mastering his environment and therefore always oversimplifies, sees the universe in antitheses, in dichotomies. He says, foolishly enough, for one cannot cut into clean halves two substances that pass into each other by insensible gradation, that there is light and darkness, life and death, pleasure and pain. He feels a need to identify these antitheses one with another, and since he is not allowed to make the obvious identification between pleasure and life and light, which would be rough indeed but sound enough save for the most crude and diseased character, he comes to the conclusion that the universe is a queerer place than he thought it, and he agrees with the cruel that life and light are pain. But there is that in all the more decent sorts of human being which warns them that it is a filthy thing to inflict pain, and therefore all that are most likely to give themselves that warning and take it are likely to put themselves in the position of those on whom pain is inflicted: to be a beaten wife, a cheated husband, is better than to be a bullying husband, an idle and spendthrift wife; to be put into a concentration camp is better than to put others into it. They become masochists instead of sadists. This must inevitably happen unless the emphasis is transferred to pleasure. Then only can a good man feel himself at ease in happiness with an unmalignant partner, and in victory over a bad man; then only will the human species have a chance to practice some other art than suicide, and creation oust nothingness.

To live by this philosophy is more difficult than following the old. Pain is always at hand in some form or other, but pleasure is harder to find; and these antitheses are protean and treacherous, always pretending to be one another. Birth-control, for example, is a means of pleasure for women in certain circumstances: it enables them not to have more children than they can feed and clothe and adequately love. In other circumstances it can be the means of preventing them from knowing pleasure: it can enable a masculinist society to deny women the right to have any children at all, and keep them as starved and sterile producers and consumers of worthless goods in large towns, and in this second form it affects to make the same offer of freedom as the first, though in fact it enjoins slavery. But more dangerous than the protean nature of environment is the protean nature of our own souls, that constantly avails itself of these changes to make its own under a cover of consistency. It is because of the ineradicable persistence of cruelty in the human species, which may be incorrigible, that I should never be saddened to be warned of its passing. I can imagine no better news than to hear that there had emerged from the South American forest or the Australian desert specimens of a new species which would, by reason of some new organ or adaptation of an organ, be able to dominate man as man has dominated the other animals. They might, particularly if their reproductive systems were differently planned, be less morbid. Our lives would seem more tolerable and more honorable if we could know ourselves a transitional form, superseding what was worse and being superseded by what was better. Not that I feel our lives to be entirely intolerable and dishonorable. The living philosophy which really sustains us, which is our basic nourishment, more than any finding of the mind, is simply the sensation of life, exquisite when it is not painful.

In the Wind

WILLIAM GREEN has heatedly denied on several occasions that the A. F. of L. would favor amendments to the Wagner Act which might "play into the hands" of employers. In this connection a Washington report in the February 11 issue of Business Week is of interest: "There's tacit agreement among some A. F. of L. and business leaders on Wagner Act amendments, but employers can't rely too much on the federation to pull their chestnuts out of the fire. Lewis is just waiting for a slip that will give C. I. O. a chance to show that Green is the tool of the bosses."

WHEN WILLIAM S. KNUDSEN, president of General Motors, visited Des Moines recently, the Hotel Fort Des Moines took extraordinary measures to insure his comfort. Among other things it issued a bulletin to all employees emphasizing that Mr. Knudsen's name was pronounced with a silent k and a long u.

THE CHICAGO Tribune's feud with ex-Mayor William Hale Thompson is famous among newspapermen. The staff has instructions never to mention his name and, if compelled to recognize his existence, to refer only to a "former mayor." This feud reached new heights recently when Chicago's current mayoralty candidates, including Thompson, addressed the Chicago Teachers' Union. The Tribune put the story on the front page and ran excerpts from all the speeches except Thompson's, whose appearance at the meeting wasn't even noted.

LIFE'S-DARKEST-MOMENT DEPT.: Three weeks ago this column revealed the unreported arrival in this country of one of Hjalmar Schacht's close associates. We reported that he told intimates here that Schacht's parting words to him were: "I don't know whether they'll build a monument for me—or a scaffold." It was a good line, and since it was relayed to us from a source we consider reliable, we have no reason to doubt it was spoken. It was also a good line, several readers have reminded us, when it first appeared in John Gunther's "Inside Europe" three years ago.

AN AMERICAN journalist attending a cocktail party in Mexico City received this "inside" version of Mexican politics from the wife of a prominent oil magnate whose properties had been expropriated. "Of course Cárdenas is a Communist. Don't you realize that Stalin sent Trotsky over here to guide Cárdenas? And why did John L. Lewis come down? To get his orders from Trotsky and relay them to Frances Perkins."

DESCRIBING THE provisions of a new law proposed by Michigan patrioteers, the Detroit Free Press reported that "it also would be mandatory that every classroom period be opened with a pledge of allegiance to the fag."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

MY RECENT review of George Seldes's "Lords of the Press" got me into hot water. Mr. Seldes thinks that I did not do justice to the book and possibly I did not. However, I still feel that in the main my review is accurate, and I am not guilty of the charge he made that I failed to read certain passages. That I sympathize with the purpose of the volume and believe in the essential truthfulness and accuracy of his views of the press of today, I gladly stress again. It is his workmanship in this book that I quarrel with.

A warm friend, Jacob Billikopf, has written me a letter in regard to my criticism of David Stern in the same review of Seldes's book. I take from his letter the following:

> To the great credit of David Stern be it said that, although he is supposed to have "obtained loans" from Governor Earle, which is not the case, he did not support Earle in the primaries and vigorously attacked his principal backer. A study of the list of stockholders of the Philadelphia Record would, indeed, be a revelation in that it would show that the majority of them are bitterly opposed to the so-called economic and political "heresies" sponsored by the Stern papers—the Philadelphia Record, New York Post, and Camden Courier-Post.
>
> There could be cited many instances of large advertisers in Philadelphia whom the Record criticizes vigorously when it feels that such criticism is necessary in the public interest. Those of us who know Mr. Stern are only too well aware that he would not tolerate the least pressure from advertisers or stockholders. In the light of what he has done for Philadelphia in the past ten years, Mr. Seldes understated the case for the liberalism of the Stern papers.

I should be the last to wish to do the slightest injustice to David Stern, but I must point out that Governor Earle is and has been a bondholder in the New York Post and so has United States Senator Joseph F. Guffey. Each subscribed for $50,000 of bonds and each paid by giving his note for that amount to the New York Post, which handed the notes over to the Bankers' Securities Corporation for discount. This placed the New York Post under serious obligation to two leading Democratic politicians. That makes it all the more creditable that Mr. Stern opposed Mr. Earle in the primaries, but it does not mitigate the fact that he who is supposedly running a politically independent newspaper tied himself up with those two Democratic politicians. I submit that if Mr. Seldes had found that a conservative newspaper had borrowed money from two leading conservative politicians he would have considered that complete proof of its subservience to politicians and big business.

It is, of course, gratifying to know that Mr. Stern has stood out against advertisers. I acknowledge gladly the hundreds of admirable liberal editorials which have appeared in his three newspapers; he has carried on some fine crusades for the public welfare. Yet he is not a free agent. George Seldes points this out when he writes that Stern has faced the choice "of publishing as liberal and free a newspaper as possible, with the necessary compromises . . ." or none at all. If these compromises, if his silences on certain men and things, are to be justified on the ground that otherwise Mr. Stern could not own the New York Post, for example, then I can only say that I cannot consider any newspaper which has to do that either liberal, free, or independent. Whether the net result of Mr. Stern's ownership of the Post has justified these compromises and silences each person must decide according to his ethics or his philosophy. Personally I have long believed that the Post cannot survive under those conditions. The public is, as the Gallup poll has shown, increasingly suspicious of the daily newspaper, and you cannot conceal facts from people indefinitely; ultimately they sense the truth, I believe, even if only subconsciously.

What is here presented is the old problem of whether the end justifies the means. The venerators of Joseph Pulitzer overlook the shocking early history of the World, its shameless sensationalism and wholesale falsification in the years immediately leading up to the Spanish War, its share in lowering the tone of our press, and point to the admirable record made by the World in later years as complete justification of Joseph Pulitzer's career. To accept this approval of evil methods to make money in order to turn over a new leaf and become ethical and patriotically useful is obviously to justify every newspaper debasement, and especially that old cynical and lying newspaper defense for vulgarity and crime stories, namely, that the public wants that sort of thing and that therefore the responsibility is the public's and not the manager's. We can only hope to get a decent press by insisting on the highest standards in morals and ethics for newspaper owners and refusing to let their good deeds validate their sins—this whether the owner is a Stern or a Pulitzer or a Hearst or anybody else.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE CUTTING OF AN AGATE

BY LOUISE BOGAN

> I have been busy with a single art, that of . . . a small, unpopular theater; and this art may well seem to practical men, busy with some program of industrial or political regeneration, of no more account than the shaping of an agate; and yet in the shaping of an agate, whether in the cutting or the making of the design, one discovers, if one have a speculative mind, thoughts that seem important and principles that may be applied to life itself, and certainly if one does not believe so, one is but a poor cutter of so hard a stone.
>
> August, 1912.

YEATS'S break with his early style and subject matter—though the break never was, and never needed to be, complete—dates from 1909, or a year or two earlier. It has been said that this break was the result of his entrance into practical affairs. This statement is only partially true. Yeats's youthful ambition was to be a man of action, and he was more active in organization—in the Nationalist movement and literary societies—in his twenties than at any later time. It was only when he broke with the popular theater, which had interested him for ten years, and refused to make any further attempt to satisfy middle-class ideals of art that the resonant tone characteristic of the later poems sounded for the first time.

Synge died in 1909. Two years earlier the "Playboy" riots had occurred. And it was in this same period that Yeats witnessed the scandal raised by popular opinion and the Irish newspapers over the question of whether the city of Dublin should build a gallery to house Sir Hugh Lane's gift of Impressionist paintings. He witnessed, that is, in an acute form, the hostility of the middle class toward disinterested artistic expression, as it had been witnessed a generation earlier in France. The bourgeois mind demanded that art be moral or useful, and not only discredited the artist's function but outlawed the artist. Flaubert and Baudelaire were summoned before courts of law, and in Ireland the citizens of Dublin attacked Synge with outright violence.

Ireland, because of its ambiguous political status, threw up bourgeois culture late. And it was there produced in such a clear form that the transformation of the countryman's economy into that of the town dweller is an easily visible process. Yeats wished to give his country not only a sense of its former greatness but also a feeling for the nobility of the arts in general. After the bigotry aroused by "The Playboy" he began to see that his ideal was antipathetic to his audience.

> I believed . . . that a new intellectual life would begin, like that of young Ireland, but more profound and personal. . . . I could not foresee that a new class . . . would change the nature of the Irish movement. . . . Power passed to small shopkeepers, to men who had risen above the traditions of the countryman without learning those of cultivated life . . . and who, because of their poverty, ignorance, and superstitious piety, are much subject to all kinds of fear. Immediate victory, immediate utility, became everything, and we artists, who are the servants not of any cause but of mere naked life, . . . became as elsewhere in Europe protesting individual voices.

This was written in 1907. In 1909 Yeats begins to speak of "the mask," and to write those direct poems filled with scorn for "Paudeen" and Paudeen's wealthy "betters." "Responsibilities" (1914) developed this phase fully. The role of action was finally refused, and the artist's role, inimical in every way to popular taste, finally accepted.

The common admonition administered to a writer when he refuses to express the opinions and ideals current in his lifetime, choosing instead his own subjects and symbols, is that he thus risks preciosity and final sterility. Yeats, in refusing to cater to the middle, had two fields open to him—"aristocratic" and "vulgar" expression. These ends of the scale are equally rejected by the bourgeoisie: subtlety puzzles and coarseness shocks then. Yeats wrote his new plays in a form derived from the aristocratic Noh drama of Japan. He interested himself in the most "unserviceable" subjects—the Kabbala, spiritualism, Hindu philosophy, Byzantine civilization. In "A Vision" he built up a whole mystical system and applied it to historic facts. The later plays are so wrapped in symbol that they approach sheer incantation, and Yeats steadily refused to make their intention clear. He said to a musician who was to write music for these plays: "Lose my words in patterns of sound as the name of God is lost in Arabian arabesques. They are a secret between the singers, myself, and yourself."

The revolt against the idea of art's usefulness could hardly be pushed farther than Yeats in this manner extended it. Did the poems, then, written in this vein, in the last thirty years of his life, from the age of forty-four to the time of his death nearly at seventy-three, suffer?

On the contrary, they went on to ever greater degrees of power and suggestiveness; they touched the borders where poetry becomes ultimate evocation, and the regions where religion rises from universal mystery.

> These lovers, purified by tragedy,
> Hurry into each other's arms; those eyes
> By water, herb, and solitary prayer
> Made aquiline, are open to that light.
> Though somewhat broken by the leaves, that light
> Lies in a circle on the grass; therein
> I turn the pages of my holy book.

For two years, between the ages of sixty-seven and sixty-nine, Yeats wrote no poetry. "I had never been so long barren." Then began a new period of creation, to which we owe the great poems which have been appearing in English and American magazines during the last few years. In these poems "aristocratic" and "vulgar" forms unite. The songs and meditations are often "coarse" and written in as simple a form as street ballads or broadsheets. Yeats never abandoned the ballad forms first learned from Sligo peasants in his childhood: one or two appear in every volume, and the "Crazy Jane" songs in "The Winding Stair" (1933) are late and intense examples of the type. The last ballads go beyond even these; there is nothing quite like them in literature. The last lyrics of Goethe, written in age, seem sentimental and literary in comparison. These poems are unstained by any breath of false resignation or "ennobling" feeling. They express the sane bawdiness of healthy old age, in phrases written, none the less, with every distinction, every knowledge of effect, every delicate sympathy native to a sensitive nature. Meditation and speculation are there, but behind them, to the last, still exist "naked life" and the vivid sensual world.

Any artist old or young can take courage from these poems. And he can discover in Yeats's prose writing—which developed, like the poetry, from elaboration into simplicity, and documents fully the struggle of a long life—old evils again to be combated, however new and disguised their modern forms. A battle has been fought against them up to the very last days of a man recently dead, who emerged the victor.

One Kind of Satire

BOOKS

Unromantic Spain

SIROCCO, AND OTHER STORIES. By Ralph Bates. Random House. $2.50.

OF WRITERS using the English language Ralph Bates has probably the most intimately local knowledge of Spain—a knowledge that goes back far beyond the present war and that grew out of living among the Spanish people Bates knows not simply Barcelona and Madrid, but the countryside and the fishing villages, and has come upon churchmen of all degrees and radicals of all complexions. Having fought in the front lines at Madrid, he has been a participant in Loyalist history as well as an observer of Spanish ways, and very likely he comes as close to the truth, in his observation of the national character, as any foreigner can.

"Sirocco" is a series of stories spanning the last fifteen or eighteen years and picturing Spain during the monarchy, the republic, and the Franco insurrection. The first stories seem remote in time, part of a modest, not much changing world marked by plowing and fishing, birth and death. Most of these stories seem written with crayon rather than ink: the sense of the country lies upon them, but they are subdued and a trifle blurred, while the longest and least typical of them, "The Quince," must face the charge of being sentimental.

"Comrade Vila"—in the section treating of the republic—is the first really interesting story; "Sirocco," which immediately follows it, the first impressive one. Told in the first person by a revolutionary who is hiding out in a Catalan fishing village, "Sirocco" is grotesque, pathetic, humorous, dramatic by turns, alternating domestic comedy with the vivid life of the fishing smacks, and reaching its climax in its account of a sudden sirocco.

Mr. Bates's stories of the civil war are very unequal, ranging from the flat failure of "Brunete Ballad" to the high point of the book, "43rd Division," the tale of a scout of a Lost Battalion in the Pyrenees. Pere, an anarchist by temperament as well as conviction, blindly courageous, utterly incapable of taking orders, comes through at full length; and his trip over the mountains in a blinding snowstorm and his escape by moonlight from Italian snipers are chronicles of great adventure told in a swirl of exciting prose.

Mr. Bates is so uneven a writer that it is impossible to pass a com-

AN INVITATION TO MEET

ADOLF HITLER AND HIS NAZIS

-but at a safe distance-

YOUR GUIDE: MARTHA DODD

daughter of ex-Ambassador to Germany William E. Dodd, who gives an outspoken account of her four years in Nazi Germany.

YOUR PASSPORT: THAT BOOK OF HERS

Through Embassy Eyes

She knows everyone in Nazi officialdom, and her intimate portrayals of the great and the near-great are probably without parallel. $3.00

THE ANTIGONE OF SOPHOCLES

AN ENGLISH VERSION

by Dudley Fitts and Robert Fitzgerald

Perhaps the best of the Greek plays and, according to W. Somerset Maugham, a perfect play if any perfect play exists. This translation is by those gifted poets whose collaboration on The Alcestis of Euripides was widely praised. Genevieve Taggard says: "These are the only versions I will want to read in the future, and the only versions I would give to poets and students." Just out, $1.50

THE ART OF CEZANNE

by Albert C. Barnes and Violette de Mazia

A fresh study of Cezanne's work of all periods, based on 11 years research and incorporating a scientific analysis of his form and technique. With 171 halftones, $5.00

"This is for the MIDDLETOWN market...and tops...*"

INDUSTRIAL VALLEY

*"It seems almost incredible that anyone could write MY SISTER EILEEN and win all through laughter—and then turn right about face and stir her readers to the depths with this extraordinarily moving history of a town (Akron) and its people."—Virginia Kirkus's report to booksellers. $3.00

by Ruth (MY SISTER EILEEN) McKenney

The favorite non-fiction book*

Listen! the Wind

by Anne Lindbergh

*So honored by the American Booksellers' Association Award. "Even better than NORTH TO THE ORIENT."—Saturday Review.

200th thousand, $2.50

Here is the most masterly, the most completely damning analysis of Fascism yet made. And here is the answer to that question: What can America do about it?

by LEWIS MUMFORD

author of "Technics and Civilization," "The Culture of Cities"

Men Must Act

The first definite, practical program for the United States to follow in combatting fascism, at the same time preserving world peace. $1.50

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

prehensive critical judgment on his book as a whole. Merely in its writing "Sirocco" seesaws between the driving power of "43rd Division" and such a sentence-in-a-bad-translation as: "I followed him all day and now as I may think with somewhat unusual frankness, I admit my conscience found a certain ease today because he had certainly assassinated the cardinal." His best stories seem lighted up from within; his worst are dull, circuitous, coreless. His use of situation, treatment of sensation, shaping of characters are just as often faltering as firm. He constantly experiments with ways of telling a story, and he much too frequently misses out.

What does unify this artistic mixture of good and bad, however, is a refusal to write about Spain glibly or to observe Spain picturesquely. There are no facile peasant "types" or cut-to-measure revolutionaries in these tales. There are devices a-plenty, but no cheap tricks. Bates's chronicles of the war are not the chronicles of war which most appeal to the average civilian mind; they lie much closer to experience. And Bates's Spain is not one of brilliant colors and throbbing music, of bullfights and mantillas and mysticism. We are not in a world made recognizable by Bizet and Debussy. This is the unlettered, unromantic Spain of the people, and Bates is most of the time content to write about it quite soberly—not with the quick enthusiasm of the tourist, but with the interest of someone who is quietly searching for fundamentals.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

China at War

INSIDE RED CHINA. By Nym Wales. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

UNCONQUERED. By James Bertram. John Day Company. $3.

THE DRAGON WAKES. By Edgar Ansel Mowrer. William Morrow and Company. $2.

THE Communist armies of China have probably given the Japanese invaders more trouble than any other Chinese force. What are the principles which govern their military tactics? Early in May, 1937, Peng Teh-huai, now deputy field commander of the Eighth Route Army, was discussing this topic with Nym Wales. His brilliant summary (pp. 313-316) should be read in full; it was intended to apply to Chinese resistance in general, not solely to the Red armies.

> The fundamental idea in our strategy [Peng then stated] must be to realize a war of maneuver and of annihilation. That is, we must decisively destroy small units of the enemy. We must chop every advance into pieces as it thrusts forward. . . . In general, we must avoid formal positional warfare wherever it is possible to maneuver. . . . Of course, there must be positional defense of large cities, but the position in the defense plans should be by points and not by a line—that is, we must hold our stationary points but not the line between them, which we defend by maneuvering in that area, and by annihilating parties of attack. . . . Defense by points instead of by a line makes it possible to use a small force to attract a big force of the enemy; thus a minority can force the enemy to deploy big forces around it, thereby making it impossible to use these forces elsewhere; thus the enemy cannot utilize its men efficiently.

Less than five months later Peng Teh-huai was applying the tactics outlined in this statement to the fighting in the mountain passes of northern Shansi. These months also spanned the period of Mrs. Wales's stay in Yenan—a period in which the launching of Japan's invasion placed the finishing touches on the Kuomintang-Communist united front. Her book, however, is much more than a commentary on the events of the crucial summer of 1937. It is a companion volume to "Red Star over China," and equally indispensable to students of the Chinese Communist movement. Using the technique employed by her husband, she has extensively supplemented that premier study of Red China. Chu Teh, for example, had not yet reached Shensi at the time of Edgar Snow's visit. From this senior Red commander, Nym Wales obtained both the story of his life and a detailed history of the Kuomintang-Communist military struggle in the south from 1927 to 1934. Mao Tse-tung and Lo Fu contribute an analysis of the class structure of Chinese society, as well as a description of the stages of the Chinese revolution since the Taiping rebellion. Most of these sections, which are of the greatest scholarly value, offer slight quarter to the reader. Lighter touches are supplied in the dramatic story of Nym Wales's escape from the Sian police, in the intimate details of life at Yenan, and in the biographies—of both leaders and the rank and file—which stud her pages. The biographical data are classified in an appendix which summarizes the provincial, class, and educational backgrounds of seventy Chinese Communist leaders.

James Bertram's path momentarily crossed that of Nym Wales at Sian in September, 1937, when he was entering and she was leaving the former Soviet region. By early October he had reached Yenan, now the capital of a newly established "special district" waging war on Japan in cooperation with the Chinese central authorities. His remarkable interviews with Mao Tse-tung at this time are concerned almost entirely with the practical aspects and the future perspectives of the war. The military commanders were at the front; after nearly a month at Yenan, the life and atmosphere of which are subtly communicated, Bertram passed over into Shansi—traveling on pony through the loess highlands cross-country to the Yellow River. His first sight of the war in Shansi was depressing. Chinese troops were falling back along dusty, crowded roads, after a strong and temporarily promising defense of Taiyuan, the provincial capital, had finally collapsed.

At the Eighth Route Army headquarters, Chu Teh and the other commanders were calmly laying plans for eventual nullification of the Japanese victory. Organization of the local population had started, partisan forces were already active, units of the Eighth Army controlled strategic points, the Japanese lines of communication were under constant attack, and Japanese details were being cut to pieces. Several times Bertram sighted Japanese forces within rifle range across narrow valleys in the northern ranges; the Eighth Route Army units with which he traveled were invisible to the Japanese. The story of his experiences with Ho Lung's division, in January-February, 1938, is the most effective piece of writing that has come from the war zones in China. His book covers much more than the guerrilla warfare in Shansi, though this is its central feature. He gives a first-hand account of the reaction in Japan to the outbreak of war, of the capture of Peiping, of Hankow when it was still China's war capital, and—on his return—of conditions in Peiping and Japan a year after the war had begun. The easy narrative style, consistently fascinating and informative, places "Unconquered" at the top of the list of books on China for sheer delight in reading.

When Bertram came out through Hankow in the spring of 1938, Edgar Ansel Mowrer was already on the ground. The latter's trip carried him, aside from an excursion to the Yellow River front, mainly to the larger cities of China's southern and central provinces. His book rounds out the material on the northwest presented by Nym Wales, Bertram, and others, and increases our all too scanty information about conditions in central government areas. Despite minor inaccuracies of fact, Mowrer's analysis is in general both sound and penetrating. His observations of Hankow, Chungking, Chengtu, and Kunming reveal a China still hampered by the legacy of the past, but increasingly a China in which the "new" supersedes the "old."

T. A. BISSON

Memoirs of Mr. Smith

UNFORGOTTEN YEARS. By Logan Pearsall Smith. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

A BOOK that angers, charms, instructs, and amuses its reader all at once does not lend itself to offhand reviewing. If Mr. Smith could be tossed off in a phrase or two doubtless he himself would have done it, for he has a knack of compression and hates to bore people almost as much as he hates to be bored. But here he has written a small volume about his twenty years or so in America and his half-century in England, about his few enthusiasms and his numerous disgusts, yet even then he leaves a good deal to conjecture. His reviewer must do the same thing.

Fortunately, however, one need waste no space in circumlocution, for Mr. Smith himself has never swerved by so much as a comma to spare the reputation of any person, including himself, among the living or the dead. Let it be said at once, then, that on page after page of this delightful book he has written himself down an unmitigated and unrepentant snob. His snobbishness takes many forms, most of them harmless and even amusing. It causes him to make careful and pointed allusion to each of the many persons of high distinction—Edith Wharton, Henry James, Henry Adams, Bernard Berenson, Bertrand Russell, James Whistler, George Santayana, Walt Whitman, Max Beerbohm—with whom he has been in one way and another associated. It makes him ridicule Quakers, evangelists, Matthew Arnold—who turns out to have been, by the way, rather a vulgarian—his father and mother, Oxford, business men, and himself as a boy and youth. Almost anyone, in fact, who believes in anything earnestly and is determined to act upon his belief Mr. Smith is likely to find at least mildly ridiculous. For he himself believes in almost nothing, and he steadily maintains the easy attitude of the spectator at life's show who asks only to be entertained. He has felt the truth, he says, of the saying that "there is no enchantment like that of disenchantment."

Mr. Smith's publishers think that they "do not exaggerate when they maintain that 'Unforgotten Years' is his most important book, not excepting 'Trivia.'" But surely Mr. Smith himself would be one of the first to maintain that he has never written a really "important" book, or has even tried to do so. Such an effort would involve a seriousness of purpose which he has elaborately disclaimed and an amount of creative energy which he seems neither to possess nor to desire. His work is about as important as a stiff little suite by Rameau, a Watteau painting, or Thomas Gray's poem about a cat playing with a bowl of goldfish. It has the same brittle charm that we find in these eighteenth-century things, but if Mr. Smith were convinced that any of it had a definite bearing upon the things that men live and die for he would undoubtedly hide his head in shame.

There is one enchantment, however, which Mr. Smith has not overcome. Like all the aesthetes from whom he stems, he is infatuated with words. Only with these "shadows of a shadow world" has he ever done, so far as the record shows, hard and serious work. But he does know words as a scholar, as an artist, one might almost say as a gentleman knows them. Whether it was his self-acknowledged snobbishness that drove him to it or some better motive, he seems to have set himself long ago to the task of writing a really distinguished prose, and in this he has not failed.

The general impression left by this brief autobiography is that of a cautious, tired, valetudinarian, and self-indulgent life. Mr. Smith congratulates himself upon getting those things that he has wanted, such as leisure, the company of celebrated persons, a modest reputation, plenty of old manuscripts, and numberless books. He says that his motto has always been that of Aristippus of Cyrene, which means in English "I have things, but I never am 'had'"—that is to say, deceived by them. And yet one is not sure of this as one lays down the book. There is a way of going through life so warily, so safely, and with such care never to give oneself away, that one is deceived and "taken in" at every step.

ODELL SHEPARD

News into Satire

THE PROFESSOR. By Rex Warner. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

AS THE headlines grow more menacing, the novelists are finding it harder and harder to compete with the newspapers for the public attention. Fact becomes more compelling than fiction, and in many cases the novelist does little more than tell the news that the papers do not see fit to print. Such recent books as Malraux's "Man's Hope" and Warner's "The Professor" are alternate versions of events that were reported on the front pages a few months earlier. Malraux is a better writer than Warner, but his superiority in this case consists partly in his sticking to the job of reporter.

Rex Warner's story repeats the pattern of events leading up to the fall of Austria—although there are points of resemblance to Czechoslovakia—too closely for one to take seriously any other moral than that inherent in the events themselves. Yet Warner uses that pattern to describe the overthrow of a different kind of country and to illustrate the futility of characters quite dissimilar to the Austrian leaders.

The story begins during a crisis in a small European democracy. A powerful enemy, which is mobilized on the border and keeps its planes over the threatened country, has demanded a change of government and representation in the Cabinet for its puppet party, the National Legion. Shirted terrorists roam the streets by night, committing rape and murder. The feeble coalition government turns to Professor A, a non-political man, the world's greatest authority on Sophocles, who is summoned from his classroom to accept the chancellorship. His response to the crisis is to propose a plebiscite on the question of autonomy and to formulate an Economic Plan. While he is announcing his plebiscite to the country through a disconnected microphone, the Fascists make their putsch and the invader marches in. After a brief fugue, the Professor is captured, beaten, and finally shot upon his refusal to praise the new regime.

The author uses this plot for a satire on liberal ineptitude which, if it were more skilfully done, would have its pertinence. The Professor objects to the minor deceptions necessary to solidify the country; he is too doctrinaire in his liberalism to give the order to suppress the Fascist gangs even after they have raped his son's sweetheart, assassinated the ex-Chancellor, and made an attempt on his own life; he is unwilling to arm the workers who alone might have saved the day. But Warner has not taken enough pains with his principal character to make him plausible. The Professor is no Schuschnigg, nor even a Benes, but an Oxford don, old style, with the addition of Social Democratic sympathies. The author has endowed him with a propensity to quote the Greek lyric poets and to go off on etymological disquisitions while the bombers are flying overhead, but neither this nor his senescent passion for a Garboesque Fascist spy suffices to make him more than a silhouette. Warner would be a more convincing spokesman of the people if he showed a sympathetic insight into any of his characters.

Imperfectly realized as it is, the novel has sufficient relevance to the tragic events of our day to keep the reader going in it, and there are scenes of a harassed populace into which the author does not intrude with his schoolboy pranks. At times, also, the satire achieves horror:

> In front of a window displaying gas masks a crowd of smartly dressed people had completely blocked the pavement. The masks were of different sizes, shapes, and colors. Each style was advertised by a particular name, and the Professor observed on some of the labels beneath the masks the words "Bulldog," "Sweetheart," "The Tooter," "Security," and "The Cosy Nook." The comments of the crowd were, to the Professor's mind, interesting but inappropriate to the objects on view. A young girl, dressed in pink, exclaimed fastidiously that she could not see herself looking like a pig. A military gentleman was heard to declare that what was needed was a strong hand on the helm. A young man with a beard pointed out, with some excitement, the similarities between some of the masks and the work done at a particular period by a school of Negro sculptors. But the majority of the spectators seemed chiefly interested in the ribbons, tassels, adornments, or patent fasteners with which the masks were variously equipped.

But the Communist policeman appearing miraculously in an assortment of false beards to rescue the Professor, together with the general Grade B Hollywood atmosphere, submerges what is genuine in the book.

Mr. Warner belongs to the coterie of young English writers whose leading spirit is the poet W. H. Auden, and he shares its symbols, ideas, and stock characters. Himself the author of a book of poems, Warner is, except for Christopher Isherwood, the only one of the group who so far has shown promise as a novelist. His first novel, "The Wild Goose Chase," although it was structurally less unified than "The Professor," was a much more brilliant and more veridical book. In it he used the devices of surrealism, of Kafka's fantastic novels, and of the movie thriller to sketch with a certain grotesque power the fascist state of the future. Here, however, Warner has used just enough of such machinery to destroy the narrative illusion, and too little to create a poetic equivalent of reality. What the book needs, besides some credible characters, is either more imagination or less.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

The Arab Case

THE ARAB AWAKENING: THE STORY OF THE ARAB NATIONAL MOVEMENT. By George Antonius. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

IN MANY ways this is a remarkable book. Never has the story of the origin and growth of the Arab national movement been told with such brilliance or with such a wealth of detail. That the author had to do his own digging at almost every point, since Near Eastern history is still a tabula rasa, only heightens his accomplishment. The story begins, as it should, with the premature and disastrous attempt at national unification under Ibrahim Pasha. Aided by Great Britain, Turkey then not only succeeded in recapturing the Arab provinces but in tightening its grip on wider areas. But Turkey's victory was a Pyrrhic one. Stimulated by the new ideas of nationalism brought by European Christian missionaries, Arab writers and poets began to dream of a cultural and linguistic rebirth; the literary roots of the new Arab nationalism are clearly traced here. Inevitably the movement began among Lebanon Christians, who were the first to come into contact with the missionaries; then it spread to Moslems; finally with the outbreak of the World War the nationalist movement developed at a dizzy tempo under the direction of British experts, for by 1916 Britain had become interested in the Arabs as a force with which to smite the Turks. The promises made to get them into the arena of war are carefully studied; no success of the desert warriors is overlooked; and we follow the movement at close range till it gallops into Damascus in the guise of Feisal's irregulars and Allenby's columns, and the Turks are swept out of the whole "fertile crescent." A shortlived Arab kingdom is then set up. The author is obviously bored with all that comes after, for after a few sallies at Great Britain for "breach of faith" he gives us a very scanty outline of developments following the Versailles settlement.

Mr. Antonius, who is now in London as secretary to the Palestine mufti delegation at the round-table conference, has had access to material not available to most contemporary students, which is to say that he brings to light some facts not generally known. He handles perfectly both English and Arabic, a rare accomplishment; having served in various British administrations for a score of years, he has had access to a great variety of material; being a man of the world and of great personal charm he has been able to obtain the oral testimony of many of the chief actors in the drama. Dr. Nimr Pasha told him about the early secret societies; King Hussein discussed with him the negotiations with McMahon; Feisal showed him a diary not yet published. Consequently his account of the Hussein-McMahon negotiations is fuller than any previous ones; new facts about the effects of the Arab revolt are brought to light; dramatic events, like the trial of an Egyptian officer in the Turkish army, take on a new significance; the von Stotzingen mission to Arabia to strengthen Turkish domination emerges as more important than had hitherto been supposed; above all, Mr. Antonius tells for the first time in English the story of the Hogarth message to Hussein and of the Declaration to the Seven.

It is therefore all the more unfortunate that the author's exceptional equipment is turned to the service of partisan propaganda rather than of objective historical truth. He is far too shrewd a propagandist to descend to the naive technique of the pamphleteer. Usually he accomplishes his ends with more subtle methods. The strength and cruelty of the Turkish rule he consistently underestimates; on the other hand, by limiting the study to the views of Nationalist leaders he finds it unnecessary to tell how insignificant in number the Nationalists actually were till years after the World War. The masses knew nothing of nationalism; all the Nationalist societies were composed of a few wealthy intellectuals without any mass following. Nor does the author point out that not once did the Arab Nationalists, unlike their Indian counterparts, show the slightest interest in social reform, which, after all, is the crying need of the Near East.

Facts are not very stubborn things as far as Mr. Antonius is concerned. On the contrary, they are very flexible. Those which can be utilized for his thesis are overplayed; those which are unfavorable are disregarded or at least minimized. Many pages are devoted to the Hussein-McMahon correspondence; not once, however, is McMahon's letter to the Times (July 23, 1937) mentioned. "I feel it my duty to state," wrote McMahon—and I feel it my duty to quote in full since Mr. Antonius disregards it—"and I do so definitely and emphatically, that it was not intended by me in giving this pledge to King Hussein to include Palestine in the area in which Arab independence was promised. I also had every reason to believe at the time that the fact that Palestine was not included in my pledge was well understood by King Hussein." Again, he gives the Declaration to the Seven but ignores the great significance of the final clause: "They [H. M. G.] are ready to consider any scheme of cooperation which does not conflict with the military operations in hand or with the political principles proclaimed by His Majesty's Government and their allies." This pledge was given seven and a half months after the Balfour Declaration. Needless to add, the role of the Arab legions in the war is consistently exaggerated, while that of the Jewish is not even mentioned.

The worst sections, however, are those dealing with Palestine. Here Mr. Antonius fails to make even an approach to accuracy. I take one paragraph (pp. 388-389) as an illustration. The Permanent Mandates Commission obtains information from a Zionist bureau in Geneva, but "there is no similar channel on the Arab side." This is not true. What about the office maintained by Emir Shakib Arslan? The commission does not use the Arab press. True; neither does it read the Hebrew press. Next statement: Arab memoranda have to be translated. True; but the members of the commission are not Elders of Zion and do not read Hebrew either. Item: Arabs do not know how to translate into English and French. They have done pretty well in the past; usually Englishmen make the translations for them—and perhaps do the writing as well. Finally: the result is that the commission's "examination of the working of the mandate reads as though it were conducted for the most part by advocates of the Zionist case." The simple fact is that the commission is charged with the task of seeing to it that the mandatory power enforces the mandate, and the mandate was drawn up for the purpose of establishing a Jewish National Home in Palestine. The commission has had to remind the government of this fact at almost every session.

ALBERT VITON

The Permanence of a Painter

THE ART OF CÉZANNE. By Albert C. Barnes and Violette de Mazia. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

GONE are the days when, as George Moore relates, Roger Fry lectured about some pictures he had seen in a town called Aix, and disciples swarmed around the banner of the Provençal master, and the people went about crying: Cézanna! Cézanna! They were a part of the now almost fabulous pre-war world. The standards to which disciples flock at the present time are other than Cézanne's. Very different acclamations and ascriptions of praise resound beneath the sky. And still books about the world-forsaking painter continue to multiply. His artistic influence persists in Picasso, Matisse, Soutine, Utrillo, quite as much as in the academy which bases itself upon his work and annually crowds gallery walls with meaningless patterns of Cézannesque planes, block-like volumes, and senseless distortions. From the point of view of capital investment, too, his paintings remain more desirable than fine gold. Nor is the enduring, nay, ever-increasing interest in them mainly to be ascribed to the maneuvers of dealers and persons unconsciously motivated by the wish to maintain their commercial value. The reason lies elsewhere.

Moore, for one, ironically discovered it in the world's weariness of representative art. Sarcastically he wrote, "The mind creates, the substance is but a fable, and no longer shall we paint the poor poppy of the field or garden but the archetypal poppy which is in heaven." But a more satisfactory explanation reaches us through the pages of Dr. Barnes's and Miss de Mazia's excellent new study. The penetrating volume provides a comprehensive account not only of the origins of Cézanne's form and technique in the traditions; of his characteristic exploitations of color and light, line and space; of the evolution of his form and technique in landscape, still-life, and figure-painting and in the water colors; but also of their total and profound influence on contemporary painting. It presents a fine appreciation of Cézanne's art, and while defining its great limitations, plainly suggests the prime source of our fascination—its overwhelming symbolism of the stability of things.

Cézanne's form, these learned collaborators affirm, is architectonic. And his style is monumental. "Not in the representative sense, of course: no one ever employed less pretentious subject matter, or more completely avoided associations of grandiosity. Even his landscapes do not directly convey, as do those of Claude Lorrain, any convincing suggestion of illimitable space or towering natural majesty. . . . This architectural and monumental aspect appears even in his small still-lifes and figure pieces, which are never conceived in terms that would emphasize the qualities of intimacy or charm." It was that the man's feeling comprehended above everything else the power of things. What he perceived was "the qualities which can make the simplest material object seem massive, immovable, and immutable. . . . Only what was permanent and essential . . . basic structure unaffected by momentary circumstances . . . finally found a place in his mind and work." The colorfulness of nature revealed its forms and architecture to him; and ingeniously he merged "these abstractions of the essentials of objects in harmonious, highly individual total designs."

Only, unlike Michelangelo, Tintoretto, El Greco—and for that matter our own John Marin—Cézanne perceived a power different from that which informs active movement. His monumental forms give the impression not so much of motion as of the power to resist it. "They are intensely dynamic and full of drama; but in his successful work the operative forces are always brought into equilibrium, and the drama is that of thrust met and stabilized by counterthrust, not of energy unleashed and set in motion. . . . His most characteristic compositional arrangement is that of the stablest of all architectural structures, the pyramid." And his natural symbols for the most part are static objects such as rocks, houses, and trees rather more than human and animal limbs, "and all in all his compositions suggest not whirlwinds but mountains." What they represent, majestically, with weight, mass, and the rich relations of color, indeed is a pure intuition of nature from the depths of the personality and related to that of nearly all men who have come into this world "a little conservative" or live in constant connection with the soil. It is the serene feeling not so much of fixity as of a fundamental firmness; thus an invaluable counterpoise to that of our own unbalanced and uprooted time. PAUL ROSENFELD

The Three Chamberlains

THE MAN WHO MADE THE PEACE: NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN. By Stuart Hodgson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.50.

THE CHAMBERLAIN TRADITION. By Sir Charles Petrie. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

NO, HE did not make the peace, and he does not represent the Chamberlain tradition but the Lord North tradition. The judgment of the independent public on both sides of the Atlantic on Neville Chamberlain and his politics has been more and more outspoken and sweeping. Therefore the friends of the English government, in the attempt to controvert the world movement against Neville Chamberlain and the other men of Munich, have begun to publish apologetics for Chamberlain. Here are two examples.

Whereas Hodgson gives an ordinary biography of his hero, Petrie chooses a cleverer method. He combines three lives within one volume, those of Joseph Chamberlain, the father, of Austen, the half-brother of our Chamberlain, and of Neville himself. But it is clear that the dead Joseph and Austen have been incommoded only in order to prove the so-called unity of the Chamberlain tradition and to arrange for Neville an honorable series of predecessors. Petrie entered the Temple of Memory which history has built for the great Joseph and the noble Austen; he put Neville's umbrella into a dark corner and wrote his book.

What was the real Chamberlain tradition? Joseph and Austen were imperialists and certainly no friends of socialism. But both were ready at any time to fight for the honor and interests of England, and both hated any form of despotism. After Hitler came to power no one in England spoke sterner or stronger words against the Nazis than Austen Chamberlain. On April 13, 1933, he said in the House of Commons:

> What is this new spirit of German nationalism? The worst of the all-Prussian imperialism, with an added savagery, a racial pride, an exclusiveness which cannot allow to any fellow-subject not of "pure Nordic birth" equality of rights and citizenship within the nation to which he belongs. Are you going to discuss revision [of the peace treaty] with a government like that? . . . Europe is menaced and Germany is afflicted by this narrow, exclusive, aggressive spirit, by which it is a crime to be in favor of peace and a crime to be a Jew. That is not a Germany to which we can afford to make concessions.

On March 8, 1934, Austen Chamberlain said at a meeting at the Mayfair Hotel in London:

> I loathe persecution with my whole being. It is because of that hatred of persecution which is in the blood of all my countrymen that England stands where she does. Take that away and what remains of the greatness, the might, of the British Empire?

Here speaks the real Chamberlain tradition. But in Petrie's book one seeks such citations in vain. If Austen were alive today no fraternal consideration would hinder him from telling the English nation the truth about Munich. Petrie's description of Joseph cannot wholly efface the well-known features of the stormy tribune of the people. Petrie is compelled to print again the famous question that Joseph asked the British capitalists—what "ransom" they would be ready to pay for their security, that is, how many social reforms they were willing to concede to the masses in order to retain their property. Joseph Chamberlain also said that all the monopolies which are sustained by the state ought to be in the hands of the people. But what is Neville's attitude toward the economic and social problems of our time? He hates not only socialism but anything that would resemble a New Deal. As Chancellor of the Exchequer he nipped in the bud any proposal which might have opened a path toward planned economy.

Neville is the most orthodox representative in England today of the so-called Liberal economic system. He believes in old-fashioned private property and fears only one danger, an economic earthquake which would shatter the foundations of private property. Neville is the friend of the dictators because he regards them as his allies in the fight against labor and democracy.

A pro-Chamberlain book might be valuable if it gave the reader an honest and detailed description of Neville's position, of his economic and social conservatism, and of his corresponding attitude toward foreign politics. But these books do not even perform this service. They tell us that Neville likes children and birds, that he is a good husband, that he has a "heart," that he hates war; and many other things of the same nature. Both authors praise Neville Chamberlain as the champion of peace, but does he really hate war? If you go not only by his words but also by his deeds, the conclusion must be different. Certainly Chamberlain does not hate the Spanish war as long as Franco wins. Every effort to achieve a real and lasting peace in Europe by means of collective security has been hampered by Chamberlain. For Neville only hates wars which could destroy the power of the dictators; he has no such attitude toward wars which strengthen fascism. He won at Munich; he won at Barcelona. It is ridiculous to assume that his work to build an anti-labor and fascist Europe can mean either progress or peace.

There is much resemblance between Neville Chamberlain and Lord North of unholy memory. Lord North, surrounded by a gang of aristocratic politicians and stock-jobbers, was able to retain the confidence of both houses of Parliament by means of manipulated majorities and an all-powerful party machine. He despised the protests of all the progressive and honest men of England. He named himself the man of peace and law, but he bowed before the despots of the European continent and trampled on the privileges of his own people and of the colonists in America.

History has given its judgment on North, and it will give the same judgment on Neville Chamberlain in spite of all the Petries and the Hodgsons. ARTHUR ROSENBERG

A Boy's Best Pal

FROST FLOWER. By Helen Hull. Coward-McCann. $2.50.
YOKE OF STARS. By Frances Frost. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

MISS HULL'S novel tells of a suburban housewife who, in the midst of her pleasant suburban life, is confronted with the ghost of a past sin. Miss Hull's gift, however, is not a considered treatment of the nature or consequence of sin, but a presentation of family life in its lighter and prettier aspects. This she does admirably, with countless recognizable details about a growing boy, an adolescent girl, a dignified and humorous grandpa who isn't quite sure his children want him around. Miss Frost has attempted something more momentous and certainly far more troublesome—the portrait of the artist in a work of fiction. Her heroine is a composer and pianist. She lived with music from an early age; she is obsessed with it in her maturity; she forgets sleep, food, personal discomfort in her work. All this is well enough, but being a woman she must be not only a musician but a wife and mother—in this case also a daughter. A hard job, but Miss Frost presents her as being fully equal to it; and since the novel is written with keen observation and sincerity, the reader is not disposed to doubt too much.

At one point Miss Hull and Miss Frost are sisters. The mothers in their stories are the most forbearing, prettiest-tempered, most understanding mothers that ever walked through the pages of fiction. The composer may be ever so deep in a score, but she is not disturbed by noise, interruption, childish questions, or the necessity of cooking dinner. The suburban lady, distressed as she is by various perplexing problems, has time not only for her own son's little troubles but for those of his girl friend, whose parents are divorced. Both mothers perfectly understand their daughters newly come to love, both offer the most expert advice or forbear to give any advice at all, whichever the occasion calls for. Neither ever becomes exasperated, smacks little Johnnie one on the ear, or says anything remotely resembling: "For heaven's sake, can't I have a little peace!"

This picture of the perfect mother indicates how clearly fiction reflects the public interests of novel readers. The education, care, and feeding of the child are in the wind. In novels we have the perfect mother. Her children Tell Her Everything, and choose her as a companion before all others.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

General Lafayette

LAFAYETTE. By W. E. Woodward. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.50.

IN A popular biography "the style is the book." The facts of Lafayette's career are hazily familiar to all. We have heard since childhood of his services in the War of Independence. We know that he played a prominent part in the early stages of the French Revolution. Then a long misty period: his imprisonment in Austrian jails, his opposition to Napoleon and the restored Bourbons. He emerges into sunlight again for the magnificent reception that this grateful country gave him in 1824-25. His influence and popularity had a last brief flare in 1830. He was "Washington's adopted son," the friend of Jefferson, and "the Hero of Two Worlds." Finally, we all know—except Andreas Latzko—that Pershing did not say, "Lafayette, we are here!" Mr. Woodward's book is neither historical research nor political philosophy. It is an easy narrative for Tired Business Men. It might be entitled "Meet General Lafayette."

No pundit, this Mr. Woodward of ours; no Dryasdust, no fanatic. The tone is that of a pleasant fireside chat. The pages are sprinkled with felicities such as "whatever-you-call-it" and "or what-have-you?" This is not a bad idiom per se. I do not believe that talent or even culture can be reduced to matters of verbal étiquette. In a genuine democracy one word is just as good as another, and probably a darn sight better. I presume that Milton, Gibbon, and Hegel might, with some profit, be translated into Ring Lardnerese. There is, however, a fundamental weakness about Mr. Woodward's use of the vernacular. It babbles so pleasantly that the effect is slightly hypnotic.

Mr. Woodward shows a scrupulous, but apparently effortless, avoidance of anything highbrow. His summing up of Rousseau is perhaps saner than Irving Babbitt's, and it has the merit of simplicity: "What was the matter with that man? I am sure I do not know, and I am describing him here simply for the reason that his writings had so much influence in France." Only Voltaire at his most Voltairean could do justice to Mr. Woodward's account of Voltaire's philosophy. All the historical preconceptions in the book are those of the Man in the Pullman Smoker. Back of the author's indulgent sympathy for Lafayette there lurks the honest-to-goodness American conviction that all Frenchmen are absurd creatures anyway: dancing masters, play-actors, men milliners, posturing, gesticulating, kissing ladies' hands—the wholesome Weltanschauung of Mark Twain and Will Rogers. (There is a trace of this philosophy of history in Crane Brinton's contention that Lafayette came to fight for American independence because he was an awkward dancer.)

The most consistent quality of homespun common sense is inconsistency. Mr. Woodward, who denounces the "fuzziness" of Lafayette's thought, is himself a chaos of clear ideas. If Lafayette definitely makes up his mind, he is "hasty," "unpractical," an "idealist." If he examines and weighs the difficulties of his political course, and attempts to adjust them, he is "undecided," a "straddler," "fuzzy." But as common sense has decreed the infallibility of the Founders, Mr. Woodward does not call Washington a straddler for condemning slavery and making no attempt to have it suppressed. Apparently, Mr. Woodward would have liked Lafayette at the same time to preserve the Ancient Regime entire ("Never pull down an old house until you have built a new one on the same site," saith Common Sense), and also to make himself the Washington of a great and glorious republic like ours. But whichever course Lafayette had taken, it would inevitably have been wrong; for fifty million Frenchmen (twenty-four in those days) cannot possibly be right. For instance, Mr. Woodward considers as particularly foolish the provision whereby members of the Assembly were not eligible as Cabinet ministers. Foolish or not, the same rule prevails with us, and has not yet wrecked our government.

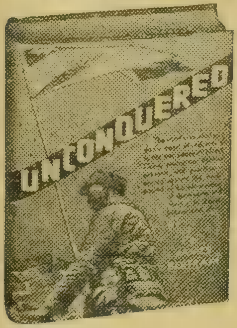
On the jacket the author professes to like and admire Lafayette, but at every turn he adopts a patronizing tone. He condemns in the same breath the reactionaries, the revolutionaries, and the moderates like Lafayette—who had their way after a century of turmoil. He believes in rigid determinism, yet lavishly distributes blame for "mistakes" which altered the course of events. He reproaches the French Revolution—and by implication the American Revolution as well—for being liberal, bourgeois, capitalistic, indifferent to the fate of the masses, as though Marxism pure and undefiled had been available in 1789; and I should be very much surprised if he were ready to commit himself to Marxism in 1938. Genuine historians may, in my opinion, be more definitely wrong than Mr. Woodward. But it is the kind of wrongness that can be checked and discussed. Mr. Woodward provides the uncertain light in which anything may happen—especially accidents.

I have no personal quarrel with Mr. Woodward: his book reveals him as a shrewd and likable man. I have no quarrel with the Average Man, whom Mr. Woodward chooses to impersonate. The Average Man is my boss, and I must submit, not without inner protest. But there are a few fields which we could keep free from the ubiquitous and cheerful tyranny of the Average Man. Not live politics or present history, alas, that is his chosen domain. But dead politics, or past history. History is a graveyard: let us make that graveyard safe for serious thought.

ALBERT GUERARD

"China may lose every battle but the last..."

UNCONQUERED



By
JAMES BERTRAM

"A magnificent piece of work—the best story of the war in China I have seen. It is to me vivid and exciting and, what is more, the truth about the war as no formal reports or general analysis can give the truth."
—NATHANIEL PEFFER

"The best book that has been written about wartime China . . . the most fascinating travel book about China that I have ever read."
—CARL CROW

"A great help to any one who wants to know what goes on in China beyond the Japanese censorship and the precariously held Japanese lines of communication."
—RODNEY GILBERT

Illustrated $3.00

THE JOHN DAY COMPANY, NEW YORK

"Something is rotten in Denmark!"

RATS IN THE LARDER

By JOACHIM JOESTEN

Exploding the popular conception of a Utopian Scandinavia, this book shows how Nazi Germany has moved bodily into Denmark and attained economic and military dominance without benefit of headlines or saber-rattling. It reveals the new Nazi technique in detail. It gives names and facts for the first time. It pulls none of its punches. Most important, it spotlights the vital strategic importance of Denmark to the democracies of the world. "Rats in the Larder is a sharp and lucid exposition of Denmark's perilous position today ... revealing the extent of German influence in Denmark, from trade treaties and defense measures to Nazi organizations already on Danish soil."—N. Y. Times. At all bookstores. $2.50

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS - 2 W. 45th St., N.Y.C.

DRAMA

Unpleasant Play

LILLIAN HELLMAN is, I believe, the author of only three produced plays. Were she author of a dozen our expectations when a new one is announced could hardly be more definite, and nothing about her work is more remarkable than the fact that her manner seemed clearly defined in the very first of her works. Before the curtain rose on "The Little Foxes," her new drama at the National Theater, one was perfectly sure that the writing would be shrewd, taut, and biting. One was also sure that the situation, the characters, and the catastrophe would all be—there are no other words for it—thoroughly unpleasant. Miss Hellman seems always to begin with a group of hateful persons and always to proceed by putting them through their hateful paces. She spares us nothing and even in her conclusions makes no concession to human weakness. Virtue never triumphs, and neither does wickedness ever get it in the neck. The curtain always goes down upon wrong in the saddle, riding hard. There are, to be sure, a few good or at least harmless persons in her plays, but their artistic function is clear and single. They are there purely to serve as victims. The spectacle of Greek meeting Greek or of dog eating dog is not painful enough. The wolf must have a lamb to devour, the serpent a dove to fascinate. Thus the wisdom of the Gnostics is reversed. Good has to exist because without it evil could not make clear its own nature.

In "The Children's Hour," which was the first and so far at least the best of Miss Hellman's plays, the study of malice working in the soul of a fiendishly corrupt child seemed to be presented purely for its own sake. In "The Little Foxes," as in her second and least successful piece, there is some attempt to suggest that the wickedness of all the principal characters is somehow connected with the social system, and we are asked to contemplate it not merely as a beautiful specimen of flourishing corruption, a sort of flower of evil, but also as a malignant ulcer interesting for its diagnostic value no less than in and for itself. The two brothers and a sister who dominate the play exhibit various minor vices, including a sadism which leads one of them to maltreat his wife and to love a son who beats horses, but it is acquisitiveness which dominates them and leads them to delight in attempts to swindle one another whenever it so happens that they are not united for the moment in an effort to swindle outsiders or to terrify the weak. But for all this, the moral is not especially clear, and the ringing determination to battle against "all this" which is proclaimed at the very end by the feeblest of the personages is not very convincing; so that what one is really driven back upon is again whatever satisfaction can be obtained from the contemplation of unadulterated meanness and villainy wholly triumphant. The fact that one tolerates the play, that, indeed, it is as tense as it is disagreeable, implies no small tribute to the skill of the writer, whose gift for vivid characterization is superb and whose technique seems not only expert but rather different from that of most of her fellows, partly, I think, because it is a good deal like the technique of Ibsen. If "The Little Foxes" seems less nearly perfect than "The Children's Hour," it seems so because it is less inevitable in its development and occasionally more melodramatic in its action than it should be, presenting characters rather more subtly conceived than the story in which they figure. But Miss Hellman indubitably possesses the Ancient Mariner's gift—one stays in one's seat because one cannot choose but hear. Miss Tallulah Bankhead, who plays the part of the most deeply villainous of a villainous crowd, was greeted rapturously by a large company of admirers anxious to see how she would acquit herself in the role of a woman older as well as less sympathetic than those she usually interprets. Miss Bankhead acquitted herself very well, but I am not sure that first place ought not to be given to Patricia Collinge, who is brilliant as the half-hysterical wife of one of the brothers.

An evening spent with "The Little Foxes" might well put one in exactly the right mood for "Mrs. O'Brien Entertains," a singularly cheerful, innocent, and simple-minded farce-comedy which George Abbott has staged at the Lyceum Theater. The scene is New York in 1848, and the story is concerned with a lively old Irishman who nearly drives his daughter to distraction by his insistence upon making her home a free hotel for Irish immigrants until such time as he can marry them off—preferably to Germans, Italians, or Poles. The theme, obviously, is racial tolerance, and the moral, as more than one reviewer has complained, is as simple as the moral of "Abie's Irish Rose." Nevertheless, "Mrs.

A famous scientist surveys the modern world

The MARXIST PHILOSOPHY and the SCIENCES

By J.B.S. Haldane

SCIENCE is no longer locked up in the laboratory; its forces are reshaping the world. In this book Professor Haldane reexamines the findings of biology, chemistry and the whole body of modern science. His conclusions will challenge the attention of every reader who is concerned with the processes of history. 214 pages, $2.00.

Random House
20 E. 57 St., New York

2ND PRINTING!
SIROCCO
AND OTHER STORIES
by Ralph Bates
"Superb characterizations. Bates' Spanish Civil War stories are better than Hemingway's."—TIME.
388 pages, $2.50

O'Brien Entertains" is a good deal more lively as well as a good deal better written than Miss Nichols's masterpiece, and it has the advantage of that liveliness which Mr. Abbott seldom fails to give a comedy that he directs.

Less innocent but even livelier is "Stars in Your Eyes" (Majestic Theater), a musical comedy about Hollywood, notable among other things for the fact that it brings Ethel Merman and Jimmy Durante together again. Mr. Durante is still doing nothing with demoniacal energy; Miss Merman is still delivering syncopated songs with a rhythmical abandon which, in my opinion, at least, no one else can equal. Together they are more than twice as good as either by himself, and they are still further sustained by Mildred Natwick, who fits into musical comedy so perfectly that there is some danger everyone may forget her preeminence as a character actress. All in all, "Stars in Your Eyes" is as substantial and entertaining a revue as is to be seen on Broadway.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

ONE of the finest pages of Bach is the Toccata of his Toccata and Fugue in C minor for clavier; and Maas's performance of it has been one of the finest things on records. The excellence of the playing is, for one thing, in the continuity it gives to a sequence of musical thought which is improvisatory in character; and this organic coherence, as one would expect, is also in Schnabel's performance, now issued by Victor. But where the first integrated sequence is sensitive and spaciously meditative the second has the conciseness and force that are almost uniquely Schnabel's; and this difference is to be heard in the performances of the Fugue also. The new version has the advantage of recent recording and quieter surfaces, but the disadvantage of being on two ten-inch records, with two breaks instead of one in the Fugue. With it, in the four-record set ($6.50), is the Toccata in D, which Schnabel makes more impressive for me than Landowska did recently. I have argued for playing a work in the instrumental terms in which it was conceived and written; and I am aware of what Schnabel's incisive performances of the fast movements would gain with the sharp timbres of the harpsichord; but I am aware also of what the slow movement gains, as he phrases it, with the piano's capacity for more sustained tone and more gradations of volume.

From Gamut, which recently issued the first three of Bach's Sonatas for violin and clavier excellently played by Boris Schwarz and Alice Ehlers on violin and harpsichord, comes a second volume (six records, $9) with the remaining three of the group, available until now in fine performances on violin and piano by Dubois and Maas. No. 5 is the best of the three, with its two slow movements; the others, for the most part, I find uninteresting.

Victor's "Tannhäuser" set (4½ records, $9) offers Stokowski's new recording of the Overture and Venusberg music, and on the last three sides a first recording of the Prelude to Act III. To my ears the Venusberg music from the point at

NEWEST FAVORITE of America's Oldest Families

LAFAYETTE
Automatic
PHONO-RADIO
COMBINATION

In tonal quality and charm of cabinet design Lafayette Model C-32 is every bit a masterpiece. For both the receiver — Lafayette's 15 tube AC Superheterodyne and record changer — the Garrard fully-automatic were selected for their ability to reproduce the true fundamental tones. All the treasures of music are yours to enjoy with C-32. Favorite stations at your fingertips. Favorite operas, symphonies and dance music — whenever you wish on the automatic record-player. Yet the price for this instrument is only $159.50 (ac-dc $169.50). Send for illustrated book, or better, visit a Lafayette showroom.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 [illegible] Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
219 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

The First Scientific Analysis of Communist Propaganda
as carried on in the United States

WORLD
REVOLUTIONARY
PROPAGANDA
A Chicago Study

by HAROLD D. LASSWELL and DOROTHY BLUMENSTOCK

THIS volume presents the first real study of the nature of Communist propaganda—its ideas, its techniques, and its results. The authors, two social scientists whose authority cannot be questioned, studied all the Communist propaganda directed at one city, Chicago, during the crucial period 1930-34. They offer facts, not emotions, with illuminating and often startling results, in a volume of basic importance to the study of social and political affairs today. $4.50

Alfred A. Knopf • Publisher • New York

PAMPHLET

Latest PUBLIC AFFAIRS PAMPHLET

AMERICA AND THE REFUGEES

By Louis Adamic

Author of "MY AMERICA," "THE NATIVE'S RETURN," etc.

10¢

Can we admit more refugees? Can the quotas be changed? What becomes of refugees when they get here? How many are Jews? Louis Adamic, long a specialist in immigration problems, answers these and many other vital questions in this concise, comprehensive, unbiased view of the whole refugee problem; what America is doing about it; and what America CAN do. 32 pages illustrated with pictorial charts.

Order from PUBLIC AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, N. Y.

TRAVEL

SEE AMERICA IN TRANSITION

Join an R. F. L. Traveling Seminar

SEMINAR I (July 5-30) —THE SOUTH, Washington, TVA, Sharecropper Country, Harlan County.

SEMINAR II (July 1-31) —PACIFIC NORTHWEST. Bonneville, Grand Coulee, Great Inland Empire. Industrial and labor problems in Butte, Spokane, Seattle, Portland, Tacoma, Inspiring Interludes with Nature.

SEMINAR III (June 22-July 22) —THE EAST. New York City, New England, Housing, Cooperatives, Labor, Civil Liberties, Industry. Last two weeks with Wellesley Institute for Social Progress.

The Directors Know Their Fields. You Confer with the Leaders Who Are Rebuilding America. Modest Cost. Plan a Trip in Connection with the International Exposition in San Francisco, or the World's Fair in New York.

WRITE TO

RELIGION AND LABOR FOUNDATION

87 ORANGE STREET NEW HAVEN, CONN.

For Newspaper Clippers

A Compact, Convenient Newsclip Filing System

Here's a miniature newspaper morgue that provides you with an efficient and accessible way of preserving and using newspaper and magazine clippings. The H-J Newsclip Kit consists of gummed label slips and folders to hold the clippings you collect on each subject. It's a neat, compact and convenient reference file, and an inexpensive one. The entire H-J Newsclip Filing System may be obtained for only $1, plus 25c for packing, handling and carriage. This is the newsclip filing system that Editor Haldeman-Julius uses in his own work as author, editor and publisher. It's ideal for writers, teachers, lecturers, club workers, students, and readers in general. Full instructions with each kit. You can put the system into operation within 10 minutes after you receive your first outfit. Address: E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 1, Girard, Kansas.

NOW you may order

BOOKS

from THE NATION

At the request of many readers who reside in communities in which no bookshop has been established, The Nation now offers to deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

which the trumpet cuts through until the end—that is, from the last third of side 4 to the end of side 6—is among Wagner's finest; the heavily Teutonic bacchanale up to that point is almost as bad as the Ride of the Valkyries; and the rest is dull. Stokowski's performance of the bacchanale is a remarkable achievement: detail is submerged in a torrent of gorgeous sound that achieves the effect Wagner did not achieve; and his handling of the other portions is also good. The recording is of present-day richness and clarity, but with power that will create noise and confusion in many phonographs.

Other major items on the February lists I am obliged to defer. Haydn's Clavier Concerto Opus 21, in a Columbia two-record set ($3.25), is a work of minor stature but of characteristic vivacity, and charming as played—on the piano this time—by Mme Roesgen-Champion with the Paris Symphony under Gaillard. On a Columbia single (75 cents) Bach's magnificent Chorale-Prelude "Komm' Gott, Schöpfer" is played, in a little too great hurry for its best effect, by Commette; on another ($1) Szigeti does a good job with the Russian Dance from "Petrouchka," the Gavotte from Prokofiev's Classical Symphony, and a Norwegian song by Lie. And on a Victor single ($1.50) Chopin's Mazurkas Opus 33, No. 2 and Opus 63, No. 1 are well done by Rosenthal.

The New York Post's recording of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was made by an orchestra whose playing hasn't the fine tone and precision of the orchestra that recorded Schubert's Unfinished.

Listening to the Goodman Orchestra's "My Honey's Lovin' Arms" I have become increasingly aware of the contribution made by Goodman's new drummer Schutz, whose percussion work has an extraordinary combination of qualities: great vitality and excitement, but these achieved through delicacy, subtlety, and even occasional wit, such as I cannot recall in the work of any other drummer. These qualities are outstanding in the Goodman Trio's "I Know That You Know" (Victor); and there are other good things in this performance: the work of Kirby on bass, of Goodman himself, for once even of Teddy Wilson, and the absence of Hampton's vibraphone.

The all-star "Blues" and "Blue Lou" (Victor) are undistinguished; but the Goodman Orchestra's "Bach Goes to Town" (Victor), Maxine Sullivan's "Say It with a Kiss" (Victor), and Mildred Bailey's "They Say" (Vocalion) are good; and Ellington's "Blue Light" (Brunswick) is one of his more interesting compositions. In the Kirby Band's performance of "Undecided" (Decca) are superb piano-playing by Kyle and fine work on trumpet by Shavers; the Basie Orchestra's "Panassié Stomp" and "Do You Wanna Jump" (Decca) offer delightful piano-playing by Basie; and Bobby Hackett does some sensitive playing on the cornet in "A Ghost of a Chance" (Vocalion). I have listened long to Sidney Bechet without being able to discover anything to justify the words—some of them sober, most of them not—that have been used about him. And though the groups led by Mezzrow in "Comin' On with the Come On" and Ladnier in "Weary Blues," etc. (Bluebird) under the supervision of Panassié succeed in recreating the old New Orleans style they don't succeed in creating anything in that style worth the attention of someone merely interested in music.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Palestine Impressions

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested in the following excerpts from some letters written by a young American traveling in Palestine. The unresolved conflicts of British policy revealed at the Jewish-Arab conference in London are here shown in practice in Palestine itself. J. E. C.

New York, February 15

Haifa, December 19

It is almost impossible to describe my introduction to Palestine. From the boat, even before we entered the harbor, a Greek who has his business here pointed out to us the Arab quarter and the Jewish quarter; the former was dark and the latter was ablaze with light. We got off the boat, and in a small group accompanied by two members of the Palestine police, made our way slowly toward the customs. From there a friend and I got into a taxi and went screaming through the gloomy, dark Arab quarter into the Jewish one, full of life and animation. We stopped at a modest little hotel. From time to time until curfew at eleven o'clock armored trucks full of British soldiers with bayoneted guns would go roaring down the street. This morning we left the modern, new, American-like Jewish quarter and passing through the Arab part reached the central business section. The buses are Jewish-run and are protected from stones and bombs by heavy wire-netting. British soldiers are everywhere, martial law is in force, and many streets are barricaded with barbed wire. Public communication between here and the Jewish quarter stops at seven o'clock.

Jerusalem, December 24, 11.38 p.m.

In a few minutes it will be Christmas Day; half an hour ago I was in Bethlehem for the singing of carols. After the singing, which was arranged by Saint George's Cathedral, Anglican, at the Church of the Nativity, the Gospel was read in Greek at the Orthodox Chapel, Church of the Nativity, following which the Romans started in at ten o'clock and are scheduled to wind up at three.

The Church of the Nativity, which is shared by the Romans, the Greeks, and the Armenians, is barricaded with sandbags and guarded night and day by British soldiers. Inside the barrier a motorized detachment is kept and many soldiers are billeted. The carols were sung in the open courtyard in the presence of Governor General MacMichael by the St. George's choir, certain pilgrims, and other Christians (some Arabs), but mostly by His Majesty's troops, who turned out and sang heartily, the more so since some were well lubricated with lager beer. I sang too, but a little timidly because the barrel of a rifle slung over the shoulder of a Worcester guardsman was just beneath my chin. With a gun in my face, surrounded by troops, in the Church of the Nativity, which was barricaded and fortified with Lewis guns and sandbags and guarded by royal troops, I sang:

"Peace on the earth, good-will to men,
From heaven's all-glorious King!"

Under such conditions, it was a little hard to imagine the manger, the Babe in swaddling clothes, Mary, and the shepherds.

Jerusalem, December 28

Today I visited a certain Jewish commune accompanied by an officer in the Royal Air Force who generally is stationed at the R. A. F. airdrome in Transjordan. I talked to him a lot. He has been borrowed from the South African Air Force, where he is a regularly commissioned officer. First of all, he told me what the British army wants in Palestine and why. There is, as you know, a very important oil pipe-line coming from Iraq, which has its outlet at Haifa. Because this line supplies the entire Mediterranean fleet, it is of vital importance to Britain. The big shots in the army would rather this pipe were guarded in case of war by Jewish soldiers belonging to a powerful Jewish state, or, lacking that, by Jews in a Palestine governed by Turkey; in short, they don't trust the Arabs, especially in view of the efforts of Germany and Italy to spread disaffection among them. For this reason the army favors the establishment of the Jewish National Home.

But Britain's interests and plans don't end with Palestine. There are the other Arab states to worry about—Iraq, Syria, Transjordan, etc. These states must, if possible, be kept friendly with England; and not only are they deadset against the Zionist movement, but they have a tendency to listen to the ever-increasing fascist overtures. This accounts for the present fence-sitting. Officially, immigration is restricted, but refugee Jews are secretly landing in Palestine by the hundreds. Once in a while a ship, usually Greek, is caught discharging its cargo of refugees, and some Jews are arrested. This is played up in every paper in the land, and the Arabs are comforted. But the Jews keep pouring in.

The English soldiers hate the Arabs, indeed, look upon them as rats to be exterminated. I'll tell you why. Take, for example, a case which my R. A. F. friend told me of this morning. Two rookies had just arrived from England and were standing on a railway station platform. Not knowing any better they stepped into an Arab taxi. Thus they were kidnapped. When my R. A. F. friend saw them, their tongues had been cut out, their testicles had been cut off, and the flesh of their thighs had been slit with a knife about where a man's pants pockets are and had been separated from the muscle. They were still alive, enough to jerk a bit; but they died later. You can easily imagine the effect of a thing like that upon the soldiers who see it.

My R. A. F. friend has already killed some eighty-odd Arabs, "and I'll get more of 'em before I'm through here!" The British soldiers can shoot practically any Arab they like with impunity. Suppose a flier sees an Arab working in a field and kills him. The report he files is that he killed an Arab who was "acting suspiciously." The bastards, think the soldiers, might as well be dead. What's the use of putting all those damn Arab captives in a concentration camp? The camps are too full as it is.

The back of the revolt, they say, is broken. And, strange as it seems, I'm given to understand that the R. A. F. (60 officers, 800 men) had more to do with it than 20,000 troops armed with tanks, armored trucks, and Lewis guns.

During the September crisis all the military planes were sped to Egypt. There they joined hundreds of other R. A. F. planes, from other airdromes in surrounding British possessions. All were filled with every drop of petrol the tanks would hold; every tank had its bomb in place. Within three hours from the time the signal was given, the entire fleet would have been over Rome.

Inside Out

Dear Sirs: No doubt we should look for it in bad times like these, the sort of side-of-the-mouth, whacky writing that some of the tough boys of our intelligentsia are turning out. It's mildly surprising, however, to find The Nation giving it space. Of course, I wouldn't ask you to suppress such a fantastic piece as that of Aurel Kolnai's in The Nation of January 21, called Pacifism Means Suicide. I would simply send it back to him and tell him to go cool off somewhere and write it over again when he felt better. Then perhaps he wouldn't pull such a line as "Pacifism is only barbarism turned inside out." That's the sort of jeepers-creepers that you get when you've seen too many gangster pictures and feel that you have to pull down your hat brim and get yourself a double-breasted black overcoat and walk hard on the backs of your heels so that people will say, "Keep away from that bird, he's poison."

"Pacifism is only barbarism turned inside out"? Fascism is only communism turned inside out. Capitalism is only socialism turned inside out. The Nation is only the Herald Tribune turned inside out. Aurel Kolnai is only George Sokolsky turned inside out. After a few more pieces like this, yours truly will be only Mayor Frank Hague turned inside out. Doctor, come get your patient, he's running up and down the ward making nasty faces at Hitler.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Fairlawn, N. J., February 10

Duties on British Books

Dear Sirs: The reductions in the rates of duty levied on British books entering the United States, incorporated in the Anglo-American trade agreement, have been welcomed here by all concerned with the writing, production, and distribution of books.

It may not be known to some of your readers that all American books imported into Great Britain enter duty free. (In my own business, the annual importation runs into many thousands.) On the other hand, British books entering America are still subject to duties ranging from 7½ per cent to 20 per cent, and I feel that this tax is operating unfairly against American readers and British authors alike.

For some time I have been working for the complete abolition of the duty on books, and I should very much appreciate the hospitality of your columns to enlist the support of American readers who are interested in the abolition of this tax.

WILLIAM FOYLE

London, February 8

Robert Hallowell

Dear Sirs: No genuine progressive can fail to mourn the recent death of Robert Hallowell at the premature age of fifty-two. And we believe that the significance of his life and work well merits the attention of Nation readers.

Mr. Hallowell was one of the founders, twenty-five years ago, of the New Republic, serving as treasurer and then publisher of the magazine. In 1925 he left the publishing field to carve out an entirely new career in the realm of art. He soon made a name for himself as a painter of water colors, and later of oils. His pictures are now included in a number of outstanding American collections. An exhibition of his paintings is to take place at the Reinhardt Galleries, 730 Fifth Avenue, from February 20 to March 4.

One of his best-known works is that of his friend and classmate in Harvard, 1910, the militant radical and journalist, John Reed. This portrait, done in the rare technique of oils on glass, hangs at Adams House, Cambridge.

During 1935 and 1936 Mr. Hallowell was assistant to the director of the Federal Art Project in Washington, and concentrated his energies on raising the status of American artists throughout the country and making art a living thing accessible to the people at large.

In every aspect of his work Robert Hallowell maintained an integrity of the purest sort and steadfastly refused to compromise under the pressure of either public whim or personal need. To those who knew him as a friend he was brave and tender, of quick and gentle humor, a true creator of the beautiful and a searcher after the good.

ROGER N. BALDWIN, JOHN HERLING, GRANVILLE HICKS, EDWARD E. HUNT, CORLISS LAMONT, MARGARET LAMONT, ELSIE PHILLIPS, WILBUR C. PHILLIPS, LEE SIMONSON

New York, February 12

CCC Complaint

Dear Sirs: The public is not aware that second-hand clothing, including underwear, some of it filthy, is issued to CCC members.

The system of fining men at the captain's discretion for petty offenses is unjust and tyrannical. "There is no system to it," the captain here explained, "you are fined when I say so."

These abuses should be corrected. While in theory a CCC man may complain to the captain over conditions, it does little good in most cases.

C. H.

Pittsfield, Mass., February 7

CONTRIBUTORS

MAX LERNER is professor of government at Williams College.

MILTON S. MAYER is a free-lance Chicago journalist.

ELIZABETH WISKEMANN is the author of "Czechs and Germans."

ROBERT DELL, Geneva correspondent of The Nation and the Manchester Guardian, is now lecturing in this country.

REBECCA WEST is the well-known English novelist. Her last book was "The Thinking Reed."

LOUISE BOGAN is the poetry critic of the New Yorker.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER is the dramatic editor of Time.

T. A. BISSON is the Foreign Policy Association's Far Eastern expert.

ODELL SHEPARD is the author of "Pedlar's Progress: The Life of Bronson Alcott."

PHILIP BLAIR RICE is an editor of the Kenyon Review.

ALBERT VITON has spent many years in Palestine.

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art."

ARTHUR ROSENBERG until the rise of Hitler was professor of history at the University of Berlin. He is now teaching at Brooklyn College.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN is the author of "Those First Affections."

ALBERT GUERARD, author of "Literature and Society," is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs. Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 4, 1939 NUMBER 10

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 249

EDITORIALS:

APPEASING BUSINESS 252
THE NAZIS ARE HERE 253
LATIN AMERICAN TRADE 254
INSURANCE OCTOPUS by Richard Lee Strout 255
WHAT NEXT IN MEXICO? by Harry Block 257
AMERICA IN THE POST-MUNICH WORLD III. ALTERNATIVE TO WAR by Eliot Janeway 260
FRANCE IS THE ENEMY. From the Unexpurgated "Mein Kampf" of Adolf Hitler 263
POCKET GUIDE by Helen Woodward 265
IN THE WIND 266
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 267

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

BROWN DANUBE by Keith Hutchison 268
ORIENTAL COUNTERPOINT by Hassoldt Davis 269
REVOLUTIONARY REALISM by Franz Hoellering 270
TOWARD A BETTER AMERICA by Dorothy Van Doren 272
PRELUDE TO VERSAILLES by Hans Kohn 273
AWAITING THE FIRE by Norah Hoult 275
SHORTER NOTICES 276

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART
I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

*

IN RECOGNIZING THE SPANISH INSURGENTS, the British and French governments have completed the task of destroying one more potential ally and installing in its place an implacable enemy. President Azaña has resigned, and the Madrid government is reported to have agreed to an armistice. Although the recognition of Franco is being defended in London and Paris on the ground that prompt action was necessary in order to wean the Spanish rebels away from Hitler and Mussolini, it is doubtful whether even Chamberlain believes this to be possible. All the evidence points in the opposite direction. There is every indication that Mussolini will use his Spanish victory to bring immediate pressure upon France to grant concessions in Tunisia, Corsica, and Djibouti. The repatriation of some thousands of Italian citizens living in France is obviously part of the gigantic game of blackmail being built up to force French capitulation. Mussolini's press has made it abundantly clear that no Italian soldiers will be withdrawn from Spain until his "political victory" is secure. By the same token, British hopes of winning Franco away from the Rome-Berlin axis are doomed to frustration. The most tragic of the immediate consequences of the Loyalist surrender and the recognition of Franco by the powers is the probability of reprisals against the Loyalist population. Advance notice of impending mass vengeance was given by William Carney, Franco's correspondent on the New York Times, when he declared that the Nationalists "vigorously oppose any repetition of generosity toward the vanquished" such as was shown after the 1934 uprising—when thousands were killed and tens of thousands imprisoned.

*

RECENT GERMAN EFFORTS TO ABATE THE economic crisis have the appearance of rather desperate makeshifts. The new decree ordering Jews to surrender all articles of gold, silver, and platinum and precious stones suggests that the pot is being scraped to obtain any trifles which can be turned into foreign exchange. The fact that it is announced almost before the ink on the Rublee agreement is dry is another commentary on

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

Nazi good faith. Even more blatantly in conflict with the plan for the "orderly emigration" of Jews is the new Berlin police order for the daily listing of 100 Jews, who will receive two weeks' notice to leave the country. Meanwhile, Aryans are also being subjected to a new squeeze. Income taxes—already tremendous—are being raised for single persons and childless couples. The amount which will be brought in is only a drop in the bucket, for in a full year it will be only some 300 million marks, whereas the monthly deficit is estimated at 500 million. Probably the increased rate is intended less for revenue than as a means of cutting down consumption and thus freeing more productive machinery for armaments and export goods. Another sign of economic difficulties is the conference between Mr. Frank Ashton-Gwatkin of the British Foreign Office and Herr von Ribbentrop which has been going on in Berlin in preparation for the forthcoming Anglo-German economic conversations. It is reported that the initiative in these negotiations has been taken by Germany, which wants to extend them to cover political questions. Britain's huge new rearmament program, coupled with its more aggressive tactics in meeting the Nazi trade drive, has underlined the German economic dilemma. If the Reich is to continue to keep its arms lead over Britain it must increase exports so as to buy the necessary raw materials abroad. But a trade war in which Britain employed its full financial resources would make this impossible. In view of these circumstances it would not be surprising if the Nazis attempted to make up for a shortage of economic weapons by a new display of saber-rattling.

*

IT USED TO BE SAID OF THE MAGYARS THAT they frequently sold their country but always failed to deliver it; today it is more likely that they have delivered their country but will not be paid for it. The resignation of the anti-Semitic Premier Imredy for the fantastic reason that his grandmother is found to have been Jewish will not arrest the pace at which Hungary is becoming a vassal state of the Germans. His successor, Count Teleki, has, to be sure, smashed the Hungarists, most active of Hungary's three Nazi parties, but that is causing no concern in Berlin. No government of Hungary today can be anything but pro-German, and the Imredys and Telekis may be easier for Hitler to control than the Hungarists, whose megalomaniac nationalism might under some circumstances even run counter to German interests. The very day Teleki clamped down on the Hungarists he signed the anti-Comintern pact, and the German Foreign Minister was quick to dismiss the suppression of the Hungarian fascist group as "purely an internal affair." At the same time all is not quiet on the eastern front. Mass opinion in Poland, bitterly anti-German for generations, bubbled over in a series of press attacks and student demonstrations, touched off ostensibly by Nazi attempts to "depolonize" the Free City of Danzig. Enraged at the reports of signs posted outside Danzig cafes reading "Dogs and Poles Not Admitted," Polish throngs greeted Count Ciano, who arrived from Italy at just the wrong moment, with cries of "Down with Berlin! Down with the Rome-Berlin Axis!" The Poles are now wistfully engaged in an attempt to woo Mussolini away from Hitler. It is hardly likely that an impoverished Beck will succeed where Chamberlain, with a continent to give away, has failed.

*

THE 1940 PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN MAY BE said to have begun at 7:14 p.m. Saturday in New York City. At that moment a blue-ribbon jury filed into a courtroom to find James J. Hines guilty of protecting the policy racket in New York—and launched District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey's campaign for the Republican nomination. Dewey's victory in this, the second trial of Hines, is a resounding one, though hardly in a class—to pick up a comparison suggested by the prosecutor himself—with the smashing of the Tweed ring. Hines is one of the most powerful of the Tammany district leaders, and gossip has linked him with racketeering for a long time. Samuel Seabury tried and failed to do what Dewey has accomplished—actually to prove the truth of these perennial whispers. Undoubtedly Dewey is the best district attorney Manhattan has had in a long time, but that is no qualification for a Presidential nomination. He has yet to give evidence of any understanding of social issues beyond the realm of "cops and robbers"; nor did he in the Whitney case—as an unanswered challenge to him in The Nation charged last January 11—show the same persistence in dealing with malefactors of great wealth that he has shown in pursuing the more obvious and less powerful type of wrongdoer. Throughout both trials he made a bad impression on the press, and reporters seem agreed in considering him high-handed and dictatorial.

*

ALTHOUGH REAL-ESTATE AND FINANCIAL interests seem to give their hearty approval to the bill which would allow the FHA to guarantee another $3,000,000,000 in mortgages, the Wagner bill to provide another $800,000,000 for public housing is in danger of being smothered, sidetracked, or drastically reduced in Congress. Though such organs of business as the Wall Street Journal speak of the $3,000,000,000 in mortgage guaranties as a figure "more theoretical than real" in so far as "ultimate liability is concerned," no such attitude is displayed toward the Wagner bill. The $800,000,000 for which it provides might with equal justice be regarded as a liability "more theoretical than real," since this amount is for loans on public housing; the additional appropriation authorized for outright subsidies is only $45,000,000. We have no strenuous objection to the extension of mortgage guaranties; they have stimulated building. But more important than this financial featherbed for real-estate and financial interests is the continuation of the federal program of public housing.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

*

IN PALESTINE THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT has taken a third major step in its appeasement policy. The new British plan for "solution" of the problem of the Holy Land is essentially as great a betrayal as the Munich pact or the recognition of Franco. The Balfour pledge is fully repudiated. The British mandate over the Holy Land is to be abandoned and a new Arab state established, linked by treaty to Britain, with "safeguards" for the Jews. Throughout the East the British plan will be accepted as further evidence that His Majesty's government understands only the language of the gun. The Arab leaders went to the London round-table conference not as vanquished fighters hoping for peace with justice but as proud victors in a struggle extending over three years, during which the British government has been unable to crush terrorism in Palestine. Many Arabs, judging Britain's intentions from deeds rather than words, came to the conclusion that permanent peace was the least of Britain's desires. The constant encouragement given to extreme nationalists, notably members of the Husseini family, in the form of official positions and access to sources of wealth discouraged moderate elements favoring compromise. But the Zionist leaders must also shoulder part of the blame for the present débâcle. Instead of trying to come to terms with their Arab neighbors, from the very beginning they hitched their wagon to the British imperialist kite. There is still hope that the latest British plan will be killed. The Jewish delegates to the London conference have rejected it unqualifiedly. But in the long run the Chamberlain government usually manages to accomplish its dubious objectives.

*

ANGERED BY CHINA'S FAILURE TO COLLAPSE in accordance with their predictions, Japan's militarists have gone to new extremes in the past fortnight. Not content with having provoked a major crisis with the Soviet Union over the fisheries and risked one with France over Hainan, they have chosen this moment to seek a showdown with Great Britain and the United States over the control of the International Settlement at Shanghai. And to make certain that their contempt for the West be understood beyond dispute, they have bombed a railway station in the crown colony of Hongkong, killing a British Indian policeman. The Shanghai issue is the most important that has arisen between Japan and the Western powers since the beginning of the present undeclared war. The International Settlement has become the focal point of Chinese and Western resistance to Japanese aggression. It is the citadel of Western economic power in the Far East. To permit Japan to police the concession would mean abandonment of British, American, and French commercial interests in the East; and the Shanghai Municipal Council has refused Japan's "request." The folly of seeking to bluff the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and the United States simultaneously has already been demonstrated by Moscow's rejection of the Japanese fisheries demands. If Great Britain and the United States continue to show backbone at Shanghai, Japan will have to choose between slow strangulation, the result of cooperation between Western and Chinese economic interests, and quick suicide through an irresponsible military adventure.

*

THE REFUSAL OF THE D. A. R. TO ALLOW Marian Anderson to sing in Constitution Hall in Washington was an ugly exhibition of intolerance, and the subsequent action of the Board of Education in refusing her the use of the Central High School auditorium was even worse because it was official rather than private. But we are almost glad the incident happened. In every city in the country, and especially in the South, discriminations of this sort are a commonplace. A thousand acts of injustice to Negroes go unnoticed and unprotested every day. It takes a sensation to jar awake the conscience even of people who look with horror at the racial outrages that mark the rule of Europe's dictators. The banning of a woman whom Toscanini has described as the world's greatest singer is just the right antidote for complacency. Important persons have protested; Mrs. Roosevelt has resigned from the D. A. R.; Jascha Heifetz, in Constitution Hall itself, announced his shame at appearing on a platform from which Miss Anderson had been barred. Because she is famous Miss Anderson can perform a unique function. She can, for a moment, crystallize and bring clear before our eyes the social indecencies that permeate race relations in this country. This is an important service to democracy.

*

IN ITS TREATMENT OF SPANISH REFUGEES the French government is expressing its own moral collapse. Thousands of soldiers and civilians have been herded into camps under conditions so bleak and inhuman that to many of them a return to Spain under Franco seems preferable. But there is one group that cannot choose that grim alternative—the non-Spanish veterans of the war. Among them are 128 members of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, trapped in a desolate camp at Argeles and now utterly dependent upon the aid of Americans and the American government. Having experienced the agonies of war, they are now through the courtesy of the Daladier government enduring the horrors of "peace." Their status is unique in that, while all of them resided in the United States before serving in Spain, they are not full-fledged citizens. Hence a good deal of red tape must be unwound before they are readmitted. In the meantime neither the food nor the clothing nor the shelter accorded them is adequate, and they are menaced by disease. They will be released from this wretched haven only if funds are provided for their expenses in France while they wait for passports.

*

"THE WILL OF A PEOPLE" IS THE TITLE OF an excellent film of the Spanish civil war now on view at the Belmont Theater in New York City. Beginning with a series of exquisite shots of pre-war Spain, it quickly plunges into the vivid and terrible record, compiled from government archives, of a proud nation struggling to free itself from foreign and fascist domination. The newspapers record that the will of the Spanish people has been thwarted by overwhelming force and the connivance of England, France, and America; these heroic actors, named and nameless, proclaim that though one battle has been lost the struggle will go on. The film is to be exhibited throughout the country, the proceeds going to the support of Spanish refugees in France. It deserves a wide audience, not only because of its intrinsic interest but because it contains a lesson in the defense of liberty that Americans should ponder.

Appeasing Business

A RECENT article by Keith Hutchison suggested that the New Deal was turning sharply from reform to recovery and as a consequence, while resisting stoutly all attacks on its spending policy, would in other respects adopt a conciliatory policy toward business. In the past week this development has been taking shape rapidly. Before departing on his Caribbean cruise the President declared that business men need not worry about new or heavier taxes. This lead was quickly followed by Secretary Morgenthau, who invited Congress to survey the tax laws "to see if there were any deterrents holding business men back from making future commitments." Another dove of peace, released by Mr. Roosevelt, was directed toward the trade unions in the hope of healing the breach between A. F. of L. and C. I. O.

Reinforcing these efforts toward peace and national unity, and transcending them, was Harry Hopkins's much-heralded speech at Des Moines. The new Secretary of Commerce accepted the view that lack of confidence was hindering the revival of business and made a great effort to provide reassurance. Speaking obviously for the Administration as a whole, he declared a moratorium on social reform, repeated the Secretary of the Treasury's hint of tax revision, and indicated that the government was prepared to make peace with the utilities on generous terms. He spoke kind words about "our American system of free enterprise," the preservation of which, he said, is "no longer simply the American dream; it is the American imperative." Asserting that an increase in production necessitated a substantial increase in private investment, he assured business that the Administration desired "to create an environment in which private capital will be encouraged to invest."

It would be difficult to find in this speech any evidence that Mr. Hopkins was half-hearted in his offer of cooperation with business. Yet those toward whom he has stretched his hand have not responded very graciously. At best he is being given credit for "good intentions," and this grudging admission is coupled with demands for a treaty with business on Carthaginian terms. The Wall Street Journal, for instance, though milder in its remarks than some papers, asks for a definition of the boundaries of future governmental power development, further revision of the capital-gains tax, modification of the Wagner Act, and early action to coordinate the railroads and simplify their financial structure.

With regard to the last of these points there is general recognition of the importance of action though much dispute about what form it should take. But the other proposals require, in effect, the surrender of integral parts of the New Deal. In other quarters even more far-reaching demands have been made, giving rise to the suspicion that business will not be content with a moratorium on reform; it will insist on reversal of much of the progress that has been made in the last six years.

This is one reason why we have doubts about the wisdom of the Administration's new approach to business. Appeasement à la Chamberlain, with every concession followed by a new demand, would be too heavy a price to pay for recovery. Mr. Hopkins in his speech stoutly defended the government's spending policy and indicated that he regarded any serious modification of it as detrimental to business itself. Apparently that is one point where Mr. Roosevelt and his colleagues will not compromise. We hope they will prove equally firm with regard to some of the basic reforms they have achieved, particularly the Wagner Act, against which a savage and senseless crusade is still being waged.

In any case appeasement ought to be two-sided. Recovery is so important, not merely for its own sake but for the maintenance of the New Deal as a whole, that sacrifices in the field of taxation or even a limitation for a definite period on new federal power projects might be justified if a large-scale expansion of private investment followed. But if business is to obtain concessions it ought to give stringent guaranties that it will make its contribution. Let Mr. Hopkins try and strike a bargain with business on these lines, and if the latter refuses we shall know the answer to the question posed by the Washington correspondent of Barron's in its latest issue: "Will reluctant investors really come forward with that 'risk capital' which has become Washington's favorite phrase; or will they prefer to sit tight with the prospect that by sitting tight they may help to oust Mr. Roosevelt and all his works from power twenty-three months hence?"

BURLINGAME PUB

The Nazis Are Here

THE mass-meeting at Madison Square Garden in New York City of the Nazi German-American Bund in "honor" of George Washington's birthday was a disgusting exhibition. But it had the merit of dramatizing, in vivid and concrete terms, the problem of fascism and its antidote.

Consider the meeting in all its implications. In the name of Americanism an organization committed to destroying every constitutional liberty holds a rally in the largest hall in the largest city of the United States. At that meeting a group of German Nazis in distinctive uniform, who have nevertheless succeeded in obtaining American citizenship, make violent attacks on the Jews and indulge in cheap sneers at the President, while 19,000 people cheer. The hall is decorated with the swastika and the Stars and Stripes; 400 storm troopers in uniform parade the aisles. Inside and outside 1,745 New York City police protect these Nazis who in the name of free speech advocate a course designed to overthrow it.

Freedom of speech is a basic right, and the police are sworn to uphold it. But the sinister aspect of the Bund affair is that the city police not only protected the Nazis in their right of free speech; they interfered with the rights of demonstrators outside and inside to voice their opposition to the Nazi doctrine. Inside the meeting the American flag waved beside the swastika; outside American flags were torn from the hands of anti-Nazi demonstrators, many of whom were badly beaten. Reliable eyewitnesses assert, moreover, that Isadore Greenbaum, the lone Jew who attempted to scale the platform in the midst of Kuhn's attack on his race, was beaten up not by the storm troopers but by the police who "rescued" him, and that the police were thereafter given an ovation at the suggestion of Adolf Hitler's agent, Fritz Kuhn. This part of the incident was not reported in the press.

We are all too familiar with the actions of the police bent on "law and order"; the alarming thing in this case is that the city administration, for all its anti-fascist convictions, gave sanction to the police in what has become their occupational antagonism to all picket lines. Newbold Morris, acting mayor, issued a statement asking the public to show their support of democratic institutions by shunning the assemblage as "one would a pestilence." A pestilence is not overcome by shunning it; the only effective popular answer to such meetings as that of the Bund is counter-demonstration. The two left groups, the Socialist Workers' Party and the Young People's Socialist League, who insisted upon exercising their right to picket, discovered that they and not the Nazis were the "enemy." They were dispersed by force—and the police forthwith became the heroes of the newspapers, of Mayor La Guardia, and unquestionably of the German-American Bund.

Aside from its strictly local implications, the Bund meeting made certain vital facts crystal clear:

It served formal notice that the Nazi gangsters are among us, complete with uniformed storm troopers and the whips of anti-Semitism. At present this anti-Semitism, which is never an end in itself, is directed toward discrediting and combating as "Jewish" the anti-Nazi policy of the national Administration.

Together with the Franco rally held the evening before at a New York armory, the Bund meeting gave further evidence that Father Coughlin, whose name was repeatedly cheered at both meetings, is our most formidable exploiter of fascist tendencies.

The most likely immediate reaction of those who believe in civil rights is to demand stringent legal restrictions on the Bund's activities. There are certain legal steps that can and should be taken. The wearing of uniforms by political organizations should be prohibited. Under no condition should the Nazis or any other group be allowed to usurp the functions of the police. There is no question that the privilege of forming private armies contributed greatly to the rise of fascism in Europe. Laws providing for the public recording of the sources of support and the membership of such organizations as the Bund would be useful in so far as they could be enforced. But the conduct of the police at the Madison Square Garden meeting should be enough to prove, if further proof is needed, that the strictest enforcement of any curbs on freedom of speech would be directed against the left, not the right. In general those on the left can afford to advocate only such restraints as they would be willing to have applied to their own activities.

It is a truism to say that the only effective safeguard against the threat of the Kuhns and the Coughlins lies in the establishment of genuine economic democracy. But it is none the less true. Mrs. Roosevelt, in her frank speech of February 20, said that the relief program of the Administration was only a stop-gap, that "we are buying time to think." This is profoundly true. We are involved in a race between collapse and genuine social and economic reform. The richness of America makes it capable of buying more time than was granted, for instance, to the Weimar republic. But the race is on. And the meeting of the Bund has given us a foretaste of what will happen if collapse wins.

Latin American Trade

RECENT reports from Washington suggest that Harry Hopkins, while energetically pursuing domestic recovery is not forgetting that his department is also responsible for foreign commerce. In particular he is said to be making a close study of trade relations with Latin America and of the methods by which they could be strengthened. Certainly there is room for fresh thought on that subject, for although our exchange of goods with Latin America has expanded considerably since the depth of the depression, it is still far from the 1929 level.

At the present time there is widespread fear that instead of further expansion a contraction may be experienced in the near future owing to the trade drive being made by Germany, Italy, and Japan. As a matter of fact, the threat these countries offer has probably been exaggerated. Trade figures for the first half of 1938 showed that except in Mexico, where our exports were seriously affected by the oil dispute, we were fairly holding our own. The strongest challenge from Germany was encountered in Brazil, Chile, and Uruguay, but the German gains in those countries were more at the expense of Britain than of ourselves.

It must be admitted, however, that the current year may see a worsening of our position. Recently the Argentine government ordered a drastic reduction in imports from the United States. The official reason is that we steadily refuse to buy from the Argentine in anything like the measure in which we sell. Its best customer is Britain, which insists that money spent for Argentine wheat and meat must be employed to purchase British manufactured goods. At the same time Germany is offering huge contracts for surplus farm products on a barter basis.

Apart from these considerations the Argentine is moved by not unjustifiable resentments against us. The United States Senate has so far refused to ratify a Sanitary Convention which lifts the embargo on imports of Argentine beef imposed by the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. The excuse for this embargo was the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in the Argentine. The real reason for its continuance, now that Patagonia, the chief ranching province, is free of the plague, is the desire of meat producers here to preserve their monopoly.

Another legitimate Argentine grievance is our competitive dumping of wheat. It was even proposed last fall that we should send subsidized cargoes to Brazil, which the Argentine has long supplied with wheat. This scheme was withdrawn, but recently suggestions have been made for its revival as a deliberate act of retaliation against the Argentine. We cannot believe that the Administration will for one moment countenance any such proposal. We should be planning not competition for present restricted markets but cooperation with the Latin American states in the creation of new markets.

In his third article on America in the post-Munich World, which appears on page 260, Eliot Janeway outlines a plan along these lines for the development of our economic relations with Latin America. Moved by the threat which recent events in the Mediterranean and the Far East offer to our supplies of tin and rubber, he proposes that we should organize the production of these commodities in the southern half of our hemisphere. By so doing we would safeguard ourselves in time of war against a scarcity of vital raw materials and by providing a basis for a higher standard of living in Latin America make possible a permanent expansion of trade.

In his analysis of the present position of Latin America Mr. Janeway seems to us to indulge in generalizations not fully justified by the facts. For instance, to say of South America's trade that "there are not even any sales to speak of" seems unduly sweeping. Seriously affected as exports have been by world depression, they still play a substantial part in the economy of the continent, and we imagine our southern neighbors will scrutinize very carefully any scheme which purports to offer something better than their present business with Europe.

Nor are we convinced that Mr. Janeway has visualized all the difficulties involved in his proposal. He suggests that eventually we shall provide a stable market for all the tin and rubber Latin America can produce, but he does not say how competition with East Indian supplies is to be avoided. This point is hardly met by his prophecy that, if war is avoided, Asia will absorb its own raw materials. Even now there is serious overproduction of both rubber and tin in Malaysia, and loss of the American market would be resisted desperately.

Again we think Mr. Janeway has underestimated the time required to develop tin and rubber industries commensurate with our requirements. Five years seems a very optimistic estimate. Rubber trees must be at least five years old before they can be tapped, and both quality and quantity are greatly improved if they are allowed to mature several years longer.

But although his plan seems to us in need of considerable revision, we think Mr. Janeway is on the right track. Certainly Latin America combines enormous potential wealth with miserable poverty. Its resources make it largely complementary to our own country, but they cannot be developed without large-scale capital expenditure. We are the logical source for such capital, and it ought to be possible to negotiate mutually advantageous terms for its supply. But it will be necessary for us to abandon the methods of exploitation we have hitherto pursued. In the long run we shall benefit more by allowing the major part of the wealth our capital can create in South America to remain there, fertilizing its economy, than by insisting on sucking out the last possible ounce of profit.

Insurance Octopus

BY RICHARD LEE STROUT

Washington, February 24

THE Securities and Exchange Commission is making the first thoroughgoing inquiry into life insurance since Charles Evans Hughes and the Armstrong committee explored the field in 1906, with sensational results. The present investigation will last a year, off and on, if funds are available, and the first phase, just completed, deals with the heart of the problem—gigantism. The growth of the life-insurance companies is unprecedented. They are coming to dominate the investment field. Their fluid assets are fabulous. They are ruled by self-perpetuating groups, although theoretically and legally they are controlled by the policy-holders. By a system of interlocking directorates their officers are in a position to pull the financial strings of the nation. These are the outstanding facts produced by the inquiry so far; at all times in the proceedings the question has been implicit: Is it safe in a democracy to put such vast power in the hands of any group?

Life insurance is now America's favorite form of saving. Today 64,000,000 policy-holders are insured to the sum of $110 billion. Since 1890 insurance in force has increased 2,500 per cent, in contrast to a 100 per cent gain in population. In 1937, 7.5 per cent of our total national income went to the life-insurance companies.

In 1906 the Armstrong committee was worried by the growth of companies whose assets then were $3 billion. Today the figure is $27.6 billion. This sum, incidentally, is 70 per cent as big as the national debt. The Armstrong committee thought the big companies were too big even in 1906. "The business of the Mutual, the Equitable, and the New York Life has grown beyond reasonable limits," it said; and it added, "No useful purpose will be served by their becoming larger." One of those companies then had almost half a billion dollars in assets. Today each of them has at least $1 billion, while the New York Life has $2.5 billion, and a fourth company, the Metropolitan, has $5 billion.

A unique feature of life insurance is the irresistible tendency of the companies to grow. There seems to be no factor limiting the rolling snowball. This tendency to bigness disturbs William O. Douglas, chairman of the SEC, just as it disturbed Justice Brandeis, whom Mr. Douglas may succeed on the Supreme Court.

Premium income is nearly always bigger than expenditures; this adds to assets which must be invested. Investments, at the same time, earn dividends, which in turn must be reinvested. It is like the irresistible expansion of funds left at interest. Growth would be checked if policy-holders withdrew policies, but experience shows that they will sacrifice every other saving before this. Today the Metropolitan Life is so big that it must invest or reinvest $2 million a day, including Sundays, and Frederick H. Ecker, chairman of the board, sees no ceiling to its growth. At the end of 1938 forty-nine large companies owned 11 per cent of the direct and guaranteed debt of the federal government; 9.9 per cent of all state, county, municipal, and subdivisional debt; 22.9 per cent of all railroad bonds; 22 per cent of the public-utility debt; 15 per cent of the industrial debt; 11 per cent of total farm mortgages; 14 per cent of all city mortgages.

Meanwhile, concentration at the top goes steadily on. It is revealed by the position of the five largest companies in relation to the total of 308 legal-reserve companies, as shown in the following table:

	Assets in billions	Percentage of all assets
Metropolitan	$5.0	18.0
Prudential	3.5	13.7
New York Life	2.5	9.6
Equitable	2.1	8.0
Mutual (New York)	1.3	5.1

These five companies, plus the eleven next largest, control more than 80 per cent of all life-insurance assets. This control is concentrated in the New York-New England area.

Many economists attack the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, the Ford Motor Company, and United States Steel for their sheer size. But the assets of these companies are tied up largely in plant and inventory. The insurance companies are just as big, and their assets are free, flexible, and liquid. Today about half of these assets are in cash or marketable securities. This means that the companies have a vastly greater potential financial influence. Life-insurance money comes close to being the fulcrum of economic power in the country today. It is the key to railroad reorganization, to the utilities' cooperation with the government, to the action of the capital markets. This reservoir of power does not necessarily act as a unit, but it is certainly controlled by men of like interests and like outlook.

Life-insurance money is tending to transform the capital markets. Consider one fact: in 1937 the ten largest companies acquired about 62 per cent of all corporate bonds and notes publicly issued; in 1938 about 55 per cent. The companies are in a strategic position and are swallowing whole issues at a gulp on a private basis, without letting them get into the open market. Last year 37 per cent of the dollar value of all new issues was purchased privately.

Back in 1906 a man with rust-colored whiskers named Charles Evans Hughes, who was regarded as a radical by his enemies, revealed that policy-holders do not really control the mutual life-insurance companies, as they are supposed to do. A third of a century later the monopoly inquiry discovers that mutuality is still a myth. The idea that policy-holders "elect" directors is a legal fantasy. How could the 29,000,000 policy-holders of the Metropolitan actually vote? It would be comparable to the Roosevelt-Landon contest. Actually, evidence shows, the election is a perfunctory rite, so meaningless that certain agents of the Metropolitan who were delegated to get policy-holders to sign ballots took the matter as a joke and signed the policy-holders' names themselves. The directors of the big companies are really picked by the executive officials or by other directors. The men at the top who pull the strings for $27.6 billion of assets perpetuate themselves.

Drawing by Schreiber
William O. Douglas

Cletis E. Tully, an assistant director of the Metropolitan, got a postcard from somebody named C. L. Fontaine in Kansas City, Missouri, in 1936, asking a few simple questions about the directors' election. Mr. Tully was so surprised at a policy-holder's interest that he asked a local manager to investigate Mr. Fontaine.

Some of the directors are just window dressing. For example, Charles M. Schwab came to only three out of a possible eighty-three meetings of Metropolitan directors between 1923 and 1938, inclusive. Alanson B. Houghton, ambassador to Germany and England, came to two meetings between 1921 and 1928. John W. Davis, elected in 1926, attended only eight meetings before resigning in 1931. Oddest of all was the record of former Premier Taschereau of Quebec, whose name as a director looked good to Canadian policy-holders but who did not attend one board meeting in sixteen years.

Directors are not paid cash for services, but they do not stand to lose by the arrangement. This has been illuminatingly illustrated at the hearing. Here are a few instances:

Mitchell D. Follansbee, a director of the Metropolitan and a former head of the Chicago Bar Association, solicited Metropolitan officials for a part of their Chicago foreclosure business after the 1929 slump. As a result, his law firm got business which brought in $334,000 in legal fees.

Alfred E. Smith, former governor of New York, was chairman of the board of the Meenan Oil Company of New York and a director of the New York Life. As a result of his solicitation, the Meenan Company, selling fuel oil, got favorable treatment from buildings owned and managed by the insurance company.

General James G. Harbord became a director of the New York Life in 1931. The Bankers Trust Company, of which he was also a director, obtained large deposits of the insurance company's funds next year.

Charles D. Hilles, former Republican National Committeeman, was a director of the New York Life and the resident agent for the Employers' Liability Assurance Company. The latter got all of the New York Life's liability insurance.

James M. Beck, a trustee of the Mutual Life, wrote gratefully to David Franklin Houston, president of the company, thanking him for sending some of the company's business to a brother-in-law at his request.

To give a more comprehensive example—half of the banks which in 1937 had deposits of New York Life's assets to the amount of $1,000,000 or more were found to be tied in with the company by common directors.

Wilfred Kurth, chairman of the board of the Home Insurance Company of New York, told the committee frankly how he "used" the paid directors of his fire-insurance company. For instance, one director was Robert Roulette. As Mr. Kurth succinctly put it, "He is an alumnus of Columbia University, and we found that the insurance on Columbia University was in British companies; that will be changed." Director Roulette, Mr. Kurth testified, also got the insurance business of the Central Aguirre Associates, a Puerto Rican sugar concern of which he was a director, away from the rival Cord-Meyer Company.

Directors of mutual life-insurance companies, unlike Mr. Roulette, are not paid. But the testimony shows that they receive advantages surpassing any mere salary. It is like belonging to the right club. Directors do favors and get favors in return. Except that it is more lucrative, the picture is amazingly like the operations of patronage-swapping Congressmen. Congressional patronage has been investigated on many occasions. It seems high time for more light to be thrown on this Wall Street system of patronage barter.

The present board of directors of the Metropolitan Life has affiliations with nineteen industrial companies, eighteen public utilities, fourteen banks and trust companies, fifteen other insurance companies, eight real-estate companies, ten railroads, one steamship company. The evidence shows the "enormous centralized power," as Thurman Arnold of the investigating committee characterized it, resulting from such interlocking directorates and increased by the unwritten alliance between insurance companies, industry, and banks. It reveals the pathological gigantism of the new insurance empire, its growing power, the myth of mutuality, and the common interests of the men at the top, who perpetuate their control over $27 billion.

What Next in Mexico?

BY HARRY BLOCK

Mexico City, February 23

LIKE the United States, Mexico faces the problem of extending its New Deal beyond 1940. In July of that year elections will be held to choose the President to succeed Cárdenas. The future of the progressive achievements of the present administration depends on the outcome of that election and on whether or not the transfer of power can be peacefully effected.

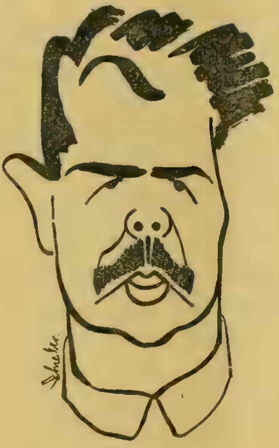
Opponents of the Cárdenas regime and of the government party are echoing the anti-Mexican propaganda of the United States. Realizing, moreover, that defeat of the American New Deal in 1940 will mean the end of its Mexican counterpart as well, the opposition papers are unanimously anti-Roosevelt and customarily refer to him with a barrage of epithets that rival the efforts of the Italian and German press. In emulation of the Franco they so fervently admire, Mexico's fascists are preparing to save the country from the reds, with the aid of foreign capital, the Gestapo, and the American Republican Party.

The Party of the Mexican Revolution, or P. R. M., against which most of the reactionary shafts are directed, came into existence to replace the moribund National Revolutionary Party, or P. N. R. The latter was a creation of ex-President Calles, the means by which he consolidated his personal domination of Mexico. With the political demise of its creator, the P. N. R. was bound sooner or later to be liquidated. Cárdenas gave the signal early in 1938, but the outlines of the new party had already been sketched in by the propaganda of the C. T. M. (Confederation of Mexican Workers) for a People's Front. The P. R. M. was born last April at a convention in which the workers, the army, the peasants, and the so-called "popular sector" were participants, and all these groups were given representation on the executive committee of the new political organism. Included in the "popular" group were a sprinkling of students, some middle-class organizations, the government bureaucracy, and the professional politicians; these last, through long years of expert manipulation of the peasant communities for their own ends, were able to become the chief spokesmen of the rural masses in the new set-up.

Naturally, this incomplete reorganization of the official party did not overnight transform it into a perfect expression of Mexican democracy; the P. R. M. has, in fact, exhibited a number of the defects of its predecessor. Many of the former ornaments of the P. N. R. blithely accepted the new party's declaration of principles—which called for a struggle against fascism and completion of the Mexican Revolution, as well as for the ultimate ideal of a "workers' democracy"—under the impression that the new phraseology would turn out to be just as effective a smoke screen for their own venalities as the shameless demagogy of Calles's P. N. R. They reckoned, however, without the action of the labor movement within the party. To the extent that the P. R. M. has since approached a real, rather than a wholly fictitious, organization of Mexico's working masses, the workers, and to some degree the peasants, have been able to inject into it some democratic bacteria; and as the party has begun to feel the ferment of this unaccustomed element in its blood stream, some of its eternal opportunists have decided the time has come to peddle their demagogic gifts in another market.

Ramón F. Iturbe, an exiled "general" who had returned to Mexico and wormed his way into Congress through the leniency of the Cárdenas government, was the herald of the new tendency. Cashiered from the army for his participation in the Escobar revolt of 1929, Iturbe is a former Gold Shirt and an avowed admirer of General Franco. With Colonel Bolívar Sierra, who was expelled from the army during the De la Huerta rebellion in 1923 and who, through the inscrutable ways of God and local politics in Mexico's rural wastes, is likewise a Congressman, Iturbe formed a "Mexican Constitutional Democratic Front" to defend the "true principles" of the revolution, the constitution of 1917, and the bleeding body of democracy against Lombardo Toledano, the Cárdenas administration, the P. R. M., and all the other alleged recipients of Moscow's inexhaustible gold supply.

Iturbe and Sierra have since become the darlings of the fascist press, and the response to their agitation indicates the coming strategy of the reaction in the presidential campaign. It is obviously impossible to make headway against the P. R. M. coalition with a frontal assault on the Mexican Revolution. The goal is therefore to split the party forces by a call for a return to the "old-time religion" of pre-Cárdenas days. Through a unification of the "fundamentalists"—that is, all the discredited and superseded ex-revolutionaries of former regimes who have since sold out to the enemy—it is hoped to form a column strong enough to attack the P. R. M. on the flank by raising the red scare. Back to 1917, runs the slogan, and down with the modern perversion of our "unique" revolution to the sinister purposes of the Stalinists!



President Cárdenas

Among all the new parties which have recently come into paper existence and are now in process of amalgamation into a single reactionary front, the Iturbe-Sierra group and two others—the Revolutionary Anti-Communist Party and the Party of National Reconstruction—pursue this strategy most vigorously. The Revolutionary Anti-Communist Party is simply the Calles gang under a new name; its present head is General Manuel Pérez Treviño, former boss of the P. N. R. who lost the presidential nomination to Cárdenas in 1933 and is thirsting for a comeback. The Party of National Reconstruction is an assortment of tired revolutionaries, embittered politicians, expropriated landowners, fascist propagandists, oil-company attorneys, and plain highwaymen—a collection so fantastic that it brings into the same bed Antonio Díaz Soto y Gama, once the prophet of Zapata agrarianism, and General Pablo González, Zapata's murderer.

Known to be in sympathy with these worthies, although he has thus far avoided public commitment, is ex-President Abelardo Rodríguez, a Calles henchman who is reputedly one of the wealthiest men in Mexico. Two other potential standard-bearers in the coming "nationalist" crusade are Calles's former Minister of War, one-eyed General Joaquín Amaro, and General Juan Andreu Almazán, commander of the zone which includes the strategically and industrially important states of Nuevo León and Tamaulipas on the Mexican border.

Within the P. R. M. itself three administration generals are seeking the nomination, and in order to hazard a guess as to which of them is likely to head the party campaign, it is necessary to understand what specific qualities are needed in the next President of Mexico. He must, of course, be a military man in whom the army has confidence. Under existing conditions there is no other possible way of maintaining the decisive alliance between the army and the labor movement. The revolutionary army has ruled Mexico since 1914, but it can no longer rule without the support of the workers, who are obviously unprepared for more than a coalition with the army and the peasants. The labor movement, conscious of its subordinate position in the partnership but also of its indispensability, is willing to cooperate only if the army's candidate is acceptable to it. Realizing that Cárdenas will be an extremely difficult figure to replace, the C. T. M. and the most influential groups within the P. R. M. are insisting that the personality of the next President is of less importance than the program to which he is pledged. They hope to draft and submit to the party nominating convention a minimum program of government for the next presidential term; the candidate they want is an administrator capable of fulfilling it. According to this view, Mexico does not need another "radical" President. It is more important to elect an executive who will consolidate the gains of the Cárdenas government, even though no startling new departures are undertaken. The feeling is pretty general that the country has bitten off quite as much as it can chew for some time to come. Labor is thus prepared for a "pause" as long as it does not take the form of a retreat.

General Francisco J. Mugica is a sincere if rather confused revolutionary. He is said, however, to be an indifferent executive, and he has been so long separated from active army service that he is little known to the army of today. So far his candidacy seems to be backed principally by personal sympathizers, and unless it can obtain the support of important mass organizations, it is not likely to prosper.

General Rafael Sánchez Tapia, late commander of the Federal District military zone, is a typical politico-militarist. Considered a right-winger within the P. R. M., he would be tolerable as a choice of evils to the business and landowning classes and acceptable to many of the machine politicians, who would expect to make hay under his government. But if he has labor or peasant backing it is so far not visible, and his nomination would probably split the P. R. M. wide open.

The third of the party entries, General Manuel Avila Camacho, was until recently Secretary of National Defense. In his early forties, he is a product of the "new" army and is known as an able administrator who has taken little active part in national politics. Unidentified with the factions of the past, he is largely unaffected by their mutual jealousies. He is reported to be popular with the officers and men of the army, and his unpolitical past, combined with a cautious dodging of the bitter polemics of recent months, is a present advantage, as it has given him a name for "moderation" that may be expected to neutralize some of the conservative opposition. By a simple process of elimination among the candidates currently available, he appears almost certain to win the formal indorsement of both the C. T. M. and the National Peasant Confederation when they hold their conventions this month. Whichever of the three candidates is finally selected by the party, the most serious immediate problem will be to hold the disappointed partisans of the losers in line; a rebellion against P. R. M. authority might give the "independent" right coalition its long-awaited opportunity.

The fall of Barcelona has encouraged the fascist bands to an increasingly vociferous activity. They won a victory the other day when the government canceled the permission to reside in Mexico previously given to members of the International Brigade; President Cárdenas has denied that this action was the result of protests from the press and the fascist organizations, but the coincidence of the two events unquestionably left that impression. On the other hand, the incipient anti-Semitic riots of three weeks ago have been scotched, after some incredible bungling by the chief of police, and are not likely to be soon repeated. The work of a handful of hoodlums hired by the Iturbe crowd, they were unimportant in themselves but symptomatic of the increasing boldness of the fascists.

The immediate political future of Mexico depends to a considerable degree on the country's international position. And here the question of oil is decisive. Mexico has been far from happy over its enforced reliance on barter deals with Germany. The goods received in exchange are often inferior to American merchandise, and the additional trade difficulties have not made the situation more popular. But unless the dispute with the oil companies can soon be settled, Mexico will have to continue with the German deals and perhaps enter into long-term contracts that will shut off a good deal of American trade. Such increasing economic dependence on the Reich will bring in its train a certain amount of political influence as well, which explains why the "patriotic" Mexican press applauds the German barter arrangements and remains skeptical about a settlement with the United States.

An immense amount of nonsense has been written and broadcast about the relations with Germany. To judge from the alarmist accounts emanating mainly from oil-company sources, one would think that no American goods were penetrating a hermetically sealed frontier and that the oil companies themselves had never sold Mexican oil to the fascist countries. The truth is that German dumping in the Mexican market dates from several years prior to the oil expropriation: from a bare 9 per cent share in the value of Mexico's imports before 1932, Germany rapidly acquired a rising proportion that reached 16 per cent in 1937 and 19 per cent last year. The oil barter deals have simply aggravated an existing condition without being responsible for it.

The increasing prominence of Germany in the Mexican market is a development welcomed by no one here but the fascist apologists, but there is no denying the fact that German goods are less prohibitively priced for at least 90 per cent of the population than American merchandise, particularly with the present exchange ratio of five pesos to the dollar. To argue from this, however, that Mexico is "going Nazi" is sheer dishonesty. The exact relative positions of the four principal countries in Mexico's import trade can be seen in the following table, covering a ten-year period:

	UNITED STATES		GREAT BRITAIN		GERMANY		FRANCE
	value in pesos 000	per cent of total	value in pesos 000	per cent of total	value in pesos 000	per cent of total	value in pesos 000	per cent of total
1928-31*....	223,000	68.2	22,000	6.7	29,000	8.9	17,000	5.2
1932-36*....	201,000	61.7	24,000	7.4	41,000	12.6	15,000	4.6
1937...........	381,000	62.1	29,000	4.7	99,000	16.1	20,000	3.3
1938...........	282,000	57.6	21,000	4.3	94,000	19.2	19,000	3.9

* Average.

It is clear that in spite of American losses from German encroachments the United States is managing to hold its dominant position pretty well. Moreover, the barter in petroleum had less to do with the German increase, even in 1938, than is commonly supposed. From April 20 to December 31 of last year Mexico exported a total of $2,500,000 worth of crude oil and derivatives. Not all of this went to Germany of course, but even assuming that German purchases were paid for chiefly in goods rather than cash, this would still leave some 70,000,000 pesos in "legitimate" imports that cannot be attributed to the oil situation.

Nevertheless, the political consequences of the prolonged oil controversy for Mexico's highly explosive internal situation are extremely serious. The longer a solution is postponed, the more dubious the future of Mexican democracy becomes. Theoretically, there are two ways in which the problem can be solved: one is the return of the oil properties to their former owners; the other is an agreement on the terms of compensation.

Return of the oil wells and refineries is a political impossibility. It could be achieved only by a reactionary—and almost certainly armed—movement to overturn the Cárdenas government. Such a repetition of the Spanish tragedy on American soil would seem a disproportionately high price to pay for the recovery of Standard Oil and Sinclair properties, for the loss of which those companies can blame only their own pig-headedness. Fortunately, there are indications that progress is being made toward a settlement. Mexico is reported to have made an offer acceptable at least as a basis of discussion, and the impending visit of Messrs. Richberg and Hurley representing the American oil interests is a concession to the Mexican contention that direct negotiations between the oil companies and the Mexican government are prerequisite to an understanding.

If the present boycott and deadlock are allowed to drag on indefinitely, Mexico will be obliged to rely increasingly on sales to the fascist countries, which will strengthen all the forces within the country seeking to undermine its developing democracy. The United States has it within its power to reverse that trend.

America in the Post-Munich World

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

III. Alternative to War

AMERICAN independence has suffered two body blows in the last six months: first, the taking of Canton by the Japanese and, second, the Franco successes in Spain. In the Far East Japan now dominates the one region outside our continental territory upon which we depend for essential raw materials. Germany and Italy, intrenched in Spain, now stand athwart the sea lane through the Mediterranean that brings us these products of the Orient. Without the rubber and tin that come from southeastern Asia, Detroit and Akron, Cleveland and Pittsburgh would be paralyzed. We have, then, a very real interest in Europe—but our frontier does not lie along the Rhine or "somewhere in France," as President Roosevelt was charged with having said. It lies at that point in the Mediterranean where it would be easiest for Franco's backers to intercept our supplies.

Strictly speaking, we have not lost our independence by the successful aggression of the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis; we have merely transferred our dependence. In the past our supply of rubber and tin has depended on the good-will of Britain. But the British bases which command the beginning and end of the sea route from Malaysia through the Mediterranean have already been undermined. Now with the Japanese in Canton and Hainan, Hongkong's strategic worth is at an end and Singapore's counterbalanced; while Gibraltar—that symbol of strength and permanence—is today commanded by German guns. It is beside the point for Americans to complain that the British Empire is ruining itself by its policy of appeasement. It is far more urgent for this country to realize that, over and above the cost of appeasement to the British and French, this fatal policy has at last exposed us to axis aggression. Without a battle, simply by enforcing the embargo against Loyalist Spain in collaboration with London, we have lost the only thing in Europe that was really worth our fighting for—the freedom of the Mediterranean. What can we do to help ourselves out of our predicament?

First, and relatively a minor step, we can bring the rubber and tin that we get from the English and Dutch Indies across the Pacific instead of through the Mediterranean. In the case of rubber, no great changes will have to be made in our import habits; Akron can pay freight charges from Los Angeles instead of from New York. But the case of tin is more serious. We do not import raw tin ore direct from the Far East. We import pig tin which has already been processed in English and Dutch smelters. We shall have to build up in this country a tin-smelting industry to break the monopoly of the British and the Dutch. But the source of our rubber and tin supplies will remain exposed to Japanese threats.

Japan took Canton when Europe was preoccupied at Munich. It took Hainan during the abortive winter crisis, as Franco's Catalonian drive dominated the headlines. With France involved in a new Mediterranean crisis, the fear is growing that Japan will seize the opportunity to move against the Dutch Indies. With such a move the security of the United States would end. To defend our interests in Malaysia we are undertaking an expensive and long-drawn-out program of navy building; we shall fortify Guam and attempt to hold the vulnerable Philippines. And make no mistake about it, so long as our basic industries are dependent upon rubber and tin from Malaysia we shall have to fight to insure our supply.

We should therefore undertake another type of defense, one which does not require us to match oversea fortifications, battleships, and airplane carriers with Japan. We should devote our energy and resources to developing rubber and tin supplies in Latin America. It is a long-term solution—admittedly. But it is a solution that will do more than make us strong enough to fight with a reasonable chance of victory; it may well make the fight itself unnecessary. In any case, it is the first thing that would have to be done at the outbreak of war. It should be done now, efficiently.

Rubber, it will be remembered, was first discovered in Latin America. The Asiatic industry was created by English and Dutch planters who smuggled seeds of the hevea tree out of Brazil. There is no doubt that rubber can be successfully grown in its native habitat; indeed it is still being shipped in small quantities from Para. Bolivia has large deposits of tin with which to supply an American tin-smelting industry. The ore is of much lower grade than that of Malaysia, but recent experiments have proved it perfectly adequate if properly processed. Physically, then, it is possible for us to develop within our own sea lanes the two chief products that would be threatened by the hostility of the axis. There are also in Latin America supplies of minor strategic metals which we lack, such as manganese, tungsten, and antimony. Other imports from Asia are likely to be replaced by substitutes developed here. Silk itself will be challenged by the new yarns developed by du Pont and Celanese. As laboratory work continues, we can perhaps supplement natural rubber supplies by synthetic processes. The development of Latin America as a base for raw materials will of course take years, but during the waiting period we would presumably build up a three-year stockpile from the East Indies. This would enable us to keep our superior bargaining power while we switched over to a new base.

The development of such raw-material production would be enormously helpful to Latin America itself. The southern continent has always been a base of supplies rather than a self-sufficient economy, and the general decline in its exports has left it with mounting surpluses. It was originally settled and cultivated as a base for Europe. But Europe is no longer importing on its former scale. We have seen what the drop in its imports of cotton, wheat, and meat has done to the North American farmer. South America's wheat-raising countries, which likewise produce cotton, meat, coffee, and wool, have suffered from shrinking markets. With their surpluses has come a mountain of unpaid debt, and, with the debt, a growing dislike of the United States and England, the major creditors. There has also come a determination to reclaim from the Americans and the British the natural resources of the continent. What has happened in Mexico is a clear example of what threatens foreign capital all over Latin America. When Mexico, bankrupt and desperate, expropriated the oil companies, we followed England's lead. We boycotted Mexico, forcing it to barter its oil to the axis partners. We shall have only ourselves—and our British-made policy—to blame if fascist influence grows in Mexico.

If we are to stop penetration by the axis in Latin America we must do more than hold conferences and try to persuade the republics to adopt resolutions against fascism. Latin America is not stretching out its arms and begging us to save it from fascism by compounding verbal formulas. Neither, on the other hand, is it anxious to fall into the fascist net. It is trying to gain independence from foreign exploitation—and right now it sees that exploitation as being chiefly American and British.

Not only do we have a shameful record of "dollar diplomacy" to live down in our relations with Latin America, but our present attitude is hardly one to encourage the trust of the republics. We frown upon Latin American barter deals with the axis, and upon debt repudiation. We sanctimoniously insist that the continent buy and sell for cash, and pay its debts to us out of the profit. But far from there being any profit, there are not even any sales to speak of. To whom can the Latin American countries sell? Certainly not to one another and certainly not to us; we have surpluses of many of the same commodities. The only customer left for South America is England, and England is no longer buying in volume sufficient to support the continent. Latin America has no alternative but to barter as much of its surpluses as it can with the countries that will take them, and these countries happen to be Germany, Italy, and Japan.

But there is one difficulty with this trade from the standpoint of the Latin American countries. The axis powers are too busy rearming to be able to give the continent more than part of the machinery it needs. Germany, facing a shortage of railroad equipment, cannot sell rolling stock to Brazil; Argentina cannot buy grain elevators or meat-processing plants in Europe. This is why we need not really fear that the axis will "take over" Latin America, especially if we act intelligently to give Latin America the alternative it wants. Trade with fascism is unlikely to prove satisfactory for long, if the experience of the Balkan states is repeated. The United States has the power to put something much more satisfactory in its place. We can make it possible for Latin America to buy—and to own—the industrial machinery it must have if it is ever to become independent of the shriveled European market.

We can help Latin America to develop new products for which we will guarantee a market. We buy now annually about $750,000,000 worth of rubber and other strategic materials from Asia. We would buy at least that much from Latin America if its productive capacities were developed; and in recovery years we would naturally buy more. With this market assured in advance, Washington would be justified in underwriting Latin American efforts to develop these new materials—plantations, mines, new railroad and shipping lines, and processing plants, all of which would be sure of plenty of work and regular sales. This condition would be a welcome relief from the feast-and-famine fluctuation of the unregulated commodity markets which has cleaned out one farming country after another. There is little need to fear competition between such Latin American products and those of southeastern Asia. If Asia eventually settles down to peace, its own industry will within a decade absorb a good deal of its raw-material production. Meanwhile, the prospect is war and blockade, and we must in self-defense encourage the production of these materials in Latin America.

Only nominal interest need be paid; for such advances by us would partially insure us against war and would make certain armament expenditures unnecessary. Repayment could start on an amortized basis as soon as the machinery we exported began to produce the materials we require: we could be repaid for our machinery not in cash, which Latin America does not have and which we do not want, but in the raw materials thus developed.

Provided with such new sources of income, the Latin American countries could do many things. Most important, they could buy machinery here in order to get industrialization started. With any measure of industrialization would come a rising standard of living, and so the beginnings of a market at home, among the natives who have been too poor in the past to provide any market at all. Latin America's salvation, like ours, lies in developing its own resources.

If government credit were granted to so poor a country as Bolivia to rehabilitate its neglected tin mines, or to Brazil to develop rubber plantations and to tap the rich ores which now lie inaccessible in its mountains, purchasing power would rise swiftly from its present level of statistical zero—long before such developments would begin to pay for themselves in the specific products cultivated. For the first time it would be possible for Bolivia to absorb grains and meat in some quantity from Latin American farming countries like Argentina and Uruguay.

To facilitate such exchange a hemispheric All-American Clearing House could be set up to handle multilateral trade. Through such a device, for instance, Argentina could for the first time find outlets for its surpluses within Latin America. The credits built up in its favor at the clearing house could be presented in New York to purchase machinery. In return for the means of industrialization sold to Argentina, the American claim on the clearing house could be paid off by receipts of Bolivian ore, Brazilian rubber, and similar materials. In this way a basic export revenue accruing to Latin America of at least $700,000,000 a year could be made to support inter-Latin American trade of much more than this sum. In fact, it might even be that exports of capital goods for industrialization could attain a volume sufficient to serve as an important influence upon our own economy.

To provide Latin America with the equipment needed for the production of these commodities, we should have to advance between $10 and $20 billion over a period of, say, five years. Even within this period repayment would begin as we began to receive needed imports. In five years these new imports should have passed the half-billion-dollar mark, and as rubber plantations began to produce, should approach $700,000,000. On this basis our investment would be secure, while the producing countries—owning the new mines, railroads, and so on—would be able to devote the balance of their productive capacity to developing the Latin American economy. Not only would such a program enable us to avoid the perpetual danger of war—by enabling us to retreat from our exposed position in southeastern Asia to this new supply base—but it would transform Latin America from a poverty-stricken continent to an industrialized community able to stand on its own feet. It would transform our relations with South America. So long as we remain exposed to the charge of "Yankee imperialism" we may expect to be blackmailed, to accomplish nothing by our subventions to native dictatorships, and to end by seeing North American properties expropriated in one country after another while German agitators whip up feeling against the "Jewish capitalists" from New York.

The policy into which we have permitted ourselves to drift commits us to paying hush money to every two-by-four dictator who waves the "fascist menace" under our nose—in Haiti, Cuba, Santo Domingo, Brazil, and doubtless elsewhere. We are definitely in the market to buy off any country threatening to trade with the axis on a fairly intimate basis—though of course our own munitions trade continues. Moreover, when the debt-and-surplus burden grows too heavy, we can offer the republics no alternative to expropriating our interests; while at the same time we refuse openly or even tacitly to condone such expropriations. Thus Cuba, having duly blackmailed and received its bribe, is about to make a three-way deal with Mexico and Germany. In spite of our unsatisfactory Mexican experience, Washington is helplessly watching the growth of new expropriation moves against mining companies in Chile and oil companies in Venezuela.

The final aspect of our Latin American policy is the most reprehensible. We compete with the crop-growing countries for shrunken export markets which are no longer large enough to support either our agriculture or theirs. Our flirtation last year with the idea of dumping our surplus crops competitively with theirs, in Europe and finally and most inexcusably in Latin America itself, did more to create the hostile attitude shown by Argentina at Lima than anything we have done since the heyday of Yankee imperialism. Here was the Colossus of the North, an economy operating on a scale of tens of billions of dollars, on the one hand mouthing platitudes about protecting its smaller, poorer neighbors and on the other trying to steal their very means of livelihood. These countries, we say, must rely upon us for protection. These same countries, pending the opening of a domestic market in Latin America through industrialization, must export crops to live. Yet last autumn we tried to dump a measly 25,000,000 bushels of wheat in a market that had always belonged to Argentina.

The result has been Argentina's declaration of economic war upon us. We do not buy from it and so it will not buy from us. Since Argentina is by far the greatest single power in Latin America it is inevitable that as it turns away from the "democracies" it will take with it a group of dissidents. Thus Latin America may well be split into two groups—one in our orbit, one under the influence of the axis. Meanwhile, abundant deposits of the tin and tungsten we need for self-defense have just been found in Argentina, giving it for the first time something to sell to us instead of against us. But the economic war we have precipitated in this hemisphere is rapidly closing to us the avenues of escape from that naval war in southeastern Asia which without a united and friendly Latin America we shall some day have to face.

[The first two articles of Mr. Janeway's series were printed in The Nation for January 28 and February 4. The fourth will appear in an early issue.]

France Is the Enemy

From the Unexpurgated "Mein Kampf" of Adolf Hitler

[Through the courtesy of Reynall and Hitchcock we are enabled to print below a few of the more significant passages from the unexpurgated translation of "Mein Kampf" just issued by that firm. In view of the remarkable degree to which the plans embodied in that volume have been carried out so far, these excerpts throw light on Germany's real intentions toward France, despite recent protestations of friendship—especially when Hitler's step-by-step technique, discussed in the last paragraph, is borne in mind. We believe that these passages will also serve to reveal the eerie, pathological quality of the mind that rules Germany—a mind which sees a tiny, divided, and completely defenseless race as holding dominion over a "world empire of Jewish satrapies." The italics are all Hitler's.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

GERMANY'S TWO ALLIES

IN ENGLAND as well as in Italy the disparity between the conceptions of the better native statecraft and the will of world stock-exchange Jewry is clear; indeed, sometimes it hits one in the eye.

Only in France is there today more than even an inner unanimity between the plans of the Jew-controlled stock exchange and the desires of a chauvinistically oriented national statecraft. In this very identity lies an immense danger for Germany. Exactly for this reason France is, and remains, by far the most terrible enemy. This people, which is constantly becoming more Negrofied, constitutes by its tie with the aims of Jewish world dominion a grim danger for the existence of the European white race. For infection in the heart of Europe through Negro blood on the Rhine corresponds equally to the sadistic, perverse vengefulness of this chauvinistic, hereditary enemy of our people, and to the ice-cold plan of the Jews thus to begin bastardizing the European continent at its core and, through infection by inferior humanity, to deprive the white race of the foundations for a sovereign existence.

What France, spurred by its own vengefulness, methodically led by the Jews, is doing in Europe today, is a sin against the existence of white humanity, and some day will inspire against that nation all the avenging spirits of a knowledge which will have recognized race pollution as the original sin against mankind.

For Germany, however, the French danger means an obligation to subordinate all considerations of sentiment, and to reach out the hand to those who, threatened as much as we are, will not tolerate and bear France's drive toward dominion.

In Europe there can be for Germany in the predictable future only two allies: England and Italy.

AMERICA, JAPAN, AND THE JEWS

Is it conceivable that the representatives of the real interests of the nations which might enter an alliance could realize their plans against the will of the Jewish mortal enemy of free folk states and national states?

Can the forces—for example, traditional British statecraft—still break the destructive Jewish influence or not?

This question, as we have already said, is very hard to answer. It depends on too many factors for a conclusive judgment to be given. One thing is certain: In one state the existing state power can be regarded as so solidly stabilized, and so unconditionally at the service of national interests, that we can no longer speak of a really effective blocking of political needs by international Jewish forces.

The struggle which Fascist Italy is carrying on, perhaps at bottom unconsciously (although personally I do not think this is the case), against the three main weapons of Jewry is the best omen that, if only indirectly, the fangs will be torn out of this super-state power. The prohibition of Masonic secret societies, the persecution of the super-national press as well as the continuous undermining of international Marxism, and, on the other hand, the steady fortifying of the Fascist state conception, will, in the course of years, enable the Fascist government to serve the interests of the Italian nation increasingly, without concern for the hissing of the Jewish world hydra.

The matter is more difficult in England. In this country of "the freest democracy" the Jew still underhandedly dictates to public opinion almost without hindrance. And nevertheless here, too, there is proceeding a continuous struggle between the representatives of British state interests and the champions of a Jewish world dictatorship.

How sharply these antitheses sometimes crash against each other could be most clearly seen for the first time after the war in the different positions taken on the Japanese question, on the one hand, by British state leadership, and, on the other, by the press.

Immediately after the end of the war the old American-Japanese mutual antagonism again began to manifest itself. Naturally, the great European world powers could not remain indifferent to this newly threatening danger of war. All the kinship connections, however, could not prevent a certain feeling of envious concern in England for the growth of the American Union in all fields of international economic and power politics. A new mistress of the world seemed to be growing out of the former colonial country, the child of the great mother. It is understandable if England today reexamines her former alliances in anxious disquiet and if British statecraft stares with dread toward a time when it will no longer be said: "England overseas," but "the seas for America."

The gigantic American state colossus, with its enormous wealth of virgin soil, is more difficult to attack than the wedged-in German Reich. If sometime here, too, the dice shall roll for a final decision, England would be doomed, were she to stand alone. Hence they anxiously reach out for the yellow fist and cling to an alliance which, viewed racially, is perhaps irresponsible, but which, nevertheless, politically offers the sole possibility of reinforcing the British world position in the face of the aspiring American continent.

While, then, English state leadership did not, despite the joint struggle on the battlefields of Europe, wish to decide to relax the alliance with its Asiastic partner, the entire Jew press fell on this alliance from behind.

How can the organ of a Northcliffe, the loyal shieldbearer of the British struggle against the German Reich, now suddenly practice disloyalty and take its own course?

The destruction of Germany was not an English but primarily a Jewish interest, just as today, too, a destruction of Japan serves British state interests less than the far-reaching desires of the leaders of the projected Jewish world empire. While England wears itself out maintaining its position on the globe, the Jew organizes his attack for the conquest of the same.

He sees the contemporary European states already as powerless tools in his hand, whether through the indirect means of so-called Western democracy or in the form of direct rule through Russian bolshevism. Yet it is not only the old world which he regards as thus ensnared, but the same fate threatens the new also. Jews are the regents of the stock-exchange power of the American Union. Every year they manage to become increasingly the controlling masters of the labor power of a people of 120,000,000 souls; one great man, Ford, to their exasperation still holds out independently there even now.

With rapacious cleverness they knead public opinion and form from it the instrument of a struggle for their own future.

Already the greatest heads of Jewry envisage the approach of the fulfilment of the hereditary slogan of the great devouring of the nations.

Within this great herd of denationalized colonial regions, a single independent state could, at the last moment, still undo the entire job. Because a bolshevist world could survive only if it included everything.

If only one state remains standing in its national power and greatness, the world empire of Jewish satrapies would and must, like every tyranny on the globe, succumb to the power of the national idea.

The Jew knows only too accurately that, owing to his millennium of adaptation, he has it well within his power to undermine European peoples and to train them to be sexless bastards, only he would hardly be in a position to subject an Asiatic national state like Japan to this fate. Today he can ape Germans and English, Americans and French, but he has no bridges to the yellow Asiatics. Therefore, he strives to break the Japanese national state by the power of existing similar structures, to finish off the dangerous opponent before the last state power is transformed in his hands into a despotism over defenseless beings.

He dreads a Japanese national state in his millennial Jew empire, and therefore wishes its destruction in advance of the founding of his own dictatorship.

Therefore, he is now inciting the nations against Japan, as against Germany, and it can happen that, while British statecraft still tries to build on the alliance with Japan, the British-Jewish press already demands struggle against the ally and prepares the destructive war under the proclamation of democracy and the battle cry: Down with Japanese militarism and imperialism.

Thus insubordinate has the Jew now become in England. The struggle against this Jewish world danger will, moreover, also start at this point.

And again precisely the National Socialist movement has its mightiest tasks to fulfill:

It must open the eyes of the people concerning foreign nations and must over and over again recall who is the real enemy of our present world. In place of the insane hate for Aryans, from whom almost anything at all can separate us, people to whom, however, we are united by common blood or the main lines of a related culture, it must condemn to general wrath the evil enemy of humanity as the true creator of all suffering.

But it must see to it that, at least in our country, the most deadly enemy is recognized and that the struggle against him, like an illuminating sign of a brighter epoch, also shows to the other nations the road to the salvation of a struggling Aryan humanity.

For the rest, may Reason be our leader, Will our might. The sacred duty to act thus gives us determination, and our highest protector remains our faith.

THE COMING SHOWDOWN WITH FRANCE

I do not believe for a moment that France's intentions with respect to us can ever change; because they have their deepest motive nowhere but in the French nation's sense of self-preservation. Were I a Frenchman myself, and were France's greatness as dear to me as is Germany's sacred, then I could and would not act otherwise than Clemenceau himself did in the end. Only through the obliteration of Germany can a France which is slowly withering, not only in its population figures, but especially in its racially best elements, maintain its world importance in the long run. French policy may make a thousand detours, but somewhere at the end will always be this goal as the realization of its last desire and deepest yearning. But it is wrong to believe that a purely passive will, seeking only self-preservation, can in the long run offer resistance to a not less powerful but actively advancing will. As long as the eternal conflict between Germany and France is carried on only in the form of a German defense against French attack, it will never be decided, but Germany, from century to century, will lose one position after the other. Follow the wandering of the German-language frontier from the twelfth century until today, and one will hardly be able longer to build on the success of an attitude and a development which has already done us so much damage.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Only when this is fully understood in Germany so that the German nation's will to live is no longer allowed to waste itself in purely passive defensiveness, but is drawn together for a decisive, active settlement with France, and is thrown into a final decisive battle for the vastest German final goals; only then will it be possible to bring to a conclusion our eternal struggle with France, in itself so fruitless; on condition, of course, that Germany really sees in France's destruction a means of subsequently and finally giving our nation a chance to expand elsewhere.

STEP BY STEP

In all cases which involve the fulfilment of apparently impossible demands or tasks, the entire attention of a people has to be united uniformly on this one question in such a manner as though indeed its existence or non-existence depended upon its solution. Only thus will one make a people willing and able to undertake truly great achievements and efforts.

This principle is valid also for the individual, as far as he wishes to attain great goals. He, too, will be able to do this only in step-like sections. He, too, will then always have to unite his entire efforts on the reaching of a certain limited task, until this seems to be fulfilled and the marking of a new section can be undertaken. He who does not carry out the partition of the way to be conquered into single sections, and then tries to conquer them planfully with sharpest concentration of all forces, one by one, will never be able to arrive at the goal, but he will remain lying somewhere on the way, perhaps even by the side of it. This gradual approach to a goal by work is an art, and it requires at a time the staking of actually the utmost energy in order to conquer the way, step by step.

This is, therefore, the very first preliminary condition which is necessary for the attack on so difficult a part of the human way, the condition that the leadership succeeds in presenting to the masses of the people just the part of the goal which has to be reached, or, rather, which has to be fought for, as the one that is now solely and alone worthy of human attention, and upon the conquest of which everything depends. The great masses of the people, anyhow, can never see the whole way before them without getting tired and without despairing of the task. They will keep the goal before their eyes only to a certain extent, but they will be able to visualize the way only in small sections, similar to the wanderer who also knows and is aware of the end of his journey, but who overcomes the endless road better if he cuts it up into sections and now marches ahead toward each single one, as though this were the desired goal. Only thus he advances without despairing.

Pocket Guide

MAKING PAGE ONE

MAYBE you'd like to know what lies behind some of the "human interest" stories that you read in the papers. In Miami the Walgreen drug chain opened a million dollar store—the "Cathedral of the Toothbrush." One of their advertising stunts was to run an item in the Help Wanted column of Miami papers: "A wife for Santa Claus. Must be plump, cheerful, etc." Santa Claus is lonely and "misses a Missus." Twenty-five middle-aged women applied, one of whom was hired and dressed up in a days-of-yore Santa Claus outfit except that she wore a red skirt. The store planned a wedding ceremony but didn't get around to it. As the result of this foolish story Walgreen's got into the papers all over the United States, and into a broadcast in New York.

Another chain drugstore put over this one. A shipment of cod-liver oil came from Norway to Chicago. The drug firm rushed a box supposedly containing 500 bottles from the boat to an airplane. It got a laundryman to put some Chinese lettering on the box and photographed it with a pretty air-line hostess. The plane flew to San Francisco; there the precious oil was transferred to the China Clipper and flown across the Pacific to China—as a donation to refugee Chinese children, so the news stories ran. As a matter of fact the box that was rushed, with every advantage of invention and speed, from Chicago to Shanghai was empty. But the story made the daily papers, big and little, and many of the weeklies. And everybody connected with the affair forgot to mention that one of the great cod fisheries of the world is off the coast of Asia.

The story about the veteran employee is always good. You take a man about seventy years old and create a fiftieth anniversary for him—a fiftieth anniversary as a pharmacist, say. It makes page one. That works so well that you get hold of a soda clerk who is supposed to have done the same thing. It is good stuff because he can tell how much cleaner and better soda fountains are now than they used to be.

Of course the air lines don't have to half try to get big news stories. It is now illegal for them to give free passes to newspapermen, but publicity men tell me it is still being done. I marvel at the newspaper space given to silly publicity stunts.

They drop a golf ball from a plane to see how high it will bounce; or they drop an unbreakable fountain pen to see if it will break; or they hold a class 3,000 feet up with a few children and a teacher.

The hostesses provide inexhaustible material. They get married and it is "Motherhood Versus a Career," or "She's Been in the Air and Now She's Got Her Feet on the Ground." One hostess was given a fashionable coming-out party by a group of "uncles" (among them, Franchot Tone, who ought to know better) as a scheme for American Air Lines. Of course, it was also publicity for the "uncles."

For an airplane show planes are delivered in parts and put together inside the building. But for a Chicago show a big Lockheed plane landed in the parking lot in front. It could have ruined the plane; it could have wrecked the surrounding buildings. But what of that? It made the papers.

One of the reasons that Florida gets so much free newspaper space is that many of the publicity men are connected with the press or are themselves newspapermen. Saint Petersburg, which is a quiet place and has always been a refuge for quiet people, wants to get into the big show and the big money. So for several years it hasn't allowed any pictures to go out showing middle-aged or elderly people. All the photographs have to show vim and youth, masculinity and the bathing-suit girl. You get the idea that Florida is just one big bathing-beauty contest. But most of the contests never come off; they appear only in the press releases.

One fantastic and foolish trick that got miles of space was worked during National Milk Week by the railroads and the milk companies. A bet was made at a public dinner that cubes of milk, instead of coal, would run a train from Chicago to somewhere or other. And so a train was run at vast expense, and made both the station and the papers.

Most of these tricks are merely amusing. They don't sell many goods; they don't really do much harm, except to the newspapers. They probably don't make you buy any drugs you didn't mean to buy before or get you down to Florida unless you were looking for a warm place anyway. But some other publicity campaigns are not quite so amusing.

If you have a little time you should look over the story of what the National Association of Manufacturers has done, as shown at the La Follette committee hearings. Consider its "Harmony" campaign—"Prosperity dwells where harmony reigns." This was a series of twelve ads published in labor towns before and during a strike. They did not mention the N. A. M. but were signed by the Monday Night Musical Club, or the American Legion, or the Rotary Club. They were full of threats like, "Imagine our town without industries," and the chorus was always, "The American way is the best way," without any definition of what was meant by the "American way." These campaigns have broken some strikes, but they have failed as often as they have succeeded. The only comfort I can get out of the whole business is that most of the millions of dollars spent have been wasted.

HELEN WOODWARD

[In the Pocket Guide of February 18 the Consumers Guide was inadvertently listed as a publication of the Food and Drug Administration of the Department of Agriculture. The Guide is published by the Consumers' Council Division of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.—H. W.]

In the Wind

ALARMED BY the impact of the anti-Japanese boycott, leading Japanese business men in the United States held a private conclave recently to discuss counter-measures. The participants agreed dolefully that the boycott has done grave damage to Japanese business, lamented that even Japanese-Americans don't buy enough Japanese-made goods, and blamed the boycott on "4,500,000 American Jews."

TO ACCOMPANY an article on the naval maneuvers Time recently published a map showing the line-up in the Caribbean. Not until the issue was off the press was it noticed that the map-maker had labeled the San Juan base "Don Juan."

DURING AMBASSADOR KENNEDY'S last visit to Washington, capital columnists reported that he had expressed deep anxiety to Administration leaders over the possibility of a Franco victory in Spain. He was said to interpret such a victory as a menace to democracy. Now Catholic newspapers insist they have learned "on high authority" that he never made such statements and never "expressed an opinion on this matter."

FRENCH PAPERS are telling the story of an Italian sculptor who carved a Venus and buried it in a field. A French peasant dug it up and submitted it to the National Beaux Arts Committee, which announced that it was a rare antiquity. The peasant is now exhibiting it for a fee; the sculptor is striving to recover it but can't because it has been certified as an "ancient relic"; and the embarrassed committee is stubbornly refusing to admit its error.

CONFUSION IS still widespread in Britain's Air Raid Precaution program, with bulletins from the Home Office and the Ministry of Health frequently at variance. The Health officials recently informed one northern town that it would be a major refuge for evacuated children. The same town has now received word from the Home Office that it is a point of special danger and should hasten its air-raid preparations.

ON JANUARY 28 observant readers of the New York Herald Tribune encountered two dispatches signed by the paper's correspondent Joseph Barnes. One carried a Moscow date line; the other was from Berlin, with the same date.

ADDITIONAL EVIDENCE of the break-up of the Hearst empire can be found in small advertisements carried by newspapers on the West Coast. One runs: "Rare birds at everyday prices, guineas, pheasants, jungle fowl, and wild turkeys. Choice matings now available. Hearst Ranch Game Unit, San Simeon, California." From the ranch itself comes word that virtually every loose item is for sale, regardless of original cost.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. The $5 prize for the best item submitted in February goes to David Epps of Portland, Oregon, for the item about the Oregon labor law printed two weeks ago.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

ON MARCH 2, 1829, there was born in Liblar, near Cologne, Carl Schurz. This March 2 is therefore the 110th anniversary of the birth of one of the greatest Americans. He is usually called a German-American, but I am never able to think of him as anything but an American of purest ray serene. As a boy and as a young man I knew him well, and I had his confidence and his affectionate friendship until he died; when, after my father's death, he called me his "adopted son," I was happy and proud. For this was a very great man, one of those rare men who cannot be spoiled by high office. He could not be weaned from his ideals even though those ideals in the last years of his life drove him into working with smaller and smaller minorities. He rose to hold higher offices than any other foreign-born citizen of the United States, and since he was a revolutionist against his king in Germany in 1848, barely escaping with his life, he combined in himself the finest German idealism with our own American spirit.

When I think of him, strangely enough I thank God that he is dead, for I know that the present situation of the world, and particularly that of Germany, would pain him so dreadfully that he would wish that he were dead. He would be ashamed of having any German blood in his veins, and that magnificent voice and superb intellect would be devoting themselves to denouncing not only what is happening in Germany but also the Fritz Kuhns and the miserable, recreant German-Americans who crowded into Madison Square Garden the other night. With all the earnestness and eloquence and power of which he was capable—a power that swung at least one Presidential election in this country—he would be insisting that there can be no such thing as a divided allegiance; that whatever sentimental sympathy he might feel for the country in which he was born, there could be not one iota of sympathy within him for the brutalizing, degrading, murderous dictatorship of a Hitler. All that overwhelming sarcasm of which he was a master would be applying itself to the contention of the Kuhns that one can be a loyal American and favor a "Gentile America"; that one can be a loyal American here, believing in republican institutions, and also believe in Hitlerism for Germany. That hypocrisy, that incredible stupidity and self-deceit where it is sincere, he would tear into shreds—he who fought at Gettysburg, lying for hours in the cemetery under the shells of Robert E. Lee's army, proud and happy to give his life if need be for his belief that there is no better way in the world for the world than democracy—of whites and blacks and Jews and Gentiles alike.

Soon after he reached this country he wrote a letter to an old friend at home in which, after reciting some of the inconsistencies and weaknesses of democracy, he said:

> The democrat just arrived from Europe, who has so far lived in a world of ideas and has had no opportunity to see these ideas put into actual, sound practice, will ask himself, hesitatingly, Is this, indeed, a free people? Is this a real democracy? . . . Yes, this is humanity when it is free. . . . All strength, all weakness, all that is good, all that is bad, is here in full view and in free activity. The struggle of principles goes on unimpeded; outward freedom shows us which enemies have to be overcome before we can gain inner freedom. He who wishes liberty must not be surprised if men do not appear better than they are. Freedom is the only state in which it is possible for men to learn to know themselves, in which they show themselves. . . . Here they allow the Jesuits to manage their own affairs; they are not killed, they are not driven out, because democracy admits the liberty of every creed as long as it does not impair the civic liberty of others. They are not opposed with the weapon of official power but simply with that of public opinion.

And then he wrote these words, so applicable today:

> Every glance into the political life of America strengthens my conviction that the aim of a revolution can be nothing else than to make room for the will of the people—in other words, to break every authority which has its organization in the life of the state, and, as far as is possible, to overturn the barriers to individual liberty.

Can anyone doubt how he would stand in regard to the Germany of Hitler, which has as its aim, not the breaking of every authority which is rooted in the life of the state, but the intrenching of the authority of the state so as to subordinate absolutely to it the life, the mind, the soul of the individual? If Hitler were as pure as snow; if his methods instead of being wicked were of the finest and noblest, Carl Schurz would be speaking out against him. He does speak out against him. Everything in his life and every one of his teachings, all his magnificent devotion to the republic that he served as diplomat, as general, as Senator, and as a member of the Cabinet, speaks out today against Hitler. If any German-Americans do not hear that voice and do not subscribe to its teachings, then I can only say again that they are recreant Americans who have perjured themselves in swearing fealty to this our country.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Brown Danube

WHEN THERE IS NO PEACE. By Hamilton Fish Armstrong. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

SURVEY AFTER MUNICH. By Graham Hutton. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

IN THE valley of the Danube Slavs and Germans have met and fought for centuries. For a time the Turks pushed back both, but as the Ottoman power receded, the struggle broke out anew. Rivalry over the domination of Danubia precipitated the Great War. But the resultant breakdown, not merely of the Hapsburg empire but of its economic system, left the region a mosaic of poverty-stricken small states, divided by tariff barriers and weakened internally by minorities—an easy and obvious prey for resurgent German imperialism.

Barely a year ago Anschluss muddied the waters of the blue Danube, and the brown flood started rolling toward the Black Sea. Mr. Armstrong describes how it burst the Czechoslovakian dikes: Mr. Hutton surveys the land it now menaces. Their two books complement each other admirably.

At Munich the Western powers gave the destiny of Danubia and with it the destiny of Europe into the hands of Germany. In so doing Mr. Chamberlain claimed that he had secured "peace in our time." But, as both these books argue powerfully, there was nothing peaceful about the Peace of Munich. It was rather a military victory important to the men who achieved it, not because it concluded a war, but because it prepared the ground for the next campaign. The fascist dictators—and this is the essential point which Chamberlain has never grasped—are not waiting for the fighting to start before they begin to wage war. In their own minds they declared war on the West long ago, accepting the full implications of Clausewitz's dictum: "War is a continuation of policy."

Mr. Armstrong's brilliantly told story opens with Hitler's announcement in February, 1938, that he claimed the guardianship of ten million Germans beyond the frontiers. The same day Mr. Eden resigned and Neville Chamberlain took personal charge of British foreign policy. Determined that whatever happened Britain should not fight for "a far-away country of which we know nothing," his tactics played completely into Hitler's hands. At home he organized pacifist sentiment; abroad he put pressure on France to ignore its treaty commitments, knowing that if France became involved Britain could not keep out.

Mr. Armstrong makes no claims to write an inside history. The facts he offers have nearly all appeared in the press, but he has arranged them in lucid chronological order and has brought out the full significance of incidents which at the time were often overlooked. He prints one hitherto unpublished document—the reply of the Czech government to the first Anglo-French demand for surrender of the Sudetenland. This dignified protest was omitted from the British White Paper on the crisis. No wonder! It would surely have caused that compilation to turn pink from shame. For it exposed with deadly accuracy realities to which Chamberlain and Daladier turned a blind eye. It demonstrated incontrovertibly the fact, to quote its final words, that "it is not only the fate of Czechoslovakia which is at stake but that of other countries and notably of France."

Mr. Hutton, one of the brilliant writers who have made the London Economist so outstanding a journal, bears impressive testimony to the truth of that statement. Reviewing the post-Munich map of Europe he shows how the balance of power has been tilted toward Berlin and how the Nazi strategic position has been improved. The nightmare which always troubled aggressive German militarism was the fear of war on its eastern and western fronts simultaneously. That fear has been removed by the destruction of Czechoslovakia. Now the Danube valley can no longer form a line of attack or a center of resistance against Germany; instead it becomes a promising source of supply. In an interesting discussion of communications in Southeastern Europe Mr. Hutton shows how all the main traffic arteries are now under German control and outlines the plans being laid for the addition to existing facilities of canals and a trunk-road network.

The necessity for such developments before Germany can exploit to the full the resources of Danubia has, however, produced new dilemmas. How is a country suffering from a chronic shortage of capital to supply the means for organizing this great region? Can the work be accomplished before high policy demands a blow against the West? For to strike such a blow might prove fatal if it led to a prolonged war. By the magnitude of their armament efforts Germany and Italy have won great victories without open war but at heavy cost. The task has left their economies debilitated and in no shape to undertake a war of attrition. If they failed to win in a few weeks by means of aerial terrorization, time would work on the side of Britain and France.

Hence, as Mr. Hutton so convincingly argues, the vital importance of Danubia. For there potentially are the foodstuffs, the minerals, the oil which, if production were fully organized, would enable the axis powers to defy blockade. The opportunity is tremendous, but so are the obstacles to its achievement. In an invaluable chapter Mr. Hutton describes the way in which Germany has reduced unemployment to the vanishing-point while avoiding internal inflation. It has done it by diverting a larger and larger proportion of total production to capital goods—mainly armaments or the means of making them—while holding down all forms of consumer income. But now capacity has been reached at a time when the consolidation of the Munich victory demands a still larger output of capital goods. If the consumer cannot be squeezed further, the railroad material and the machinery needed for the development of Danubia must be provided by cutting down armaments. Thus Hitler in rescuing Germany from a military dilemma has impaled it on the horns of an economic one. The great question for Europe and the world in 1939 is: By what method will he seek escape this time?

Mr. Hutton does not attempt to give any final answer to this question. What he does do is to provide the student of foreign affairs with a wealth of facts bearing on it which will serve to illuminate press dispatches for many months ahead. If there is any criticism to be made of his book it is that the facts are rammed in too tightly and have not been organized as carefully as might be desired. But this is an excusable fault in a work which had to be written in haste and is sufficiently up to date to take in events of last December.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Oriental Counterpoint

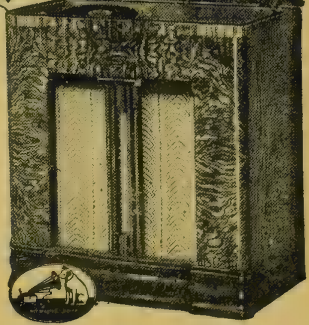
THE PATRIOT. By Pearl S. Buck. John Day Company. $2.50.

IT WOULD be unfortunate if Pearl Buck's new novel, coming in the wake of the Nobel Prize award to her, were no more successful than the novels of the American scene which she has written in the last several years. In "The Patriot" she has returned to the Orient to present a fictional biography which not only is compelling by its timeliness but is probably the best of her books since "The Good Earth." It is none the less not comparable; though her craft is surer now, "The Patriot" lacks the wide cultural dimensions of the earlier book. What she has managed admirably here is to give the bifocal vision of both China and Japan during the current conflict without debasing her narrative interest with propaganda. There is no rancor in the book, and its only political implication seems to be that the two nations, though of different clay, must eventually, intelligently, blend.

This is the story of I-wan and Tama, of China and Japan. I-wan, the son of a banker and Chiang Kai-shek's friend, worked as a youth toward the Communist revolution, hating his own comfort, the rich rugs a poor man would love to sleep beneath, the service of pretty slaves, the smell of opium, and old men. But Chiang Kai-shek occupied Shanghai, and when I-wan's revolutionary activities were discovered, his father saved him only by shipping him to Japan. He met Tama there, in the house of Muraki, the Japanese importer, who soon would be trading in the loot of Shanghai. It was an ordered house, like all Japan, and I-wan came to know in a few years that this exquisite spare order, in gardens as well as troops, was the result of ruthless discipline; even the earth of Japan was shaped despotically. And he soon learned too that the Tama he married would gladly have sacrificed her love to marry General Seki if she had felt her country needed Japanese sons to raise for war.

But news of the conflict in China seeped slowly through the censored press, and only when Bunji, once I-wan's friend, returned a brute from a world of slaughter and rape, and when the treasures of China were flung into his agency's hands, could he realize his country's need of him and his need to return. Yet it was the Japanese who taught him this patriotism, this larger love for his own land; it was Tama who confirmed it; and it was the destruction of their home by earthquake and flood, as Japan had been so often destroyed, which persuaded him that China's enemy had been formidably trained to vaster foes than man. So I-wan went home, lamenting his sons, while Tama in Japan taught them not to hate their father, the patriot. He joined his old Communist

The World's Greatest Orchestras are on VICTOR RECORDS



You can choose the music, the composers, the conductors... to hear whenever you please!

Hear the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Toscanini . . . the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy or Stokowski . . . the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Barbirolli . . . the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky . . . all the great orchestras of the world under the various men who have conducted them in the past decade! The only way you can hear them whenever you wish is with Victor Records. Instruments for playing Victor Records range from the inexpensive RCA Victor Record Player shown below, to de luxe automatic record changing RCA Victrolas. One is shown at right.

RCA Victrola U-123 with automatic record changer and electric tuning

Combines Victor Record and radio entertainment. Price includes $17.50 worth of any Victor or Bluebird Records you choose, $2.00 subscription to Victor Record Review, and Victor Record Society membership. $129.95*

MUSICAL MASTERPIECES OF THE MONTH

Suite for Strings (Purcell). Played by New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, John Barbirolli, Conductor. Album M-533, 4 sides $4.50

Early Choral Music, sung by the Trapp Family Choir, the Austrian family of nobility, whose American tour is bringing it tremendous acclaim. Album M-535, 10 sides $7.50

BLUEBIRD RECORDS (Made by Victor)

For popular bands, new tunes, big hits! ONLY 35c

You can buy RCA Victrolas on C. I. T. easy payment plan. Any radio instrument is better with an RCA Victor Master Antenna. *Price f.o.b. Camden, New Jersey, subject to change without notice.

Listen to the "Magic Key of RCA" Sundays, 2 to 3 P. M., E. S. T., on the NBC Blue Network.

Play VICTOR and BLUEBIRD Records Through Your Radio

Get $24.45 Value — in Victor or Bluebird Records and RCA Victor Record Player—for $14.95

Special offer gives you $14.95 (list price) RCA Victor Record Player, $7.50 worth of any Victor or Bluebird Records you choose, $2.00 subscription to Victor Record Review, and Victor Record Society membership, for $14.95. RCA Victor Record Player can be connected to any modern AC radio at little or no expense; plays Victor and Bluebird Records with full tone of set.

RCA Victrola

Combines Record and Radio Entertainment

A SERVICE OF THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

LEWIS MUMFORD

is called the modern

Thomas Paine

for the most masterly, the most completely damning analysis of fascism yet written

MEN MUST ACT

What fascism is made of, what it is doing, and what it will do next. And what Americans can do about it immediately.

"Its importance to our time is comparable to the utterances of Thomas Paine: the rights of man have once more been denied, and Mumford shows the pathway toward a new age of reason."

—EDUARD C. LINDEMAN

•

"MEN MUST ACT rings clearly and powerfully like Thomas Paine's appeal to the men of liberty of his time."

—GEORGE SELDES

•

"Without any exception, it is the most exciting book on the contemporary political situation that I have read. In the deepest sense, it is in the tradition of the great pamphleteers."

—MAX LERNER

•

"This is to serve notice on all Bunds, Silver Shirts, and other nightshirt Nazis that the undersigned is buying as many hundreds of copies of this book as he can afford for free distribution. . . . The undersigned invites reprisals from all those bands of skunks in human form who now plan to destroy our democracy."

—PAUL DE KRUIF

$1.50 at bookstores

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 MADISON AVE NEW YORK CITY

friends, who at last had swallowed their ideals to follow Chiang Kai-shek, for he saw that it was the whole people, and neither familial love nor the fight of factions, that counted now.

Part of the excellence of the book is in the author's detachment from both her inherited China and the Japan she fled to during the revolution, while she weighs without bias the vacillation of one, and the other's lust, weighs equably too the universal qualities of those germane lands which must make them understandable to us. This is fiction, a man's-eye view, not a militarist's, the wise perspective of I-wan, who grew from the theoretical to the actual world and remained China's patriot. His capitalist father, manipulating peace, his Communist hero who loved the fight but not the people, his wife who conscientiously must deny the art her old geisha had taught her of love—these are drawn as small biographies in a work which is as essentially biographical, though it may be framed in fiction, as all Pearl Buck's books. She is not quite a novelist; her creatures are housed haphazardly, and though each of them may grow honestly, draped in her beautiful, nearly monosyllabic style, they have not yet built together a novel's structure. This is none the less a notable fiction of the wretched earths in the East today.

HASSOLDT DAVIS

Revolutionary Realism

APOSTLES OF REVOLUTION. By Max Nomad. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

THE frustration of socialism's first attempts to achieve power by means of education and the democratic ballot box in Italy, Germany, Austria, Spain, and Czechoslovakia, the disintegration of "communism" in Russia; the whole development of the world since 1914, which confronts the great and beautiful dreams of the nineteenth century with an ugly reality—these sobering experiences more and more impel the slowly rallying forces of the political and cultural left to analyze the reasons for the defeat of their own and their spiritual ancestors' ideas. In the making is a new radical literature which tries to answer the questions: What happened? Why did it happen? What will follow? Professional eyewitnesses present their journalistic memoirs. Defeated politicians lament. University research workers offer their scholarly findings. Novelists begin to speak who prefer the difficult and painful vision of the entire present to the comfortable partial problems of a psychological past.

The author of "Apostles of Revolution" cannot easily be classified. He falls partly into each of these categories and yet into none of them. He is a lifelong revolutionary who has seen the prisons of more than one country from the inside. He is a warm-hearted activist with a profoundly skeptical mind, a dreamer of realities and a painstaking student of facts, quotations, and anecdotes, a champion of the under-dog but not a demagogue. One feels in his formulations, many of which seem to be either grandiose or petty, that he is honestly conscious—and far from hiding it—of being himself subject to all the contradictory impulses of the human mind. Such an author must be read carefully, and the more critically the more the reader favors independence.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

The volume consists of brief biographies of seven exceptional characters, each of whom represents a school of thought or temperament in the world of progressive action and counteraction: August Blanqui, the martyr; Karl Marx, the teacher; Michael Bakunin, the heretic; Sergey Nachayev, the fanatic; Johann Most, the preacher; Nestor Makhno, the warrior; Joseph Stalin, the hierarch. The labels are those of the author. In four hundred pages he presents a complex aggregation of material, part of which is salvaged from obscurity, part made available for the first time in English. The sketch of Bakunin is particularly excellent, revealing in sixty pages more than Professor Carr was able to do in six hundred. That the minor figures of Nachayev, Most, and Makhno are treated on the same level as the three "giants" seems to indicate at first a distorted perspective. Then one realizes how the negative characteristics of all of them add up to the reverse side of revolutionary illusion in all its forms. Their positive virtues are assumed to be known and are not stressed. But there can be no doubt that the author enriches our knowledge; and his sharp and witty style drives his points home.

In the introduction, which I read last, the author states that his chief object was "to explain the ever-recurring tragic failures of all revolutionary mass movements, which invariably fall short of achieving their originally professed aims." The use of the words "ever-recurring" veils the fact that he is dealing with limited and relatively short experiences in a world which seems, in contrast to its potentialities, still very primitive. Even if one does not share the vision of the French anarchist poet Laurent Tailhade of the "Heureux temps d'anarchie ou la plèbe baiserait la trace des pas des poètes," one may without illusion visualize a time not too remote in which the simple necessities of life will be granted to everyone. After all, revolutionary mass movements have achieved results. It is only a hundred short years since serfdom and the inhuman exploitation of the early capitalistic period. This, no doubt, the author also knows, even if he does not write much about it. He assures us, however, that his work is not a "'farewell to revolution' or an admission of the futility of human struggles, even though it is a renunciation of the utopian dream of the final triumph of justice and equality." In other words, he is convinced that an ideal can be approached but never realized 100 per cent. With contemporary propaganda slogans promising a 1,000 per cent fulfilment, the temptation to restate the old truism is understandable and even useful. Happily enough, "Apostles of Revolution" conveys much more: that however difficult and from time to time discouraging the fight of the common people may be, this fight is in itself a noble reality and will never cease. That the champions of the just cause, their books and their actions, show as often as not weaknesses of every kind will not disturb the true fighter. Max Nomad proves by his own life that he at least is little frightened by the ghosts of skepticism that haunt him—and sometimes fool him in his capacity as author.

"Apostles of Revolution" is a distinct contribution to the literature of revolutionary self-criticism. It expresses the growing desire to see the "naked truth." I hope every reader of this book, and I wish it may have many, will be able to penetrate its discouraging surface; he will then experience the kind of "pessimism" on which "optimism" grows.

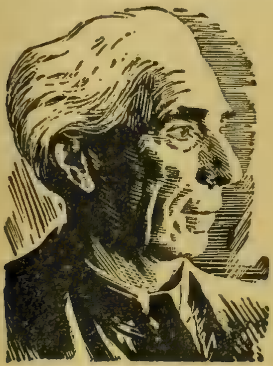
FRANZ HOELLERING

IF WAR COMES
Should We Fight?

BERTRAND RUSSELL
HARRY ELMER BARNES
LEWIS MUMFORD
MAX LERNER
JOHN T. FLYNN
CHARLES A. BEARD
JOHN DEWEY

DISCUSS THE PROS AND CONS OF THIS PRESSING QUESTION IN THE MARCH ISSUE OF

COMMON SENSE



"I think that in spite of Munich, war in Europe will come, and probably soon. . . ."

—BERTRAND RUSSELL

$1 for 7 Months —of Frank C. Hanighen's monthly reports on Europe, Senator Sheridan Downey and Representative Jerry Voorhis exclusive stories on Congress.

Also this Month:

THAT COMING NAZI SOVIET PACT in which Peter F. Drucker discusses the successors to Dr. Schacht.

"THE TIMES" vs. MEXICO, by Max Putzel

AMLIE TAKES THE STAND, by Selden Rodman.

COMMON SENSE, 315 Fourth Avenue, New York.
Enclosed is my dollar. Please begin my introductory 7-month subscription to Common Sense with the current issue.

Name ....
Address ....
....G

Timely New Books of Vital Importance

●

BETRAYAL
IN CENTRAL EUROPE
By G. E. R. GEDYE

"Superb . . . no other book can match it. Gedye was there and knew every move. He saw what happened. And he can make you see and feel it. Decidedly a must book . . . a book that everyone should read."—N. Y. Times

"The pages sizzle and crackle . . . the most eloquent book that has come out of the European crisis." —N. Y. Herald Tribune

"Made fantastically exciting by intimate knowledge and brilliant writing. A tremendously moving story and a great human document."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $3.50

●

I MARRIED
A GERMAN
By MADELEINE KENT

The authentic experiences of an Englishwoman who went to live in Germany, found her life wrecked by the Nazi rise to power and finally returned to England with her husband. "A remarkable autobiography of absorbing interest." —Vera Brittain. $3.00

●

UNION NOW
By CLARENCE K. STREIT
N. Y. Times Correspondent at Geneva

Written by an authority on world affairs, it presents nothing less than a daring, but practical, plan whereby the great democracies of the world can unite for security in a single federated government.

DOROTHY THOMPSON calls this: "The most important book for international democracy written in this generation."

JAMES TRUSLOW ADAMS, on the front page of the N. Y. Times Book Review, says: "Someday, something like what Mr. Streit suggests will have to come to pass, either now or after we and our children have waded through flowing rivers of blood." $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

Toward a Better America

ROPE OF GOLD. By Josephine Herbst. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

SEASONED TIMBER. By Dorothy Canfield. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

A SERIOUS novelist these days finds it difficult not to be concerned in some way with the contemporary scene. We live in a world which seems to be changing every day, not for the better. And as it is, it is bad enough. Both Miss Herbst and Miss Canfield write seriously about our times. Their novels, which superficially are very different, complement each other. Man, says Miss Canfield, cannot live by bread alone. But if he doesn't eat, Miss Herbst says grimly, he will die! Both writers, moreover, indicate that within man himself lies the remedy for his difficulties: he must have fortitude, use vigilance, act strongly to protect himself from the enemies which are trying to destroy democracy. Miss Herbst's enemies are mainly greed and exploitation; Miss Canfield's are the denial of intellect and the suppression of the free mind.

Taking a large canvas which includes the East as well as the West, farms as well as the industrial cities, Miss Herbst writes about the underprivileged. There are farmers who live in daily terror of the all-enveloping maw of the bank. The black days on their calendars are interest days; they work while daylight lasts not only to preserve their crops and their families from the ravages of the weather—drought, hail, dust—and all the insect pests that farmers have always fought but from a burden of debt that threatens to bury their future. Nor does the industrial worker who has left the farm to go to the city fare any better. There are not enough jobs to go around; workers are subjected to the speed-up and numbed by the monotony of the moving belt; and they must fight for the right of legitimate protest in the form of union organization. (It should be explained that these are automobile workers and the time is from 1935 to 1937.) Miss Herbst is passionately involved in the problems of her characters. She makes their bitter need seem very real; and with a fine sense of dramatic climax she builds up to the release and promise of a farmers' union and the sitdown strike as weapons to carve out better days. Her protagonist is a young man from a well-to-do family who has devoted himself to the interests of workers and farmers; the villain of the piece is his brother, a smart young business man quick to adopt the weapons of the scab and the informer to keep the workers quiet. Both are sensitively drawn, neither one wholly bad or wholly good, not particularly happy or satisfied, both anxious to protect the rights which seem to each essential, although the rights of one are directly opposed to the rights of the other. A love affair with a girl who was brought up with the working class enriches and complicates the life of the hero. But the main job is not love or family happiness or earning enough money to be comfortable; it is work, day and night, for the cause, for those persons who are denied, and must have, economic security.

Miss Canfield limits herself geographically to Vermont, with a brief look-in at New York City. Her characters are the hard-bitten, reticent Vermonters who people New England novels as well as the Vermont hills. The sense of country living here is very strong and sweet: water rushing over rocks, red and gold in a New England autumn, the blue shadows cast by the firs over the crusty snow. But there is poverty here, too, and poor farms. Even the towns are poor. Miss Canfield's particular town is dominated by the academy to which the local boys and girls as well as a few outsiders go for a practical as well as a theoretical education. The academy in turn is dominated by its principal, a man of culture, who in the best sense deserves the name civilized. In the first half of her book, Miss Canfield plagues the principal by having him fall in love, at forty-five, with a young school teacher. Then she gets down to business, and having thoroughly established her background of democracy governed by reason and the libertarian tradition, she throws the bone of anti-Semitism into her little town. The ensuing dog-fight provides real drama. The academy's only rich trustee leaves a million dollars to the school on condition, first, that it be made into a preparatory school for rich men's sons and, second, that no Jew be permitted to become a student. A million dollars is a lot of money; the school has never had many Jewish students. The town doesn't know much about Jews. But it does know about its own principles; and it dislikes being bossed by outsiders. The bequest is refused, but not without a struggle; freedom of thought has as many enemies these days as has the farmers' union.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

It should be clear that both these books are intensely American. One looks back at the American past and fights its battle for the tradition of tolerance; one looks forward to the American future and a better day for exploited and desperate people. In a sense one represents the liberal, the other the radical point of view, but the aim of both is the same. For Americans, however they may be situated, both books have a great deal to say.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Prelude to Versailles

THE FORGOTTEN PEACE. BREST-LITOVSK, MARCH, 1918. By John W. Wheeler-Bennett. William Morrow and Company. $5.

IN THESE days which are marked by an effort to "revise" the Treaty of Versailles and to reestablish the peace treaties of Brest-Litovsk and Bucharest, Mr. Wheeler-Bennett's book should be prescribed reading. The author is an Englishman who has devoted many years of study to the consequences of the peace treaties, and who has discussed in a large number of books the different phases of the reparations and disarmament problems. Whereas these books remained known only to the specialist, his book on Hindenburg introduced him to a wider circle of readers. The present book, undoubtedly his best, will be of equal interest to the specialist and to the general reader.

It is a dramatic story. Its background is the Russian Revolution in its prime, Lenin and Trotsky having just come to power; opposed to the new government is the victorious German army preparing, after the collapse of Russia, for the great offensive in the West in the spring of 1918. The Russian revolutionaries and the generals and diplomats of the Hohenzollern regime confront each other. The problems of "national self-determination," abused for the purposes of Get This Special 148-Page Issue FREE . . . . .

WHAT DOES the European crisis mean to us in America? How should we meet the challenge to democracy?

SURVEY
GRAPHIC
"CALLING AMERICA"

Actual Size 8¾" x 11¾"

For the answers to these burning questions turn to the Survey Graphic where 28 distinguished writers from Europe and America, under the special editorship of Raymond Gram Swing, cover the world crisis more comprehensively than a $3 book.

So authoritatively do they discuss the consequence of tyranny — the minority problems and anti-Semitism in the United States—our democratic duty to labor, Negroes, refugees—the course of democracy in a changing America —that you will refer to their articles for years to come.

Over a hundred photographs, drawings, charts and maps help make this the most popular issue Survey Associates, a non-profit making educational society, has published in 28 years of activity.

The caliber of the contributors to this number suggests the high standard of articles which appear in every issue of Survey Graphic, the magazine David Cushman Coyle calls "the only authentic and readable current source of American social facts": Edgar Ansel Mowrer, William E. Rappard, Dorothy Thompson, Dorothy Canfield, William A. Neilson, Archibald MacLeish, Lewis Gannett, Alvin Johnson, Bertrand Russell, William L. White, George N. Shuster, John Masefield, Felix Frankfurter, Thomas Mann, Hendrik Willem Van Loon and others.

The first edition of 50,000 sold out in ten days! The second edition of 30,000 is now ready.

PRAISE FROM THE PRESS

The Nation—"We congratulate Survey Graphic and hope that this excellent issue has the wide distribution it deserves."

New York Times—"Remarkable issue."

Detroit Free Press—"Grand job of selling the American principle of Democracy."

St. Louis Post-Dispatch—"Survey Graphic deserves a salute."

Kansas City Star—"Intelligently planned—expertly presented—timely report."

New York Post—"Monumental edition bearing the most distinguished list of contributors I have encountered in one magazine in recent years."

Harry Hansen, New York World-Telegram—"Offers a vast amount of information for those who write, think and act to stop persecution and injustices in the United States."

Davenport, Iowa, Times—"Timely contribution to American thought."

INTRODUCTORY OFFER

Single copies of this special issue (not generally available on newsstands) sell for 50c. The annual subscription price of Survey Graphic is $3. For the next five issues—and the special number free—mail only $1 with the coupon below, while copies are available. Mail your order today!

SURVEY GRAPHIC N
112 East 19th Street, New York City

Send me your "Calling America" issue free and the next five issues for the dollar I enclose.

*Name*____________________

*Address*____________________

You are cordially invited to
The Wedding
OF JENNIE MIDDLETON and
DR. PERCY GREGG

This is the story of a single day, the day of Jennie Middleton's wedding to Dr. Gregg. If you have ever said, "I do," before the altar, you will see your sensations of that day untangled with a keenness little short of marvelous. "THE WEDDING creates in the reader much the same effect that Proust's Prelude does in REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST: there is the same delicacy of discernment, the same instinctive emotional rightness. This carefully planned and finely wrought novel of man's deep and hidden emotional life is a pleasure indeed in a world which applauds too facilely slipshod work."—William March

The WEDDING
By GRACE LUMPKIN
Author of TO MAKE MY BREAD $2.50 at bookstores
LEE FURMAN ▪ NEW YORK

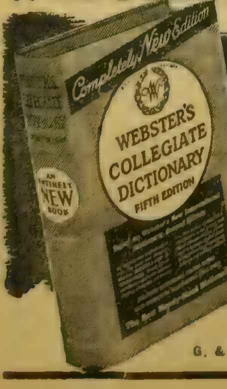
NEW!
WORLD TRADE
By E. B. DIETRICH

"It is well organized, well written, and gives the reader a more complete picture of recent economic changes in the international field than any other book with which I am acquainted."—Norman S. Buck, Yale University.

$2.75

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY 257 Fourth Avenue, New York, New York

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE
NEW FIFTH EDITION



The Best Handy-Sized Dictionary

because it defines all the most commonly used words, selected from WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY, Second Edition—the "Supreme Authority" in courts, schools, and editorial offices—and is edited with the same careful scholarship. 110,000 entries; 1,800 illustrations; 1,300 pages; $3.50 to $8.50, depending on bindings. Purchase of your bookdealer or order from publishers.

Write for New Quiz and Picture Game — FREE.
G. & C. MERRIAM CO., 248 Broadway, Springfield, Mass.

naked power politics, the specter of the proletarian revolution, the aims of economic imperialism, and the struggle for strategic positions to insure further victory were then interwoven in a complex picture, as they are today. It is history, but it is a history not only of a period twenty years in the past but also of our own days.

The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk revealed to the world the degree to which the army high command and the annexationist party ruled Germany and how impossible it was to arrive at a peace of understanding with them. The motives which animated General Hoffmann, probably with Ludendorff the most gifted German general of the World War period, were the destruction of Bolshevism and the limitless expansion of German influence eastward; the same motives animate many Germans today—not only the Nazis but also the German nationalists on whose behalf German colonization of Russia was proposed by Dr. Schacht in Rome in November, 1932, and by Hugenberg in London in June, 1933.

On March 18, 1918, the German Reichstag discussed the terms of the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk. "The parties of the right and center were openly jubilant at having achieved peace in the East on their own terms, and expressed enthusiastic hopes that the great offensive in the West, which was about to be launched, would shortly result in a similar peace." Against some attempt by the left to secure the possibility of future friendly relations with Russia, Gustav Stresemann, who acted as the usual mouthpiece of the supreme army command, exclaimed: "Here the right of self-determination does not apply. I do not believe in Wilson's universal League of Nations; I believe that after the conclusion of peace it will burst like a soap bubble." As the debate proceeded, news came that the allied armies were retreating before the hammer blows of Ludendorff. "With the news of victory in their ears, the deputies ratified the treaty on March 22. Only the Independent Socialists opposed. The Social Democrats abstained from voting and thereby forfeited their right of protest when later they themselves were forced to submit to a dictated peace."

But the story did not end there. The Peace of Brest-Litovsk did not stop Germany in the East. It was unable to gather the desired fruit of victory. Although the outstanding organizer of the German army, General Gröner, was sent to the Ukraine, he could not collect the grain, for the peasants refused to cooperate. The "independence movement" of the Ukraine collapsed quickly; the peasants turned to Moscow. But the Germans were insatiable. Expeditionary forces penetrated into Baku; others occupied the Crimean ports, and the German colonists in the Crimea were urged to appeal to the Kaiser for annexation. General Gröner outlined plans for the ultimate partitioning of Russia into several independent states, thereby eliminating forever a great Russia capable of stopping the German march eastward. But these schemes of expansion were not to endure. Ludendorff, beaten on the Western front by the Allied armies, was obliged to sue for peace.

The reply which came from President Wilson on September 27 declared, "We are all agreed that there can be no peace obtained by any kind of bargain or compromise with the governments of the Central Powers, because we have seen them deal with other governments at Brest-Litovsk and at Bucharest. They have convinced us that they do not intend justice. They observe no covenants, accept no principles but force and their own interests." Germany by its treatment of Russia had shown the consequences of defeat at its hands. This gave to the Allies, finally, that degree of cooperation which was necessary for victory. Germany's defeat in the West undid the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk but its spirit survived. Will there be a new Brest-Litovsk in our days, and will defeat or victory in the East be again closely linked with events in the West? Mr. Wheeler-Bennett cannot answer these questions, but his book will make the reader understand the psychological factors upon which the future depends.

HANS KOHN

Awaiting the Fire

HERE COMES A CANDLE. By Storm Jameson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THIS is the story, told as it were in flashlight photographs, of a number of unrelated people living in poverty and discomfort in an old courtyard building in London's Soho. There is Captain Randall, a dislocated ex-officer whose latest venture is the Screech Owl night club; there are the Pizettis, who keep the cafe bar and are scraping together enough money to enable them to go back to Italy; there is the Barley family, the man a craftsman carpenter steadily losing in competition with the big firms; there are two prostitutes, successful and unsuccessful; there is an old woman anarchist, and another old woman who wants to go back to the country; there is a young girl in love with a flying instructor; and a mysterious doctor. What unites them is that they are all in some way waiting for something, chiefly a chance of escape. No longer post-war, they might be described as ante bellum, trying to grab something and run before a smash comes.

The immediate threat, implicit through the book, is that the house will go up in fire. It might be the careless Barley children, who do indeed start a bonfire; it might be old Pop, who searches the refuse bins by the light of his candle; it is certain that Randall, carefully insured and at the end of his tether, will give in to the suggestion of the two professional fire makers, Ben and Franklyn. But the urgency and vitality of the book come from its success in presenting and fusing a group of average-enough representatives of London's flotsam, individuals outside and unrepresentative of the straight and narrow path of most English women novelists. Sometimes, it is true, the flashlight method fails to pick out what is significant in the characters. This is the case with the two old women, the drunken but efficient doctor, and a waiter at the night club. On the other hand, the picture of the younger drab whining her way into the Lock hospital, until her own stupidity brings about a more sudden death, is an excellent etching in the ruthless manner; and good, too, is Pop, who alone is satisfied with his lot and whose discovery of a two-shilling piece ends the book: "You waited for me, he said, holding it affectionately inside his pocket. Now he felt that the country would at least last his time. And after that, what would it matter?" Pop provides if not a moral at least a contrast which might have been expanded.

NORAH HOULT

Tours for COLLEGE STUDENTS
SPONSORED BY
The National Student Federation

MEXICO. Leader to be announced. Principal points of interest and all aspects of Mexican life. Patzcuaro, Morelia, Cuernavaca, Taxco, Puebla, Mexico City, etc. Sailing July 12. Back Aug. 21 .... $395

●

CYCLING IN SCANDINAVIA with short sojourns in England, Belgium, France, under leadership of Arthur Northwood, Jr., ex-Pres., National Student Federation. Sailing June 27. Back August 27. $398

●

CYCLING IN HOLLAND AND FRANCE with short sojourns in London, Paris, Belgium, under leadership of Catherine Woodruff, Assistant Director of The Open Road. Sailing June 27. Back Aug. 27. ...... $398

●

FRANCE BY MOTOR (4th season). Leader to be announced. Caen, Bayeux, Mont. St. Michel, St. Malo, Tours, Chateaux of the Loire, Carcassonne, Nimes, Avignon, Arles, Cannes, Nice, Grenoble, Geneva, (Switzerland), Dijon, Paris, etc. Optional extension. Sailing June 27. Back August 9. .... $398

●

SCANDINAVIA under leadership of Mary Jeanne McKay, President, National Student Federation. Norway—Bergen, Oslo, a week of fjords and mountains. Sweden—Stockholm, Uppsala, Visby, the countryside of Dalecarlia and Scania. Denmark—Copenhagen, Elsinore, country life. Sailing July 6. Back August 20. .... $474

●

"INSIDE EUROPE" (fourth season) under leadership of Herbert Witt, Exec. Secretary, N. Y. District, American Student Union. Auspices American Student Union. London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Stockholm, Oslo, Amsterdam, Paris. Sailing July 1. Back August 22. .... $498

Steamship passage Third Class. For information regarding itineraries, social and cultural programs, etc., on these and other trips, address:

THE OPEN ROAD
8 W. 40TH ST.
NEW YORK
Department C

Cooperating in the Soviet Union with Intourist

IS A DEAD MAN RULING GERMANY!
The Answer is YES

What is the sensational, suppressed truth behind the zig-zag course of German diplomacy since the day of the Munich Pact ?

What appalling situation confronted Chamberlain in the carefully darkened rooms at Munich and Godesburg? And how does this account for his mystifying hesitations during those hours of life or death ?

What is in back of the strangely persistent rumors in London and elsewhere that the real Adolf Hitler is dead ?

The astounding revelations in this book will rock the world! For the full details of the fantastic truth—read

THE STRANGE DEATH OF ADOLF HITLER

$2.50 at bookstores

MACAULAY Publishers 386 4th Ave. N.Y.

Shorter Notices

THE HANNES SCHNEIDER SKI TECHNIQUE. By Benno Rybizka. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

Hannes Schneider, inventor and master of the Arlberg ski technique, quotes in his foreword to this excellent ski primer an old Austrian saying:

> "Gray is all theory
> But grayest the one about ski."

I wish to contradict such skepticism after putting the book of his former assistant—now an exile in this country—to a twofold test. I studied the book with a beginner and also with one of these numerous "good" skiers who persist in the same faults because they have no theoretical knowledge of the sport they think they are practicing. We read lesson after lesson—dry-skiing indoors—and went outside only after we knew exactly what we wanted to do. In practice—this was most important—we never rushed ahead before mastering the simpler exercises. After a week the beginner was able to start with stem-turns; the advanced skier had lost his bad form and went down the slopes in almost perfect Christianias. That such results could be achieved in so short a time is the best proof of the clearness and efficiency of Mr. Rybizka's method of teaching. He has a very simple, plastic, and colorful way of explaining things; there is nothing grayish in his theories. Beautiful photographs—movie sequences of all the turns—allow one to see the different phases of every movement with the eye of the slow-motion camera. The volume is to be recommended to skiers of all grades. Even the master of skiing will read with profit the short discussion about the necessity of stemming. F. H.

THROUGH THE FOG OF WAR. By Liddell Hart. Random House. $2.50.

At first glance this book may seem a rather casual collection of biographical sketches, historical essays, and reviews of military memoirs. More detailed study, which it well repays, shows a real unity in apparent diversity. Attemping to pierce the fog of untruths with which false patriotism and self-interest have sought to hide unpleasant facts, the author turns a brilliant searchlight on some outstanding personalities and events of the Great War. Masses of new material which have become available in recent years have caused him to revise judgments made in earlier books. He has now come to agree broadly with Lloyd George's view of Haig here exhibited as intolerant, conceited, deceitful, and obstinate—a general who rather than acknowledge error recklessly sacrificed half a million men. Nor are other inflated reputations spared. Liddell Hart's uncompromising search for truth is likely to make him unpopular in military circles. The distinguished German general who a few years ago made a public plea for "camouflage," meaning the discreet veiling of past blunders of the high command, is all too typical. We cannot learn from experience if we allow the history which embodies it to be varnished. It is fortunate that the foremost military historian of our time insists on getting down to the original paint. His books ought to be required reading for intelligent civilians and soldiers alike.

LIFE MAKES ADVANCES. By Madeleine Boyd. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

This is an imposture as a novel, and a book singularly embarrassing to review, for any criticism of it must be an affront to the life of the author who has unmistakably written an autobiography in this form. Using the alias of Nicole Desrieux she introduces H. L. Mencken, James Stevens, Padraic Colum, "A. E.," all mistily drawn, and with them that great company of composite characters, even mistier, who were obsessed with the knees of Nicole. It is like the surrealist collage which assumes art by the gluing of real objects upon a painted scene. The scene here is panoramic. Nicole traipsed first from France to Ireland in search of Life, and soon met Michael, a critic of promise who married her beneath the more virile nose of the god-like Denys. Michael's appointment as vice-counsul took them to Baltimore, where Nicole continued to repulse her suitors, loathing and desiring them at once. It was only in England at last that she succumbed, to her faithful Denys, then conceded him forever before the needs of Michael's physical frailty and prodigious mind. The writing is deadly. There are a few good details of Nicole's character, but her stature as a heroine is so small that it compels small interest, and even the distinguished names in the book, aside from the question of taste involved, mean no more than a ruse to carry the attention between one and another episode when "all her femininity was for answering his masculinity." That is the tenor of it, and a review in a phrase.

NATION SUBSCRIPTION ORDER FORM

THE NATION 20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $.................. please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

☐ TEN WEEKS ($1) ☐ TWO YEARS ($8)
☐ ONE YEAR ($5) ☐ THREE YEARS ($11)

Name..

Address...

City..

Extra Postage for Year: Canadian, 50c; Foreign $1.00

8-4-[illegible]

CONTRIBUTORS

RICHARD L. STROUT is a Washington correspondent.

HARRY BLOCK, Mexican correspondent of The Nation, has in the past written under the name of L. O. Prendergast.

ELIOT JANEWAY has just completed a survey of manufacturers and industries doing business in war supplies.

HASSOLDT DAVIS is a frequent contributor to magazines.

NORAH HOULT is a British novelist, author of "Coming from the Fair" and other books.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 11, 1939 NUMBER 11

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 277

EDITORIALS:
- ARMS AND ISOLATION 280
- THE COURT REVERTS 280
- CHINA IS STILL FIGHTING 281

A. F. OF L. INTO G. O. P. by Kenneth G. Crawford 283

PIUS XII AND THE AXIS by G. A. Borgese 285

THE KING COMES TO CANADA by David Martin 288

WE STILL NEED A BILL OF RIGHTS by Raymond L. Wise 291

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS. HARD FOOD FOR MIDAS by Keith Hutchison 293

IN THE WIND 294

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 295

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 296
- THE MIND OF MATTHEW ARNOLD by Robert Morss Lovett 297
- DEMOCRAT IN BERLIN by Erika Mann 298
- A HAPPY ETERNITY by Maxwell Geismar 299
- LUSTIER THAN LIFE by Eunice Clark 300
- FILMS by Franz Hoellering 301
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 302

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART
I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE SENATE ECONOMY CROWD IS TAKING A new tack. Believing that the Treasury must shortly ask Congress to raise the legal debt limit, Senator Harrison has announced his vociferous opposition. The present law fixes the limit at $45 billion, which, according to the Senator, will be reached by July 1, 1940. This forecast is based on the assumption that the President's budget recommendations will not be substantially curtailed by Congress. But if the appropriations are voted, the Treasury must find the money either from taxes, on which Congress is also the final authority, or from loans. It would therefore seem that the logical action for Mr. Harrison to take would be to persuade his colleagues to reduce appropriations and raise taxes to the point where the budget balanced. But logic is frequently not politics. The Harrison-Garner bloc wants to receive credit for preaching economy without incurring the odium which would follow brutal budget surgery. They hope that by squeezing the President between an irresistible deficit and an immovable debt limit they may force him to undertake the bloody work. Were it not for the devastating effect on the national economy, we could wish Mr. Roosevelt would call this bluff by sending Congress a revised budget reducing expenditure by three or four billions. What a universal howl there would be! How convincingly the Wall Street boys would demonstrate their confidence by frantic dumping of stocks! As a writer for Barron's, the financial weekly, says: "It is the conservative axiom, in both business and political worlds, that the No. 1 keystone of confidence would be a balanced budget, but when actual reductions have in the past been contemplated by Roosevelt, as they were late in 1937 and early in 1938, they have been deterred by almost panicky, if usually private, pleas from business itself."

*

THE SUPREME COURT DECISIONS DISCUSSED editorially on another page of this issue should be a sharp warning to the President that he must exercise the greatest care in picking a successor to Justice Brandeis. A post so imperial in its power calls for a man whose liberalism is firm and whose experience is wide. Among the candidates mentioned, Senator Schwellenbach has a record of liberalism which as far as our own investigation discloses is unmarred. The same can be said of Lloyd Garrison. Chairman Douglas of the SEC, who is favored by several of the President's closest advisers, is generally considered a liberal but certain reservations must be made. The others are too little known to admit of final judgment. Judge Stephens of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals is under suspicion because of his conservative Democratic backing. Judge Hutcheson of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals has the Strecker decision to his credit and has in general supported the New Deal, but more ought to be known of his decision against the Wagner Act in the Jones and Laughlin case and his ruling upholding the Texas "white primary" law. Dean Wiley B. Rutledge of the Iowa Law School has the reputation in his section of having been a New Dealer before the New Deal, and he has the support of the liberal St. Louis Star-Times.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

CHAIRMAN DOUGLAS IS AN EXPERT ON corporation law and reorganizations. In an article in the Yale Law Review for December, 1933, dealing with the federal Securities Act, he advanced much the same arguments for revision and amendment as those put forward at the time by Wall Street. An article on Protective Committees in Railroad Reorganizations in the Harvard Law Review of February, 1934, evinces a faith in the readiness of insurance companies and savings banks to fight the influence of railroad bankers in defense of the investor that has been completely exploded by the testimony brought out in the Wheeler investigation. His unexpected failure, of more recent date, to support President Hutchins of Chicago when he resigned as a public trustee of the Stock Exchange because of the way the present "reform" management handled the Whitney case is also disturbing. We wonder how hardy Mr. Douglas's liberalism would prove to be in the cold isolation of the Supreme Court.

*

MR. MORGENTHAU HAD A COMPLETE ANSWER for those Senatorial critics who cross-examined him on the workings of the Stabilization Fund, and he made out a good case for its continuance. Publication of the accounts showed that rumors of the use of the fund for unauthorized purposes, such as the financing of arms shipments, were entirely baseless. We do not feel that the Secretary of the Treasury was on such safe ground in asking for an extension beyond June 30 of the President's power to revalue the dollar. He argued that this power should be retained for use in case other countries devalued their currencies in order to gain trade advantages. There is indeed a risk that the exchange rate of sterling will fall owing to the strain of armament finance and the drag of Britain's adverse balance of payments. But it is doubtful if a further cut in the dollar would meet this situation. Unfortunately the real problems involved were not brought out by Senator Glass, who as Mr. Morgenthau's chief heckler confined himself to rhetorical flourishes about "the degradation of the dollar." On page 293 Keith Hutchison, in a new fortnightly column dealing with financial and economic questions, shows the grave danger of attracting more gold to this country. So long as we attempt to keep step with foreign currencies which for both political and economic reasons are inevitably weaker than our own, we must accept more gold. To devalue again, that is, to increase the dollar price of gold, would only result in an increase of offerings. Failing a lowering of tariffs for the purpose of reducing our "favorable" balance of trade, we would be well advised to achieve the same result by deliberately allowing other countries an exchange advantage.

*

THE IDES OF MARCH—HITLER'S OPEN SEASON for treaty-breaking—are at hand. The air is thick with rumors of coming axis demands for appeasement in Africa, and there are ominous reports of troop movements. Nevertheless, European correspondents report some lifting of the atmosphere of panic so pervasive a month ago, and from Berlin and Rome come hints of dictators in a hesitant mood. They badly need another Munich, but they don't want war. The problem of just how high to pitch their demands is therefore exceedingly delicate. It is not made simpler by the attitude of Poland and the states of Southeastern Europe. These countries, of course, are not openly hostile to the axis—they cannot afford to be—but they are not so impressed with fascist might and right as to be dependable in an emergency. Yet unless Eastern Europe can be counted on, not merely to remain passive in a military sense, but to give active economic support, it is dangerous for the axis to push the Western powers to a point where they might revolt against appeasement and say: "Shut up or put up." Meanwhile there is new evidence of Germany's economic plight. Government contractors are now being paid in non-interest-bearing I. O. U.'s without definite redemption dates. In order to meet bills and pay rolls, they have to use these as collateral for bank loans, but this must lead to further increases in the note issue. Little wonder that Herr Brinkmann, Dr. Schacht's technical successor at the Reichsbank, has had a nervous breakdown manifesting itself in "extraordinary eccentricities." This diagnosis seems almost equally applicable to the state of Germany's finances.

*

THE OVERTHROW OF PREMIER NEGRIN BY A National Defense Council headed by General Segismundo Casado appears, as we go to press, to foreshadow the end of government resistance to the rebellion of General Franco. Despite Casado's formal statement promising a continuation of resistance if decent terms are not obtain-able, it is evident that the coup was organized by a group which desires peace at almost any price. It was provoked by Negrin's effort to reorganize the army so as to carry on the struggle until an honorable peace could be made. Even in defeat, Negrin and Julio Alvarez del Vayo, his Foreign Minister, will go down in history among the great men of the present age. Their leadership in the past two years under the most adverse circumstances has set an example of efficiency, firmness, and devotion which the leaders of Spain's sister democracies might profitably have heeded. As a military man of the old school, General Casado may conceivably get better terms from Franco than Negrin could have done. But this is doubtful.

* * *

ENGLAND AND FRANCE HAVE FOR REASONS of their own hastened to recognize Franco. Daladier hopes desperately to make friends with the new power on the French border, while Chamberlain is planning certain delicate hi-jacking operations which can only be carried out if he slips his foot in the door before the fascists slam it. The United States is under no such compulsions. Spain is still a nation in arms; foreign invaders are still occupying the country. Thanks to them and to democratic "non-intervention," Franco will doubtless be able to establish his power—if only for the time being. Our government did enough to help France and Britain to help the fascists to help him win. Let us not hasten to crown him before his triumph is complete. In 1873 the United States was the first to recognize the new Spanish Republic; in 1931 it was the last. Mr. Laughlin, then American ambassador, was more concerned with protecting the contract of the International Telephone and Telegraph Company than with the political shift in Spain; Mr. Laughlin, now of the American Union for Nationalist Spain, urged recognition of Franco a few days after the fall of Barcelona. But today we have the Stimson doctrine to which we can tie our policy. We refused to recognize the conquest of Ethiopia and Manchuria; by the same token we can refuse to recognize the conquest of Spain.

* * *

IT IS A SIGN OF THE FEVERISH TIMES THAT the election of a pope is hailed with joy by forces that never before dreamed of the Vatican as anything but the inner sanctum of reaction. G. A. Borgese argues elsewhere in this issue that the Holy See can never reconcile itself with the liberal Weltanschauung, let alone rescue it from the totalitarian blight now settling down on half of Europe. We do not forget that as papal secretary of state the new Pope was the guiding spirit of the Vatican's support of General Franco, and we admit the philosophic limitations to any pope's support of democracy as we know it. And yet we cannot go all the way with Mr. Borgese in disparaging the importance of Cardinal Pacelli's elevation. For the new Pope has become a symbol. So marked was his opposition to Nazi racial doctrines and his inclination toward the democratic powers that the German and Italian press felt called upon to warn the Sacred College of Cardinals against his election. Nevertheless, he was chosen in less time than it took the college to pick any pope since 1621. Whatever that may mean in the decades in which Mr. Borgese deals, in 1939 it is a stumbling-block in the way of the totalitarian chariot. It is an order to the Catholics of Germany to resist a fanaticism that reduces the Inquisition to mild bigotry by comparison. That will not help Herr Hitler in his next crisis, and to that extent at least the cheering in strange quarters is justified.

* * *

ALL INDIA WAS PROFOUNDLY STIRRED BY the hunger strike of Mohandas K. Gandhi in protest against the autocratic rule of Thakore Sahed in the state of Rajkot. It ended after ninety-eight hours with a victory for Gandhi when the Viceroy intervened and undertook to guarantee that the ruler of Rajkot would set up the council Gandhi had demanded. The Viceroy also promised to refer to the Chief Justice of India Gandhi's charge of breach of faith and any further disputes regarding proposed reforms. Until within the past few months Gandhi had opposed intervention in the states' affairs on the ground that the population was not sufficiently awakened to assume the responsibility of self-government. He now regards non-intervention as "cowardice when there is all-around awakening among the people of the states." Thakore Sahed, one of the richest and most reactionary of all the independent Indian rulers, recently went back on his pledge to grant a moderate amount of self-rule in Rajkot. Gandhi's fast was, of course, more than a mere protest against misrule in that one state. It was a supreme effort to arouse the Indian people against the autocracy of the Indian princes, backed by the British Raj.

* * *

HAROLD LASKI ARRIVED IN SEATTLE EARLY in January to fill an engagement as visiting lecturer at the University of Washington. Shortly afterward the issue of The Nation for January 14 also arrived. It contained an article by Mr. Laski entitled Why I Am a Marxist. At this disclosure the professional patriots of Seattle, aghast but not speechless, sent up their usual protests; the D. A. R. joined the fray, pointing out that Mr. Laski was occupying a chair endowed by a capitalist. It is a pleasure to report that as a result of the publicity Mr. Laski's public lectures have been so crowded that the doors are closed long in advance of the meeting time —the university band plays to brighten the interim of waiting; and bleacher seats on the fire-escapes are regularly occupied. The Nation has also profited, the reactionary Seattle Times having republished sections of Mr. Laski's article, with a credit line, in order to view them with alarm. Lee Paul Sieg, president of the university, has also done his part; for although he helped to destroy academic freedom at the University of Pittsburgh, he has been defending it ably and successfully in the heady air of Seattle. The business community is torn between resentment at a university which pays $5,000 for anticapitalist lectures and awe for the man who can get it. Mr. Laski, through all the excitement, has kept his seat.

Arms and Isolation

THE Administration's enlarged arms program is encountering but little opposition either from opponents of its foreign policy or from the economy bloc. Only on the question of Guam did these two groups get together, and this is the sole important item in the program which has been discarded. The $500,000,000 Army Supply bill with its provision for a greatly increased air force was passed by the House unanimously and with very little debate. Despite more vocal opposition, arms sentiment in the Senate is equally strong; in fact, the Senate has raised the House's ante by an additional 500 planes. It is clear that whatever we may economize on, it will not be arms. It is equally clear that we intend to face the world with a big stick even though we are at sixes and sevens about how it ought to be used.

In the Senate, debate on the National Defense bill has been prolonged, but only to a small extent has it been directed at the bill itself. Instead there have been discussions about the French airplane contract, the alleged secret diplomacy of the President, the accuracy or inaccuracy of Colonel Lindbergh's reports on German air strength, and, of course, what Washington meant by "foreign entanglements." Despite the expenditure of abundant eloquence it cannot be said there was much clarification of the real issues at stake: Is there a menace to this country sufficient to justify a great expansion in arms? If so, in what quarters is that menace developing, and have we a foreign policy designed to minimize it?

There are some isolationists in the Senate, including Messrs. Nye and Borah, who apparently answer the first question in the negative and therefore have some logic on their side in arguing that we have no interest in what happens in Europe. Nevertheless, their anxiety to prove their point leads them to some extraordinary conclusions. For instance, on February 28 Senator Nye expressed his firm conviction "that Europe is not going to have war this year or next year unless and until one side involved in Europe can have assurance that the United States is going to stand ready to assist them in that war." He went on to explain that the danger was that the democracies, if given hope of American support, would refuse the next demand of the dictators and war would result. This is "munichism" with a vengeance. It amounts to saying that, no matter what the fascist countries demand from Britain and France, we should do nothing which might make them say "no," lest war ensue and this country be dragged into it. We wonder if Mr. Nye would maintain this attitude were Germany to require the cession of Newfoundland or Bermuda. Pressed by Senator Barkley, who suggested that if the field were thus abandoned to fascist bluff it would not be long before "we should be confronted with the same situation," Mr. Nye completely reversed himself. "The democracies," he said, "have ceased their moment of fear . . . and are ready to stand their ground; we have heard the last of the matter unless we are ready now to give encouragement to another rush into war in Europe." We hope Mr. Nye is correct in his second estimation of Anglo-French guts rather than in his first. Recent cables from Europe suggest that there has been some stiffening in London and Paris accompanied by increased hesitation in Berlin and Rome. In all these places the new factor recognized as affecting the situation is the probability of American economic support to the victims of aggression. If there is neither a war nor another Munich this year, the world will be greatly in debt to Mr. Roosevelt.

The Court Reverts

THE Supreme Court seems to be relapsing into its historic role. The decisions interpreting the Wagner Act in the Fansteel, Columbian Enameling, and Sands Manufacturing Company cases force one to conclude that the liberal phase which began under the impact of the President's court plan was merely a strategic retreat. The court has been encouraged by the revival of reaction to serve again as the chief instrument of propertied interests in combating progressive legislation.

The fact that the sitdown strike is involved has served to make one of these decisions, that in the Fansteel case, appear more important than its fellows and also to obscure its real significance. For though we do not share the Pecksniffian horror with which the sitdown strike is regarded, we are ready to admit that if the only effect of this ruling were to bar the sitdown strike we should hardly regard it as calamitous. Congress intended, and until now the courts have agreed, that men on strike are to be regarded as employees, entitled to all the rights and the protection that the Wagner Act gives an employee in his dealings with his employer. "As now construed by the court," Justice Reed objected in dissenting for himself and Justice Black, "the employer may discharge any striker, with or without cause, so long as the discharge is not used to interfere with self-organization or collective bargaining." In the Fansteel case the striking employees were all discharged for taking part in, or helping others to take part in, a sitdown strike. But these men could as easily have been discharged for other reasons, thus ridding the company of its obligation under the act to bargain collectively with them and not to subject them to coercion or discrimination for union activities. "Friction easily engendered by labor strife," Justice Reed continued, "may readily give rise to conduct, from nose-thumbing to sabotage, which will give fair occasion for discharge on grounds other than those prohibited by the Labor Act." With a few agents provocateurs on a picket line, an employer can break a strike and destroy a union by discharging the strikers and hiring other men to take their place, with no danger of interference by the Labor Board.

Burlingame, Cal.

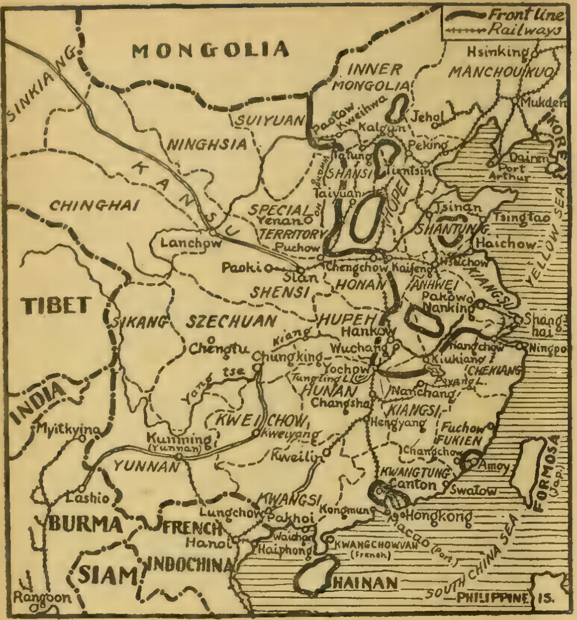
As though that were not enough, other weapons are placed at the employer's disposal by the Sands and the Columbian decisions. If he can find his employees guilty of some breach of contract, even though it be, as in these cases, of the most dubious and technical kind, he can discharge them whether they are on strike or not; they are thus deprived of the protection given them by the Wagner Act. "The act," as Justice Roberts wrote for the majority in the Sands case, "does not prohibit an effective discharge for repudiation by the employee of his agreement, any more than it prohibits such discharge for a tort committed against the employer." The Fansteel decision is cited as authority for the latter part of the statement. What casts the deepest shadow across future decisions is the unwillingness of the majority in both the Sands and the Columbian case to examine realities. If breaches of contract can be so easily established, labor must prepare itself for a terrific onslaught in the courts. In the Sands case there was a lockout rather than a strike over a reasonable difference of opinion in interpreting a contract; the employer rather than the union breached the contract. In the Columbian case the contract did, indeed, provide for arbitration and no strike while a decision was pending. But the employees did not go on strike until after the company had repeatedly refused to arbitrate differences, and accordingly there was no decision pending to bar a strike.

In these decisions the court has made four amendments to the Wagner Act as written by Congress. These "amendments" provide that the courts may review the facts and draw their own inferences from them in Labor Board cases, that strikers forfeit the rights of employees if they are discharged for violence or property damage; that an employer has no obligation under the act if he can show a breach of contract on the part of his employees. These clauses do not appear in the act; provisions embodying them were discussed and rejected by Congress when the law was framed. But the most important "amendment" made by the court is in regard to the right to strike. The act says that nothing in it "shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." Chief Justice Hughes says, "But this recognition of 'the right to strike' plainly contemplates a lawful strike," and these three decisions plainly imply that it is the courts which will decide when a strike is lawful. Judging from these decisions, the court in deciding this question is weighted heavily against labor. The Fansteel case provides the most striking example of the application of the double standard to capital and labor. A company admittedly guilty of the most serious violations of the Wagner Act nevertheless was held to retain the protection of the law against sitdown strikes. But men who had already been punished in the state courts for violating the rights of their employer in a sitdown strike are held to have lost their rights under the Wagner Act, and their employer goes unpunished for his violations of the law. Thus the Supreme Court once more dispenses "even-handed" justice.

The drive against the Wagner Act in Congress seems superfluous after these decisions, for a new conservative majority of six has changed the meaning of the Wagner Act as drastically as if the present campaign to amend it had already come to a successful conclusion. The court, in accordance with a pattern all too familiar in the history of the past two generations, has entered on the task of transforming a law meant to aid the less powerful into a means of oppressing them. The judicial veto is more spectacular, but what one might term the process of judicial erosion is as effective in destroying legislation that does not meet with the court's approval. The court never held utility-rate regulation unconstitutional; it merely made it ineffective by entangling it in the metaphysics of "fair return on fair value." The "rule of reason" emasculated the anti-trust laws without removing them from the statute books. A complacent phrase, "merely declaratory of what is the best practice always," waved away the anti-injunction provisions of the Clayton Act, once also hailed as a Magna Charta of labor. The conception of the illegal strike developed by these new Wagner Act decisions promises to be as fatal to collective-bargaining legislation.

China Is Still Fighting

THE relative quiet on the China front in the past few months has been widely interpreted in this country as evidence that Chinese military resistance was all but crushed by the capture of Canton and Hankow. Japan is assumed to hold virtually the whole of China, having bottled Chiang Kai-shek in a narrow stretch of territory in the far west. The accompanying map shows the inaccuracy of this assumption. Japan's conquests, though important, are restricted to the plains of the northeast quarter of China. Of the eighteen provinces of China proper, only four—Hopei, Shantung, Anhwei, and Kiangsu—have been in large part overrun



Front Line
Railways
MONGOLIA
SINKIANG
INNER MONGOLIA
MANCHOUKUO
Hsinking
Mukden
KOREA
SUIYUAN
Paotow
Kweihwa
Kalgan
Jehol
Peking
Tatung
Tientsin
Dairen
Port Arthur
NINGHSIA
KANSU
SHANSI
Taiyuan
HOPEI
CHINGHAI
SPECIAL
Yenan
TERRITORY
Tsinan
Tsingtao
SHANTUNG
Haichow
YELLOW SEA
Lanchow
Puchow
Paoki
Sian
Chengchow
Kaifeng
Hsüchow
SHENSI
HONAN
ANHWEI
Pakow
Nanking
KIANGSU TIBET
SIKANG
SZECHUAN
HUPEH
Hankow
Shanghai
Chengtu
Kiang
Wuchang
Hangchow
Ningpo
Chungking
Kiukiang
CHEKIANG
Yang tse
Yochow
Tungting L.
Poyang L.
HUNAN
Nanchang
Changsha
INDIA
KWEICHOW
KIANGSI
Hengyang
Myitkyina
Kweiyang
Fuchow
FUKIEN
Kunming (Yunnan)
Kweilin
Changchow
Amoy
YUNNAN
KWANGTUNG
Canton
Swatow
FORMOSA (Jap.)
Lashio
KWANGSI
Kongmun
Lungchow
Pakhoi
Hongkong
BURMA
FRENCH
Macao (Port.)
Hanoi
Waichow
Haiphong
KWANGCHOWVAN (French)
SIAM
INDOCHINA
HAINAN
SOUTH CHINA SEA
Rangoon
PHILIPPINE IS.

by the Japanese. Five others—Shansi, Hupeh, Chekiang, Kiangsi, and Kwantung—are partly in Japanese hands, but the remaining nine are almost completely free from the invader. And outside of China proper the vast areas of Chinghai, Ninghsia, Sikang, part of Suiyuan, and the whole of Chinese Turkestan and Tibet remain in Chinese hands.

Perhaps the most striking fact made clear by the map is the failure of Japan to make any headway in South and South Central China. In this vast region, stretching from the coast inward for more than a thousand miles and containing some of China's richest agricultural land, Japan has succeeded in seizing only the ports of Canton and Amoy. The remainder, including several important ports, is entirely Chinese. This is not because the Japanese have made no effort to invade this region. As early as last July the main force of the Japanese army launched an offensive against Nanchang, the great pottery city in Central China, which is connected by rail with Changsha. The plan was to capture this city and push against Hankow from the south. The map shows that the Japanese armies are still some miles from Nanchang, having suffered a major setback at Teian. Changsha itself was burned by a panic-stricken general after the fall of Hankow, but is still behind the Chinese lines. The Japanese occupied the city of Hangchow, 100 miles south of Shanghai, on Christmas day, 1937. But in the ensuing fourteen months they have not succeeded in advancing the few additional miles necessary to take the important port city of Ningpo.

It has been frequently pointed out that the Japanese control in the so-called occupied areas rarely runs more than a mile or so on each side of the railways and main highways. What is not generally realized is that Japan has thus far failed to gain control of China's main railways. The two great railway lines of China are the north-south Peiping-Hankow-Canton railroad, and the east-west Haichow-Chengchow-Sian road. Of these, only that small section of the Peiping-Hankow railroad which is north of the Yellow River and a shorter segment near Hankow are operated by the Japanese. The strategic city of Chengchow, where the north-south and east-west railways cross, has held out for more than a year, thanks to the broken Yellow River dikes. Chinese trains run regularly from Paoki, west of Sian, to Chengchow, and thence south nearly halfway to Hankow. Owing to guerrilla activities, the Japanese have never been able to use the eastern part of this railroad between Haichow and Hsüchow, though they are operating the short section between Hsüchow and Kaifeng. Haichow was captured last week. The other east-west line—that between Changsha and Hangchow—remains almost entirely in the possession of China.

A number of Chinese "islands" in the territory nominally occupied by the Japanese will be noted on the map. These are not, as might be supposed, merely districts which the Japanese have neglected to occupy because they are busy elsewhere. They are the bases of guerrilla activity. Each "island" supports a large, active Chinese army which works closely with partisan groups in the Japanese-occupied areas. The northern islands are controlled almost entirely by the Eighth Route Army—Communists who made the famous "long march" in 1935—while the southern are under the banner of the Fourth Route Army, led by Communists who remained in Kiangsi during the long march. The Japanese have launched repeated drives to eliminate these islands, especially in Shansi, and each time have been set back with huge losses.

The possibility of a Chinese counter-attack which would drive Japan from the cities under its control depends in part on the success of the guerrilla units in organizing the Chinese population behind the Japanese lines, and in part on the ability of the Chinese government to develop a strong economic base in the western provinces to support its armies. Recent reports are distinctly encouraging on both counts. Taxes in the occupied areas are still collected by the Chinese government. Szechuan, which is now the military and administrative center of China, is perhaps the country's richest agricultural province. Yunnan, Kansu, Chinghai, Shensi, and Ninghsia are rich in minerals. It is estimated that three-fourths of the industrial equipment of the Hankow area was successfully moved westward before the Japanese occupation. New roads have been built and a gigantic new plan of coolie transport worked out. Economically China is still strong, and in view of the amazing strides which have been made in the past few months under adverse circumstances, there is every reason to believe that it will ultimately regain its lost cities.

A. F. of L. into G. O. P.

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, March 2

THOUGH expediency and plausibility are on the President's side in his effort to bring peace to the labor movement, it will be no simple welding job to unite the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. The last time it was tried, without success, the sole issue was jurisdictional. Both Green and Lewis were going along with the New Deal. Their organizations, making the most of unprecedented opportunities under the Wagner Act, were gratefully gathering in membership cards. Labor was divided but on the march.

Since then more serious complications have set in. It is no longer merely a matter of who shall organize whom. The cleavage between the parent organization and its offspring goes deep into ideological as well as procedural bedrock. The trend of the C. I. O. has been to the left of the New Deal; it has demanded heavier relief expenditures and larger recovery outlays than those Roosevelt has approved. The A. F. of L., meanwhile, has veered sharply to the right, joining the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce in advocating appeasement of business at the expense of the unemployed.

But for the President's personal intervention and his apparent willingness to serve as mediator, the latest peace project would be hopeless. As it is, there is small chance for more than an armed truce or a superficial reconciliation. If it is the President's idea to save business the annoyances incidental to labor rivalries, he may succeed. If he is trying to unify labor as a political force, for its effect on Congress now and on the election in 1940, he will almost certainly be disappointed. He has come too late.

The ruling clique of the A. F. of L. has already gone over to the Republicans. At its meeting in Miami the Executive Council issued a statement that might have been written by the N. A. M. It deprecated "fear, lack of confidence, and distrust" on the part of business, deplored "various forms of public spending," and recoiled from the idea of maintaining "an army of unemployed as wards of the government." Its essence was well expressed by the headline: "Green Raps New Deal's Recovery and Relief Policy."

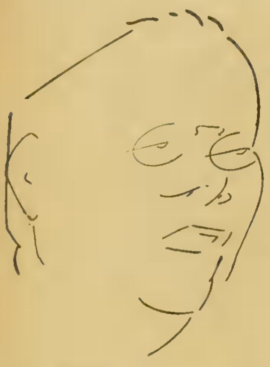
Thus the voice of labor became an echo for the lament of big business. The Wolls, Hutchesons, and Freys reverted to type. Always at home in the Hoover camp, they do not usually worry too much about the unemployed and the unorganized. The depth of their concern for the under-dog could have been easily plumbed by anyone who watched them go perfectionist and hold out for a wage-hour bill so inflexible that they knew Congress would not pass it. Now the reaction has set in, and they can abandon such subterfuges. But how can Lewis and the C. I. O., champions of the unskilled and the unemployed, sign on with this crew?

The differences between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. at this stage are best illustrated by the current fight over the proposed amendments to the Wagner Act, a law which has doubled labor-union membership since its passage in 1935. In its reckless courtship of reactionary business, the A. F. of L. has proposed, through Senator Walsh of Massachusetts, a series of amendments that would make this law useless at best and a deadly weapon against labor at worst. The Walsh proposals would assuredly wreck the C. I. O. For the moment they might help the A. F. of L., which industry now regards as a satisfactory substitute for the outlawed company union. But in good time they could and would be used by reactionary employers to smash the A. F. of L. too.

That the Walsh amendments are actually industry's amendments is obvious. Senator Burke of Nebraska has submitted some even more destructive proposals, but no one in or out of Congress is paying much attention to them. They served their purpose when they gave Green a chance to denounce something obviously worse than his own proposed changes. His went so much farther than the Houston convention had authorized that he was secretly called to order by some of the more liberal council members at Miami for betraying the convention mandate. The upshot was an agreement to get behind a new bill.

This new plan calls for repeal of the present Wagner Act and its reenactment with three major changes: (1) substitution of a five-man board for the present three-man board; (2) a requirement that crafts must be certified as the proper bargaining units; and (3) a provision that the board may not nullify labor contracts. These three amendments are enough to destroy the Wagner law, if the Supreme Court, following the election returns in its latest decisions, has not already done so. In the Fansteel case the court accommodatingly pointed the way for labor-baiting employers to avoid their obligations under the Wagner Act by goading strikers into unlawful acts. In the Columbian case it invited federal courts to ignore the board's findings of fact, the same legal device by which the Federal Trade Commission was devitalized years ago. Thus the objectives of some, but not all, of the Walsh amendments already have been achieved by judicial fiat.

The drive for abolition and reenactment of the law has one purpose—to get rid of the present board, whose members have incurred the enmity of the federation by insisting upon enforcement without corner-cutting or favoritism. This device would relieve the federation of the embarrassing necessity of going through with its fight against Donald Wakefield Smith, the member who has been most friendly to the crafts. A five-man board might have the additional virtue of providing green pastures for a pair of favored A. F. of L. wheelhorses.



William Green

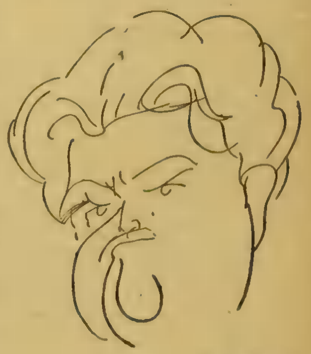
The craft-union amendment would freeze industrial unionism. But since the formation of the NLRB the federation has asked for recognition of more industrial units than strictly craft units—173 against 84. Frequently it has demanded broader groupings of workers than has the C. I. O. itself. The record clearly shows that vertical unionism versus horizontal unionism is a fake issue so far as the federation is concerned; the sheer necessities of belt-line production have driven it into acceptance of industrial unionism. It has no objection to industrial unionism per se, only to control of the new unionism by someone else.

As for the charge so often repeated by the A. F. of L. and its allies that the board has favored the C. I. O., the record shows it is a spurious one. Early in the game the board adopted the so-called "Globe" doctrine: that crafts must be certified as the proper collective-bargaining units in all cases where they have any historical claim to recognition, any substantial membership, and any inclination to be classified separately. As result, in the sixty cases in which there has been a substantial disagreement between the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. over the proper unit, the board has found for the federation in twenty-nine cases and for the C. I. O. in twenty-three. In only eleven cases has the board turned down applications for craft-unit classification. In all these cases it had a good reason for deciding as it did, the most common being that a majority of the craftsmen involved wanted to join an industrial union.

The amendment against the invalidation of contracts is the most vicious of the three. Its purpose is to prevent the board from upsetting A. F. of L. contracts where employers have helped the federation to organize their workers in order to head off the C. I. O. Federation leaders want to wangle closed-shop contracts and thus to forestall C. I. O. expansion. Already this has been done in scores of cases, and the board has nullified thirteen contracts which obviously were the products of collusion between the federation and employers. One such C. I. O. contract also has been canceled.

On August 18, 1937, William Green and Lewis G. Hines, now Pennsylvania's Secretary of Labor and Industry, acting for the A. F. of L., signed a "working agreement" with F. D. Coster, late swindling president of McKesson and Robbins, and Frederic Wingersky, for the company. It stipulated that all McKesson and Robbins branches would be placed under local A. F. of L. contracts providing for a work week of not less than forty-five hours (one hour above the maximum now permitted by law), that there would be no strikes or lockouts, and that the federation would do "all within its power to prevent imposition upon or interference with business of the employer by any other labor body not affiliated with the federation." A board examiner in Seattle subsequently found that this agreement had been represented to McKesson and Robbins employees as a closed-shop contract. If that wasn't a yellow-dog contract, it was out of the same litter. Yet it would have been inviolate under the proposed amendment.

In the first case of contract nullification by the board, the A. F. of L. was the complainant against the Clinton Cotton Mills. The federation quite properly demanded cancelation of a contract between the mills and their company union. Since then the federation has gone in for a kind of company unionism on its own hook. But if the amendment it now sponsors is adopted, nothing will prevent employers from rushing into contracts with "independent unions" and again freezing out the A. F. of L.



Bert Hayden

John L. Lewis

Trade unionists are growing increasingly restive under the shortsighted leadership that has tried to make them behave like scabs. Already units of thirteen internationals of the A. F. of L., seven state federations, and central bodies of twelve cities—including Omaha, Senator Burke's home town—have gone on record against tinkering with the Wagner Act. This kind of independence at the grass roots holds out some hope for an eventual union with honor between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. But unless Roosevelt can reach over the heads of federation leaders to rally this sentiment behind a reconciliation that preserves both militant industrial unionism and the fundamentals of the Wagner Act, the price of his peace gesture to business will be high.

Pius XII and the Axis

BY G. A. BORGESE

I

IN THE near future Pope Pius XII will face, in an atmosphere of dire difficulties, the consequences of the policy of his predecessor. This policy was largely his own. As a church diplomat and as Secretary of State, Eugenio Pacelli specialized in papal relations with Germany and Italy; he led the church to unavoidable retreat and submission under the Fascist threat in 1931, and two years later, that bitter failure notwithstanding, he negotiated an unfortunate concordat with Nazism. The Catholic party in Germany, intentionally democratic or at least anti-totalitarian, was surrendered to Hitler—an error, or a destiny, which Don Sturzo's Popular Catholic Party had experienced in Italy several years before. The events of these last years have obviously convinced the Vatican that a Catholic alliance with the pagan axis is an alliance of lamb and wolf. How and with what results the new Pope may alter the course which the church chose under his predecessor's leadership is a question so gigantic as to discourage any prophet.

In a more or less remote future the strife between the church and the totalitarian states will prove to be an issue involving the relations—theological as well as political—between the Roman church and democracy or liberalism, in other terms, between Catholicism and Protestantism, the latter being unmistakably the background of modern liberal thought. The same is true of the relations between the Italian nation and the papacy.

Many Italians in past centuries have thought and many more think nowadays that the Italians are the people elect, and that it is their task to rule the world through the combined forces of a Roman emperor and a Roman pontiff. It is, however, questionable whether the Catholic world at large would be amenable in the long run to such a theory. The record speed at which the cardinals agreed on electing Pacelli indicates only how alarmed they were by the problems of a more remote future, how eager to postpone them as long as possible, how contented at last with the dilatory expediency of prolonging the pontificate of Pius XI, with all its responsibilities, in the person of Pius XI's closest associate and adviser. Considered from a certain angle this election compares with the vote of confidence bestowed by a parliament on a shaky cabinet whose succession no opposition covets.

But non-Italian candidacies, especially that of the French Canadian Villeneuve, loomed large in the conclave, and the problem of the relations between a strong, national Italy on the one side and a Christian and universal church on the other is now open and can hardly be expected to be solved before many years of struggle and crisis. There is a curious suggestion in the famous prophecy of Saint Malachy, according to which the pope who will succeed Pius XII will be pastor et nauta, pastor and sailor. Yet this virtual and already present contrast between Italy as a world power and the church as universality is only one aspect, and a rather superficial one, of the trials which the Roman Catholic church will face in the decades to come.

II

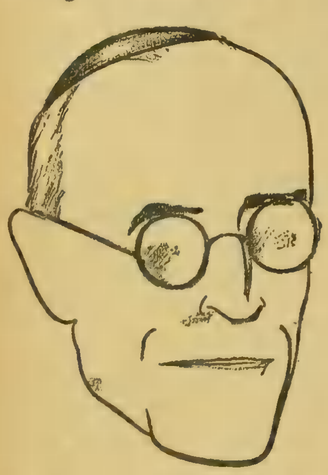
The history and the essence of Roman Catholicism are only understandable if one takes into account the three major defeats which it has suffered in the course of the Christian era, none of which have so far been retrieved. First the Roman church lost the loyalty and obedience of all Eastern Europe. While this rift was enlarging into the Oriental schism, it lost to Mohammedanism all northern Africa plus Asia Minor, Syria, and all the Near East that had been a constituent part of the Roman Empire, of the ancient unity. Finally at the close of the Renaissance the north of Europe became largely Protestant, separating itself from Rome. As a consequence of the latter heresy or separation—until transatlantic countries were able to make up at least partly for the loss—the Roman Catholic church receded to approximately the boundaries that had been those of the western, European part of the Roman Empire.

How the church reacted to these repeated and disastrous defeats is well known. Each time the organism tightened its defensive apparatus; it adopted the technique and the strict discipline of a beleaguered fortress; it enforced an increasingly more absolute obedience while formulating its dogmas with more and more compulsory exactitude. The most famous episode of these tactics of defense, whose purpose was to start again a conquering march on the world whenever it might seem possible, was the Council of Trent immediately after the outbreak of Luther's and Calvin's rebellion.

What happened in the nineteenth century is less familiar to the average cultured mind, especially in Protestant or agnostic countries like the United States, not only because recent events are less easily synthesized, but also because the struggle, which included so much of the contemporary history of these years, happened to be fought almost exclusively on Italian soil over Italian issues which seemed to almost everybody to have only local and temporary significance. Now, however, everybody's attention should be directed to the enormous meaning of the events that took place in Italy and within the Catholic church during the pontificate of Pius IX, from 1846 to 1878. That was the beginning of what should be called, and most probably will be called some day, the second Counter-Reformation, and that was the crisis and the struggle in which were sown many of the seeds which later fructified in Fascism, Nazism, Munich, and after-Munich as far as we can contemplate.

III

At the start of his reign Pius IX believed for a short time in a possible conciliation of Catholicism with liberalism and of the universal church with Italian national feeling. For a few months he was hailed as the leader of the Italian national risorgimento. The outcome was irreparable discord between the Pope and the administration of the liberalized Papal State, the Pope's flight and exile, the foundation of the short-lived Roman Republic under the inspiration of Mazzini, the intervention of the French troops, and the return of the ousted Pope, now utterly sobered as to the unnatural and unhistorical alliances which he had envisioned. The interval between the return of Pius IX to Rome and the complete unification of Italy, with the military occupation of Rome by the Piedmontese army and the self-imprisonment of the Curia in the Vatican palaces, was comparatively a very short one—twenty years, from 1850 to 1870. But it was sufficient to start and organize a series of events which now appears to be the most important heritage handed down by the nineteenth century.



George Schreiber

Pius XII

The papacy had become aware that the rational, liberal, scientific trends of European philosophy and politics of that age held for the Catholic church even greater dangers than were contained in the challenge of the Protestant sects three centuries earlier. The defense was magnificently adequate, although at first it seemed to consist of mere words, lacking all power. The church of the sixteenth century had defied the Protestant Reformation with the Council of Trent and the so-called Counter-Reformation; the second Counter-Reformation was started by Pius IX and found expression in two documents—or deeds—which Catholics and non-Catholics alike should know very exactly but which practically nobody at present cares to consult when problems arise concerning the relations between democracy and the church.

These two documents are the "Syllabus of Errors," published in 1864, and the Dogmatic Decrees of the Vatican Council, promulgated in 1870, only a few short weeks before the Italian annexation of the Papal States. Many will remember these dates and titles. But what counts is whether the spirit and words of the documents are present, as they should be, to political and religious minds. It is unquestionable that both the decisions of the council of 1870 and the "Syllabus of Errors" have dogmatic validity. No hierarch, no doctor of the Catholic church, qualifies the obedience that is due to each and all of the teachings and prescriptions of the two documents.

Popularly stated, the gist of the decisions of the council of 1870 is the infallibility of the Pope. It was a compensation for the loss of temporal power, the acquisition of an indisputable and boundless autocratic majesty in the spiritual world as opposed to the impious and possibly temporary triumphs of Protestant liberalism on earth. The One directly inspired by God hovered over the chaos of the many.

The "Syllabus," for its part, listed the errors of modern times which the church refused forever to countenance. It is an error, among seventy-nine others, that "the church ought to tolerate the errors of philosophy, leaving to philosophy the care of their corrections." It is an error that "every man is free to embrace and profess the religion he shall believe true, guided by the light of reason." It is an error that "men may in any religion find the way of eternal salvation, and obtain eternal salvation." It is an error that "we may entertain at least a well-founded hope for the eternal salvation of all those who are in no manner in the true Church of Christ." It is an error that "Protestantism is nothing more than another form of the same true Christian religion." It is an error that "it appertains to the civil power to define what are the rights and limits with which the church may exercise authority." It is an error that "the church has not the power of availing herself of force, or any direct or indirect temporal power." All the eighty sentences should be learned and memorized by Catholics and non-Catholics alike. But certainly the last is comprehensive enough to give in a few solemn, powerful words the total intention and meaning of the document. It states in unsophisticated Latin as heavy as a tombstone that it is an error to believe that "Romanus Pontifex potest ac debet cum progressu, cum liberalismo, et cum recenti civilitate sese reconciliare et componere." The Pope and modern civilization are proclaimed utterly irreconcilable.

IV

Now it is theoretically and, who knows, perhaps even actually possible that what we call modern civilization, the development of human thought from the Renaissance to the eve of the World War, is doomed and rotten. It is possible that we are at the end of an age and that something new is growing under our tottering steps. It cannot even be excluded theoretically that this something new is something old, miraculously revived, made of one heart and one piece, triumphantly aggressive, the church of the Middle Ages, perfected through ordeal and defeat in the final statutes of the despoiled Pontiff Piux IX and his successors. The Encyclical "Pascendi," by which Pius X crushed the resurgent errors of theological modernism, is one of many events in line with the fundamental documents of the second Counter-Reformation. The pontificate of Pius XI seems to have brought the first fruits of revindication. Until a few years ago the church was regularly on the losing side. Under the pontificate of Pius XI it has reconquered at least Italy and Spain, it has spread its influence deep and far in the Western Hemisphere, it has even regained temporal power in Vatican City, ceded to the Papacy by Fascist Italy in the Lateran Treaty of 1929. This is, to be sure, a tiny territory, but it has a very great significance, since it is the intention of the token that counts and not the number of acres or the weight of the bricks.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame Cal.

We have become accustomed to such changes that nothing can now surprise anybody living in this age. Fascism and Nazism would have seemed thoroughly unthinkable twenty years ago, and a prophet of such events as we read about every morning would have seemed fit for a sanatorium. Therefore nothing logically or historically compulsory can be formulated against the hypothesis that the Roman Catholic church, self-defined as the "perfect society," may conquer the entire world. This may happen or not. One thing, however, is certain, even if only one, and that is that a reconciliation between the Roman church and modern civilization—that is, democratic or liberal civilization in the meaning that we give to these words—is utterly impossible and that the very idea of such a compromise has been stifled irretrievably by the church as anathema.

If by democracy one means the belief that all human souls have equal dignity before God, and that each and every human soul, provided that it accepts the rule of salvation as imparted by the Roman church, may attain eternal bliss, then the Catholic church is a perfect democracy. The firmness of its insistence on the inborn and transcendental equality of all men before the judgment of God constitutes one of those most vital and glorious Christian elements which are permanent in the Catholic church, and which make it impossible for even the ugliest and most vulgar anti-clericalism to treat Catholicism as a phenomenon of depravity comparable to such un-Christian and inhuman monstrosities as Fascism and Nazism. But if by democracy, or even, more exactly, by liberalism, one means the right of everybody to think and think freely and to bring his own contribution to the progress of collective human life and to the advancement of knowledge—the concession of equal rights and equal dignity to all religious beliefs—then the talk that we hear so often and so insistently in these days about the Roman church as a mainstay of liberalism, tolerance, and democracy is frivolous, futile, and dangerous, for there is always danger in obscurity and confusion of issues.

As regards the particular relations at the present moment between Roman Catholicism and the totalitarian states in Europe, there cannot remain a decent doubt that the anti-Christian trends of such states, veiled more or less by cleverness and circumstances in Italy, blunt and outrageous in Germany, must displease the Roman church. But such strife between the ecclesiatical and the civil authorities is as old at least as European Christian society, and it may be a delusion to think that even the fight between the church and Hitler is at bottom more substantial than the quarrel between the German emperors of the Middle Ages, such as Frederic Barbarossa, and the Latin popes—unless the fundamental issues, theological as well as political, involved in the relations between Catholicism and liberalism are faced sooner or later by a renovated church. On the other hand it should be quite clear that if the perfect society as represented by the church is embodied in an organism autocratically ruled, the tendency of the church must be to favor the legislative order which is forced on nations by strictly monarchical institutions, and the Catholic mind at large must feel, at least for reasons of analogy, more sympathetic to organisms like Italy and Germany than to democracies swept hither and yon by the emotions and the interests of the changing masses.

With respect to the United States, there seems to be no doubt about the historical correctness of William Haller's study of "The Puritan Background of the First Amendment." "What the founders of the national union did or did not do about religion was of the utmost significance for the success of their enterprise. The assumptions concerning truth and human nature underlying the doctrine of religious liberty—namely, that truth is most surely discovered when everybody is free to take part in the search of truth [italics mine] and that it is at least equally as important for every man to think and speak as for some to think correctly and to speak wisely—these notions now seem to most Americans axiomatic." To most Americans, but not to all? Are the Catholics taken as a body among the "most," or are they not?

V

This an issue intrinsic to the development of American Catholicism and to the problems that American Catholics must inevitably face in the near future. The modus vivendi seems quite plain, and theoretically it is. In several ways the attention of an increasingly large and increasingly alarmed group has been called to the tendency of many individual Catholics and Catholic organizations in this country to acquire a larger share of power than is due proportionally to them, and to hamper through pressure or other devious ways the effectiveness of those very principles of free speech and free thought and free worship to which they owe their prosperity and power in the United States. It ought to be plain that a permanent modus vivendi, equally necessary for Catholics and non-Catholics in America, would consist in the liberty for Catholics to be Catholic and in their acknowledgment that all other beliefs or disbeliefs have an equal share in American freedom, which share should not even be curtailed by such invisible but actually oppressive means as pressure, censorship, and boycott.

But clearly enough such an attitude would imply a very substantial concession on the part of Catholics to the spirit of liberalism and democracy and would be virtually and actually in disagreement with the teachings of the "syllabus" and the decisions of the council of 1870, which point unmistakably to the hierocratic system of the Roman church. This aims beyond all renouncement and defeat at a perfect society in which the Pope should be, if not personally the absolute emperor, at least the inspirer and watchman and judge of those who rule the earth.

Whether this immanent contrast between the spirit of Americanism and the system of Catholicism as it has been shaped by history can be evaded by American Catholics or whether the inner split is bound to develop some day into an open crisis is a problem that must be left to Catholics themselves, at least for the time being. But contemplation of history from observatories not befogged by crude and mean passions opens a vista, even if a dim one, into the coming age. It is quite likely that much of this century of ours will be an age of religious upheaval and readjustment, that it will attempt to shape beliefs acceptable to reason and science and liberty, while treating the religious heritage of the past no less piously and devotedly than early and later Christianity treated the Jewish prophetic tradition.

The King Comes to Canada

BY DAVID MARTIN

THAT the motives behind the forthcoming visit of King George VI to America are not entirely social is one of those things that are commonly understood but are left unsaid by everyone with good manners. The fact that this will be the first time in the history of the New World that a British sovereign has set foot on Canadian or American soil is in itself enough to indicate the existence of some extraordinary emergency.

On September 15, at the height of the Czech crisis, Lord Beaverbrook's Daily Express said editorially: "Adversity grows good fruits. Today New Zealand promises all her support. Yesterday it was Australia. Tomorrow it will be Canada." That tomorrow, however, never came. Beyond vaporous expressions of attachment Canada refused to commit itself.

British imperialists waxed indignant at what they termed Canada's desertion. On September 20, in an article headlined "Canada Loses Face in Britain," the Toronto Globe and Mail presented a review of official British opinion on the Dominion's role in the Czech crisis. Responsible officials, members of Parliament, and newspapermen who were interviewed were almost unanimous in their condemnation. "Britain would not have had to concede so much to Germany if Chamberlain had been able to tell Hitler that the empire was solidly behind him." "How the British feel about Canada's defection constitutes an unpublishable story." Such, in essence, were the comments.

The European crisis put to a test the slender ties that still bind the dominions to the mother country; and in the case of Canada they were found totally inadequate to insure active military support. For years the British government and the Imperial General Staff have been waging a valiant struggle against the centrifugal tendencies threatening the integrity of the empire. The unique idea of having the King and Queen tour Canada is a product of the urgency of the situation. No shrewder method could have been devised for drumming up the flagging Canadian enthusiasm for empire defense. The effect on the public can well be imagined: whole pages in the newspapers devoted to Their Majesties; the population of entire cities turning out to receptions; pageantry without precedent; fervid declarations of loyalty.

But will the King and Queen succeed in their mission? To answer this question we must consider Canada's evolution as a nation and the development of its foreign policy. Unlike Australia and New Zealand, Canada is far from being a homogeneous Anglo-Saxon nation. According to the last census, only 51 per cent of the population is of British descent; almost a third is French Canadian; the rest is largely of Continental stock. Public opinion divides along these ethnological boundaries.

Among the majority of the Anglo-Saxon population love of empire is still strong; if Britain were to become involved in a European war, there can be no doubt that a large number would flock to the banners. This is the only section of the population whose loyalty can be definitely counted on. The citizens of Central European origin nurture no particular sympathy for British imperialism. And as for the French Canadians, they are by tradition anti-imperialist and provincial in their outlook. They consider themselves oppressed by the Anglo-Saxons and for this reason tend to sympathize with England's enemies. In the Boer War they were pro-Boer; during the Ethiopian crisis they were pro-Italian; and from the very beginning of the Spanish civil war they have been overwhelmingly pro-Franco. During the Great War the Canadian government met with such determined opposition in the province of Quebec that it was compelled to suspend application of the conscription act. The young Canadiens took to the backwoods by the thousands to escape the army; in Easter week of 1918 there were anti-conscription demonstrations in Quebec City that ended in bloody barricade fighting.

Mayor Houde of Montreal created a sensation recently when he stated that "in the event of a war between Britain and Italy the sympathy of the French Canadians would be with Italy." He was denounced by both the French and the English press as an irresponsible, publicity-seeking politician, but his declaration still stands as a simple statement of fact. That the Catholic church and the press disown Houde and plead loyalty to the British Crown cannot be taken as an indication of French Canadian opinion, for when the church pledged the French Canadian people to the support of Britain in 1914, its pledge went entirely unheeded by its adherents. Today French Canadian nationalism has assumed such proportions that it is doubtful whether Canada could take part in another European conflict without danger of civil war.

In view of all this, it can scarcely be said that the sentiment of the people at large provides any encouragement for the British imperialists. Are there then no other bonds, which might draw Canada toward the empire?

Canada's economic and cultural ties with the motherland were sufficiently strong to involve it in both the Boer War and the War of 1914. Even then, however, it was motivated largely by national considerations. (In a letter of his that has recently come to light, Sir Wilfred Laurier, Canada's Premier at the time of the Boer War, explains that while he considered the cause of the Boers to be just, he favored supporting Britain "because of the enormous development which our commerce has undergone in recent years.") Indeed, almost from the time of confederation, Canadian foreign policy has been determined far more by national interests than by servile fealty to the empire. Thus as early as 1876 Premier Sir John A. MacDonald refused official sanction for the dispatch of troops to the Sudan on the ground that "the Suez Canal was no concern of Canada's."

Whereas the British declaration of war in 1914 automatically involved the dominions, the dominions acted as cosigners of the Treaty of Versailles—a recognition of their new status as equal partners in a commonwealth of nations. In 1923 Canada negotiated the Halibut Treaty in its own name—its first diplomatic step unassisted by the mother country. At the Imperial Defense Conference of 1926 a formula was agreed upon which referred to the empire nations as "autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status and in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their external or domestic affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown and fully associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations." The formula stated further that "the military action taken at any time in peace or war is a matter for individual decision on the part of each empire government." This declaration was given legal status by the Statute of Westminster, enacted in 1931.

George VI

Nevertheless there are still certain observers who look upon the studied ambiguity of the conference formula of 1926 with misgiving: they fear that "common allegiance to the British Crown" still implies subordination to Britain in matters of war and peace. They cite the facts that fifteen high-ranking Canadian officers, eight of whom today hold important positions in Ottawa, have attended the Imperial Defense College in England during the ten years of its existence; that the British navy still has the use of the Canadian naval bases at Halifax and Esquimalt; that the Canadian army still employs British army manuals. And they point with especial alarm to the fact that Britain is today developing Canada as a source of military supplies. After all, it must mean something when a commission of British experts headed by Sir Hardman Lever visits Canada and announces that plans have been drafted for the construction of six airplane factories and when it is further revealed that arms orders to the amount of at least $400,000,000 will be forthcoming from Britain. Is Britain going to use this investment in order to bribe Canada to return to active empire membership? Our pacifists and anti-imperialists are disquieted. But they may reassure themselves.

Common military training and the development of Canada as a source of supplies are facts that by themselves prove nothing. Britain's industry is incapable of filling the orders of its armed forces. And there are only two nations to which it can turn for assistance in rearming—Canada and the United States. In the long run it is upon the tremendous machinery of American industry that it will have to place primary reliance; already 400 bombers costing $25,000,000 have been ordered from the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation and the North American Aviation Company. While Britain's armament orders are bound to influence its relations with both Canada and the United States, it can scarcely be said that they provide a guaranty of future military collaboration. In the case of Canada, the best that can be said is that the prospect of $400,000,000 in orders has resulted in an effusion of pro-empire sentiment—which thus far has not transcended the plane of verbal courtesies.

It has been Canada more than any other dominion that has prevented the development of a concerted policy at the various imperial-defense conferences. It was, for example, Canada's intransigent opposition at the conference of 1921 which prevented the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. When, in March of 1936, J. H. Thomas, Britain's Colonial Secretary, indicated that the dominions were still bound to empire defense, Premier King indignantly denied that this was so. When Viscount Ellibank came to Canada in the fall of the same year with the official mission of stirring up enthusiasm for empire unity, Ian Mackenzie, Minister of Defense, said: "I don't think any person ought to come here from another country and tell us what to do." Mackenzie was commended for his stand by Premier Hepburn of Ontario and other prominent Liberals.

If the foregoing is still not sufficient to allay the fears of our isolationists and pacifists, let them listen to Major General J. F. C. Fuller, developer of tank strategy and former assistant to the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, who speaks with the bluntness of a military man. "We have got to establish a stable Europe and simultaneously a united empire," wrote Fuller in 1936, in "Empire Unity and Defense." "If Canada cannot agree, and so far Canada, in spite of the loyalty of her people, has been the rock upon which every cooperative scheme has foundered, then we should say to her . . . 'We want a united family. . . . But if we cannot accomplish this, in no circumstances will we sacrifice our entire family for our eldest daughter.' It is better to let her go and unite the rest, or even to let some of the rest go and unite what remains over, than to live in a state of sham and pretense."

What has caused Canada to stray so far from the orbit of British influence? Another power, because of its nearness and mass, has greater drawing force in the constellation of nations—the United States of America. Culturally and economically, as well as geographically, Canada stands far closer to the United States than to Britain. Culturally there is no border between Canada and its "good neighbor" to the south. Magazines, books, movies, the radio, an exchange of immigration, mutual invasions by armies of tourists—all these have broken down whatever barriers may once have existed. Economically the two countries really constitute a single natural unit. How heavily Canada depends on the United States is forcefully registered by the following table:

	Total	United Kingdom	United States	U.S. Percentage
Foreign capital invested in Canada (Dec. 31, 1936)	$6,833,700,000	$2,725,100,000	$3,984,400,000	58.8
Canadian capital invested abroad (Dec. 31, 1936)	1,671,500,000	50,500,000	999,500,000	59.8
Exports from Canada (1937)	1,061,200,000	408,000,000	435,000,000	41.0
Imports to Canada (1937)	671,900,000	117,900,000	393,700,000	58.6

These figures provide the real sinews of collaboration in international affairs. It is true that Canada's economic ties with Great Britain are still of imposing magnitude, but there is one other fundamental consideration. With the prospect of war in the Pacific, Canada and the United States have been compelled to enter into the closest military collaboration. An agreement has been concluded for the construction of a military highway from the American border through British Columbia to Alaska. The British Columbia coast is being studded with air bases which appear on the map today as part of a chain of bases stretching from California to the Aleutians. On the occasion of the opening of the Ivy Lea Bridge, President Roosevelt and Premier King pledged themselves to mutual defense in no uncertain terms.

The trade pact recently concluded between Britain, the United States, and Canada, by giving American products freer access to the Canadian market and by curtailing the British preference on Canadian wheat, has served further to alienate Canada from the mother country.

For the time being Britain and the United States appear to be on tolerably friendly terms. But nowhere is it written in the stars that the two great English-speaking democracies are destined to eternal collaboration; on the contrary, the interests of Britain and America clash at many points and the future of their relations is largely contingent on British policy in Europe and Asia. Britain's passivity before the conquest of Manchuria, its role in restraining France, its naval agreement with Germany, its complicity in the rape of Austria and Czechoslovakia—all these events point in the direction of continued British collaboration with the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo axis. And as long as Britain travels along this road the possibility of lasting friendship with the United States will seem slim.

So the King is coming to Canada. Will he succeed in persuading Canada to come back home to the empire? The answer would appear to be definitely No. His visit may improve relations between Canada and the mother country, but even this is contingent to a large extent upon the results of his American visit. The question could more properly be put: Will Britain adjust its foreign policy to jibe with the material interests of the United States? The answer lies with the gods and Chamberlain.

PUBLIC LIBRARY, Burlingame, Cal.

We Still Need a Bill of Rights

BY RAYMOND L. WISE

THE Constitution of the United States requires amendment. It needs a bill of rights.

The first ten amendments are miscalled the "Bill of Rights." Taken literally, they give no guaranty of rights at all. They merely prohibit Congress from passing any law to interfere with the fundamental rights which have always been regarded as essential by free men. Nowhere does our Constitution explicitly require that the various states shall not curtail these rights.

It would be well, therefore, to find out what these rights are, how they came into being, and how they have been interpreted. And it is of vital importance to consider how to write them into our Constitution in such clear and unmistakable fashion that they will be binding on the states as well as on Congress and will endure as long as our form of government endures.

In the early days of civilization there was only one philosophy of sovereignty. The individual belonged to the state, body and soul. The state was supreme. It was usually personified by king or emperor, who ruled by "divine right." Over the centuries another philosophy took shape. The state is the agent of the individual. It exists for his protection and convenience. The individual has inalienable personal rights which are never surrendered to the state.

When our Constitution was adopted in 1787, the philosophy of the freedom of the individual was given great impetus. The colonists had been oppressed by many forms of tyranny. The free exercise of religion had been interfered with, free speech and the press had been suppressed, peaceable assemblies had been dispersed, and the colonists had been denied the right to petition the king for a redress of these and other grievances. They were vital and real grievances—as real as our present-day problems of unemployment and taxation.

When the state governments were formed, the founders were careful to put into each state constitution provisions which would prevent most of these forms of tyranny. But when the Constitutional Convention in 1787 drafted the national Constitution, the only personal rights dealt with were habeas corpus, bills of attainder, and ex post facto laws.

Largely through the eloquence of Patrick Henry of Virginia and others of like mind who supported him, it became clear that the Constitution should be amended so as to make it certain that the newly formed federal government should never have the power to imitate the tyranny of the mother country. Accordingly in 1789 a number of amendments were proposed, and these became the first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States. They prohibited Congress from interfering with freedom of press, speech, and worship. They prohibited the federal government from carrying out unlawful searches, demanding excessive bail, imposing cruel and unusual punishment, and depriving any person accused of crime of fair criminal process, such as the right to know the charge, the right to have a trial by jury with the assistance of counsel, and the right to summon witnesses.

Congress was thus prevented from exercising tyranny; but as early as 1833 it was held that a state might pass a law depriving a citizen of that state of any or all of the rights contained in these ten amendments. Even in 1789 there were many who felt that these fundamental rights should be safeguarded against action by the states. But not until the time of the Civil War and the freeing of the slaves did an opportunity arise to accomplish this. The freeing of the slaves required the establishment of constitutional guaranties protecting the new status of the Negro. The occasion presented an opportunity to protect the privileges and immunities of all citizens.

The statements made in 1866 by Thaddeus Stevens, leader of the House, in presenting the Fourteenth Amendment to the House of Representatives and by Senator Howard in submitting it to the Senate show clearly that it was the intention of the Congressional committee which formulated the amendment to make the declaration of organic law found in the first ten amendments binding on the states. The Thirteenth Amendment abolished slavery and involuntary servitude "except as a punishment" for crime, of which "the party shall have been duly convicted." The Fourteenth Amendment defined a new class of citizen. All persons born in the United States or naturalized became "citizens of the United States." No state "shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law." The Fifteenth Amendment provided that the right of citizens of the United States to vote should not be denied or abridged by any state "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

These were the fundamental liberties and civil rights actually written into the Constitution, either in the original or in its amendments. But constitutional law, as everyone knows, does not consist solely of what is written into the Constitution. It consists of the provisions of the written Constitution plus the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States interpreting these provisions.

It is clear that the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to change the state of the law so that all of the fundamental liberties and certainly most if not all of the procedural rights which Congress could not interfere with should be protected against interference by the states. But from the very start the interpretations of the Supreme Court qualified the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment and prevented it from becoming a Bill of Rights binding on the states and the nation.

First, as to the "equal protection of the laws": the Supreme Court held in the civil-rights cases that Congress could not punish wrongs done to Negroes by private individuals. Next, as to the extent and nature of "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States": in the famous slaughter-house cases, in 1873, the court held that the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply to the fundamental liberties and procedural rights of the first ten amendments, "which belonged to citizens of the states as such." In other words, citizens of the United States had no civil rights as such.

The prohibition against depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law" has had a long court history. Parallel with the effort of lawyers to read the "Bill of Rights" into the "privileges and immunities" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, other lawyers in other cases from 1868 on contended that the words "liberty" and "property" in the "due process" clause might be construed so as to include all civil rights pertaining to the individual, and hence all the rights contained in the "Bill of Rights." This brought about a most curious distortion of the former state of the law and a stretching of the plain meaning of words.

The history of this development is perhaps the most powerful argument in support of the need for a constitutional amendment. For if the Constitution had been properly amended in 1873—after the Supreme Court misunderstood it in the slaughter-house cases—so as to make it clear that the Fourteenth Amendment meant to include the rights contained in the Bill of Rights as part of the "privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States," there would have been no need for the amazing legal contortions which ensued. In actual fact the "due process" clause has been stretched beyond recognition to prevent various kinds of state action directed against a multitude of rights, in particular, the property rights of corporations.

The Supreme Court, lacking the clear written word which could have been supplied to it by a new constitutional amendment, has done its humble best in more recent years to bring some civil liberties into the scope of the "due process" clause. From 1925 to 1937 the court has held that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a state from depriving a defendant of the services of a lawyer and from abridging the freedom of the press, the right of peaceable assembly, or freedom of speech unless there is "a reasonable apprehension of danger to organized government." It is to be noted that the states can interfere with these rights if they do so by "due process of law." But under the First Amendment Congress can make no law abridging freedom of religion, of speech, of the press, or of peaceable assembly. The former are qualified rights. The latter are absolute rights. It is also to be noted that interference by a state with freedom of religious worship has not been prohibited. Of course it is probable that if such a case were squarely before it, the court would extend the doctrine and hold that any interference by a state with religious liberty must be by "due process of law."

The net result of the interpretations of the Fourteenth Amendment by the Supreme Court since 1868, though recent decisions have been encouraging, is decidedly unsatisfactory. The precious fundamental liberties and the valuable procedural rights are protected from interference by Congress by the first ten amendments. Some of the fundamental liberties are, according to recent Supreme Court rulings, protected against action by the states. Nearly all of the almost equally valuable procedural rights are unprotected against action by the states and may be and have been altered or abolished.

As recently as 1930 it looked as if the democratic theory would prevail in the world. In eight short years the idea of the supremacy of the state over man has gained complete control in nation after nation. And what has happened to "fundamental liberties" in those countries? The very first thing to go was freedom of speech and the press. Criticism must be silenced. Next, freedom of religion went. And the only right of peaceable assembly left is mobilization.

And how about the equally precious procedural rights? What has happened to the right to indictment, information as to the accusation, the right to face one's accuser, a fair trial by an impartial jury, freedom from unlawful searches and from cruel and unusual punishment? Bag and baggage these rights have been taken into "protective custody" and dumped into a concentration camp, along with the other hapless victims.

It won't happen here? Probably not. But in the meantime let us make our democratic processes definitely and unmistakably clear.

The Fourteenth Amendment should be expanded and clarified by a new amendment. This should state that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States include the rights of freedom of religion, speech, press, and assembly. It should declare that due process of law requires, among other things, that the people shall be secure against unreasonable searches; that a person should be accused of crime only by indictment or information; that after the accusation excessive bail should not be required; that the defendant should be entitled to a speedy and public trial by jury (except in cases of minor offenses); that the accused should be informed of the nature of the accusation, be confronted with witnesses against him, have process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and have the assistance of counsel. The accused should not be compelled to be a witness against himself. If he is acquitted he should not again be tried for the same offense, and if convicted he should not be subject to excessive fines or cruel or unusual punishments. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended except when the public safety may require it.

The amendment should provide that no state may make or enforce any law abridging or impairing the fundamental liberties or the other requirements of due process of law. It should further provide that Congress have the power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation.

Such an amendment goes no farther than the present trend of Supreme Court decisions in respect to fundamental liberties. It does go farther in respect to procedural rights. Much will be said on both sides on the questions of indictment, self-incrimination, jury trials, and suspension of habeas corpus, but let us at least ask for every protection against oppression by the states that the ten amendments gave us against any tyranny on the part of Congress.

Everybody's Business

HARD FOOD FOR MIDAS

> Washington. Treasury stocks of gold amounted to $14,853,876,149 on February 24, an increase of $7,519,000 over the previous day.—Wall Street Journal, February 28.

TWO or three times a week little items like this may be found hidden away on the financial pages. Few people notice them; fewer still give them more than a passing thought. Yet with these daily accretions of gold a problem is developing which sooner or later will be forced into the front-page headlines.

In the five years 1934 to 1938, inclusive, the monetary gold stock of this country rose by $7.7 billion, that is, about doubled. Of this huge total the odd $700,000,000 represents the yield of domestic mines: the remaining $7 billion has flowed in from abroad. In the same period gold production in the world at large has each year attained a new record. Every ounce of that production, so laboriously dug out of the earth, has found its way to these shores to be promptly reburied in elaborately constructed vaults. Even so, our appetite for gold has not been satisfied, and in addition we have acquired a round billion from the accumulation of other countries.

Does this golden rain mean a corresponding increase in wealth? There was once, it may be remembered, a King Midas who thought it impossible to have too much gold. When an ironic god offered him the gift of the golden touch, he jumped at the chance. But his joy was short-lived when he found every mouthful of food turning to indigestible metal, every sip of wine solidifying in his throat. Midas soon learned how easy it is to starve in a treasure house; how much better he would have fared had he asked his divine benefactor to bestow fertility on his fields.

The story of Midas has been told for 2,500 years or more as a warning against the sin of avarice. But its economic moral has been neglected. One nation after another in history has sought, vainly, to establish a world corner in gold. Where Rome and Spain failed we appear to be succeeding. We now have nearly 60 per cent of the world's monetary gold and, unless present tendencies are reversed, may within a few years have 80 per cent or more. Is it not about time to inquire into the cause of this flow and into its effects on our economy? Even banking pundits, whose faith in gold as the pivot of the financial system remains intact, are beginning to mutter, like the Scotch preacher whose prayers for rain were all too amply rewarded: "But, Lord, this is downright reedeeculous."

Last fall, when European capitalists, scared by the international situation, were frantically buying dollars, gold shipments to this country reached spectacular heights. The British exchange authorities, faced by a demand for dollars enormously exceeding the demand for sterling, were forced to obtain those dollars by selling gold to America. This illustrates one reason for our accumulation of gold in recent years, but it would be a mistake to think it the sole cause. The Federal Reserve Bulletin for February provides an analysis of the gold influx since 1934 which distinguishes three main factors. Net additions to foreign capital holdings in this country account for $2.7 billion. Rather more than half this sum represents funds which have not been invested here but have been held as bank balances or in other liquid forms. This is the so-called "hot money" which is liable to return home quickly if, for instance, a scare starts about the value of the dollar. But some $1.2 billion of foreign capital which has come here in the last five years has been used to purchase American securities—that is, it forms a more or less permanent investment.

Another very important factor in the gold influx is the repatriation of American holdings abroad. In the period under review Americans have liquidated foreign assets to the tune of $1.5 billion. Finally, we must consider the effects of our consistently favorable trade balance. Since 1934 our sales to foreign countries have exceeded our purchases from them by no less than $2.1 billion. Our customers could only fill this gap by shipping gold.

We can now see what we have really exchanged for the bullion which fills our vaults. We have given to foreigners claims on bank deposits, title in the form of securities to a part of our productive machinery, capital assets formerly held by Americans in other countries, and large quantities of cotton, oil, automobiles, and so on. The first item—"hot money"—should perhaps be excluded, since it is, in effect, an immediately realizable claim against our gold stock. But the other items constitute wealth in tangible forms. Have we received in return for them something equally tangible?

Of course our gold, though lost to common sight, does play a part in our banking system as backing for the currency. But it is far and away beyond what is necessary for this purpose, even allowing a large margin for a future expansion of business. We could replace every note in circulation by gold coin and still have $8 billion worth of the metal to play with. Clearly the five-year influx cannot be regarded as essential to the maintenance of the currency. To what other uses can we put our gold? It does provide us with a large fund with which to buy additional goods from other countries or to acquire property situated abroad. But our fiscal policy has for long been designed to discourage imports, and whenever they show signs of exceeding exports we begin to get nervous. As for new foreign investments, they have been hindered by legislation (the Johnson Act) and, in any case, are understandably unpopular in the present state of the world.

It would seem, therefore, that while our gold theoretically gives us command over vast purchasing power, in practice we cannot use it for money unless we abandon some cherished policies. Meanwhile, the hoard grows steadily. Every war scare is a stimulant, and if a European conflict does break out, the inflow will become a tidal wave. Thus it is hardly fanciful to imagine a situation arising in which this country would have a statistical corner in the world's gold. What then? The probability is that other countries would be reduced to barter unless, in order to avoid such a return to the primitive, they devised some new international standard of value. In either case we should be left sitting on a mountain of gold worth only what it would fetch for making jewelry or filling teeth. We should be the only customer in the world for the gold in the mines, and if we refused to buy any more, we should find its value, in terms of goods, falling headlong, just as the price of silver collapsed when it was demonetized. The real wealth with which we parted in exchange for gold would be lost forever: the economic system would be profoundly shaken.

Is it not about time that we took steps to check or even reverse the gold influx regardless of vested interests? Or must we gorge this "hard food for Midas" until it chokes us?

KEITH HUTCHISON

In the Wind

THE POSSIBILITY of a "sudden" general election in Great Britain is emphasized by urgent private appeals for funds which the Conservative Party has addressed to its followers. To rank-and-file members it has sent a circular letter; wealthy supporters have received envelopes marked "personal" containing copies of a letter from Neville Chamberlain to the party treasurer. The letter urges financial support of the party to insure continuance of the National government and its "peace" policies. It is dated October 15—the month when Chamberlain was deploring hints that he would try to make "political capital" out of Munich.

EACH SUNDAY throngs of pickets descend on radio station WMCA in New York to protest against that station's barring of Father Coughlin for his anti-Semitic utterances and for refusing to submit an advance script. Catholic newspapers and organizations are backing the protest; among its most vigorous sponsors is Patrick Scanlan's weekly Brooklyn Tablet. Back in 1933 Scanlan had occasion to protest against anti-Catholic speeches broadcast by station WMCA. At that time he wrote: "Mr. Rutherford [the speaker in question] belongs in the ranks of Franklin Ford and other bigots whose endeavor it seems is to misrepresent other religions and to spread bigotry. . . . You should either put an end to Mr. Rutherford's racket or else go over his manuscripts before permitting him to speak." In response to such protests WMCA sought to curb Rutherford, and when he—like Coughlin—refused to heed restrictions, he was barred from the air.

IN AN old Copenhagen street there is an officers' house which bears, under an old-fashioned bell-cord, this notice: "Door-bell for the general staff." During last September's crisis this admonition was chalked underneath: "In case of war, please ring three times."

AT A luncheon held in London recently the Chinese ambassador was pressed for a statement on China's prospects. He responded optimistically: "You know that when two boxers fight one tries to get at the other's chin to strike a knock-out blow. China's advantage is that she has no chin."

A STORY about the evicted share-croppers who recently demonstrated along Missouri highways carried this headline in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat: "Red Linked with Share-croppers; Police to Move Group Urged on by Agitators." Nowhere in the story, notes the Guild Reporter, is the word "red" or "communist" or even "radical" used, and the only reference to "agitators" is in a sentence quoting unidentified "landowners" as tracing the demonstrations to "certain agitators."

DESPITE THE projected expansion of the air corps, Negroes will still be barred from enlistment in that service. . . . Reporting a speech by Dr. John H. Finley, the New York Times spelled the name of its editor emeritus "Findley" throughout the story. . . . Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has abandoned plans for a film about Spanish refugees on the ground that it wouldn't be entertainment. . . .

THE DU PONT radio program "Cavalcade of America" dramatized the life of Allan Pinkerton, founder of the agency which has of late been chiefly notorious for its strike-breaking deeds. The story ended with the year 1861, five years before Pinkerton went in for strike-breaking. The script for the program, prepared by Barton, Batten, Durstine, and Osborn, announces that "in order not to offend any of the radio audience, we never mention anything to do with war, peace, class struggle, labor, or religion."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Burlingame, Cal.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IF I were Stuart Chase and were possessed of his nimble pen I should incorporate myself as a private Book of the Month Club, for the volumes that come from him follow so swiftly one upon another that I am sure turning out one a month would offer no difficulty for him. His latest volume is "The New Western Front" (Harcourt, Brace, $1.50). It is written in his breezy characteristic style and, though but a small volume of 190 pages, is packed full of interesting facts and figures. It is his picture of our situation in this post-Munich era, and like all his books it is most readable and stimulating, even when one must disagree with his conclusions, and occasionally with his facts: it was, for example, not a "wilful twelve" in the Senate that refused to permit President Wilson to put the United States into the League of Nations, but many more than that; the "wilful twelve" voted against the Armed-Ship bill.

As for Mr. Chase's conclusions, the truth is that he leaves us considerably up in the air, but in that respect he does not differ very much from all the others who have been grinding out books upon our desperate situation. He merely urges moderate preparedness and watchful waiting. What commends the book to me so strongly is that a sane and rational tone runs all through it; its author is not stampeded as are so many other writers and public men, who seem to believe that we are in immediate jeopardy when as a matter of fact we cannot possibly be attacked, through the air or on the surface of the water or below it. With the present armament madness guided neither by reason nor by any intelligent consideration of the factors involved, it does my heart good to have Stuart Chase say, after discussing the impossibility of a Japanese attack in the Pacific Ocean: "I apologize for wasting your time in this discussion. It would make an admirable topic for a debate in an insane asylum." A little later he says: "Any way you look at it, a successful invasion of the United States is impossible with any weapons now known, provided we do not have to meet it with our bare hands. We already have a powerful navy, a good air force, an efficient army." I rather doubt the last, although the army has been enormously improved, and there is a great deal of testimony about the inefficiency of the navy and the joint inefficiency of army and navy caused by their failure to cooperate with each other. Perhaps Mr. Chase has had his attention drawn to this fact now that Major General Henry H. Arnold, head of the Army Air Corps, has testified officially that there exists no plan for the joint defense of the United States.

I like Mr. Chase's handling of the colonial question also. He says: "Grabbing territory, enslaving natives, was all very well for Alexander, Attila, Genghis Khan—even for Cecil Rhodes. We have largely progressed beyond that sort of thing today. It is difficult to grow rich by owning colonies which cost more, in administrative and naval expenses, than trading rights can ever return." To him Hitler's drive for colonies and markets seems "pretty silly." "A drive for self-sufficiency," he says, "is understandable, but for commercial empire it is about thirty years too late." As for our home situation, Mr. Chase thinks that if we have surpluses to dump we should dump them at home, where there are plenty of Americans on relief who could use more wheat, cotton goods, and electrical appliances, instead of subsidizing gifts to foreigners and creating angry neighbors by increasing export competition. But he wants the government to take over control of foreign trade, perhaps issuing export licenses for what we need to import, and he thinks that this kind of control is destined to dominate the field of foreign trade all over the world in the years before us.

Next Mr. Chase wants us to initiate a plan for a real League of Nations along the lines of Stephen Raushenbush's "The Final Choice," but he does not want us to go in until England, Germany, France, Russia, Japan, and Italy all agree to go in together, and reduce their armies and navies "to the demands of internal riot calls." That seems to me a counsel of perfection. Certainly there is not the slightest chance of this coming to pass until all the nations are much nearer bankruptcy from armament competition than they are today. This is one of the places that make me wish that Mr. Chase had thought more deeply, just as I am sorry that he has put so much reliance upon this country's arming, when armaments, as Eliot Janeway recently pointed out in Harper's with reference to England, may open the direct road to fascism. Again, I am disappointed that he accepts the idea that we must rely on protection at this time. The difficulty is that when you put on tariffs even for a temporary emergency you create vested interests more and more difficult to dislodge. The same is true of building up your defense forces. You create thereby another specially privileged class which will keep up the alarums indefinitely rather than be mustered out in any disarmament program. None the less, the book is, as I have said, useful, full of valuable meat, and always entertaining.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

THE Associates in Negro Folk Education have recently issued two small volumes of unusual interest. Both are the work of Sterling Brown, one of the most talented of contemporary Negro writers. The first covers "The Negro in American Fiction," the second "Negro Poetry and Drama."* Together they form a definitive study of the part the Negro has played, both as subject and as creator, in American literature. Both bear witness to exhaustive, and what must have been at times exhausting, research, considering the dull stretches of material Mr. Brown has so conscientiously traversed. Both are designed as textbooks; but thanks to the author's insight and discrimination, as well as his readable style, they also qualify as literary criticism in an important and neglected field.

In "The Negro in American Fiction," Mr. Brown demonstrates how consistently the Negro has been exploited in literature as in every other field. In our early literature he appeared mainly as a subsidiary character, and his portrayal was often as realistic as that of other characters in the fiction of the time. It was when the slavery debate broke out that he became affected with a public interest and his role became that of a "walking argument." From then on he appeared, and continues to appear, according to the point of view of the writer, as one of a variety of stereotypes; as the childlike comic, as the contented slave, as the unhappy freedman, as the tragic octoroon, as the noble savage, as the brute, and, in contemporary times, as the Harlem "creature of joy." "Whether the Negro was human," writes Mr. Brown, "was one of the problems that racked the brains of the cultured Old South. The finally begrudged admission that perhaps he was has remained largely nominal in letters as in life." And even "many authors who are not hostile to the Negro and some who profess friendship still stress a 'peculiar endowment' at the expense of the Negro's basic humanity."

Mr. Brown traces in detail the permutations of the Negro as fictional character; and his study has a double interest in that it provides period-by-period commentary on one of the central social issues of our history. Southern authors have been mainly responsible for the stereotypes into which the character of the Negro has been cast; and the connection between these types and Southern social policy is clear. To justify slavery against the attacks of the abolitionists the Southern novelist invented the happy slave; in the days of Reconstruction the picture of the Negro as brute was set up as an argument against giving him the vote. In this same period nostalgia for the Old South gave rise to another version of the mythological Negro, and the mythological plantation as well. On the other hand the abolitionist writers contributed the picture of the noble savage, the perfect Christian, and the tragic octoroon. Meanwhile, the humorist used the Negro for his own special purposes. Only rarely, as in the character of Jim in "Huckleberry Finn," did the Negro emerge as human being.

In modern times the realistic school has somewhat redressed the balance. Mr. Brown points out that the best portraits of Negroes as human beings in a complex social environment rather than as handy sociological symbols or "props" for interracial melodrama have come from sympathetic white authors. And by a poetic justice many of these have been Southerners. But the Negro as stereotype is still dominant in such best-sellers as "Gone with the Wind."

It should perhaps be said that Mr. Brown nowhere implies that the stereotypes he attacks have no basis in reality. His own view of the Negro is anything but romanticism. His valid objection lies against the novelist become amateur social scientist who turns individual types to the uses of race prejudice and propaganda.

Mr. Brown looks to the Negro novelist for the ultimate full and objective portrayal of his people. His own book, by analyzing so thoroughly the pitfalls that have tripped the writer in this field, makes an important contribution to that end. It need hardly be said that the realistic portrayal of the Negro, who continues to be an involuntary participant in one of the great social and economic dramas of our history, can only improve the quality of the literature which takes that drama for its theme. Marx's statement that "labor cannot emancipate itself in the white skin where in the black it is branded" admits of literary paraphrase. As long as the Negro in American fiction is "branded" with unreality, so long will such fiction remain inferior and false.

J. B. Lippincott of Philadelphia and Hodder and Stoughton of London have announced a new kind of treasure hunt. They are searching for a long first novel in the "fine romantic vein" of Hervey Allen, Daphne du Maurier, Margaret Mitchell, "or even" as the announcement puts it, William Makepeace Thackeray. The rewards are impressive: a prize of $2,500, a free trip to Europe or America depending on the habitat of the winner, and an assured income of $2,500 a year for four years, during which time, to be sure, the author will be expected to produce three more literary enfants terribles.

In order that there shall be no mistake about the kind of book desired, the publishers have compiled an elaborate "guide" in five parts. Among other things it informs contestants that they must be able to differentiate between sentimentality, passion, and true romantic love, warns against introspection and the introduction of abnormalities, and specifies a happy ending. The guide makes everything perfectly clear, but it seems to me that it would be even clearer, and the contestants could get down to work quicker, if it were reduced to one sentence, to wit: "J. B. Lippincott and Hodder and Stoughton will give at least $1,000 and a trip abroad to anyone who will produce four 'Anthony Adverses' in four years."

It would be cheap at half the price.

---

* Each volume 50 cents.

Correspondents of the London Spectator have been submitting answers to the question, What is a gentleman? Harold Nicolson, who contributes a weekly page to the Spectator, asked the question, and the most amusing answer so far is the one which defines a gentleman as "one who is never unintentionally offensive." Who has a better one?

Mr. Nicolson's "Studies in Modern Diplomacy," consisting of his "Portrait of a Diplomatist" (which is also a biography of his father, Sir Arthur Nicolson), "Peace-Making, 1919," and "Lord Curzon," have just been reissued in a uniform edition by Harcourt, Brace. (Each volume $2.50.)

In writing of the British and the Egyptian question in the eighties, Mr. Nicolson has this to say:

> British statesmen are usually blind to their own tendencies, but vividly aware of their own disinclinations. While not knowing what they are doing or what they want to do, they realize quite clearly what they do not want to do, and they are apt to grasp at this negative, and to proclaim it, in place of the very tiring calculations which any positive policy would entail. This gap between our conscious realization of what we do not want to do, and our unconscious realization that in the end we shall have to do it, is inevitably interpreted by foreign observers as indicating hypocrisy or even worse. The mistake our critics make is to state in terms of ethics a problem which is essentially psychological. We can scarcely expect, however, even the most intelligent and forbearing foreigner to regard our handling of the Egyptian question as anything but opportunist in the extreme.

In 1882 the British occupied Egypt after repeated assurances to other powers that they had no intention of acting alone. In 1938 the British surrendered Czechoslovakia to Germany after repeated assurances to other powers, including the victim, that they had no such intention. Mr. Nicolson, as well as recent history, confirms the view of those who operate on the assumption that when Mr. Chamberlain announces solemnly that the British have no intention of partitioning a given country the blueprints are already drawn up. This view has one immediate reward: it makes the daily news from England as fascinating as those new-fangled double-crostics.

MARGARET MARSHALL

The Mind of Matthew Arnold

MATTHEW ARNOLD. By Lionel Trilling. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

IT IS understood to be in accordance with Matthew Arnold's wish to have no biography of himself written, that his descendants have maintained careful guard over his private papers. Mr. Trilling admits that he had available only published sources of information. It may be said, however, that if family piety could have made terms with the inevitable it could not have found a biographer of greater intelligence and discretion than Mr. Trilling. He has followed with patient study the development of Arnold's thought from the thin sheaf of poems published in 1849 to the "Last Essays on Church and Religion" and the later "Essays in Criticism." He has written, as he says, a biography of Arnold's mind, and if Arnold had contemplated any record of his life this is the one he would have wished.

Among the many virtues of Mr. Trilling's book a thorough study of Arnold's intellectual background is the first. He has gone to Arnold's sources and influences, to Dr. Thomas Arnold, to Spinoza, to Senancour, to Joubert. He has emphasized the contemporary aspect of Arnold's writings—his emergence as poet when the smoldering ashes of the French Revolution were flaming up in 1848, his entrance upon the field of modern controversy in the middle sixties when "The Origin of Species" shook the gates of revealed religion, when the opposition between the schools of Mill and Carlyle was brought to a focus by the trial of Governor Eyre and the rioting over the Second Reform Bill, when Home Rule for Ireland was beginning to shatter the Liberal Party. The proper way to read Arnold's essays is in the magazines in which he appears in the lists with Carlyle and Newman, Gladstone and Mill, with Kingsley for the Broad Church, Mallock for Catholicism, Frederic Harrison for Comtism, Huxley, Clifford, and Leslie Stephen for science. Mr. Trilling supplies the background which is necessary for the comprehension of Arnold as a prose writer in an age of controversy unmatched since the early seventeenth century.

Although amid the dust and confusion of contemporary conflict Arnold strove to hold himself aloof, above the mêlée, he was nevertheless subject to winds of doctrine. Mr. Trilling makes no effort to attenuate the fallacies in Arnold's thinking. His famous apology for the status quo, drawn from Joubert's maxim, "Force until right is ready," is mere sophistry born of his wish to maintain expansion without revolution. His theory of the dominance of a racial strain, "of blood," prominent in his view of Celtic literature, is bad anthropology, discredited today by ignoble use. His doctrine of the state in which classes should rise above their interests to their "best selves" suggests a mythical concept, likewise discredited. As Mr. Trilling remarks: "Class is a category whose very essence is interest—the reason of a class is its interest."

Above all, Mr. Trilling disposes of Arnold's new version of Christianity by quoting F. H. Bradley's devastating comment on the famous definition of religion as "morality touched by emotion." All morality is touched by emotion, and when it is touched by religious emotion it is religious. This religious emotion gathers about some external reference which Arnold calls God, but his definition of God as "a stream of tendency by which all things fulfil the law of their being" makes little appeal to emotion, and is, moreover, as Mr. Trilling points out, a begging of the question—it is no more than to say "things act as they act."

Arnold's crusade in behalf of religion, like his defense of literature, was the expression of what Mr. Trilling recognizes as the cardinal point in his thought, the pursuit of unity, integrity, totality for the individual and for society. In his preface to the poems of 1853 he took occasion to enforce the principle of classic as opposed to romantic art by comparing a tragedy of Sophocles, in its emphasis on the central theme, with Keats's "Isabella," so remarkable for beautiful detail in which the main action is obscured. The lack of a principle of unity to guide the poet was the source of his dissatisfaction with his own art. Wordsworth had found such a principle in his belief in man's relation to nature, but Arnold felt the dichotomy between the inscrutable ways of the cosmos and the values which man's consciousness gives to life. Morality is not found in nature. "Nature is cruel, man is sick of blood," he wrote, and again, with reference to moral striving, "Man must begin where nature ends." This discontent supplied the prevailing emotional color of Arnold's poetry. Harold Nicolson attributes Tennyson's lyrical gift to the emotion of fear—fear of God, fear of death, fear of sex. Mr. Trilling finds the mood which assures Arnold the lyric gift in self-pity. This mood obtains direct expression in many of his poems, such as "The Buried Life" and "Dover Beach," and it is the undertone of others in which the subject is dramatic—"The Scholar Gipsy," "Thyrsis," and Rugby Chapel." To escape from this melancholy, to bring release from it to the world, Arnold thought was the true aim of poetry. What men want is "something to animate and ennoble them—not merely to add zest to their melancholy or grace to their dreams." It was in deference to this judgment that he suppressed for many years the most pessimistic of his poems, "Empedocles on Etna." It was in obedience to it that he turned from poetry to criticism.

Arnold made the great discovery that criticism of art must necessarily depend on criticism of life. Carlyle had anticipated this position in his comparison of German with English criticism, but Arnold made its announcement in "The Function of Criticism at the Present Time" in such explicit terms that he became for the half-century that preceded the Great War the dominant force in English criticism, which after his example seldom fails to take account of the special and political determination of literature. Criticism of life he declared to be the function of literature, of poetry. In the chief doctrine of his applied criticism he emphasized his objective of totality. Culture, the remedy for present discontents, he defined as the pursuit of one's total perfection, by getting to know the best that has been thought and said in the world. It was in recognition of this principle of totality that culture for Arnold became a social doctrine.

The papers which made up "Culture and Anarchy" were written with reference to the social disorders of the late sixties, as was Carlyle's "Past and Present" with reference to those of the forties. But Arnold's social doctrine was the reverse of Carlyle's dependence for salvation on the hero. Already he had written to Clough: "I am more and more convinced that the world tends to become more comfortable for the mass, and more uncomfortable for those of any natural gift or distinction—and it is well perhaps that it should be so—for hitherto the gifted have astonished and delighted the world, but not trained or inspired or in any way changed it." In this acceptance of democracy Arnold perceived the overwhelming importance of ideas, response to which is the only ground for human advance. It was the function of literature to make ideas prevail in a democracy; hence the value which he attributed to literature over science in education. He opposed the individualism of the Liberals no less than that of Carlyle. Freedom, the fetish of the Liberal Party, was to him merely machinery, depending for its value on its results. "It is a very great thing to be able to think as you like, but after all an important question remains: what you think."

With all his assertion of integrity and totality Arnold was far from absolutism of thought. In one of his ironical quotations he cited Frederic Harrison's objection, that he lacked "a philosophy with coherent, interdependent, subordinate, and derivative principles." Mr. Trilling finds frequent parallelism between his attitude and that of the pragmatists. His defense of belief in God is on the lines of William James's "The Will to Believe," and like John Dewey he insists that things must be taken for consideration in the complexity of their relations, not in the simplification which logic requires.

The chief of Arnold's contributions to modern thought sprang from the combination of practical sense with reason, a bias toward relativity, a sense of emphasis according to the needs of the age. Thus with his recognition that conduct is three-fourths of life, and that Hebraism is concerned with "strictness of conscience," he asserted the present need of his countrymen for Hellenism, or "spontaneity of consciousness." Again, in his recommendation of the state as an authority he admits that the French have the idea in excess, the English not sufficiently. He anticipated present-day social thought in seeing that private property was the great obstacle to social wealth, but he saw that this obstacle was one erected by law and limited to it. Indeed, in his sympathetic anticipation of social transformation and recognition of tendencies toward it he was almost the only notable Englishman of his class to view the Paris Commune of 1871 with anything short of horror. "Paris does not make me so angry," he wrote, "as it does many people, because I do not think well enough of Thiers and the French upper class generally to think it very important that they should win. What is certain is that all the seriousness, clear-mindedness, and settled purpose is hitherto on the side of the Reds."

Mr. Trilling is sure that Arnold never read Marx, and he does not attempt to work Arnold's ideas into Marxist formulas. What is much more important, he shows, with an art which conceals design (if any), that in his view of history, literature, and politics Arnold is in line with the thought that is replacing the liberalism of the nineteenth century with the socialism through which alone democracy can survive.

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

Democrat in Berlin

THROUGH EMBASSY EYES. By Martha Dodd. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

TO begin with, nothing here is seen "through embassy eyes," nothing is heard through embassy ears, nothing is thought by an embassy brain—and that is perhaps the best thing about this refreshingly undiplomatic book. Martha Dodd, daughter of the former American ambassador to Berlin, meets us at the beginning of the story as a typical American girl—intelligent, curious, sincere, still flexible, still impressionable, but already searching for knowledge and a definite goal. In the course of the narrative we see this young person developing, and as she endeavors to conjure up for us the people and scenes of the Third Reich, she herself comes alive—unprejudiced and thoughtful, saucy and companionable, ready to help, eager to discipline herself through freedom and to make fruitful for herself and others the incredible situation in which she suddenly found herself.

The family of William E. Dodd, a professor of history, is enjoying a modest, retired, and industrious vacation on a small farm in Virginia when the father is appointed ambassador of the United States to Germany. Professor Dodd has never been a diplomat, but he knows history—the history of the country to which he is being sent as intimately as that of the nation he represents. He has studied in Germany and received his doctor's degree there; he loves Germany—its civilization, its people, its language. At home he is valued as a clever and upright man, a prominent Democrat. Roosevelt, who wants to meet the new Germany in a new way, sends a human being to Berlin, not a diplomat.

At first young Martha thinks Berlin is splendid; and her father, who does not recognize in the Third Reich the Germany of his youth, speaks in a joking but worried way of his "Nazi child." In all sincerity she tries to feel at home in the dictatorship; she looks about her, she makes inquiries, she learns. There is much to learn all at once; things stand in strange opposition to each other. She learns in the school of diplomatic social life and in the school of the Nazi terror. She learns that it is quite impossible—it is simply not allowed—to leave an evening party before eleven o'clock, or to depart from the rigid seating arrangement prescribed by the "Protocol." At the same time she learns that it is neither impossible nor forbidden to break international treaties, to throw hundreds of thousands of men into concentration camps without trial, and to transform all Germany into one big prison in which the vicious and the sick keep the watch.

She learns. And although she learns little that we did not know, little that would have escaped an alert newspaper reader, her sincere, childlike, conscientious presentation of events gives us a good picture. The conclusions she draws are often amazingly correct. And her portraits live. The Nazi rulers pass before us: Hitler—an amorphous, inhuman, amoral, hysterical figure; Göring, fat and red, but a splendid host; little Goebbels, who sparkles with "irresistible gaiety" and has such a "soft voice" that one cannot believe the horrors one knows he has instigated; Schacht and Rosenberg, Ribbentrop and Papen, Hanfstängl and Neurath, and the other great men of the Third Reich, some now overthrown, some still in power. They smile and bow on the parquetry floors of the American embassy. The diplomatic corps smiles also, and the representatives of the great European democracies bow—they do not come off too well in the sketches of the young and impudent Martha. Against this background the father, who according to the daughter presents the "rare spectacle of an informal and idealistic ambassador," appears like a man before a row of life-sized marionettes. He is struggling with a problem which he soon recognizes as insoluble. On what plane shall he, the representative of a free democratic nation, meet the crafty terror which sees a plot when the democrat would like to negotiate, which plans extortion when the democrat believes in honorable transactions, which practices violence when the democrat dreams of justice?

After the terrible events of June 30, 1934, Miss Dodd suddenly decides to fly to Russia. She spends a month there and comes "home," to Berlin, full of most encouraging impressions. Her childlike self-confidence admits no doubt about the authenticity of such impressions. She might have said to herself that you cannot learn the truth about Russia when you do not know the language and for four weeks are led about by a government official; she might have remembered, too, that she was at first all enthusiasm for Nazi Germany. She fails to do so and pronounces judgment, but this judgment is based less on subjective impressions than on simple truths—the truth of the fundamental difference between Soviet and Nazi aims, even if the methods used are similar, and the other truth that the general situation in Russia is not comparable with that in Germany. In Russia government is for the people, not against the people as in simple truth it is in Germany. The standard of living has fallen under Hitler, while it has risen in the Soviet Union. Russia shows no sign of intending military aggression against the world, while fascism threatens to stick Europe in its pocket. Meanwhile, the atmosphere in Germany is filled with fears as with bacilli—the people's fear of their rulers, the rulers' fear of one another. Trembling persecutors and quivering victims, unhappy tyrants and a despairing people! Even the house of the foreign diplomat teems with hidden microphones and spying servants. William E. Dodd, who soon does not conceal his abhorrence of the regime, has reason to be especially on his guard; the American family lives as if on an island, with the waves of the terror breaking around them.

After four years and a half the father resigns, but he had really resigned long before. The knowledge that Germany is spoiled for peaceful intercourse with civilized humanity as long as Hitler is master there, that Hitler's desires are boundless and his methods thoroughly unacceptable, fills the brain and heart of the democratic Professor Dodd while Ambassador Dodd takes his leave. They go back to America, the richer for a great if bitter experience, but poorer by, oh, so much. The mother dies. Four years and a half in Nazi Germany have literally broken her heart; the gay and charming woman whom the daughter describes with so much tenderness has reached the end of her strength as her husband finally brings her home to freedom. And where is that saucy young person Martha, the "Nazi child" who at the beginning of the story went out to seek adventure? In the poisonous hothouse atmosphere of the Third Reich four years are like twenty, and it is an earnest, understanding woman, knowing life in all its wretchedness, who here undertakes to speak out about the unspeakable, to portray what cannot be portrayed In conclusion, the young Martha (I have a sisterly feeling for her, for six years of exile are also like twenty years) makes a confession of faith—which is also mine—faith in a just freedom and in the struggle against dishonorable barbarism. ERIKA MANN

A Happy Eternity

THE MIRACLE OF HAWORTH. A BRONTE STUDY. By W. Bertram White. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.50.

"A LITTLE credulity," said the first of the Brontë biographers, "helps one on through life very smoothly," and some of Mrs. Gaskell's heirs have both practiced and banked on this. With at least four Brontës of talent, the life of each turning closely upon all the others, what indeed cannot be done? Brontë combinations and permutations are almost infinite, and irresistible. Which one of them wrote "Wuthering Heights," or rather which did not? What are the relations of Charlotte to Arthur Nicholls, George Smith, and Branwell, of Branwell to Mrs. Robinson and Anne Brontë, of Anne to Emily, of Emily to William Weightman, Branwell, and Charlotte? Was the Reverend Patrick Brontë himself fool, ogre, or genius? Did he live for or on his children? Such matters as these are the common fare of the Brontë specialists, and no wonder some of them, dwelling in the midst of keys, clues, and inklings, habitués of the devious, have invoked the improbable, confident that the Brontës, like Wordsworth's Nature, never did betray the heart that loved them.

Little daunted by such complexities, Mr. White has set out to make an end of them, to write a straightforward, conscientious, and sympathetic account of Haworth parsonage. Such a purpose is praiseworthy and courageous, yet I am afraid "The Miracle of Haworth" is marked by daring more than divination. In common with a larger humanity, Mr. White solves his problems chiefly by ignoring them. Sweeping away much of the bad theorizing of previous Brontë studies, he disposes also of most of the good. "The Miracle of Haworth," indeed, guards the Brontës from the unwelcome advances of their critics with the same sort of jealous love that Madame Héger utilized to protect her professor from the advances of Charlotte herself. Coming, in brief, at the end of a long tradition of Brontë commentators, including the valuable studies of Shorter, May Sinclair, Virginia Woolf, and E. F. Benson, Mr. White completes the arc and returns, almost as though no years had passed and no gains had been made in our psychological perceptions, to the tone of Mrs. Gaskell. Yet "The Miracle of Haworth" is simply another of those hortatory documents which the Victorian celebrities, for reasons I cannot always see, draw to themselves. Why should it be characteristic of Mr. White's book that what is tolerable in its fellows becomes so unfortunate in it?

Perhaps it is because the Brontës, even more than the unhappy Dickens, the morose Carlyle, the tormented Butler, reveal so sharply the moral sickness of their era. For the Brontës, in their years but especially in their spiritual lives, were closer to that state of being which seemed to draw down the special wrath of Victorian society—youth. This history of their childhood, surrounded by solemnity and disease, from which the imprint of the Victorian morality crushed whatever pleasures might have remained; this picture of the Brontë children forced by their father's vision of their genius, a vision more like a threat, into a dreadful maturity—is there anything very inspiring in such a chronicle? "Tell me," says the Reverend Brontë to his daughters; "What is the best mode of spending one's time?" "By laying it out in preparation," says Maria, aged ten, "for a happy eternity." Were Charlotte and Emily also preparing for their happy eternity—shy, nervous, precocious children as they were, taking refuge in the story-telling which was to be their only fruitful adjustment to life; these virginal young women revealing to a shocked society a passion as intense as it was aimless, and one which, afraid of human response, sought as its sure object the printed page? "Out of travail," says Mr. White, "a soul is born," but he does not specify what sort of soul. Perhaps the Miracle of Haworth is not that the Brontë children lived so beautifully, but that they managed to live at all.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

Lustier Than Life

HANNIBAL HOOKER. By William Harlan Hale. Random House. $2.50.

"HANNIBAL HOOKER" is rich in history, brilliant in dialogue, a lustier chunk of life than anything you'll be likely to be living yourself. It is a true carnival for the spirit. But if you are a literary critic, your canons will be outraged.

The hero, who gives the book its title, is the son of a small-town banker and a pious mother in Waynesboro, Indiana. He is sent to a theological seminary in Boston. Here he makes two lifelong friends—Saulpaugh, whose mentality is Anglo-Catholic, and Limbach, a Shavian character of wit and learning. The conversations of these three recur throughout the long novel, punctuating the adventures. In themselves they are brilliant; and aside from their intrinsic value they supply a much-needed integration to the novel, a Greek chorus linking the separate stories. This link should have been supplied by the evolution of the hero, but it is not. The character of the hero does change, but except in the case of his dramatic break with the suburban church, the reader cannot tell why. From that point on, a certain chaos comes over the novel.

Now if "Hannibal Hooker" were truly "picaresque," as the publishers and even the writer seem to think, there would be no need for integration of the symphonic type. No one asks a Hervey Allen to keep score. We could blithely follow Hannibal through his first pastorship, his escape to Haiti and involvement in a comic Caribbean revolution, his work for pacifism just before the Great War, his adventures as a correspondent in Europe. But to write this sort of story-suite Mr. Hale should have been trained as a pulp-writer, putting aside his intellectualism, personal subtlety, and moral idealism. The author is much too good, and not good enough, to write for the pulps; he is a writer for educated adults and should resign himself to that audience.

Isolated episodes, to be sure, come through magnificently. Hannibal's great love affair is real and clear and moving—though much more so when handled as a recurrent theme through the years of adventure than under the glaring sunlight of an island of escape. And the adventures with such unforgettable characters as Pat Deasy, the treacherous Irish revolutionary, Johnny Papadakis, the Greek saloon-keeper, and Alois Kastenhuber, the stone-cutting anarchist, are excellent. But Mr. Hale in his next novel should eschew definitely the string-of-beads organization in favor of the symphonic, because that is the only way his highly humanistic sense of life can be projected into a telling whole. The reader does get, through the choppy life and conversation of the hero, a dim sense of man with his fist against the sky, but whereas he should have emerged as the immortal Faustian seeker, the modern man in search of his soul, Hannibal Hooker is always merely the central operative in a number of events, never quite emerging as character.

If Mr. Hale is right now too inspired for his skill, that is not to say that he hasn't enough to outstrip his American contemporaries. He has. His first novel must be read. And his second will be.

EUNICE CLARK

South Carolina Town

THE WEDDING. By Grace Lumpkin. Lee Furman. $2.50.

YOU won't be much worried for fear the wedding presents sent to Jennie Middleton may have to go back, because you have a feeling that she will make up her quarrel with Dr. Gregg in time. Besides, it would be no tragedy if she didn't, because—Miss Lumpkin being rather hard on her own sex in this novel—Jennie is not exactly a prize package. When she wants to be, she is very much the ingratiatingly charming Southern girl, the darling of the saber-scarred Confederate Veterans, but she also has a streak of Yankee selfishness and stubbornness that—oh well, as the Bishop in the book says, let's not stir up any more of these old sectional hatreds. The main purpose of the story is not so much to entangle you in the very tenuous web of its plot, which covers merely the twenty-four hours between the quarrel and the marriage ceremony, as to depict the complex cross-currents of life in a Southern town (called Lexington, but sounding very much like Columbia, South Carolina), poised between the old and the new. The wedding lies in the center of a mesh of wires that connect with the church, the bank, the town's traditions and economic future, even with its penitentiary and red-light district. The threatened hitch merely adds additional complications, greatly to the amusement of Dr. Gregg's small and Puckish best man. Miss Lumpkin, whose novel "To Make My Bread" was dramatized a few years ago as "Let Freedom Ring," is no stylist, but she writes with the sincerity and conviction that come from first-hand knowledge of her setting. Robert Middleton, the bride's father, is particularly well drawn: an amiable scion of an old family, endowed by nature to grace a drawing-room but doomed by circumstances to shuttle back and forth between petty cares at home and small notes at the bank. LOUIS B. SALOMON

FILMS

"CRISIS—MADE IN GERMANY" (Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse), the full-length documentary film about the developments in Czechoslovakia from last May till after Munich, is an exciting and illuminating piece of sincere work. It also poses unintentionally the whole problem of the reporting of political situations and actions by means of the movie camera. The newsreel outfits of the great companies report generally only the surface of events, unconnected bits which, if you had not read your newspaper, would be meaningless; and usually, the farther removed any given event is from politics, the more complete and truthful the picture report. Catastrophes for which God alone seems to be responsible—hurricanes and floods—can be sure of excellent handling. Reels about political actions, on the other hand, which may concern the lives of millions in all parts of the world, are composed mainly of shots of statesmen with and without umbrellas rushing to and from conferences: you see planes, cars, desks, fountain pens, smiling faces, but you must choose your own criminal. Herbert Kline, an independent young American producer, and Alexander Hackenschmiedt, an excellent Czech camera man, intended to do more. They set out to photograph whatever was to happen in Czechoslovakia, and to a certain extent also to interpret and explain it.

We see the first Czech mobilization which stopped Hitler in May; meetings in Sudetenland of fanatical Nazis and democratic anti-Nazis who hold out for their convictions against tremendous pressure from over the frontier; terrorized Jews. We see two funerals: historical and pompous rites for two dead Nazis attended by Henlein and Hitler's representatives; and seven simple coffins in which rest workers beaten to death. We see marching boots, truncheons, barricades, smashed windows. The atmosphere of a countryside under a terror springs from the screen in all its tenseness.

And there is more: the fitting of gas masks that make little children look like monsters; the faces of simple women with big honest eyes, who understand only too well what war will mean; the beautiful hills and fields; villages and towns; people at work and people at leisure, taking walks, looking at shop windows full of Nazi propaganda or of books by Freud and Thomas Mann; soldiers, tanks, cannon, fighting planes. The contrast between everyday life which is hard but sweet and the bloody future ahead is conveyed so convincingly that it chokes you. Especially touching, and full of hope for days less barbarous, is the sequence showing the work in Czech-German solidarity—the children's camp and the visit of the two eminent Czech comedians and satirical poets, Voskovec for tonight's concert . . .

YOU plan the program

LAFAYETTE
Automatic
PHONO-RADIO COMBINATION

All the treasures of music are yours to command with this 9 tube Lafayette phono-radio combination. Here's an instrument that is literally a masterpiece in accoustical engineering. It combines eight advanced radio features with the almost-human Garrard Automatic Record Changer. Distinguished for its living tone both in broadcasting and record playing, C-22 is at the same time superb in cabinet design. Only Lafayette could offer such an instrument to delight the ear and lend charm to the home—for $112.50 (ac-dc model $122.50.) Write today for illustrated book, or visit the Lafayette salon nearest you.

LAFAYETTE RADIOS
100 SIXTH AVENUE • NEW YORK, N. Y.
542 E. Fordham Rd. . . BRONX, N. Y.
90-08 166th Street . . . JAMAICA, L. I.
901 W. Jackson Blvd. . CHICAGO, ILL.
219 Central Ave. . . . . NEWARK, N. J.
110 Federal Street . . BOSTON, MASS.
265 Peachtree Street . ATLANTA, GA.

and Werich. (We live in fast-moving times: both are already exiles in New York.)

The end: Berchtesgaden, Godesberg, again mobilization. The producers saved seven thousand meters of film for the outbreak of the war which did not come. They show us a stream of refugees—German socialists, Jews, Czechs, stranded in no man's land. The commentator of the picture, Vincent Sheean, points to their misery: such are the consequences of Munich! But would war not have been a thousandfold more disastrous? This question and many others the picture does not answer? The Czech fascists, the fifth column in Prague of financiers and industrialists, the big landowner friends of Hitler do not appear. In short, the whole truth about what happened last year in Central Europe is not yet told even in this gallant attempt. But the feeling of what life was like in those desperate months in Czechoslovakia comes through, and that in itself is a great experience.

"Stagecoach" (United Artists) is the best Western picture in years. You get all you expect—Indians on the warpath, wild frontiersmen, corrupt bankers, noble gamblers, youthful officers, hypocrites, drunkards, heroes, innocent ladies, whores, and horses. But they have never been presented more expertly. The story moves fast, with ever-growing suspense. There are no slips into false romance. The known types almost become characters. The dialogue is to the point and as true as possible. And the beauty of plain and sky takes your breath away. The direction (John Ford) and the production (Walter Wanger) show unsurpassed craftsmanship. The picture is an unspoiled pleasure from beginning to end.

This cannot be said of Sacha Guitry's "Champs Elysées" (Tri-National Film), which nevertheless has enough of Parisian wit and irony to be amusing most of the time. Sacha Guitry plays five parts and is best as the old teacher who, on the pretext of telling the story of the famous boulevard to his ten-year-old pupil, explains many things about love.

A warning for thriller addicts: "Torchy Blaine in Chinatown" is terrible. I saw it on a rainy afternoon with an audience of poor kids—to whom such trash is sold. But even they were bored.

FRANZ HOELLERING

RECORDS

HAYDN'S Symphony No. 102, issued by Victor (three records, $6.50), is Haydn at his best—which I would not say of the Boston Symphony's recorded performance: even the Haydn vigor would sound the better for the lightness of hand with which Koussevitzky treats the Haydn playfulness. On a single record ($1.50) Bruno Walter offers a sensitive and warm performance with the London Symphony of the lovely Ballet Music Nos. 1 and 2 from Schubert's "Rosamunde"; on another Walter single Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture loses the power it would have in a performance that was steady and controlled.

Such steadiness and control made Walter's recent Victor set of Brahms's Third Symphony the excellent thing it was; and they are to be heard again in Weingartner's performance of the work with the London Philharmonic, now issued by Columbia (four records, $6). The superiority of the new version is in recording which gives clean-cut reproduction of the sounds, as against a slight clouding of the older performance by reverberation. On the other hand there are occasions when strands of the Brahms texture are not heard in the new version that are heard in the old; and in the new one the fourth movement is recorded at a lower volume level at the end of side 6 than on sides 7 and 8.

Fauré's Requiem is the first of his works that I have found not only beautifully contrived but, in its quiet way, deeply felt. It is well recorded for Columbia by French singers and players with Commette at the organ (five records, $7.50). In a two-record set ($3.25) are four arias from operas by Lully—lovely music sung quite well by the tenor Villabella and the soprano Renaux; in another such set is French music of still another sort—the charming music of Offenbach arranged for the Ballet Russe's "Gaieté Parisienne," buoyantly played by the London Philharmonic under Kurtz; on a single ($1.50) is Beecham's superb performance of the Overture to "Oberon" with the same orchestra.

Richard Crooks's Victor record ($2) of "Il mio tesoro" from "Don Giovanni" is surprisingly bad: I was not prepared for such constricted, harsh singing from him. But Roy Harris inflating nothing into Nothing in his Chorale for String Sextet—well played by the Kreiner Sextet on another Victor single ($1.50)—is something I was fully prepared for. Hertha Glatz's record ($1.50) of Schubert's "Seligkeit" and "Wehmut" offers musically intelligent use of a voice that is a little metallic.

Technichord Records (39 Worthington Road, Brookline, Mass.) has issued an album (five records, $8) of Bach's organ music played by E. Power Biggs on the Baroque Organ in the Germanic Museum at Harvard University, which was built for performance of such music in accordance with the principles of organ design of Bach's period. The volume offers several fine works: the Concerto in A minor after Vivaldi, the Chorale-Prelude "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," the Prelude and Fugue in E flat known to many in the Busoni arrangement for piano recorded by Fischer; and on the fifth record is the Trio Sonata No. 1, which I find less interesting. The sound of the instrument is recorded with beautiful fidelity, but there are places where the texture is not clear: after the first b flat of the E flat Prelude, for example, one cannot hear the a flat, g, and f that lead to the e flat. The Prelude suffers a great deal from this sort of thing; and it would gain from something more imposing than Mr. Biggs's simple, direct treatment of the various works.

I have had much pleasure from the Victor album (six records, $9) of Jerome Kern's show music sung and played in the style in which one hears such music sung and played in the theater.

B. H. HAGGIN

In Coming Issues

A Review of Hitler's "Mein Kampf"
BY FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

The Fetishism of Power
BY SIDNEY HOOK

Letters to the Editors

Job-Insurance Amendments

Dear Sirs: An editorial, Job Insurance in Peril, in your issue of January 28, contains several misconceptions. The proposed amendments to the New York law are an attempt to correct the conditions which you describe so mildly in your first paragraph; these conditions are the real peril to job insurance. Our objectives may be summarized as understanding of his benefit rights on the part of the employee; equitable distribution of the funds between regular industrial workers and the casual, seasonal, and part-time workers; maintenance of actual living standards; simplicity of procedure so that benefits will be paid accurately and promptly; reduction of unnecessary administrative cost and delays.

The proposals offer uniform duration of benefits of sixteen weeks to all eligibles, instead of the present additional limitation, based on one-sixth of earnings, which terminates benefits short of sixteen weeks for 75 per cent of the claimants. Estimates made with the cooperation of the Division of Placement and Unemployment Insurance show that the proposals will reduce the payments to those who have little unemployment in the benefit year, but will increase the payments to those who remain unemployed for a long time.

The annual-wage proposal allows benefits equal to 50 per cent of the weekly full-time wage for employees who have worked (in typical wage ranges) forty weeks or more in the base year; more than 50 per cent of the full-time wage is allowed to those who have worked regularly in the base year and are unexpectedly unemployed in the following year.

The proposals offer definite liberalization by the inclusion of benefits for partial unemployment, which is not now protected by the New York law.

Employee contributions at a fraction of the employer's rate will go far toward preservation of the employee's self-respect, as will the continuance of unemployment benefits as a matter of earned right, not to be confused with various forms of dole or relief.

The stamp-book system proposed in the editorial does not answer all the problems of enforcement and simplification with equity; it raises a whole series of new questions. Nevertheless, it may be desirable for certain types of employment, particularly if coverage is extended to smaller employers and farm labor.

There has been no quiet threat or surreptitious attack in the launching of these proposals; a draft was presented to the New York State Advisory Council in September, with specific authority to broadcast as widely as the council desired. Early in October the proposals were discussed with the Social Security Board in an all-day session. Late in October copies were sent to each of the representatives of the Unemployment Division from every state who attended the board's Interstate Conference. This is important, because of the board's failure to take decisive action, as pointed out by your editorial. Wherever organized labor has carefully studied the proposals, and discussed them with the designers, labor has found much unexpected merit in them.

F. B. CLIFFE,
Assistant Comptroller,
General Electric Company
Schenectady, N. Y., February 20.

[The Nation readily admits that New York's unemployment-insurance law stands in serious need of revision, and that Mr. Cliffe's proposal for a uniform sixteen-week duration of benefits is a desirable change. His proposal that the "annual wage" be substituted for the "full-time weekly wage" as a basis for determining the benefit rate, on the other hand, involves a departure from the basic principle of American unemployment-insurance legislation: compensation for unemployment at a rate commensurate to the loss suffered. When a worker is unemployed, he does not lose an income equal to his average week's earnings but his full week's wages. The use of the average wage imposes a definite penalty on the most insecure worker because of his insecurity. The effect would be most disastrous in a depression since benefit rates would decline more rapidly than full-time weekly wages. Thus the unemployment-insurance system would fail to maintain purchasing power at the time when it was most needed.

Mr. Cliffe slides over the most reactionary of his proposals by saying that employee contributions "will go far toward the preservation of the employee's self-respect." The fact remains, however, that the tangible effect would be to place an increased share of the burden of unemployment on the group that now carries most of the burden—the workers—rather than on business and society as a whole, where it rightfully belongs.

As to the attitude of labor, since our editorial appeared we have been assured by numerous labor groups that they recognize the dangers inherent in the Cliffe proposals and are actively opposing them.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

"When Germany Awakes—"

Dear Sirs: During the very week when the German-American Bund held its meeting at Madison Square Garden, a once well-known German novel, forgotten by the present generation, happened to fall into my hands. It contains a memorable political confession — or should I say a prophecy?—made by a German-American a hundred years ago.

The novel first appeared in 1855, causing a great sensation. Its title was "Der Amerikamüde ("The Man Who Grew Tired of America"), and subsequently the phrase gained wide popularity in Germany. The author was the Vienna journalist Ferdinand Kürnberger, who had achieved considerable reputation as an incisive political analyst and was regarded as a successor to Ludwig Börne, the great democrat.

Kürnberger describes the disappointments of a German immigrant who seeks to establish an ideal farm settlement of his countrymen in America and sees his enterprise suffer shipwreck. This disillusioned idealist was modeled after the poet Nikolaus Lenau, who actually spent a few years in the United States. The hero turns out to be somewhat prematurely "tired of America," in fact, from the first page on. The novel, moreover, abounds in unfairnesses to the American people and in misrepresentations of Americanism, faults which were sharply criticized by contemporary reviewers and which doomed the work to oblivion, despite its literary qualities. One passage, however, remains of great interest. In fact, it seems more timely today than ever. The hero works himself up to the following climax in a speech delivered at a German meeting:

> When I look into America's future, I see our own German greatness. For this I know in my heart: America will not perish until Germany has completed her revolutions, beyond which lie unity and freedom. Until then, I can wait. The spark of German spirit that I shall hand on to my heirs will stay alive. Have not the German farmers of Pennsylvania instinctively known how to hold fast to their German ways for one hundred years? So fast that whole communities understood not a single word of English today. . . . The fall which I see facing this mongrel people concerns me no more than the fate of the goat that suckled Jupiter. Let it come—we shall not perish. Germany will send her fleet and know how to defend her German province Pennsylvania. What am I saying? Pennsylvania? All of North America will become German, for our immigration will then rest upon a mighty motherland. But why merely North America? The whole world will become German, for Germany's rise will mean England's decline. When Germany awakes, no nation in the world will maintain its old rank.

From the distant past we seem to hear the voice of an orator in Madison Square Garden, his mask of "honest Americanism" lifted for an instant. Even Adolf Hitler and Fritz Kuhn could hardly have formulated it any better than this German author of the fifties. And this German vision coincides remarkably with the conception of the role of Germans in the United States current in Berlin today. Yet Kürnberger was really a progressive and democratically minded (which throws a good deal of light, by the way, on the asumption that there are "two kinds of Germans").

Ferdinand Kürnberger never visited the United States. This spiritual anticipator of Hitler and the Bund, who sat in such stern judgment on America, never set foot on American soil. His vision of German-Americans and their future role was from across the sea. In view of Nazi world policy this may be the most significant point.

ANTON KUH

New York, March 2

"Dear Junior"

Dear Sirs: I have sent the following letter to Frank Hague, Jr.:

Dear Junior: So soon you will become a Judge of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals. Here, indeed, is a milestone in the history of New Jersey jurisprudence. I realize how pleased your daddy must be with this appointment and I hope he will find time to come up from Miami to be present at your induction.

I too have a junior, aged seven, who like you is eminently qualified to don the Jersey ermine, and I trust that you will put in a good word for him with our distinguished governor in order that his daddy may also be pleased.

I am now preparing a biographical sketch to be entitled "All That He Is Today He Owes to His Father, and What Governor Moore Owed His Father Nobody Knows," and in this connection it may be necessary to call upon you for further details as to the acquisition of that degree tendered you by the renowned Southern college whose name both you and I have unfortunately forgotten. At all events at the outset of what assuredly will be the growth of the fairest judicial rose in the "Garden State," will you accept the hearty congratulations of a layman who looks forward to years of many errors but few appeals?

I am about to make a tour of New Jersey under the auspices of the Workers' Defense League to present to the youth of the state the inspiring details of your rapid rise to juridicial honors. It will be an inspiration to our youth to think how well you conned your Blackstone before the burning logs in the remote Deal cabin of your distinguished father, or how in the boulevard apartment you nightly had by heart the dissents of Justices Holmes, Brandeis, and Cardozo. Youth must be served, and the fact that you flunked at Princeton in your sophomore year need cause you no qualms. I see that another princely heir, Prince Fumitaka Konoye, son of the former Japanese Premier, Prince Fumimaro Konoye, who was busted out of Princeton altogether, is now dean of the Japanese-sponsored Tungwen College in Shanghai.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Radburn, N. J., March 3

One-Act Play Contest

Dear Sirs: The American Civil Liberties Union, through the medium of the One-Act Play Magazine, announces a contest for one-act plays. Plays submitted must deal with some aspect of civil liberties in the United States or its colonial possessions and must not be longer than one hour of playing time or shorter than twenty minutes. A first prize of $75 and a second of $25 will be given. The judges will be Brooks Atkinson, Sidney Howard, William Kozlenko, Archibald MacLeish, and Elmer Rice. The contest closes April 30.

Manuscripts should be sent to the American Civil Liberties Union Play Contest, care the One-Act Play Magazine, 112 West Forty-second Street, New York.

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION

New York, February 20

Doctors in Germany

Dear Sirs: Under the heading "Doctors Needed in Germany," the Neue Züricher Zeitung of January 16, 1939, says: "Panel and insurance-practice patients are treated badly as there is a great need for doctors after the purge of Jewish and half-Jewish doctors. In private practice the fees are very often two or three times what they have been; so that also private patients are in a bad situation."

These lines show that not even fascism with its hard methods of education is able to change human nature.

R. KUHN

New York, March 6

CONTRIBUTORS

KENNETH G. CRAWFORD is the Washington correspondent of the New York Post.

G. A. BORGESE is the author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism."

DAVID MARTIN frequently contributes articles on Canadian matters to American publications.

RAYMOND L. WISE is a New York lawyer and a director of the American Civil Liberties Union. He has been special assistant to the United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York—Bureau of Securities.

ROBERT MORSS LOVETT has for many years been professor of English at the University of Chicago. He is an editor of the New Republic.

ERIKA MANN is the daughter of Thomas Mann and author of "School for Barbarians."

MAXWELL GEISMAR is a member of the English Department at Sarah Lawrence College.

EUNICE CLARK is one of the poets whose work appears in the Modern Library's anthology of modern poetry.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $15; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs, Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 18, 1939 NUMBER 12

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 305

EDITORIALS:

ISOLATION IS NOT ENOUGH 307
LIBERALS NEVER LEARN 308
OPEN LETTER TO GOVERNOR LEHMAN 309
HITLER'S NEW THREAT by Louis Fischer 310
AMERICA IN THE POST-MUNICH WORLD
IV. MOBILIZE FOR DEMOCRACY
by Eliot Janeway 314
POWER DAMS AND POLITICS
by Richard L. Neuberger 317
LIVING PHILOSOPHIES
XI. THE PURSUIT OF FREEDOM
by Jacques Maritain 319
IN THE WIND 321
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 322

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NAZI KORAN by Frederick L. Schuman 323
THE SCIENTIST AND THE WORLD
by Dorothy Van Doren 324
THE ROAD THAT LED TO MUNICH
by Franz Hoellering 324
AFTER THE GHETTO by Harold Strauss 326
DRAMA: THE SWING MIKADO
by Joseph Wood Krutch 328
MUSIC by B. H. Haggin 330

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE NEW CRISIS IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA IS THE direct result of the constant Nazi intriguing in that country since the Munich agreement put it at Germany's mercy. Not content with its territorial conquests in the Sudetenland, Berlin has steadily pressed Prague for economic and political concessions. On many points the Czechs have yielded, but they have stood out on others, including a demand for a part of the Czech gold reserve. Meanwhile, Nazi agents have been busy encouraging separatist sentiment in Carpatho-Ukraine and Slovakia, the most economically backward and politically reactionary parts of the country. Last week Prague at last moved to halt disruptive movements in these two provinces, sending in troops and removing the local governments. This bold action brought hot denunciations from the German press, which quickly dusted off its old headlines about "Czech tyranny." At the time of writing Hitler is receiving with honors the deposed Slovak Premier, Dr. Tiso, and an ultimatum is reported to have gone out from Berlin ordering the division of Czechoslovakia into three "independent" states and the reorganization of the Prague regime. German occupation of Czechoslovakia to "restore order" is also hinted. In preparation, the Nazis in Slovakia are busy manufacturing disorder. In the face of these threats the Prague government shows signs of retreat. Indeed, it is in no position to resist. Hitler made sure of that at Munich, and nobody regards the tentative guaranty of the Czech frontiers given by Britain and France as more than a bad joke. This sudden crisis is an indication that lack of news recently about Germany's eastern drive is no proof it has been abandoned. After all, the east and west campaigns are halves of the same whole. Hitler can only feel free to put full pressure on Britain and France when he has consolidated not only his military but his economic position in the Danube Basin.

* * *

ON ANOTHER PAGE LOUIS FISCHER REPORTS by cable on the struggle in Madrid. The position as he describes it coincides with the analysis of close observers here. Growing hatred of the Communists linked with a desperate desire for a quick peace made possible a coup that was undoubtedly planned in consultation with British and French interests; the coming overthrow of the Negrin government was known in Washington three days before it occurred. Every faction in Spain wants peace. The certainty of ultimate Fascist victory leaves only the problems of time and method. Negrin believed that the only hope of saving the lives of active Loyalist leaders lay in continuing the struggle and so making it worth Franco's while to offer some measure of amnesty. The Casado-Miaja faction now in power believes—perhaps honestly—that a government purged of Communist influences stands a better chance of winning decent conditions of surrender. Since Franco is in a position to dictate, and since he has never wavered in his insistence upon an unconditional surrender, the hopes of both groups were probably vain. In any case, whatever the merits of their calculations, it is certain that the coup and the brutal fratricidal struggle that followed have wiped out whatever faint chance existed of an "honorable peace." In spite of bitter political differences behind the lines, the army of the Republic for two and a half years has demonstrated a courage and solidarity almost unequaled in history. That these comrades should have turned to slaughtering each other in their hour of defeat is a tragedy almost as great as the defeat itself. Communist resistance to the new government is now apparently ended; all that remains is for Franco to pick the fruits of his victory.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

*

WHAT AWAITS THE LOYALIST SURVIVORS with the final triumph of the rebels was made clear long ago by General Franco himself. In an interview with a United Press correspondent in November, 1938, he announced that "we have more than 2,000,000 persons card-indexed with proofs of their crimes." Of late the Burgos regime has stated in answer to appeals for clemency from abroad that only those guilty of crimes will be punished; but the "law of political responsibilities" recently promulgated shows that under the Burgos definition of "crime" every person over fourteen years of age in any territory ever held by the Republicans is liable to punishment. And this is not all. The law is retroactive to October 1, 1934. Its clauses specify for punishment ranging from execution through exile and imprisonment to loss of civil rights those who held executive positions in the Popular Front parties, those charged with missions of trust by the Popular Front, those who organized the 1936 elections, and even Free Masons. Republican officials will be held punishable not only for acts "which would have brought conviction by a court martial or acts of political responsibility" but for failing to support the nationalist movement if they had the opportunity to do so or for showing "a passive attitude." Behind the Franco censorship the vast court martial of the Spanish people has already begun. And for lack of evidence to the contrary we may assume that the second Inquisition, like the first, will have the blessing of the Vatican.

*

THE TRADE AND CREDIT AGREEMENT WITH Brazil represents a new kind of "dollar diplomacy." Unlike the old variety its primary aim is not the protection of American investors—though, incidentally, they may reap considerable benefit—but the mobilization of this country's economic power against the politico-commercial drive of fascism. It combines Secretary Hull's belief in expanding trade as a path to peace with the President's policy of enforcing "a decent respect for the opinions of mankind" by methods other than war. Our agreement with Brazil provides for an extension of credits by the Export-Import Bank, for a gold loan of $50,000,000, subject to the approval of Congress, to assist a new Brazilian Reserve Bank to achieve currency stabilization, and for technical aid for Brazilian development. Brazil, for its part, agrees to safeguard American investors against discriminatory treatment, to promote the production of non-competitive commodities, such as rubber, and to resume partial payments on the debt service suspended since November, 1937. With the means that the agreements provide for the reestablishment of credit and relaxation of currency restrictions, Brazil should be able to restrict, if not cancel, its barter arrangements with Germany, which have proved disadvantageous in many ways. Instead of being forced to accept whatever goods Germany chooses to dump in payment for raw materials, it will be able to buy railroad and other capital equipment in this country. The agreements will perhaps be criticized by those who feel that foreign investments stink of imperialism. But if Brazil is to raise its standard of living it must obtain capital from an industrial state. If the new agreements are carried out in the spirit of cooperation which their terms suggest, they can help remove the flavor of exploitation which has hitherto clung to our foreign investments.

*

CONGRESS CONTINUES TO BE EXTREMELY vocal on the subject of economy, but deeds are conspicuously lacking. One or both houses have considered five regular appropriation bills—independent offices, legislative, Treasury and Post Office, military establishment, and Interior Department—totaling around $4,282,000,000, or roughly $552,000,000 more than was provided for the current year. The gross reduction of this figure effected by Congress is only $56,000,000, and some of these cuts are not yet agreed on by both houses. The Senate has in fact shown a tendency to reject the economies favored by the House. Thus it restored $17,000,000 for the TVA and $2,000,000 for New England hurricane relief, and the House meekly agreed. Of the bills still to be acted upon, those for the WPA and agriculture are most likely to come under attack from the economy bloc.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

But before they are voted on, there will be a battle royal over this year's WPA deficiency bill, in respect of which the President's renewed request for $150,000,000 is imminent. Congressmen, frightened at taking responsibility for dropping a million or more workers from the WPA rolls at a blow, are almost begging the President to find them an excuse for reversing themselves. The numerous reactionaries in this Congress would no doubt like to vote relief for the big taxpayers while denying it to the unemployed. But we suspect they lack the nerve.

*

LABOR AS WELL AS CAPITAL HAS VESTED interests, and these are now the chief obstacles to peace between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. In more normal times it might be argued that the split in the labor movement was not without useful by-products, that competition between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. was stimulating to both organizations. But in a time of growing reaction, with the Wagner Act under organized attack and the prospects of reactionary victory in 1940 increasing, the division in labor's ranks is suicidal. It is not hard to believe that certain leading figures in the A. F. of L., who have always been associated with the Republican Party in the past, look on disunity with partisan satisfaction as a factor calculated seriously to weaken the New Deal. But the chief opposition to a democratic merger of both organizations, together with the Railway Brotherhoods, in one united American labor movement comes from the top bureaucrats and chair-warmers of the A. F. of L., who realize that the proposal would inevitably shake the little monarchies of many of the old-line unions. The Greens, Wolls, and Morrisons have long outlived their usefulness to the labor movement and should be retired. We know that the rank and file of both organizations want peace. If their leaders fail to reach an agreement, we hope the President will use his enormous influence to bring one about.

*

THE SOUTHERN TENANT FARMERS' UNION had already established itself as the first successful union of Southern agricultural workers when it voted to affiliate with the United Cannery, Agricultural, Packing, and Allied Workers of America (UCAPAWA), a C. I. O. affiliate. It stipulated that its autonomy must remain effective, for very good reasons. Its policy and technique had proved successful in a backward area offering extraordinary difficulties in union organization; the fact that the UCAPAWA, widely or unwisely, is made up of cannery and packing as well as agricultural workers in widely scattered and divergent sections would seem to indicate a loose federation of autonomous unions rather than centralized control. The S. T. F. U. has now, after a referendum of its membership, withdrawn from the C. I. O. affiliate on the issue of autonomy. The break was precipitated when Donald Henderson, president of the UCAPAWA, suspended the elected officers of the Tenant Farmers' Union on charges which boil down to refusal of the union to surrender its autonomy. The union has made it clear that its grievance does not lie against the C. I. O. On the contrary it has appealed to the C. I. O. to bring about a fair settlement. Specifically the union charges Donald Henderson, president of the UCAPAWA, with a long series of disruptive acts motivated by his allegiance to an outside political group, namely the Communist Party. The records of S. T. F. U. officials, of H. L. Mitchell and J. R. Butler, make any counter-charge of red-baiting irrelevant. We hope the top executives of the C. I. O. will find the time to resolve the difficulties of a union whose importance is far greater than its size.

Isolation Is Not Enough

BY HIS able exposition of the case for an affirmative foreign policy, in place of one compounded of "drift and negation," former Secretary of State Henry L. Stimson has performed a twofold public service. He has contributed to the discussion of the most vital issue of the day a calm and carefully reasoned statement of the dangers to this country involved in a policy of isolation; and by placing himself firmly at the President's side in a controversy which cuts clean across party lines, he has made difficult any attempt to snipe at the Administration's foreign policy from a partisan angle. This is all the more important because after weeks of desultory debate on foreign affairs Congress is now faced with the necessity of getting down to brass tacks.

On May 1 the "cash and carry" section of the Neutrality Act expires. Unless it is reenacted or the whole statute is amended, this means that, although the embargo on the sale of arms, ammunition, and the implements of war to belligerents will continue, other commodities, including oil and metals, may be exported to belligerents in American ships. The lapse of this section, therefore, would be displeasing to the isolationists, one of whose chief fears is that incidents involving our ships will once again force us into war. On the other hand they do not want to open up the whole issue lest in the process the act should suffer emasculation. They have therefore made no move so far except to announce untiring opposition to any serious change in the act.

Meanwhile Senator Pittman has announced that the Foreign Relations Committee will begin discussion of revisions of the act shortly. Four definite proposals have been put forward. Senator Lewis has introduced a bill to repeal the Neutrality Act and substitute a simple declaration that this country's policy in case of foreign war is one of neutrality, to be put into effect by regulations and executive orders by the President. Senator King has offered a simple resolution of repeal. A third suggestion is an embargo on the export of arms and munitions in time of peace as well as war. Finally there are the amendments to the act put forward by Senator Thomas of Utah, under which the President could ask Congress for authority to apply embargoes against aggressors—defined as powers which embark on war in violation of a treaty to which this country is a party.

Of these proposals the last seems to us to do most to give the Neutrality Act that flexibility which it requires if it is to become the instrument of a positive foreign policy. Whether its definition of aggression would prove adequate in view of modern tendencies to make war without declaring it, and whether the association of Congress with the President in deciding when embargoes should be applied would lead to undue debate and delay are questions which need to be carefully considered. Nevertheless, the Thomas amendments do seem to afford an opportunity both to Congress and the public to arrive at conclusions on the main issue. In the words of Mr. Stimson it is: "Shall we bury our heads in the sands of isolationism and timidly await the time when our security shall be lessened and perhaps destroyed by the growing success of lawlessness around us? Or shall we use our present strength and security to throw our weight into the vacillating scales in favor of law and order and freedom?"

Judging by the defense debates, simon-pure isolationists form no more than a small minority in Congress. But they are a sincere, vocal, and influential group and are quite capable of attempting to carry out Senator Nye's threat of engaging in a summer-long filibuster if any effort is made either to repeal or change drastically the Neutrality Act. Such tactics might prove successful in view of the fact that the convinced supporters of legislation which would serve warning on the aggressors are also a minority. Much therefore will depend on those Congressmen whose minds are not yet made up. This last section is perhaps the most representative of the country at large. There can be little doubt that the public mind is in a state of considerable confusion on the leading issues of foreign policy. Recent Gallup and Fortune polls suggest an overwhelming hostility to the fascist powers coupled with a general belief that if war breaks out in Europe America will inevitably become involved. A large majority favors supplying Britain and France with food in the event of war; a bare majority would sell them planes and other war material. But to any idea of military support there is tremendous hostility.

Public opinion is, rightly, first and foremost concerned with the maintenance of peace. The belief that this objective can best be secured by having as little to do with Europe as possible is still widely held and is an obstacle to the kind of affirmative policy Mr. Stimson desires. Yet on the premise that a general European war would eventually engulf us, there is everything to be said for taking steps now that will discourage any aggressor from precipitating a conflict.

Isolationists are aware that this is a difficult argument to meet, and in their efforts to overcome it they are driven to an attitude of Chamberlainism. We must not encourage the European democracies to expect aid, they argue, lest we give them courage to resist demands for appeasement and so cause the aggressor powers to enforce their claims by war. Accepting all fascist bluff at its face value, this argument logically leads to the conclusion that a bloodless Nazi conquest of Europe by way of a series of Munichs would be advantageous to America. Can our isolationists seriously maintain such a position? Only by rejecting all the evidence that points to fascism as an international religion sworn to a worldwide jehad for the extermination of democracy.

Liberals Never Learn

THERE is a good deal of repetition in the story of democracy's efforts to control our economic monarchs. The report of the Industrial Commission of 1898 led to the establishment of the Federal Bureau of Corporations in 1903. The inefficacy of that agency in dealing with our corporate mammoths was aired in the Pujo "money trust" hearings of 1912. Those revelations were largely responsible for the enactment of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act and the creation of the Federal Trade Commission in 1914. Twenty-five years later the puny successes and colossal failures of the commission are being examined at Washington in a new inquiry into the monopoly problem.

Considering the present mood at Washington, it is instructive to recall the words with which Woodrow Wilson in 1914 recommended the establishment of the Federal Trade Commission.

> What we are proposing to do [he said] is, happily, not to hamper or interfere with business as enlightened business men prefer to do it, or in any sense to put it under the ban. The antagonism between business and government is over. We are now about to give expression to the best business judgment of America. . . . The government and business men are ready to meet each other halfway in a common effort to square business methods with both public opinion and the law. The best-informed men of the business world condemn the methods and processes and consequences of monopoly as we condemn them. . . . That is the strength of our position and the sure prophecy of what will ensue when our reasonable work is done.

The prophecy proved as false as the hollow assumption on which it was based.

For it is not merely a few malefactors of great wealth or even big business as a whole that seeks constantly to monopolize, to control the market, to fix prices. The Federal Trade Commission cases outlined in the monopoly inquiry show that the little business man is as ready to join in restraint of trade as any steel baron. Now, as when Adam Smith first made the observation 150 years ago, "men in the same trade seldom meet together but the conversation ends in a conspiracy against the public or in some contrivance to raise prices." The failure of the anti-trust acts is due not only to the ambiguity of the laws, the duplicity of the courts in interpreting them, and the niggardliness of Congress in providing for their enforcement. They run counter to the natural trends of the business community, which is constantly talking about competition and as constantly striving to stifle it. The difference between little business and big business is simply that the former finds it more difficult to act in restraint of trade, and is more easily policed and regulated.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The brilliantly written report on "Monopoly and Competition in Steel" made by the Federal Trade Commission to the Temporary National Economic Committee vividly illustrates the uneconomic results of monopoly practices and the complete failure of the anti-trust laws to stop those practices. The industry's regimented prices "allow it to make a profit when operating at less than 40 per cent of capacity"; the buyer of steel—and we are all buyers of steel directly or indirectly—pays fixed charges and a profit on 100 per cent of capacity in return for the use of less than 40 per cent. The excuse that to allow unlimited competition would enable the biggest companies to drive the others to the wall, as Rockefeller did in oil, is a specious one. "To sanction private price controls such as those in the steel industry as a protection against price-raiding is to establish monopoly by agreement for the sake of avoiding monopoly by capture." Furthermore, as the commission points out, "capitalist theory has always held that industry was expected to produce in the hope of a profit, not that it was expected to stand idle at a profit." The commission believes that "sound competition in steel would be preferable from every point of view: it would be better for the consumer; it would make for more efficient operation of the industry. But how bring it about?

Two answers seem to be taking shape in the monopoly inquiry. Professor Frank A. Fetter spoke for the trust-busters when he told the committee: "Business leaders are vainly trying to operate a capitalistic system by methods and practices which are in conflict with its fundamental principles. The ultimate alternative to a regime of competitive prices is one of authoritarian prices. You can take your choice between private monopoly and public socialism." The trust-busters take their stand in the second sentence. They are for restoring competition. Jerome Frank and the group which wants a revival of something like the NRA says that "where an industry involves a large amount of fixed capital with high fixed costs, one must recognize that, by the very nature of the facts, there cannot be the same kind of competition as between farmers." Both seem to us correct in their analyses, hopeless in their conclusions. We have been trust-busting since 1890, and American business has constantly grown more monopolistic. In industries like steel, where experience has shown the restoration of competition impossible and where an NRA code merely pinned a policeman's badge on the monopolistic Steel Institute, government ownership is the only way out. But both sides recoil from this solution, preferring to shut their eyes to the lessons of the past two generations. It is said that the Bourbons never learn. Neither, in some fields, do the liberals.

Open Letter to Governor Lehman

DEAR GOVERNOR LEHMAN: Undoubtedly you are familiar with Section 192, Clause G, of New York State's military law, which provides that "an armory shall not be used for political or religious purposes except that an armory may be used for the purpose of holding the national convention of a political party." In view of the unambiguous terms of this law, we urge you to investigate the use of New York's Seventh Regiment Armory by the "General Committee on Americanism and Neutrality." Newspaper accounts of a public meeting staged by the General Committee at that armory on February 19 correspond with a detailed memorandum submitted to us by a spectator; all these reports confirm the openly political character of that meeting. Speakers hailed General Francisco Franco and urged immediate recognition of his government; a resolution was passed advocating "neutrality" in foreign affairs and criticizing by clear implication the anti-Nazi utterances of the Roosevelt Administration. Few issues are as obviously political and controversial as these aspects of American foreign policy. Yet Colonel Ralph C. Tobin, commanding officer of the armory, apparently insists that the meeting did not fall within the scope of the law. We regret that he will not allow us to quote his written reply to our inquiries; we also regret that his reply is entirely unsatisfactory. Gratuitously reminding us of the libel laws, he does not explain his own apparent misunderstanding of the military law. We therefore submit for your attention the following quotations which will indicate the nature of the armory meeting:

1. "If we expect to maintain close relations with our neighbors to the south, if we expect to maintain the Monroe Doctrine, we should recognize the new Spain." From the address by Merwin K. Hart, quoted in the New York Times and Herald Tribune.

2. "The resolutions, which were adopted with cheers by the audience, further demanded that Congress forbid an accord of special privileges to any foreign power, and emphatically condemned indulgence in abusive and contemptuous comment upon the rulers of foreign states and upon the forms of government they administer." From the Herald Tribune report.

3. "References by speakers to General Franco, Premier Mussolini, and Chancellor Hitler were applauded." From the Times report.

4. "Ogden H. Hammond . . . described pre-war Spain and said General Franco was a great man who would unite Spain and give it a stable government." From the Times report.

As final and clinching evidence we cite the address of Dr. Joseph F. Thorning, since published in full in the Brooklyn Tablet. Dr. Thorning's pro-Franco oration corresponds verbatim with large sections of the leading article, signed by Dr. Joseph Code, in this month's issue of Spain, an avowed pro-Franco propaganda magazine. We cannot believe that even Colonel Tobin would deny its political character.

It is possible, of course, that the legal restriction on the use of armories is unwise and should be done away with. The question is arguable, though we incline to the opinion that it is just as well to keep the National Guard and its properties completely out of politics. But even if a change in the law were desirable, surely it should not be effected by individual interpretations by commanding officers. If there is any doubt as to what constitutes a political meeting, that too should be clarified. In any event the law should not remain open to interpretations which may vary with the character of those who seek to hold meetings. We believe the incident calls for prompt investigation.

(Signed) THE EDITORS OF THE NATION

Hitler's New Threat

BY LOUIS FISCHER

London, March 4

THIS is a "lull." The tension of last fall is supposed to have subsided. When President Roosevelt announced that international events might bring him back in a hurry from the naval maneuvers, those who strive to direct public opinion here made an effort to utter a surprised, "Why? What for?" Officially all's well. Except of course that the British government has just decided to borrow £800,000,000 for rearmament. The defense services next year will spend £580,000,000.

On February 24 Premier Daladier warned the French Chamber that "the next few months or even weeks would bring some redoubtable reefs to be faced, and peace would have to be defended with vigilance." "We must not deceive ourselves," Marshal Göring echoed on March 1. "The world situation is tense."

Germany has yet to digest its victory over Czechoslovakia, and the two Fascist invaders of Spain can only now contemplate the economic exploitation of the Iberian peninsula. The fact that they are already pressing new territorial demands with an insistence which makes all Europe nervous suggests that Hitler and Mussolini may feel they had better not delay in using their recently gained strategic positions in Central Europe and the Mediterranean to achieve further expansion. This year, some authorities here contend, marks the end of the era of map-recarving by blackmail. British and French rearming is proceeding so rapidly, they submit, that the anti-Comintern powers will be afraid to attack or precipitate another "Munich" situation in 1940 or thereafter.

Is this so? If Berlin and Rome think it is, then the chances of an early serious international crisis are increased. Apprehension is widespread in Western Europe. Hence, it seems, the vigorous public assertions by Chamberlain and other responsible ministers regarding Britain's improved defenses, and hence apparently the repeated reaffirmations by the Prime Minister and Lord Halifax of British readiness to protect France.

Since the unnecessary surrender at Munich, Great Britain has probably added 1,500 airplanes to its air force. These are said to be of exceptionally high quality, and the bombers among them could inflict damage on Berlin. But Germany has not been idle, and the gap cannot be much less now than it was in September, 1938. This month, however, one hears that British industries will produce 400 military planes, compared to the previous 250. By October the monthly rate is expected to reach 700, and by February, 1940, 1,000. The British government and people, moreover, are engaged in a titanic and partially successful effort to build up their navy, already superior to any other, to perfect the woefully deficient anti-air-raid services, and to furnish all branches of the army with ample modern equipment.

The howls which have gone up in Berlin and Rome over the latest American and British astronomical defense budgets justify the suspicion that many Fascist minds are perturbed by the anticipated effect on Germany's and Italy's rocking national economies of the necessity of keeping pace with the accelerated rearmament programs of Great Britain, France, and the United States. Wiser perhaps to gamble immediately on another cheap triumph which would give strategic and material advantages to offset the democracies' added arms strength.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

This is certainly a possibility which today troubles Western statesmen. Danzig, Memel, and Danish Schleswig could be seized with impunity at any time. But all these together are a small catch, and preoccupation with them might postpone a bigger effort.

Holland is being gravely discussed as a possible object of aggression. On January 28, 1939, a number of very influential Englishmen, among them Lord Willingdon, Lord Derby, Lord Dawson of Penn, Montagu Norman, Lord Stamp, Lord Horder, and John Masefield, issued an open appeal to the leaders and people of Germany to "lay the specter of war" and cooperate with Britain to destroy the "spirit of uneasiness" which oppresses the world. This document had been prepared in the British Foreign Office and was given to some of the signatories by Lord Halifax. It sought to prevent a German invasion of Holland, which, according to official information, was then imminent. To this very day an attack on the Netherlands is regarded in the highest quarters as a real danger. The Dutch have some frontier fortifications and put trust in the device of flooding the low lands—although this expedient would necessarily inconvenience the defenders too. But could the British navy and air force save Holland from a swift assault? Can England send an expeditionary force? Would France, in the probable event of Belgian neutrality, advance frontally into Germany? It is supposed that Germany might seek to forestall French participation by turning the Maginot line with a lightning drive into Switzerland. This move, plus an Italian threat from the Alps and from Catalonia and the knowledge that after the Japanese occupation of Hainan Island Tokyo would be tempted to occupy Indo-China, the richest French colony, as soon as France became engaged in Europe, might give the Flandins and Bonnets enough arguments to keep France out. The peace-loving Dutch no longer sleep securely.

Germany, in any case, is looking westward. The Ukraine has dropped out of the headlines. Whether by intent or not, the effect of Munich was to direct German expansion toward the east. It had the additional virtue, from Chamberlain's and Daladier's point of view, of separating by a long distance the spheres of activity of the two ends of the axis—Germany in Eastern Europe, Italy in the Mediterranean basin. But the fall of Barcelona reversed these effects of Munich.

After Munich, Chamberlain would have best served his Munich policy by becoming pro-Loyalist. For a fascist-encircled France offers Hitler an attractive alternative to the hazardous Drang nach Osten. Moscow is no Jericho, and neither the hysterical shouts of an enemy nor the ultimatums of friends are likely to reduce its walls. Hitler has never fought a war, and without one he could not obtain Soviet territory. The Poles too seemed firm in the face of Nazi Ukraine propaganda, and immediately sought comfort in better relations with Moscow.

Hitler has enough means of persuading Poland to shun a war in the West. All the hunting in and for Poland appears to total up to Polish passivity in the next major diplomatic crisis and in the early stages of a physical conflict between the fascist and democratic axes of Europe. With Poland neutral, the Soviet Union is more likely to remain neutral. Soviet domestic trends are confirming the U. S. S. R. in an isolationism which is the compelling by-product of the disappearance of democratic Czechoslovakia. Even if Russia wished to go to the aid of a France in peril—and I am not sure it would have any such desire until the "1917" stage of a war—the new geography would make intervention difficult. The Kremlin is now in a mood to allow everybody to court it but to leave England, France, and America to do their own wrestling with the anti-Comintern powers.

Lord Halifax is reliably reported to have told a recent private meeting of Conservative M. P.'s that Britain cannot afford to ignore the U. S. S. R. It did ignore it in the Czech episode. Neville Chamberlain attended a reception at the London Soviet Embassy on March 1, the first British Prime Minister who ever did. The flirtation is on, for unless London and Paris can create an eastern front against Germany, the stage is perfectly set for another act of international blackmail. Hence, too, the revived British interest in Poland. Will Hitler and Mussolini anticipate the possible success of these efforts by advancing the date of the next crisis?

Upon whom would pressure be directed? Hitler's last speech to the Reichstag on January 30 was significant because in it he revised "Mein Kampf" for the first time. He demanded colonies. "Mein Kampf" did not; in fact, it minimized their usefulness. He promised that "a war against Italy, from whatever motive, will find Germany at its side." This means Nazi support for Mussolini in an offensive war too. Any such war would be against France and England—never, in view of the Anglo-French alliance, against France alone. The German demand for colonies and the military solidarity with Rome have therefore direct and serious anti-British implications. "Mein Kampf" is not anti-British. Fascist successes in Spain, Germany's western orientation, and Hitler's encouragement to Mussolini's bellicosity inaugurate a new phase in European affairs. Great Britain has been warned. Berlin's announcement of new submarine and other naval construction shows that Hitler is thinking more about England and France than about Russia. Mussolini gloats. The axis revolves more smoothly. The stubborn idea that it could be broken has proved an expensive illusion. While something can be gained by keeping the world on tenterhooks, the two Fascist powers will stick together. Peace cannot be established by paying them to separate. A firmly established peace would divide them.

Beneath the surface calm there is anxiety in Britain. One senses it in conversation with people of all classes, and it is partially reflected in the acts of the government. After the Republican defeat in Spain, the Fascists' next play would logically be to arouse the Arabs in the British- and French-ruled states as a preliminary to a Mediterranean crisis. The changes in Palestine at the expense of the Zionists are conceived as a measure to block such a development. The hasty recognition of Franco by England and France—the recognition was not unconditional; Franco imposed humiliating conditions on Bonnet—cannot merely be the climactic expression of well-known British and French sympathy for the Spanish insurgents. (Compare it with British recognition of Soviet Russia in 1924.) It is an effort to wean Franco from his masters. But does the decision rest with Franco? He had decided to take Minorca by peaceful means and British intervention. Yet the Italians bombed the island and, I am told, the British cruiser Devonshire, which carried the negotiators to Port Mahon. In September, 1938, Franco had decided to remain neutral in case of a European war. According, however, to a statement by General Harrington, the British commander of Gibraltar at that time, Germany replied that it would employ the military airdromes in Spain. Franco will undoubtedly be an independent puppet. In the early period of his regime, at least, he could not, even if he would, prevent the fascist powers from using Spain as a war base and a source of cannon fodder. I cannot see what effective means are at England's disposal for changing this situation. Certainly money will not do it. But it is natural that the present British government should try.

Prime Minister Negrin

The evacuation of congested cities is being planned with an urgency which suggests that London has no faith in the present peace. Individual air-raid shelters are being distributed. Perhaps these and other energetic measures will deter Germany and Italy. And then again they may convince Hitler and Mussolini that time is working against them. Suppose Germany overran Holland while Italy took Tunis and Japan occupied Hongkong and all of Shanghai. Which way would England and France turn first? A coalition of Germany, Italy, and Japan (and Poland?), bent on the redistribution of Dutch, Portuguese, French, and (why not?) British colonies would be a formidable combination. The sacrifice of Czechoslovakia and Spain and of the prestige and respect of the democracies has not appeased the aggressors or reassured the appeasers.

SPAIN'S FINAL TRAGEDY

Paris, March 13, by Cable

It is all very sad. This bloodshed in Madrid is senseless. The very officers and soldiers who saw Communists die in thousands at their side are shooting down the Communist executives. The few remaining Loyalist planes, tanks, and cannon rain explosives on Loyalists.

Now, of course, many people will say, "I told you so. I always knew the Loyalists were reds." But it seems to me that this last and ugly phase of the Spanish struggle proves the very opposite. Casado, Besteiro, Miaja, and their friends in the defense junta are all prominent Loyalists; yet they are bloody anti-Communists. Moreover, if Republican Spain were Communist, could Casado in three days have turned a large part of the army against the Communists? Before the Socialist Negrin and Del Vayo, together with many Communist leaders, left Spain last week, Negrin rang up all the important cities and army centers. Casado told Negrin over the telephone, "I've rebelled." Valencia, Murcia, Albacete, and Estremadura answered in much the same way. In the little village where Negrin and Del Vayo stayed, a handful of militiamen volunteered to make a last stand, but several companies of the Casadist troops were already en route to arrest the Negrin government. Where, then, was that Communist Spain which Mussolini, Hitler, and some sincere anti-fascists had summoned up in their imagination? Part of it never existed; part of it lies in unmarked graves.

The Communists are putting up a swell fight. According to the last report published by the Paris Temps civilians are joining the Communist soldiers, and private information suggests that non-Communists are supporting the Communists against the junta; but whoever wins, Franco wins. It is clever of him to wait. The longer the intra-Loyalist war goes on, the less resistance he will encounter when he advances.

The Casadist revolt diminishes the possibility of obtaining terms from Franco. Why should Burgos negotiate even an unopposed Loyalist surrender? The fascists want a complete victory, achieved by force of arms. Italy and Germany will reject any peace parleys chiefly because France and England have favored them. Apparently both foreign partnerships feel that the manner of ending the war will help determine their rival positions in Spain after the war.

The Minorca incident disturbed Mussolini and Hitler. That's why Italian bombers raided the island, although arrangements for it to be peacefully turned over were about to be sealed. The totalitarians feared the receipt of Minorca on a British platter would put Franco under obligations to London. England's success at Port Mahon raised high hopes of a similar diplomatic coup in the Valencia-Madrid area, and the Anglo-French contacts with Casado may date from that time.

The Fascists throw armaments into the balance when they wish to win battles. France and England trust to political maneuvers and money. England precipitately recognized Franco, expecting that he would feel honored and forget his debt to Roman-Nazi intervention. France sends as ambassador to Burgos its most revered citizen, Marshal Pétain. Just candy for babies. No one nowadays respects those who humiliate themselves. Burgos replies by appointing to the Paris embassy a little-known, anti-French Falangist.

The hasty, unconditional recognition of Franco by the British and French had a great deal to do with Casado's outbreak. When Barcelona fell, the Loyalists realized that the war was lost and would soon end. On February 1 Negrin enunciated to the Cortes three conditions for the cessation of hostilities—national independence, a regime with popular support, and the promise of no reprisals; but within a week the British and French governments were informed that the republic was ready to reduce these to one—clemency. No reply to this démarche has ever been received.

Negrin and Del Vayo flew to central Spain after the collapse of Catalonia, not to prolong the war, but to organize resistance with the sole purpose of extorting the best possible peace terms from Franco. Perhaps it was a forlorn hope, but could Negrin just deliver thousands of valiant armed men to the Fascist hangman? Had he tried, he would have met with the same response that Casado got—fighting. Before they left Spain Communist leaders gave orders not to oppose Casado with arms. I know definitely that the Communist pilots were told by their chief not to move against Casado. But it would have been unnatural and un-Spanish for the men to obey. It is at least possible that some guaranties might have been obtained through Negrin's firm attitude. The difficulty of suppressing a few thousand brave Communists intrenched in isolated buildings and parks without benefit of preparation or coordination shows how costly it would have been for Franco to take a desperate, determined Madrid by storm. He might have counted the costs and come to terms, especially if England and France had insisted on clemency as a preliminary condition to recognition. But unconditional recognition was granted on February 27, and Casado rose on March 5. I suspect that many foreign powers knew at least a week in advance of his coming putsch. A foreign diplomat showed a foreign friend of mine in Madrid a list of members of the junta three days before its formation was announced to the world. Casado and the powers feared that further resistance would upset their plan of a peaceful surrender. Actually the rising against Negrin spoils the Anglo-French Minorca strategy by facilitating a violent Fascist occupation of the remaining Republican zone.

When Negrin discovered that most of the military opposed resistance, he availed himself only of officers who supported his policy whole-heartedly, and they were Communists. This precipitated the crisis. A powerful hatred of Communists had developed in Loyalist Spain. (I discussed this phenomenon from time to time during the war in my dispatches.) Defeatism and anti-communism are twin brothers. The longer the war lasted, the more some Loyalists despaired of a successful conclusion; therefore they abhorred the Communists, who had faith and tenacity. The Soviet Union's failure to send as many munitions as Germany and Italy sent was booked to the discredit of the Spanish Communists. Besides, the Communists made many enemies by their irritating attempts—which, as is now apparent, failed—to control important institutions. While the war was at its height, even the pessimists restrained their anti-red animus, but when all was clearly lost, their restraint disappeared. Had Negrin flown from doomed Barcelona to Madrid, he might have prevented an explosion of their passions, but he hoped for a moment to reestablish a line of defense in Catalonia, and when the later débâcle engulfed him he didn't get to Alicante until February 10. By then the bitter rage which comes with the imminence of an inescapable, crushing disaster had gained the upper hand. I suppose if a dying man were in possession of his strength and a gun, no one within reach would be safe. This is probably the psychological explanation of the Casadist adventure.

A defeat after so many lives have been lost and the country ruined must release boundless resentment. The Spaniards abroad will now proceed to cut one another's throats with denunciatory articles, books, and speeches. Services will be forgotten; the moral capital accumulated in the heroic struggle will be dissipated in an internecine war of mud-slingers. That has already begun. Each will proceed to explain how he would have saved the situation and why the others failed. What an end to a glorious struggle for freedom!

As a postscript, the Casadist junta has no status in law or in the Spanish constitution or in popular support. Negrin vehemently denies its right to pose as his government's successor. The closing of De Los Rios's embassy in Washington wouldn't hurt the Spanish Republic any more than keeping it open hurts Franco. This doesn't mean we should recognize Franco. Sixteen years elapsed between Kerensky's fall and Ambassador Bullitt's arrival in Moscow.

America in the Post-Munich World

IV. MOBILIZE FOR DEMOCRACY

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

THE PROBLEM OF THE MARGINAL FARMER

BY 1922 it was evident to American farmers that the biggest export boom ever known in this country had ended. Agriculture the world over was settling down to peace and hard times. But almost everyone assumed that crop exports would eventually come back, if only—horrible thought—with another war. No one suspected that Europe's next reversion to militarism would be made with the slogan "Guns or Butter," and that guns would win a complete and easy victory over wheat, corn, and other food products.

In 1922 militarism had faded, and the American farmer hoped that the peaceful New Europe would soon achieve prosperity and begin to absorb his products again. These products, though, must be taken at a high price if all of American agriculture was to prosper. For the European market was needed by just those farmers who could profit only when wheat sold at $1 a bushel and cotton at 13 cents a pound. Low-cost farmers do not need the European market to prosper; they can supply the domestic market at a profit even when prices dive far lower. But for the marginal farmer Europe offered the only hope, as it had for the past fifty years.

Some persons, however, suspected that all might not be well with the export trade. Was it, indeed, desirable at all, they asked, that the American farmer continue to be dependent upon exports, which have done far more to bankrupt him than his favorite bogy man, Wall Street? The ablest of this group was Henry A. Wallace, who argued that even when exports revive after a cycle of stagnation they don't balance the losses on agriculture's books. For, he wrote in Wallace's Farmer, "the history of the export trade in corn shows that Europe makes large purchases only when corn is selling for far less than it costs the American farmer to produce it. . . . Are we prepared to sacrifice ourselves in this way so that Europe will have enough cheap food to make it possible to maintain standing armies and to build battleships? . . . Is a big export trade on these conditions worth having?"

Today Europe has become so enmeshed in maintaining its armies and building its battleships that it is no longer able to take advantage even of below-cost corn. Yet Wallace the Secretary of Agriculture seems strangely to have lost the insight of Wallace the editor. American agriculture is still dependent upon the moribund European market. Instead of attempting to find a new outlet for it, governmental policies have subsidized the waste and the loss caused by the European collapse. First, at a pegged and artificial price the government has bought up the surpluses no longer wanted abroad. Then it has dumped them, pocketing the loss between the pegged price paid to the farmer and the much lower yield received from foreign purchasers. Finally, it has subsidized the withdrawal from production of land made marginal by the closing of the European market. We are paying, then, for what we export, for what we produce but do not export, and for what we do not even produce. We have spent a great deal of money, but it has not gone to solve our farm problem. Instead, we have underwritten the continuance of an outworn farm system on the theory that the European market would eventually return. And this there is absolutely no prospect of its doing. We have wasted our money and our time.

With the passing of the European market, the small, inefficient farmer, now becoming marginal, is facing occupational unemployment, and we cannot conceal the fact by keeping him on relief and trying to gear our price structure to his high cost of production. Not all the millions poured into farm relief have succeeded in bolstering prices: the high-cost farmer is not making his cost of production; he is not making anything but surpluses. And the surpluses depress the price. But while the marginal farmer and the surplus-ridden government suffer with each drop in price, the cost of food and clothing is still too high for the urban consumer—much too high to allow the great increase in consumption which would really begin to absorb existing surpluses.

If prices were to fall even farther, to a point where consumer demand would materially increase, that portion of agriculture which is modern and efficient would still be able to operate at a profit. Just as the big mass-production industrial units are the profitable ones, so the large-scale mechanized farms are the ones which pay. The earnings of how many small farms would have to be added together to equal the $1,500,000 earned in a recent year by Henry Ford's farm enterprises? Similarly, any number of great industrial organizations have found it profitable to satisfy their raw-material needs by intensive farm operations; and of course there are successful large independent farms.

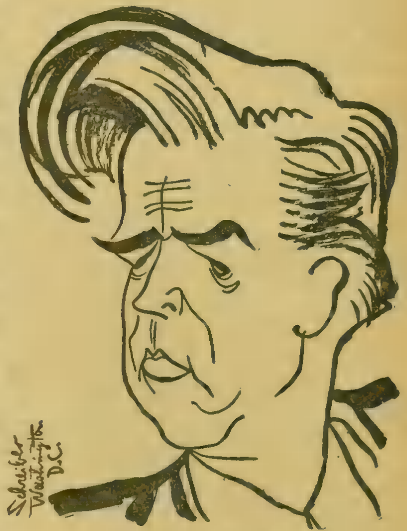
The high-cost, marginal farmer operates in the same way as the little fellow in industry. He gambles on price movements, hoping to make a price profit as well as an operating profit and trying to avoid suffering a price loss as well as an operating loss on the down side of the business cycle. If a large corporation gambles on price movements, it does so because it wants to, not because it has to. No matter what the commodity market may do, it has contracted for its supply well in advance. But it is precisely the farmer, the least prosperous entrepreneur in the community, who is forced to gamble on the most violent price movements in our economy. The corporate farm does not have to gamble; it can count on making a profit simply by producing crops. It can do this because it takes advantage of every development in farm technology. Thanks to mechanization, seeding, irrigation, modern fertilizers, rotation, soil treatment, animal husbandry, and so forth, an entirely new cost structure has been created by the top layer of American agriculture—American agricultural enterprise would be a more accurate term. With this application of mass-production methods of farming, the yield of the land has multiplied: hybrid corn, for example, with whose development the Secretary of Agriculture was associated, increases output per acre from 20 to 250 per cent.

Scientific practice has increased the nutritive output of corn and wheat land as much as five times, and has obtained yields of four and one-half to eight times the average crop of 1927-30. Professor B. W. Kunkel estimates that all grain and potatoes required by the United States can be raised on an acreage smaller than the total area of farms in Kansas. (Increased yield, due to technological progress, is the reason why all the acreage reduction effected by the AAA has not been able to reduce output.) The individual farmer must not only face the competition of low-cost, mass-production units, but must also see the productivity of his own land lessened by erosion and exhaustion. The technological revolution in agriculture, which is barely under way, is making both the farmer and his land unable to compete. The combination of export collapse and mass-production, low-cost farming has rendered millions of farmers and millions of acres of farm land superfluous.

REHABILITATING THE LAND IS THE ANSWER

This can be either a curse or a blessing. Here are four out of six million farm families occupationally unemployed, living on or close to a bare subsistence basis. We can keep these farmers on the land, gearing our farm prices to their costs, at the expense of the consumer; or we can realize that it is a fine thing for 4 million families, 15 to 18 million people, no longer to be needed on the farms. We can leave the task of feeding and clothing us to the relatively few farms which can produce cheaply, and which are already large-scale consumers of every type of work-making manufactured goods, from tractors to clothes and bread; and we can use the four million families for one of the most urgent jobs facing the country—for rehabilitating the land they have been working. Unless this land is reclaimed from erosion, put back to forest and pasture, made fit, in the South particularly, for dairy and truck farming, a first-rate catastrophe threatens the nation. We saw in the Dust Bowl what happens to defenseless land. And we know what happens to the people. Our economy cannot afford to have these people frozen out of its retail markets.

The labor force needed to do the work of salvage is already on location. No private agency can fight against drought and erosion and flood; only the government can do it. If we can buy protection against these menaces for only $2 billion a year, we may consider ourselves lucky. Putting our marginal and subsistence farmers to work on such a campaign will not of course employ all of the four million families. But they will be employed when the ultimate purpose of the campaign, the rehabilitation of the land for forest industry and dairy and stock farming, is accomplished.



Secretary Wallace

There is no reason why the government should carry the load alone. If the government restores the land, why should not industry contribute toward what is to be its own source of supply for raw materials? Once the land has again been made fit for productive use, why cannot the chemical companies buy and tend the new forest land which they need? And why cannot the dairy and packing companies raise herds on the newly created pasture land? Such supplementary private investment would go far toward putting on pay rolls this latest addition to our technologically unemployed. Meanwhile, by the absorption of these four million subsistence families into productive work, the retail market—and, not least, the retail market for food—would be considerably expanded.

Remember, too, that as soon as the marginal farmer no longer needs to be protected by pegged prices, technological progress can facilitate a really radical readjustment of the price structure. Dr. Isadore Lubin, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, has shown, for example, that an increase from $1,200 to $1,500 a year in family income creates a 66 per cent increase in the purchase of textiles by such families. The same increase can occur because of a reduction in price, and cheaper cotton and wood pulp would mean a reduction in the price of textiles. Lower meat and dairy prices would cause an even more sensational rise in food sales.

SALVATION IN PLANNED GROWTH

The next great task facing the nation is the rehabilitation of the exhausted land and its people. In order to do this, we must expand our economy. Retail sales in 1938, considered in terms of our 130,000,000 people, came to less than $300 a person. Actually, many millions of people never, or only rarely, enter the retail market. Unless these millions can be drawn to our markets, there is no hope that industry will conquer its tendency to overproduce, even at the present level. Here is an opportunity to use our agricultural crisis, and particularly the crisis of Southern agriculture, as a lever to force our economy into a period of planned growth. It was grasped and exhaustively described in "Save America First," one of the most seminal economic inquiries of recent years, by Jerome Frank, who was instrumental later as a New Dealer in arranging for the sensational study which appeared last autumn as the "Report on Economic Conditions of the South." Frank demonstrated conclusively that our economy can no longer depend on exports, that, in fact, we cannot export unless we subsidize foreign customers to take our surpluses. We did it by loans during the twenties, and we are doing it now by permitting them to unload their sterile gold on us. Writing before Munich, Frank anticipated the rapid closing of the small European market left to us and warned that we might be tempted to precipitate economic war with smaller countries in this hemisphere for the remnants. He urged, instead, that we recognize that our salvation as a democracy —indeed, that the salvation of democracy—depends upon our ability to expand the scale of our domestic economy. His program of economic reconstruction begins with the immediate problem of agriculture in the South and the Dust Bowl and embraces railroads, utilities, housing, and hemispheric trade in a way that is broad and practical enough really to start government and private capital forward on the road to genuine revival.

Exactly how great this revival must be to solve our national unemployment problem has been roughly estimated by Louis Bean, economic adviser to the AAA. (Much of the most illuminating analysis in Washington comes from Henry Wallace's office.) Bean assumes that by 1945 we shall have an employable population of 46,000,000. To absorb them he estimates that we shall have to have a volume of production far above the 1929 figure of 116 on the Federal Reserve Board Index, running, indeed, to a level around 160. Now if 116 could not be sustained in 1929, 160 is visionary today, when we have suffered from overproduction at a level of 105. Moreover, technical advance in production methods has already outmoded the old scale of values, and if such advance continues at a rate as rapid as that of the past nine years, it may be that Bean has set his production rate necessary for complete employment too low. For example, although 1938 was not a year of great capital investment in the automobile industry, the opening of the new-model year in November-December found production running 20 per cent ahead of the previous year, with the number of men employed the same as in 1937. It is inevitable that industries which have been technologically stagnant for a generation, like building and textiles, should be completely remade during the next few years—at least, if Bean's production level is reached. These developments already exist in embryo in the laboratory.

MORE SPENDING, NOT LESS

The experience of the past few years, as I said, seems to prove such a production level visionary. But before we put it aside as impossible let us consider whether the fault may not lie rather in the practice of the recent past than in the Frank-Bean production schedule itself. If we examine the program of government spending that the New Deal has put into effect, and defended so firmly, we find that it has been almost completely self-defeating —entirely so in the years since 1936. In 1937 government cash income virtually balanced cash spending, so that there was no cash contribution to purchasing power; the 1936 cash contribution had been nearly $4 billion. Spending that is balanced by tax collection has no real effect on purchasing power; at present taxes on consumption have increased to a point where they take a 13 per cent toll of income available to purchase goods. Remember that during the two war years, when our economy really climbed to a mass-production basis, government contribution was $11 billion a year.

Today when we need an increase in production quite as revolutionary as that of the war years, in order to absorb the unemployed in the city and on the farm, investment in capital goods is lagging $10 billion behind the $23 billion invested in 1929, although to support a production rate that will put our people back to work, it should stand at least $10 billion higher. Industry is simply stagnating at a level that is unprofitable for all but the greatest and most efficient companies. Obsolescence is mounting. All that the present self-defeating level of government spending can do is to perpetuate this unsatisfactory state of affairs. What we need is the financial equivalent of war—an increase in government contribution striking enough to employ our resources.

If, as I suggested in my last article, government and private capital between them could invest $3 billion to $4 billion in industrialization for Latin America, a good beginning would be made. Sooner or later the government will have to spend $2 billion a year at least on land reclamation. If this can be done in cooperation with corporations investing an additional $2 billion in forest and herd culture, we shall begin to approach the necessary $10 billion annual investment increase required to give us a fighting chance for real recovery.

On top of such basic investment, supplementary underwriting by governmental agencies, preferably in partnership with private capital, will doubtless have to be undertaken in order to permit modernization and expansion of thousands of small enterprises. Today they are hopelessly inefficient; and they can get no new money, at present. But they could use $2 billion of new private capital a year for reorganization, underwritten if necessary by the government—as is the FHA, which has spent no money but stimulated the investment of a billion.

All such measures would only begin to solve our unemployment problem, and so to make our democracy secure against fascism. At least an additional $5 billion or $6 billion of investment money a year would still be needed to accomplish it, and only private capital could provide this. We must recognize frankly that fascism threatens to become the only political alternative to a successful democratic attack, by public and private capital, on the problems of unemployment and stagnation. With such a program of rehabilitation, reemployment, and contribution to purchasing power the New Deal could safely say to business, "We will see that the people are fed; you take the risks." With the goal no longer the self-defeating one of "balance" but the dynamic one of contribution, taxes could be reduced both on consumption and on capital. Once contribution of this magnitude had had its effect, and declining tax rates had increased both consumption and investment, the national income would really rise to an adequate level. Even with lower tax rates an increased national income would provide increased tax revenue, sufficient finally to permit government debt formed in the recovery-financing period to be written off—something the Republicans did not do during the boom days of the twenties.

All that remains to be said is that this program to mobilize our men and resources for peace, as fascism mobilizes them for war, cannot wait. But if our economic aid to fascism stops, if our foreign trade is redirected into hemispheric and domestic channels, if our farm problem is faced and solved, if reemployment is achieved, Roosevelt and democracy can still win.

[This is the fourth and last article in Mr. Janeway's series. The others appeared in the issues of January 28, February 4, and March 4.]

Power Dams and Politics

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Bonneville, Oregon, March 7

NEW ENGLAND'S six Republican governors are taking heroic measures to protect their people from the tyranny of the federal government's flood-control and power program. No New Deal dams across the rivers of Vermont and Massachusetts shall destroy the liberty won by the Founding Fathers.

On the other side of the continent such valiant defenders of freedom are missing. There the citizenry is meekly submissive. The people of the Pacific Northwest are going to submit to the thraldom of paying $2.25 for 100 kilowatt-hours of electricity from Bonneville Dam. In the Vermont capital of Montpelier, where Governor George D. Aiken bravely invokes the doctrine of states' rights against President Roosevelt's dam-building plans, the inhabitants enjoy the liberty of being billed $5.23 for the same amount of juice. Shopkeepers in the Oregon town of Eugene are to be subjected to a commercial rate of $13.53 for 750 kilowatt-hours of Bonneville power distributed municipally. Montpelier's business men shall be preserved from this servitude; they can go right on paying at the rate of $40.50.

The issue of hydroelectric power reduces to a sham G. O. P. protestations of internal harmony. It splits the Republican Party like a wedge. Governor Aiken, as quoted in the New York Times, believes that the New Deal would "break down the structure of the states under the cloak of flood control and of cheap-power development." Herbert Hoover in New York last month insisted that the dams constructed by the federal government were wasteful. "We build them," he said, "by the impulse of Congress, not by the impulse for low-cost power." All along the Atlantic seaboard Republicans are militantly opposed to federal power projects. The Congressional Record is filled with New England weeping about local government and the sovereignty of the states.

Out West the story is slightly different. "I've got to give Charlie his dam," said the President when he signed the authorization for the great $75,000,000 barrier at Bonneville. "Charlie" is Senator Charles L. McNary of Oregon, the Republican Senate leader and the party's shrewdest strategist on Capitol Hill. McNary's stand on power is practically the same as that of Senator Lewis Schwellenbach of Washington, one of the most aggressive New Dealers. Together they successfully sponsored a bill to set aside at least half the Bonneville hydroelectricity for public agencies. When McNary was reelected in 1936 his championing of Bonneville Dam formed the principal plank of his platform. Every Republican from the Columbia Basin states voted to support Senator Norris's plea for a new TVA dam at Gilbertsville.

From the Rockies to the Pacific Coast this situation prevails. The supposed Republican blood-brothers of Governor Aiken and Herbert Hoover are whooping it up for the President's power program with no regard for tranquillity in the family. Charles A. Sprague, the new Republican Governor of Oregon, recently delivered an address on public power which was termed "magnificent" by J. D. Ross, the administrator of Bonneville Dam. Sprague is now advocating additional legislation to get Bonneville juice to the people via "public-utility districts." When Glenn Frank spoke in the Pacific Northwest a few weeks ago, he was warned not to criticize the New Deal's power and reclamation projects. Colonel Knox did that at Spokane in 1936, and newspapers and politicians in the region raced each other to the exits of the Republican encampment. At the last election G. O. P. candidates not only demonstrated their enthusiasm for Bonneville and Grand Coulee but said they wanted the government to build another dam at Umatilla Rapids.

George Schreiber

Senator McNary

There is a reason for all this. Republican leaders do not swallow the New Deal brew because they personally approve the flavor. The taste of the voters generally governs. Compare the Bonneville objective rates with those in New England and New York, where dwell the Republicans most hostile to Mr. Roosevelt's flood-control, power, and reclamation projects:

	100 kwh.	250 kwh.	500 kwh.
Bonneville	$2.25	$4.75	$6.25
TVA	2.50	5.00	6.90
New York City......	4.70	7.95	12.95
Boston	5.10	9.60	12.50
Montpelier	5.23	9.48	11.98

When Hoover ridiculed the notion of low-cost power from New Deal dams, he spoke in a New York hotel which pays more than double the Bonneville rate for electricity. The federal projects on the Columbia River have had a terrific impact on the whole Northwest. While Bonneville and Grand Coulee have risen block on block across the country's swiftest waterway, private utilities in the area have reduced rates as much as 15 per cent. The Portland General Electric Company has certified the low cost of Bonneville juice by announcing that it wants to buy power from the government and thus pass on substantial savings to its customers. When Mr. Roosevelt moved into the White House only 31 per cent of the farms in Idaho and Oregon had electricity. Today the figures for the two states are 55 and 50 per cent.

Money talks; the storekeeper in Klamath Falls is interested to learn that the electricity which costs him $35 from the California-Oregon Power Company can be had in Eugene for $13.53 from Bonneville Dam. Massachusetts housewives might view Governor Leverett Saltonstall's hostility to federal power projects in New England with something less than enthusiasm if they knew they paid more than twice the Bonneville Dam rate to light their homes.

Bonneville Dam is completed now and ready to produce electricity. Grand Coulee will be finished about 1941. Already twenty-five "public-utility districts" have been organized in the state of Washington. Similar units will be formed in Oregon. One of the obstacles to this development is that the districts have to obtain the money for financing the work in the general bond market. They have to turn to promoters, salesmen, and investment bankers to get started. This has aroused considerable criticism. Secretary Ickes, Ben Cohen, and other New Dealers are said to favor loans of RFC money to the districts. Some members of the Washington State Grange have approached Jesse Jones on this matter with no definite result. Incidentally, although the Grange nationally is conservative, its chapters in Washington, Oregon, and Idaho are overwhelmingly for public ownership of utilities and the federal government's power program.

The governors of the New England states do not seem especially concerned that electricity in their region costs two and three times as much as at Bonneville Dam. Testifying before the House Flood Control Committee last year, Governor Aiken was asked if he thought federal power projects "would result in the reduction of the cost of electricity to consumers in Vermont":

> GOVERNOR AIKEN: I do not know.
> CONGRESSMAN CLASON: You never looked into that?
> GOVERNOR AIKEN: No.

One of the most remarkable men in American public life, James Delmage Ross, is supervising the New Deal's drive to cut the price of power to the people of the Far West. For thirty years he has been superintendent of the municipal light plant in Seattle. His power project on the Skagit River is the biggest hydroelectric undertaking in the United States outside those owned by the federal government. Once a conservative mayor fired Ross. The voters of Seattle immediately recalled the mayor, and Ross was reinstated. He is a tradition in the Northwest.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

Famous throughout the country is the $4.05 vacation he offers to the people of Seattle in conjunction with the Skagit River plant. For that sum he provides a week-end in the mountains, with room, board, railroad transportation, and entertainment included.

Since the President authorized Bonneville and Grand Coulee, no Republican who failed to support these projects enthusiastically has been elected to public office in the Columbia River basin. Even chambers of commerce make pilgrimages to the huge structures. Business men want cheap power, too. Republican newspapers in New England may believe that Governor Aiken has saved Vermont from federal tyranny, but the Republican Spokesman-Review of Spokane and the Oregonian of Portland have published special editions devoted to Mr. Roosevelt's dams on the Columbia River. Unless the G. O. P. platform makers next year combine the talents of Houdini and Talleyrand they will have difficulty in satisfying both Republicans in the East, who insist New Deal power projects are despotism, and Republicans in the West, of whom the President was thinking when he said, "I've got to give Charlie his dam."

Living Philosophies

XI. THE PURSUIT OF FREEDOM*

BY JACQUES MARITAIN

IT WAS after my conversion to Catholicism that I made the acquaintance of Saint Thomas. After my "passionate pilgrimage" among all the doctrines of modern philosophers, in whom I had discovered nothing but disenchantment and splendid uncertainties, I felt, as it were, an illumination of the reason. My vocation as philosopher became clear to me. And through thirty years of work and combat I have followed in this path, with a feeling that I could understand more completely the gropings, the discoveries, and the travail of modern thought as I tried to throw upon them the light of a wisdom which, resisting the fluctuations of time, has been worked out through the centuries.

In order to advance along this way we are constantly obliged to bring together singularly distant extremes, for no solution of our problems can be found ready-made in the legacy of the ancients. We are also obliged to make the difficult separation between the pure substance of those truths which many "moderns" reject as a mere jumble of the opinions of the past, and the dross of prejudice, worn-out expressions, and arbitrary constructions which many "traditionalists" confuse with that which really deserves intellectual veneration.

In the Middle Ages philosophy was usually treated as an instrument in the service of theology. Culturally, it was not in the state required by its nature. The coming of a philosophical or profane wisdom which had completed its own formulation, for itself and according to its own finalities, responded therefore to a historical necessity. But unfortunately this was accomplished under the emblem of separatism and a sectarian rationalism; Descartes separated philosophy from all higher wisdom, from everything in man which comes from above man. I am certain that what the world and civilization have lacked for three centuries has been a philosophy which would have developed its autonomous exigencies in a Christian climate, a wisdom of reason not closed but open to the wisdom of grace. Reason must battle today with an irrational deification of elemental and instinctive forces which threaten to ruin the whole of civilization. In this struggle reason's task is one of integration; understanding that the intelligence is not the enemy of mystery but rather lives by it, it must reenter into communication with the irrational world of instinct, as with the world of the will, of liberty, and of love, and with the supra-rational world of grace and the Divine Life.

The pursuit of supreme contemplation and the pursuit of supreme liberty are two aspects of the same thing. In the order of the spiritual life man aspires to perfect and absolute freedom, and therefore to a superhuman state. The men of wisdom of all times have given evidence of this. The function of the law is one of protection and education of liberty, the function of a pedagogue. At the conclusion of this tutelage the perfect man is freed from every servitude, even, St. Paul says, from the servitude of the law, because he does spontaneously what the law demands and is one spirit with the Creator.

The pursuit of liberty is still, to my way of thinking, at the bottom of the social and political problem. But here, in the order of temporal life, it is not a divine liberty which is the object of our desires but rather a liberty proportionate to the state of man and to the natural possibilities of his earthly existence. We must make no mistake about the nature of the object thus pursued. It is not simply the protection of free will in each of us, nor is it the liberty of power of the social community.

---

* Translated by Fenton Moran.

It is the liberty of expansion of the human beings which make up a people and participate in its virtues. Organized society is intended to develop conditions of life in common which, while insuring first of all advantages and peace to the whole, help each person in a positive manner progressively to obtain that freedom of expansion which consists above all in the flowering of moral and rational life. So justice and love are the very foundations of the life of society, which places truly human advantages above all manner of material advantages, technical progress, and the implements of power. I believe historical conditions and the yet inferior state of development of humanity make it difficult for organized society fully to reach its objective, and that in respect to the possibilities which the Gospel develops in us and the demands it makes on us in the social-temporal domain, we are still in a prehistoric age. As we can see today in the psychoses of the masses which adore Stalin or Hitler, or dream of exterminating certain classes which they consider diabolical, such as "the reds" or "the fascists," or "the Jews," human collectivities bear such a burden of animality, easily inclined to morbidity, that it will take centuries still for human personality to be able to take on among the masses the breadth of life to which it aspires. We can see, then, that the objective toward which organized society tends is the common advantage of the multitude procured in such a manner that the individual person, not only the one belonging to a privileged class but all members of the mass, may truly reach that measure of independence which is proper to civilized life and which is insured by the economic guaranties of work and property, political rights, civic virtues, and cultivation of the mind.

These conceptions belong to a wider general view which seems to me most fittingly designated by the term "integral humanism," and which involves a whole philosophy of modern history. In the social-temporal order it does not call on man to sacrifice himself for any imperialism, be it of the race, of the class, or of the nation. It calls upon him to sacrifice himself to a better life for his brothers and to the concrete good of the community of human beings. Thus it can only be a heroic humanism.

It has often been remarked that middle-class liberalism, which tries to base everything on the individual considered as a little god and on his gracious pleasure, on absolute freedom of property, commerce, and the pleasures of life, must inevitably lead to a despotic paternalism of the state. Communism may be regarded as a reaction against this individualism. It claims to lead to the absolute release of man, who is supposed to become the god of history, but in reality this release, presuming that it were accomplished, would be that of man taken collectively, not of the individual. Society as an economic community would enslave the whole life of the person, because economic functions would become the essential work of civil society instead of serving the liberty of expansion of the person. We already see in Russia that what is represented as the release of man taken collectively means the enslavement of all individuals. As for the anti-communist and anti-individualist reactions of the totalitarian or dictatorial type, it is not in the name of the social community or of the liberty of man considered collectively but in the name of the sovereign dignity of the state, or of the spirit of a people, or of a race and blood, that they would turn man over bodily to a social entity in which the person of the chief is the only one to enjoy, properly speaking, the privileges of a human personality. This is why totalitarian states, having need of the entire devotion of persons for whom they have neither feeling nor respect, inevitably seek to find a principle of human exaltation in myths of external grandeur and in the never-ending struggle for power and prestige. By its very nature this leads to war and the self-destruction of the civilized community. If there are churchmen who count on dictatorships of this kind to promote the religion of Christ and Christian civilization, they forget that the totalitarian phenomenon is an aberrant religious phenomenon in which a kind of earthly mysticism devours every other sort of mysticism and will tolerate no other one besides itself.

Confronted with bourgeois liberalism, communism, and totalitarianism, what we need is a new solution, at the same time personalistic and communal, which views human society as the organization of liberties. We are thus led to a conception of democracy differing fundamentally from that of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, which we might call "pluralist," because it requires that the state insure the organic liberties of the different spiritual families and the different social bodies assembled within it, beginning with the natural basic community, the family. The tragedy of modern democracies is that under the appearances of an error—the deification of a fictitious individual closed to all realities from above—they have sought something good, the expansion of the personality open to realities from above and to the common service of justice and friendship. Our personalist democracy is really inconceivable without those super-elevations which nature and temporal civilizations receive, in their own order, from the energies of the Christian leaven.

I am certain that the coming of such a democracy, which presupposes class antagonism overcome, requires that we go beyond both capitalism and socialism, which are tainted by a materialistic conception of life.

We shall never give up the hope of a new Christendom, of a new temporal order inspired by Christianity. Now if it is true that the means must correspond to the end and are themselves the end, as it were, in the state of formation and preparation, it is then clear that in order to prepare a Christian social order, Christian means are needed, that is to say, means which are animated, even when they are perforce harsh, by a true spirit of love.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

The present state of the nations obliges us to record that never have the mind and the spirit been so thoroughly rebuffed in the world. In the end, however, pessimism is always the victim of its own deceit. It disregards the great law which might be called the law of the double-energy movement of history. While the wear and tear of time naturally dissipates and degrades the things of this world and the energy of history, the creative forces which are characteristic of the spirit and of liberty, and are also their witness, and which normally find their point of application in the effort of the few—destined thereby to sacrifice—constantly revitalize the quality of this energy. Such is the work accomplished in history by the sons of God; such is the work of Christians if they do not give the lie to their name.

This work is not understood at all if it is imagined that it claims to be able to set up a state in the world from which all evil and all injustice would be banished. Naturally, on this ground it would be too easy, in view of the results obtained, stupidly to dismiss Christians as Utopians. What the Christian has to do is to maintain and increase in the world an internal tension and that movement of slow and painful delivery which comes from the invisible powers of truth and justice, goodness and love, acting upon the mass in opposition to them. Woe to the world should the Christians turn their back on it, should they fail to do their job, which is to heighten here on earth the charge and tension of spirituality; should they listen to those blind leaders of the blind who seek the means to order and to good in things which are in their very nature dissolution and death.

One of the gravest lessons we learn from the experience of life is that in the practical behavior of most of us all those things which are in themselves good—science, technical progress, culture, the knowledge of moral laws, and even religious faith itself, faith in the living God (in the civil war in Spain the inhuman feelings which have swept over "crusaders" and "reds" both have demonstrated what we are saying)—all these things, without love and good-will, only serve to make men more wicked and more unhappy. This is because, without love and charity, man turns into evil the best that is in him.

Once we have understood this, we put our hope here on earth only in that good-will of which the Gospel speaks, in the obscure strength of a bit of real goodness which brings forth life without cease in the most hidden recesses of things. Nothing is more destitute, nothing is more secret, nothing is nearer to the weakness of childhood. And there is no more fundamental, no more effective wisdom than a simple and tenacious confidence—not in the weapons of force and cleverness and malice, which, though they always triumph at the outset, a grain of sand suffices to ruin—but in the resources of personal courage and good-will. Through this kind of lightness of heart flows the force of nature and of the Author of nature.

In the Wind

TO MANY newspapers the false report of a clash between French and Italian troops on the Tunisian border, with eighty-four killed, was headline news; a few treated it gingerly; and the CBS news broadcasters deliberately played it down. The most novel handling of the story was by the Louisville Times, which interviewed American army men and reported their skepticism of the report. They cited expectancy tables to show that if 84 men were killed, there must have been from 375 to 500 wounded, and almost 10,000 soldiers engaged. If a battle of that magnitude had been fought, they concluded, there would have been a good deal more news and less vagueness in the February 22 dispatches. They were right.

AFTER DEMOCRATIC and Republican chieftains in the House had announced where their respective caucuses would be held, Vito Marcantonio, lone American Labor Party Congressman, took the floor. He announced that his party's caucus would be held in a telephone booth on the main floor.

THE RESULTS of a certain recent Gallup poll received significantly little press comment. The survey showed that three out of four voters had never read or heard about the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee, a token of the meager publicity given the hearings. In contrast, two out of three knew about the Dies committee; yet the La Follette committee has been functioning two years longer than the Dies committee.

IN THE course of the current Guild strike the Chicago Hearst papers have lost more than $500,000 in advertising revenue. . . . The Colorado legislature has set up a "little Dies committee" to probe "reds" in the state. . . . Money is being raised on the West Coast to finance broadcasts by Father Coughlin over stations there. . . . The new issue of High Time, published monthly by Communist employees of Time, Inc., reports that readers are using subscription cards—postage prepaid—to urge that the company use union printers. . . . William Pelley's fascist weekly Liberation solemnly reports that plans are on foot for the impeachment of President Roosevelt.

ANXIOUS TO reassure its American customers, J. Tanaka and Company, a Japanese seed company, prefaces its English catalogue with this announcement:

> OUR SEED GROWING DOES NOT DAMAGED
> BY THE CHINO-JAPANESE DIFFICULTY
>
> From some letters recently received from our oversea's customers, we are anxious that some of our friends are considering that our many stuffs were going to war, and our business were rotten, so we have to inform you that no one members of our stuffs has been going to the Chinese war, and also the war only doing in China. . . . In our country real peace coming at all times, as Japanese are lovers of PEACE. . . . If you have been received another reports from newspaper they are all demagogues whoppers from Chinese side.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TWO comments on the German situation which have come to my attention lately have impressed me. One of them was in an article by Anne O'Hare McCormick—who, by the way, is doing fine work in the field of correspondence, better than almost anyone else—printed in the New York Times on March 4. She speaks of the mystery of Germany, which, she says, "deepens as you try to penetrate it. It is like a machine geared to top speed and running away. Nowhere in Europe is there anything like this motion, this tension, this fever of tearing down and building up. Berlin is in a turmoil of work and change. Everybody hurries and pushes, as people used to do in New York." That we have heard from others, but the significant thing in this article is that she can throw no light whatever upon who runs the machine. "To some destination," she says, "it is running at ever-increasing speed. But who decides where?" She says it is not Hitler, and she does not credit Göring with it, though he has developed great drive and executive ability. The bulk of the Nazi hierarchy is composed of "commonplace men, agitators who rattle around in their big jobs and live in their big expropriated mansions." Who is supplying the brains and the vision for what is indubitably an extraordinary administrative and creative undertaking?

I am sorry that Mrs. McCormick could not answer the question, because I have been asking it myself for several years. Germany has developed in the most extraordinary way since Hitler came in—on the physical side. The very face of the country is being made over. Berlin is being reconstructed on a huge scale and, as Mrs. McCormick testifies, practically overnight. When we think how long it takes us to get a PWA job going, to read that a suburban road in Berlin which last year curved through a deep forest is now lined with enormous apartment houses makes us wonder how it can be achieved with such speed. It takes, of course, not only amazing planning and a tremendous drive in construction never before associated with German industry, but also quick decisions and most elaborate allocation of the funds available. If this were being done by a humane and decent government, interested in benefiting all humanity and leading the world along the roads of justice and peace and good-fellowship, it would be really a wonder of the time. As it is, the explanation is the more difficult to obtain when one realizes how cast down and discouraged Germany was in the first fifteen years of the republic. Again one asks, Whence this sudden tremendous burst of creative energy?

Not that the republic did not do many remarkable things. Some of them I summarized in my book "The German Phenix." There was constructive work of a high order from 1918 to 1933, but it was not spectacular and, being decent and humane, naturally did not attract the attention of the world as have the brutalities of Hitler. Undoubtedly the republic lacked a showman, someone to dramatize its acts, to use the spotlight and the massing of flags and all the rest. Still that lack alone does not explain the difference, and one must wait eagerly for Mrs. McCormick or someone else to discover finally whence has come the present great impulse of the German nation, albeit along such utterly mistaken lines so far as human liberty and respect for laws and obligations are concerned.

The other thing that has impressed me is the following extract from a letter of a German woman who waited until she got out of Germany to write me of her horror at what has been happening there and to assure me that she had not met a single person in Germany who did not react to the pogrom of November 10 with the utmost "shame and disgust." She criticizes a great deal and envies me that I can speak out freely against what has happened. Then she declares that while millions of Germans protest against this phase or that of the Hitler regime, there is, on the other hand, "not one German who does not have the feeling that he is being used, that he is cooperating in a great undertaking, that something is happening, that things are being done, and that is something beautiful and it gives us a feeling of security not easily described." All of which is indubitably true; it will make the reaction in Germany frightful when the present illusion passes, when the whole truth is told and the national balance sheet totaled up with the crimes on one side and the physical achievements on the other.

All of which makes me mourn all the more that there has been no one connected with Mr. Roosevelt who could dramatize the great achievements of the New Deal; Mr. Roosevelt himself has failed utterly to make the country realize that it has been cooperating in a great undertaking, that something tremendous has been happening, and that taking part in it is a beautiful and inspiring experience. If people could only visualize all that has been done and recognize how much the physical plant alone has been improved, they could bear the New Deal's tremendous failures with greater resignation.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Nazi Koran

MEIN KAMPF. Complete, Unabridged, Fully Annotated. By Adolf Hitler. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

MEIN KAMPF. Complete, Unauthorized, Unexpurgated. By Adolf Hitler. Stackpole Sons. $3.

"THE true test of faith," declared an early church father, "is to believe what is absurd." Every creed fascinates the faithful by an impressive gallery of heroes and saints and an elaborately verbalized mumbo-jumbo. Every creed requires a Sacred Book, preferably written by the Prophet, ostensibly inspired from on high, and invariably ponderous, bulky, difficult to read, obscure and ambiguous in its meanings, and heavily compounded of platitudes, homely wisdom, folklore, and mystic visions of tribal genesis, cosmic battle, and millennial salvation.

"Mein Kampf," acknowledged bible of National Socialism, follows the prescription closely. In the tradition of other seers, Hitler began the work in prison and dedicated it to the "martyrs" of the Beer Hall Putsch. Unlike "Das Kapital," it is devoid of intellectual content or any pretense of rationality. Unlike the Jewish and Christian sacred writings, it is devoid of poetic beauty or ethical catholicity, for its only song is that of fierce tribal fanaticism. Its author lays no direct claim to divine inspiration. But the pagan deity of Deutschtum glares malevolently from every page. This Giver of the Word belongs in the ranks of Mahomet, Joseph Smith, and Mary Baker Eddy in that he became the Leader of millions of converts during his lifetime. "Mein Kampf" differs from most holy writ in that it is vicious, vulgar, and violent. These qualities, however, are but a measure of that cultural degradation of which Hitlerism is the most complete contemporary expression.

This was not a work meant to convert alien infidels to fascism. Its appeal is only to Deutschtum and, within Deutschtum, only to the debased and debauched Bürgertum which found its soul by losing its mind. Der Führer has consequently opposed any full English or French translations. Anglo-Saxon heathenry has hitherto had no access to this scripture, except in the diluted and condensed translation by E. T. S. Dugdale issued here in 1933 by Houghton Mifflin. Now, by way of compensation, two full translations are made available simultaneously. Reynal and Hitchcock went to press by arrangement with Houghton Mifflin. They promise "profits to the refugees." Stackpole Sons asked for no authorization, on the assumption that Hitler's shift from Austrian to German citizenship in 1932 furnishes a legal loophole under copyright agreements. From either volume curious pagans may now discover what the faithful Nazi believes and what manner of man the Führer once conceived himself to be.

As for the merits of the two versions, both offer competent translations of Hitler's crude German. Both were rushed into print at top speed. Both lack an index, though Reynal and Hitchcock promise one in the second printing. The Stackpole edition, with a preface by Ludwig Lore, has fewer pages but is larger in format and bulk. Reynal and Hitchcock offer as special attractions a sketch map; an introduction by a distinguished editorial board; a topical table of contents; an appendix of early party posters; the text of the party program of 1920; and numerous historical and analytical notes.

Most readers will doubtless peruse these pages in the hope of finding answers to the perennial question: What will Hitler do next? They will not be disappointed, for the Leader follows his blueprint closely. His general objectives, domestic and foreign, are set forth as frankly as his prejudices, his background, his propaganda technique, his racial mythology, his megalomania, and his views of the nature of the world and of man. And in the light of current hopes and fears in Paris and London, it is worthy of note that Hitler's Drang nach Osten and his promised crusade against Moscow were postulated upon a supposition that has not materialized—that is, the "disintegration" of the Russian state under the impact of the "Jewish ferment of decomposition"—and that the prerequisite of eastward expansion was (and still is) an alliance with Italy and Britain to bring about the "annihilation" of France. This objective also bids fair to be realized.

What is missing in "Mein Kampf" is as important as what is present. Here are the symbols by which Hitler recruited a mass following among psychotic little men. But the other, and more significant, half of fascist strategy is not here revealed. When he completed the second volume of this work, Hitler already knew that he could count upon his enemies and future victims to rescue him. But he could scarcely anticipate that he would be put into power by precisely those Germans whom he was sworn to destroy, nor could he quite guess that the Third Reich would be granted hegemony over Europe by the very democratic powers he was pledged to annihilate. Hitler's best allies have ever been those who have actively aided him to consummate their own ruin under the delusion that he was thereby "saving" them from a worse fate. Fascism can be stopped only by force. But the élite of the decadent West have consistently refused to use force, not out of fear that they would lose in a contest of arms, but out of fear that they would win! Whom the gods would destroy they first induce to save the savior who is in reality their own nemesis.

This suicidal mania is the counterpart and complement of Hitler's neuroses and his sadistic drive toward omnipotence. "Mein Kampf" is half the record of the psychopathology of the twentieth century. The other half is not thus conveniently available in a single volume. But those with eyes to see will find much of clinical interest in the words and deeds of such "statesmen" as Blum, Laval, Londonderry, Chamberlain, Eden, Bonnet, and Daladier. Thanks to them the absurdities of "Mein Kampf" are successively translated into fact. And, since it is later than we think and it is already happening here, two names may be added to the roll of dishonor: Sumner Welles and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Chinese and Spaniards will understand why they deserve inclusion.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

The Scientist and the World

DOCTOR ADDAMS. By Irving Fineman. Random House. $2.50.

IN 1650, when England had beheaded a king and was in the throes of revolution, William Harvey, who had published his famous treatise on the circulation of the blood twenty-two years before, was asked "if all were well with him." "How can that he," he replied, "when the state is so agitated with storms and I myself am yet in the open sea?" Sir Isaac Newton, whose long life was as fully occupied with pure science as any man's before or since, served in Parliament on three different occasions, was active in a dispute between Cambridge University and the crown, was for the last thirty-three years of his life warden and then master of the mint, and was president of the Royal Society for twenty-five years.

This random information will nevertheless indicate that the problem of the scientist's relation to the world of affairs, with which Mr. Fineman occupies himself in his new novel, is by no means a new one. We are too prone to think of the contemporary world as somehow unique. When we read that Mr. Fineman's book is in the direct tradition of "Arrowsmith," but that it is concerned with "pressing problems that did not even exist when Sinclair Lewis's character was created" we may doubt. If this statement has any truth, it is only in a superficial way. The problem of socialized medicine is perhaps new; but race prejudice is as old as history; and the scientist's difficulties with respect to love and marriage, which is Mr. Fineman's other theme, are hardly peculiar to our own times.

Dr. Addams is a biophysicist in the pay of a large foundation doing research on the subject of procreation in all its manifestations. The foundation itself, depending for its support on the capricious attention of wealthy men, is blown upon by all the winds of current doctrine and superstition. Jews who work for it are likely to have a hard time; "radicals" are suspect; doctors who prefer to do their work, whether it be clinical or in research, in "groups" sooner or later get into trouble. Dr. Addams prefers his laboratory to contact with patients outside it. He is performing experiments which may be of the greatest ultimate benefit to mankind; but he refuses to concern himself with improving society so that his scientific results can be the more readily put into practice. While the medical congress at which he is a lecturer is torn apart by discussions of socialized medicine, he goes on writing abstruse mathematical equations on the blackboard before a steadily diminishing group of listeners.

All this is interesting and highly pertinent not only as a contemporary problem but as a continuing struggle between the present and the future, between theory and practice, between man's unhappy body, which needs food as well as healing, and his restless mind. Mr. Fineman has stated the problem with the most impressive documentation, with scientific data which are as fascinating as they are sometimes difficult to read; his characters illustrate the variations in his argument and at the same time are recognizable men in a recognizable world. His Doctor Addams is a likable fellow, credible as a scientist and as a perplexed human being.

The conflict between science and the world, however, is not his only trouble. The other is love. Most of Mr. Fineman's doctors are troubled by love. It is perhaps unfair to hold an author responsible for the description on the jacket of his book. But when we read of these characters that "scientific knowledge has freed them from moral restraints" we may not only doubt but smile. It is as if we were to say, "My knowledge of French has cured my indigestion." Dr. Addams, as is certainly not surprising, finds that his scientific knowledge and his love affairs do not seem to have much to do with each other. His marriage is not a success; his subsequent "free" relationship with a woman who is combined lover, nurse, and mother is not a success either. Mr. Fineman's scientific conversations, esoteric as many of them are, are nevertheless unfailingly interesting. His conversations about love are interesting only if you like that sort of thing and like a lot of it. His heroine who learns about life, love, and herself by going to bed with most of her medical colleagues and then by marrying one of them in order to have children and a proper family life has appeared in fiction before, though never perhaps in as much detail. She is Woman, the helpmeet, the healer, man's solace and restorer. As a person, despite Mr. Fineman's evident care, she hardly exists. Compared to the head of the medical foundation, a niggling fellow who plays politics because he has not the strength to do anything else, or even to the perturbed Dr. Addams himself, or his humanistic New England father, she has about as much life as a sheet of decorative blotting-paper or a feather-bed.

In "Dr. Addams," in short, science and society are absorbing, love is pretty much of a bore. Which is no reason why an adult reader cannot read it with both pleasure and profit. DOROTHY VAN DOREN

The Road That Led to Munich

BETRAYAL IN CENTRAL EUROPE. By G. E. R. Gedye. Harper and Brothers. $3.

EUROPE IN RETREAT. By Vera Micheles Dean. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THESE two books—the first a vivid record of events by the New York Times correspondent in Central Europe; the second a concise study and brilliant analysis of the forces behind these events by the research director of the Foreign Policy Association—make one feel hopeful because their clarity and spirit stand in such happy contrast to the defeatism of the day. Both books deal with the period of historic changes in the map of Europe which started a year ago with Schuschnigg's secret visit to Berchtesgaden and ended, for the time being, with the march of the new German army into Czechoslovakia.

G. E. R. Gedye arrived in Vienna in the summer of 1925 and had his first breakfast, Kaffee mit Schlag, on the sunny terrace of the Cafe Heinrichshof. Vienna, the beautiful city of crass psychological contradictions, remained his headquarters for thirteen years, till he was expelled by the Nazi Gestapo for sending truthful dispatches. Two-thirds of his book deals with Austria, the last third with Czechoslovakia, where he went from Vienna in order to remain on his job.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Cal.

Are YOU getting FULL MEASURE for your dollar?

Without accurate, reliable information on the comparative value of competing brands your everyday buying can be a wasteful business. With it, you can save substantial sums. This month, CU Reports helps consumers save money by reporting on soap, canned peaches and asparagus, tea, men's topcoats, can openers, and juice extractors.

"We will eat a bar of it while doing handsprings up Fifth Avenue"

"If any soap is soothing to any kind of skin," says Soap, the leading trade magazine of the soap industry, "we will eat a bar of it while doing handsprings up Fifth Avenue."

With the same engaging candor, Soap states, "To him who would advertise successfully in the intensive competitive fight for soap business, not too much attention can be paid to these minor details such as scientific exactness, strict adherence to proved facts, and misleading implications."

With these findings, the results of recently completed tests of toilet soaps, published in this month's issue of Consumers Union Reports, agree. Over 150 brands are rated by name, for price and quality (you can pay anywhere from 50c to $1.97 per pound of dry soap for certain brands but get better quality for only 9.1c); those that may irritate or actually damage the skin are pointed out.

It's Illegal, but . . .

. . . plenty of packers put less peaches into their cans than the law requires. The names of the 21 out of 36 brands of canned peaches tested by CU which were illegally slack-filled are given in this report. Another report gives price and quality ratings of 39 brands of canned asparagus and asparagus tips.

Good bills and bad bills . . . A bad one costs consumers plenty

New food and drug bills are now pending in 13 states. In an article describing this legislation, the bills which should be vigorously backed and those which should be opposed are pointed out. In another article the effects of the Miller-Tydings price-fixing act—now in operation a year and a half—are discussed. The results of studies showing that this law has cost consumers many thousands of dollars are noted.

How to be rich and successful . . .

The dazzling promises of correspondence school ads are analyzed and clues given for determining which schools are fakes and which are honest. Many an impressively-titled "institute" is but a one-room office in an obscure business building. Hundreds have been proceeded against by Federal authorities for fraudulent practices.

"A major crime in gastronomy"

"We buy it ignorantly, prepare it abominably . . ." says a recent article on tea in a popular magazine. Far be it from Consumers Union to concur in a sweeping statement like this, but there is something to what this writer says. To help American tea drinkers acquire skill in tea purchasing, 40 brands of black, mixed, oolong and English Breakfast tea were given taste tests by tea experts and rated by name. Instructions on how to prepare tea properly are given and current advertising claims to the effect that tea "peps you up" are analyzed.

This year the consumer will get the best value for his money . . .

. . . in men's topcoats of a certain type at a certain price level. What type and which price level may be ascertained by reading the report on men's topcoats in this issue. Twenty-three brands sold under the manufacturer's names are rated for quality and workmanship.

●

Other reports and articles in this issue rate can openers and fruit juice extractors and discuss phases of the sugar and insurance industries of particular significance to consumers. To get this issue just mail the coupon below.

COMING IN APRIL!—The 1939 edition of Consumers Union's Annual Buying Guide. Running to nearly 300 pages and rating over 2,000 brands of products by names as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable," this valuable handbook is included in the yearly subscription to Consumers Union Reports without extra charge.

To: CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.
17 Union Square W, New York, N. Y.

Send me CONSUMERS UNION REPORTS for one year and the 1939 BUYING GUIDE when it appears. I enclose $3. I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Name ....

Address 3N9

CONSUMERS UNION OF U. S. Inc.
17 UNION SQUARE W NEW YORK, N. Y.

"Betrayal in Central Europe" is not a rehash of newspaper articles. It is a remarkably homogeneous account of vast experiences, written under the sway of the terrific emotions which swept Central Europe last summer and fall when history was being enacted with all the suspense of a grandiose and cruel melodrama. This suspense is felt almost in spite of the writer, who simply tells all he knows, all he sees—always speaking straight from his heart. On page after page an immense amount of material is piled up: little incidents and great actions; the contours and the content of personalities, whether they are key men, hypocritical servants of hidden powers, or just common citizens who want to live; the atmosphere of streets and countrysides in critical and in peaceful moments; the unseen spinning of intrigues of far-reaching consequences; monetary and military problems; private pleasures and public functions—a whole world is pictured as this world really was. I know that world, and I have never read a better journalistic account of it.

Take the sketch of the thin-lipped Monsignor Ignaz Seipel, the Catholic priest whom the workers of Vienna called the "no-mercy cardinal." Austrian chancellor in the twenties and ruler of the country till his death and afterward through his pupils Dollfuss and Schuschnigg, he was obsessed by ambitions entirely out of proportion to the needs of a small country of only six million inhabitants. He organized the Heimwehr as an arch-enemy of socialism even in its reformist Austrian form, and inaugurated the artificial course of atavistic reaction which led his successors and his country to their bloody suicidal end. One cannot understand the post-war history of Central Europe without knowing the "no-mercy cardinal" and his philosophy. Gedye makes this difficult, sly character and his fateful politics absolutely clear. Equally plastic is the sketch of Seipel's Socialist opponent on the Austrian political stage, the "Bolshevik" Otto Bauer, who fought with "spiritual weapons" till it was too late—the Christian Fascists used cannon and gibbet to crush this most peaceful and most European section of Austria's population while a third party, the Nazis, laughed. One would like to emphasize the merits of each chapter, but that is impossible in a short review. I will simply say that Mr. Gedye's history of the Austrian Republic is the best on record.

In Prague the English-born correspondent reports with shame the next act of the drama. (We still remember how we waited for his dispatches day by day.) Now the marionettes Henlein and Runciman come on the stage and entertain us with their ghastly tricks till their masters show themselves in Berchtesgaden, Godesberg, and Munich. The great and noble illusion of democratic solidarity which deceived the Czech people and their leaders explodes with a shock felt around the world. The author was one of the few Englishmen who understood the importance of Central Europe for the Western world. He also knew the true intentions of the Nazis. He therefore favored resistance. He is still convinced that Hitler would not have dared to fight had England and France told him in time not to touch Czechoslovakia. And he has many cogent arguments to prove that if war had broken out, Hitler and the whole Nazi plague with him would have perished. As for the French and English ruling classes who prefer fascism to socialism, he quotes a lady who compared fascism with a drought and socialism with a flood and said to her troubled husband who feared both: "When the drought has passed, it leaves behind it an arid desert where nothing can live. After the flood subsides, new forms of life spring up, some monstrous, some young, vigorous, and healthy —we see it in this world of ours today. I think, dear, that you and I could never choose the drought." With the question "And You?" the book closes. Any reader who starts it will, after an exciting experience, arrive at this question— and will have no peace until he makes up his mind how to answer.

Vera Micheles Dean starts with an analysis of "Mein Kampf," which she calls a new edition of pan-Germanism. She sees German imperialism as a young buccaneer who is disturbing the peace of many satisfied and retired pirates. Into this conceptual scheme the post-war development of Europe is fitted move by move—France attempting to block Germany, Hitler counter-attacking. The diplomatic struggle between the status quo group and the rest of Europe since Versailles is retold excellently and briefly and with an admirable knowledge of the complicated forces at work in the hundred conferences which culminated in the Munich accord. Mrs. Dean disentangles the diplomatic wires leading to the Bavarian capital, and in posing all the questions which the Big Four did not answer she takes pains to draw the highly necessary distinction between established fact and conjecture. Her book is a marvel of objectivity, but a very definite point of view is taken. Her last sentence reads: "If the Western world is to prevail over fascism it must redefine, in equally dynamic terms, the ideas it offers as an alternative, and correct those grievances against democracy which in the past have proved Hitler's most effective allies."

The newspaper correspondent lived in the midst of events which the research worker scrutinizes from a more detached observation point. Both books are "must" books for people who do not merely cherish their prejudices but want to live conscientiously and honestly. FRANZ HOELLERING

After the Ghetto

EAST OF EDEN. By I. J. Singer. Translated from the Yiddish by Maurice Samuel. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

IT IS startling to realize that we have nurtured on our doorstep a foreign literature of major proportions. In the short space of fifty years since the first Yiddish newspaper was issued, New York City has become the literary capital of the Yiddish-speaking world. Its most prominent authors live and write here—and first publish their work in the daily press. To them America has been, not the land of material opportunity, but the land of spiritual release, since in circumstances of democracy they were able to develop their gifts as they never could have done in Eastern Europe.

Yet Yiddish literature, in spite of its high development, is still extremely close to its folk culture. Although the various movements of reform and enlightenment encompassed the Jews of Western Europe in the time of Napoleon, it was not they who made Yiddish literature. To the Jews in Poland and Galicia, in Russia and in the Ukraine, a day in 1913 was hardly distinguishable from a day in 1773. Not until the World War was there any real change in the tenor of their life. Therefore it is not surprising that the majority of Yiddish novels begin in the timeless existence of the ghetto; and there can be hardly a Yiddish reader to whom the transition from its medieval culture, hermetically sealed and preserved by religious customs, to the outer world of politics and revolution, science and mass-production, is not the greatest of all dramatic themes.

This at first appears to be the theme of "East of Eden." The first third of the book is a magnificent picture of the unchanging life of the Jewish quarter of a Polish village. Each Sunday Reb Mattes the peddler shoulders his pack of mirrors, needles, thread, aprons, and thimbles and plods out along the dusty roads from Pyask. Each Friday night he returns to spend a day with his family in their poor hovel; each year his wife bears him a daughter. When at last she gives birth to a son, Nachman, in Reb Mattes's heart there flares that great ambition of all poor Jews—to educate his son to be a rabbi. The scrimping and saving to pay the boy's cheder fees, the death of the boy's mother and Mattes's second marriage, the flight of Schiendel from her stepmother's torments to domestic service in Warsaw—all this flows by in a rich narrative.

And then suddenly Schiendel comes home and gives birth to an illegitimate child. Mattes and his family are forced to flee from the scandal to the oblivion of a crowded Warsaw tenement. Up to this time "East of Eden" has been the story of Mattes, and the reader has come to share his gentle dreams and hopes. But once in Warsaw the whole focus of the book changes. At the cost of alienating the reader's sympathy, Mattes is roughly demoted from his position as the central character of the novel. The opening sentence of the second section sets the new tempo: "A war demonstration was pouring tumultuously through the principal streets of Warsaw." With the turning of a page we have stepped from an ancient into a modern world—and for the first time the action is dated. It is 1914.

Singer must have felt that Mattes's comprehensions were too narrow to present this new world through his eyes. He therefore swiftly disposes of him in an early battle of the war, and makes Nachman his central character. In doing this he risks much, for he violates the great pattern to which the best realistic novels since "Madame Bovary" have adhered: the shattering of a dream by reality. Before Mattes's dream can be shattered, we are offered Nachman's dream—and a very different dream it is. In Warsaw he abandons his studies, becomes a baker's apprentice, falls under the spell of Comrade Daniel, a Communist organizer, and learns to dream of a proletarian Utopia. Eden is to the east, in the new land of Soviet Russia. It is to the east that Daniel forever gestures during his stump speeches, which Singer characterizes as hypocritical and demagogic. At this point the whole novel seems to be wrenched apart to make place for a harsh, opinionated, and acrimonious attack upon the Soviet Union, and we come to perceive why Mattes was so swiftly slaughtered. We remember that "East of Eden" was serialized in a New York newspaper. If the Yiddish press has assisted in a literary renaissance, it has also cultivated perfervid political attitudes in its contributors.

It matters not in the least, from the point of view of literature, whether Singer likes the Soviet Union or not. It does

THE NEW NOVEL BY

Josephine Herbst

ROPE OF GOLD

ONE OF THE REALLY IMPORTANT NOVELS OF THE SEASON IS GREETED BY THESE IMPRESSIVE REVIEWS

"THE FIRST COLLECTIVE NOVEL in America that is not rigid. . . . It is in her portraits of women that Miss Herbst does her best work. . . . She invests them with a tenderness that is like nothing else in our contemporary fiction. . . . There are few writers in America who write out of so overwhelming an emotion."
—Alfred Kazin, N. Y. Herald Tribune

"IMPRESSIVE as a book which depicts the turgid undercurrents of economic insecurity." —Rose C. Feld, N. Y. Times

"POWERFUL, ORIGINAL novel. . . . No one, not even Hemingway, or Lewis, has a surer sense and command of the vernacular."
—Richard A. Cordell, Saturday Review

"FEW OF OUR NOVELISTS are able to give us people so real, so pulsating with life. Miss Herbst is a deeply emotional writer." —Edwin Seaver, WQXR

"ONE OF THE MOST GIFTED of the relatively small group of American writers whose material is all taken from the contemporary social and economic scene. . . . It is so remarkable a piece of the very stuff of our own day. . . . She is undeniably a novelist to be reckoned with—sincere, passionate, and powerful." —Herschel Brickell, Commonweal

$2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 Madison Ave. New York City

NEW WAYS IN PSYCHOANALYSIS

By

Karen Horney, M.D.

Author of The Neurotic Personality of Our Time

Are sexual factors necessarily the basis of personality maladjustments? Does current psychoanalytic practice give sufficient attention to the mature environment? Answering both these important questions in the negative, a leading authority here presents the first thoroughgoing critical examination of psychoanalysis. The author's aim is to provide a firm, scientific basis for psychoanalysis by eliminating those elements of debatable value which heretofore have been accepted largely on faith. To this task Dr. Horney brings not only her long experience as a practicing analyst, but also her years of experience as Secretary of the Berlin Psychoanalytic Institute, Associate Director of the Chicago Institute for Psychoanalysis, and Lecturer at the New School for Social Research. $3.00

SOCIAL SECURITY

By

Maxwell S. Stewart

Associate Editor of The Nation

Since publication of the first edition of this book, there has been more discussion and activity in the field of social security than at any other time in our country's history. This entirely new, revised and greatly enlarged edition brings the whole situation into fresh focus and furnishes the reader with a complete, up-to-date picture of social security legislation in the United States and in other leading countries. $3.50

"BOOKS THAT LIVE"

W. W. NORTON & COMPANY
70 FIFTH AVENUE • NEW YORK

matter that the tone of a hitherto fine novel is debased by political pamphleteering. When he deals with Daniel, Singer abandons his patient, creative methods; his characterization amounts to little more than this: because Daniel is a Communist, he is a rogue.

For his new beliefs and revolutionary activities Nachman suffers beatings, torture, and eight years of imprisonment. Broken in body, he thinks that he has earned the right to go to the promised land to the east. But he finds that while it is easy for powerful bureaucrats like Daniel to escape when danger threatens, the Soviet authorities insist that it is still his duty to make the revolution in Poland. Nevertheless, he sneaks over the border. When he finally proves that he is not a spy, he is granted citizenship and put to work in a bakery. He hopes to serve his new country well, but he is depressed by the long hours and miserable pay, by the corruption and sabotage, and by the gloomy disappointment of the workers. Although his protest takes the innocuous form of opposing the punishment of a fellow-worker for drunkenness, he is arrested as a spy and a saboteur. With the treason trials in mind Singer attempts to show with what malevolent skill the authorities piece their charges together. Once again, just as in Poland, Nachman goes through the whole round of imprisonment and torture. This time, no longer sustained by his dream, he yields. The confession that is extorted from him becomes the foundation for a new treason trial, but his own punishment is merely expulsion from Eden.

Is this a novel of the transition of the Jews from a medieval to a modern world? If so, of what pertinence is the detailed analysis of Russian economic conditions? Or if this is an exposition of bureaucratic mismanagement and despotism in the Soviet Union—of which Singer's first-hand knowledge seems to date from 1922—why the stress upon Jewish life? Only by the most charitable effort can one uncover a unifying theme: the futility of Jewish meddling in nationalist politics, and the ineffectualness of the idealism of Mattes and Nachman in the modern world.

HAROLD STRAUSS

DRAMA

The Swing Mikado

I DO not know what either Savoyards on the one hand or swing addicts on the other think of "The Mikado" as produced by the Federal Theater and sung by an all-Negro company. The general public, however, enjoyed it mightily and so did I, for it is a rousing and hilarious entertainment in its own right whatever it may be when considered as an "interpretation" of Mr. Gilbert's text and Mr. Sullivan's music. Both of these are adhered to most of the time with superficial fidelity, and the novelty of the effect produced is due less to the "swing" arrangements used repeatedly as encores than to a clash of temperaments—to what results when the work of two Victorian gentlemen is taken in hand by a company of enthusiasts who never heard of the Savoy tradition but who are quite willing to "express themselves" in connection with "The Mikado" or anything else. Occasionally it is quite evident that a particular performer does not know what a particular song or a particular bit of business is all about; more often he succeeds somehow in so reinterpreting it that one is almost ready to swear that the original intention of the authors was to be, not politely fantastic, but as rowdy as it all now seems.

The scene has been transferred to some tropical isle, and though the members of the opening chorus still introduce themselves as "gentlemen of Japan," all that is soon forgotten amid goings on under the bamboo tree which certainly do not suggest anything to be seen "on many a screen and jar." Mr. Gilbert, stickler that he was for propriety, would be shocked to see any members of his company of ladies and gentlemen comporting themselves as Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum do in that scene where they show each other just how they would behave if love-making between them were permissible; he would also, I think, marvel at the completeness with which mere intonation and emphasis transformed the ballad of the dicky-bird into an unmistakable coon song. Not all the performers have good voices; one or two, as a matter of fact, have almost no voices at all; but everyone attacks everything with such vigor and such enthusiasm that one soon forgets all else and is carried along through thick and thin on a wave of uncritical delight.

At least one or two of the novel "swing" arrangements —notably those of "Three Little Maids from School" and "The Flowers That Bloom in the Spring"—seemed to me extraordinarily exhilarating, and so did the wild dancing which went with the latter. Certainly the whole is a triumph of main force and high spirits rather than of any sort of finish, but it is a triumph nevertheless. I should add that it is now current at the New Yorker Theater, where, I venture to prophesy, it will remain almost as long as the six months it played in Chicago.

Two recent comedies—"Miss Swan Expects" by Bella and Samuel Spewack and something called "Off to Buffalo"—disappeared before my comments, which were nothing worth waiting for, could appear in print. I should not be too much surprised if a similar fate should overtake "Close Quarters" (Golden Theater), a two-character tour de force said to have enjoyed a considerable run in London. The acting of Elena Miramova and Leo Chalzel is much more than ordinarily good, and the play itself is an ingeniously constructed shocker, but an evening-long appeal to a single emotion grows monotonous, especially when the emotion happens to be apprehension. The two characters are expecting to be arrested for a murder which one of them committed, and they kill themselves when they can endure the suspense no longer. A few seconds later the audience knows that there was no evidence against them.

At the Windsor Theater a revival of Clifford Odets's "Awake and Sing" is alternating with the same author's "Rocket to the Moon." Seeing the earlier play again convinced me that I was right when I found the original production extraordinarily interesting.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

TWICE · A · YEAR
FALL-WINTER SPRING-SUMMER

A New Semi-Annual Journal of LITERATURE — THE ARTS — CIVIL LIBERTIES
IN BOOK FORM

Spring-Summer, No. 2, 1939: Contributors and Contents
MARCEL PROUST
A Story (Heretofore unpublished in English)
WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS
A Study of the Artist
HERBERT J. SELIGMANN
Challenge of Anti-Semitism
FRANK KINGDON
Challenge of Nazi Persecution of Christianity
JOHN MARIN Notes, Reproductions, Letters
ELIOT PORTER Photograph
JAMES LAUGHLIN IV Poems

Architecture Section:
GEORGE BERNARD SHAW LEWIS MUMFORD
LOUIS H. SULLIVAN WALTER GROPIUS
WILLIAM LESCAZE
MAP: Outstanding Modern Architecture by Living Architects—in America

Civil Liberties Section—Current Issues:
ROGER BALDWIN OSMOND FRAENKEL
THEODORE IRWIN
AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION
(Civil Liberties Committee):
HAGUE-C.I.O. BRIEF
247 PAGES

TWICE · A · YEAR
DOROTHY NORMAN, Editor MARY LESCAZE, Asst. Editor

Fall-Winter, No. 1, 1938; Contributors and Contents
RAINER MARIA RILKE: Some War-Time Letters
ALFRED STIEGLITZ:
Photographs, Conversations, Notes
RANDOLPH BOURNE:
Essay on the War; also a Letter to Van Wyck Brooks
ANDRE MALRAUX IGNAZIO SILONE
THEODORE DREISER E. E. CUMMINGS
FRANZ KAFKA KENNETH PATCHEN
CHARLES OLSON THOREAU

Civil Liberties Section:
ROGER BALDWIN IRVING BRANT
T. V. SMITH, etc.

Single Issue, $1.00, Foreign $1.25; By Subscription: $1.75, a year, Foreign $2.25. Clothbound: Single Issue $2.00, Foreign $2.25; By Subscription: $3.75 a year, Foreign $4.25.

------INTRODUCTORY OFFER------
TWICE A YEAR PRESS, 509 Madison Avenue, New York City
I enclose:
$1.75 ($2.25 foreign*) for a year's SUBSCRIPTION to TWICE A YEAR. beginning with issue No. ....☐ Clothbound $3.75 (*4.25) ....☐
$1.00 ($1.25 foreign*) for SINGLE ISSUE No. ....☐ Clothbound $2.00 (*2.25) ....☐.

Name ....
Address ....

ORDER DIRECT OR FROM ANY BOOKSELLER

The Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade
Invite you to a Wedding Reception
for Mary Tannenhaus
and
Lieut. Robert Raven
Blinded Hero of the Lincoln Brigade

Friday, March 31
7:30 P. M.
DINNER
Two Dollars per Plate

Town Hall Club
43rd St., E. of B'way
Proceeds to Disabled Veterans Fund

Reservations from FRIENDS OF THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN BRIGADE
125 W. 45th St., N. Y. C. LOngacre 3-6215

CLEARANCE SALE!

14,000 BOOKS MUST GO!

Prices: 29c—49c—69c—98c—$1.29 and other books at savings up to 50%. Books on Economics, Political Economy, Communism, U.S.S.R. etc., and selected novels by best authors, Feuchtwanger, C. D. Lewis, Marx, Engels, R. Bates, M. Brand, Browder and others.

Write in for Special Price List

WORKERS BOOKSHOP, 50 E. 13 St. N.Y.C.

Buy Your Books Through The Nation

THE NATION will deliver any book to your door at the regular publisher's price (postfree) providing payment is received with the order or publisher's price plus postage if sent C. O. D.

The Reader's Service Division

The Nation • 20 Vesey Street • New York

To Subscribe to The Nation just fill out and mail this form

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York, N. Y.

For the inclosed $_______ please enter my subscription for the period indicated below:

☐ TEN WEEKS ($1)
☐ ONE YEAR ($5)
☐ TWO YEARS ($8)
☐ THREE YEARS ($11)

*Name*____________________

*Street*____________________

*City*____________________

*State*____________________

3-18-39

Extra postage per year: Foreign $1; Canadian 50

MUSIC

IF, glancing through announcements of piano recitals with their stereotyped program sequences, you encountered a program that comprised Schubert's Sonata in C minor, Weber's Sonata in A flat, and Beethoven's "Hammerklavier" Sonata, you might suspect that behind this different program was a pianist with different qualities of mind and feeling that caused him to be interested in different music and to hold a different view of his function as a public performer: the view that this function was to concern himself with music of great significance and to present himself to the public as an interpreter of such music. You would expect this attitude and the qualities behind it to show themselves also in his playing; and at the recital on February 24 you would find this to be true of Schnabel's performance. Not one sound had any purpose other than illumination of the music; the greatness of the performances was apparent only in the greatness they revealed in Schubert and Beethoven; and in the playing that created such startlingly heightened significance in each phrase, so startling an order in what had previously appeared to be the rambling finale of Schubert's sonata, one heard evidence of extraordinary powers of integration—integration of experience and emotion inside, which expressed itself in integration of the music outside.

A musical phrase which we think of in its entirety is heard as a succession of sounds: its significance is in the relations established among these sounds by timing and force; and no pianist I have heard has, by his timing and coloring of the sounds, brought them into dynamically continuous and significant relations in the way Schnabel has. These are the relations of things arranged in a design, a form; and one may say that the composer's written score, in prescribing exactly what sounds to produce but only approximately their duration and degree of force, indicates only roughly a shape—whether of phrase or of large structure—to which the pianist must give sharp definition with precise degrees of force and durations of time. And I would say then that no pianist I have heard has shaped a piece of music in a way that integrated its details, brought them into significant relations with each other, as Schnabel has.

What he does requires a powerful mind, but one that requires powerful emotions to work with. It cannot be done without long thought, but it cannot be done with cold calculation. It can be done only by someone who feels in a sequence of sounds what it was that caused Beethoven or Schubert to create it, and who knows from this the relations that must exist between each sound and the next, the shape the sequence must have, for it to fulfil the intention embodied in it. And the lifetime of thought and feeling behind the performance goes to create something that sounds as though it were being felt and thought through for the first time.

There were vacant seats at Schnabel's recital; but in the program one read that only standing-room was left for Josef Hofmann's recital on March 26; and earlier Hofmann had advertised the fact that he would play Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata and Liszt's "Liebestraum." From his programs of the past twenty-five years I predict that he will also play small pieces by Chopin, including the "Minute" Waltz, Liadov's "Music-Box," Mendelssohn's Spring Song, Rubinstein's Melody in F, Moszkowski's "Juggleress," and Rachmaninov's most famous Prelude, or their equivalents. From these you might suspect that Hofmann was a different sort of pianist from Schnabel—with different qualities that caused him to hold a different view of his function as a public performer, to play different music, to play this music in a different way. And you would be right: Hofmann—about whom there has been such an outpouring of effulgent words in the press recently—presents one of the worst examples of the virtuoso career.

The virtuoso pianist presents himself to his audience for the same purpose as the acrobat—to show all the things he can do with his instrument and with the music; and he regards the instrument and music in the way the acrobat regards his trapeze—as things to be used for his purpose. In his youth he learned his pianistic and musical tricks in a certain number of works; and since then he has used the same works to show off his pianistic and musical tricks. Thus, in the twenty-five years that I have heard Hofmann he has gone on recombining into programs of one pattern the limited group of works that he learned fairly early—a group that has included a large quantity of trashy salon and display pieces but not one sonata by Mozart or Schubert (he has played Liszt's Concerto in E flat and both concertos of Rubinstein, but not one by Mozart.) And in his playing of these works there have been such things as the left-hand octaves crashed out sensationally to achieve nothing more than left-hand octaves crashed out sensationally; the series of notes extracted from within accompaniment chords and brought out as a counter-melody which the composer never dreamed of; the Brahms variation or the exposition of a Chopin sonata played with one set of crescendos, decrescendos, and rubatos the first time and another set the second time—each set for no other apparent reason than to show he could think up crescendos, decrescendos, and rubatos different from the composer's, and the two sets for no other apparent reason than to show he could think up two sets different from the composer's—things which have added up on occasion to some of the worst performances of music I have ever heard.

Most recitals are given by other Hofmanns big and small; in a few the conventional recital program is analogous to a conventional form like the sonnet: it acquires interest and distinction from its use by musicians of taste. This may be said of the 'cello recital, this season, of Emanuel Feuermann, the violin recital of Orrea Pernel, the Lieder recital of Gertrud Pitzinger. As for Szigeti, the normal continuity of his phrasing was destroyed this time by its abnormal intensity—the effort to crowd into one note meaning enough for the entire phrase.

B. H. HAGGIN

In Early Issues of The Nation

Two Recent Poems by William Butler Yeats

Christopher Isherwood's "Good-bye to Berlin"
REVIEWED BY KLAUS MANN

EUROPE • MEXICO
• SOVIET UNION •

You see how life is really lived—you meet the people—you travel with companions of your own mental [illegible] in a small informal group—those things best done together are done cooperatively; otherwise you pursue your own interests—services are generously inclusive.

SCANDINAVIA, SOVIET UNION, TURKEY, BALKANS, GREECE under leadership of Prof. Colston E. Warne. 14,000 miles: London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkov, Kiev, Odessa, Bucharest, Istanbul, Athens, Salonika, Belgrade, Budapest, Paris. Sailing July 6. Back September 5. $698

■

SCANDINAVIA, LAPLAND, FINLAND. Leader to be announced. Denmark, Sweden, Norway, North Cape Cruise, Lapland, Finland, London. Optional extension to Soviet Union. Sailing July 1. Back Aug. 22. $576

■

"INSIDE EUROPE" (fourth season) under leadership of Herbert Witt, Exec. Secretary, N. Y. District, American Student Union. Auspices American Student Union. London, Copenhagen, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Stockholm, Oslo, Amsterdam, Paris. For students only. Sailing July 1. Back August 22. .... $498

■

THE SOVIET UNION (third season) under leadership of Robert Magidoff, an American writer resident in the Soviet Union for the past 5 years. London, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Helsingfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Ukraine, Caucasus, Black Sea, Crimea. Sailing July 1. Back September 5. .... $498

■

MEXICO IN PROGRESS (second season) under leadership of Herbert Weinstock. An unusually complete survey. Sailing July 6. Back August 15. Travel arrangements First Class. $468

■

Steamship passage Third Class except for "Mexico in Progress."
For information regarding itineraries, social and cultural programs, etc., on these and other trips, address:

THE OPEN ROAD
8 W. 40TH ST.
NEW YORK
Department O

Cooperating in the Soviet Union with Intourist

SPANISH Variety NIGHT
With these Great
SPANISH ARTISTS
Dance
MARTINEZ & ANTONITA
NINA & ZABAL TRIANITA
Song
CONSUELO MORENO
VICENTE CORDELLAT
Music
GERONIMO VILLARINO VICENTE GOMEZ
Guitarist
HISPANOS UNIDOS
10 Pc. Orch., Folk Dancers
MECCA TEMPLE, 133 W. 55 ST
SUNDAY, Mar. 19 at 8:15 P. M.
Tickets
$2.20, $1.65
$1.10, 55c
at N. Am. Committee, 381 4th Avenue
Workers Bookshop, 50 E. 13th Street
LeBlangs, 42nd St. and B'way
Auspices MUSICIANS COMMITTEE
TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY
For the Relief of Spanish Republican Refugees

Letters to the Editors

Gadfly to Chicago

Dear Sirs: Milton Mayer is an effective writer and a gadfly to Chicagoans. His latest sting, "It's Hell to Be a Chicago Liberal," in The Nation of February 25, has provoked considerable discussion, including a snorting Daily News editorial on February 27 rephrasing Mayer's title as "A Chicago Liberal Is a Hell of a Liberal."

In this placid discussion neither Mayer nor the News nor anybody else is qualified to speak for "Chicago's liberals." The supporters of the Committee to Draft Ickes for Mayor did not switch to Kelly as a bloc; they formed an independent group named A Better Chicago League to push a program for Chicago, and the league did not indorse a candidate. Though many of its sponsors favored Kelly, some supported Courtney. What, then, did the "Chicago liberals" do? What is a "Chicago liberal?"

I object to Mayer's Delphic gloom: "the worst city in America went right on getting worse and is going to get worse faster from now on," whereas "national reformism" had left its mark on "most American cities." This highly generalized thesis that a liberal national Administration has reformed most cities is doubtful at best. The condemnation of Chicago is sweeping enough to be silly.

In the sense that a "liberal" is one seeking new social adjustments, a liberal is generally not with a majority and to this extent has a hell of a part to play everywhere, at all times.

ROBERT ACKERBERG, JR.

Chicago, March 9

Of Interest to Consumers

Dear Sirs: In Helen Woodward's column in The Nation of February 18 a reader asked about the National Consumers Tax Commission. May I call your attention to the December issue of Propaganda Analysis, which is devoted entirely to explaining the connection of the A. and P. Company with this organization? Also in the November issue of the N. C. T. C. News, the monthly publication of the National Consumers Tax Commission, is the following statement: "The National Consumers Tax Commission is gratified to announce that John A. Hartford, president of the Great Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, has pledged the big retail organization to 'go along as far as it is necessary for us to go to see that your work is not hampered by lack of funds.' "

To your list of organizations interested in the consumer I should like to add the National League of Woman Voters, which has supported the TVA as a yardstick, worked for an adequate food-and-drug law, and is still working for grading of canned goods, against price fixing, and for tariffs which will lower prices for the consumer.

ELIZABETH KELLERS

Montclair, N. J., March 1

Birth-Control and Public Health

Dear Sirs: The President's Interdepartmental Committee to Coordinate Health and Welfare has recommended a health program at an estimated cost of $850,000,000. Millions of this sum will be requested for the purpose of reducing infant and maternal deaths.

Addressing a Conference on Better Care for Mothers and Babies, at Washington, in January, 1938, the Surgeon General said: "The 12,544 mothers who died as a result of conditions of pregnancy and childbirth in 1935 do not represent the whole of the loss from child bearing . . . for there were more than 60,000 babies who died two weeks after birth and more than 77,000 recorded still-births. In other words, there occur in the country each year more than 150,000 deaths, 60 per cent of which are needlessly lost, because of the mismanagement of the child-bearing function." He also stated: "Approximately one million children are born each year to families on relief or with an annual income of less than $1,000." (Among this group is found the highest death-rate of mothers and infants.)

Breaking down these 150,000 deaths, 90,000 of which are unnecessary, with the aid of statistics from the Public Health Service, we find that five out of every six babies born to untreated syphilitic mothers will be born dead or infected; one out of every eleven babies will die or be born syphilitic, even if mothers have received adequate treatment before the fifth month of pregnancy; two out of every five babies will die or be infected even if adequate treatment is given the mother after the fifth month of pregnancy; there were 25,000 still-births in one recent year because the mothers suffered from venereal disease.

Birth-control is one weapon by which these appalling conditions can be combated. Yet the Children's Bureau, the United States Public Health Service, and the Departments of Health of the several states, with the notable exception of North Carolina, take a neutral or negative stand on giving out birth-control information.

J. F.

Baltimore, Md., March 7

Correction

The drawing of Pius XII attributed to George Schreiber in last week's issue was by Bert Hayden.—EDITORS THE NATION.

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER recently returned to Europe after a visit in the United States.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, a Portland, Oregon, newspaperman, is the author of "Our Promised Land."

JACQUES MARITAIN is professor of philosophy at the Catholic Institute of Paris and the author of "True Humanism" and many other books. His essay will be included in a volume entitled "Living Philosophies, II" to be published in the spring by Simon and Schuster.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Woodrow Wilson professor of government at Williams College, is the author of "Europe on the Eve," published this week.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN is the author of "Those First Affections."

HAROLD STRAUSS is a frequent contributor of book reviews to The Nation.

HELEN WOODWARD'S column "Pocket Guide" was unavoidably omitted from this issue.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $15; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs, Information Service. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 148 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 25, 1939 NUMBER 13

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS:
EDITORIALS:
- MUNICH: ACT II 335
- A NEW NRA 337
- LOVING HITLER LESS by Freda Kirchwey 337

YOU CAN'T APPEASE BUSINESS by Kenneth G. Crawford 339
ARE THE BALKANS DOOMED? by Albert Viton 340
"IN SPITE OF THE GESTAPO" by Klaus and Erika Mann 343
THE GREATEST STRIKE-BREAKER OF ALL by I. F. Stone 346
EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS. WHAT ODDS ON RECOVERY? by Keith Hutchison 348
IN THE WIND 349
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard 350
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
- NOTES BY THE WAY by Margaret Marshall 351
- A GREAT DEMOCRAT by W. H. Auden 352
- YOUNG MODERN by Louise Bogan 353
- RIVALS FOR THE MEDITERRANEAN by Henry B. Kranz 354
- CHILDREN OF REBELS by Samuel Romer 355
- AUSTRIAN MEMOIR by Rustem Vambery 356
- RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 356
- FILMS by Franz Hoellering 357

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
ROBERT BENDINER

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors
KEITH HUTCHISON
MAXWELL S. STEWART
I. F. STONE

Dramatic Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager and Director of Circulation
HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager
MURIEL C. GRAY

The Shape of Things

THE FRENCH CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES BY 321 votes to 264 and the Senate by 286 to 17 have in effect suspended the Constitution of the French Republic and suppressed democracy in France until the end of next November. A dictatorship has been set up which will almost certainly be of a quasi-fascist character and which may lead to the establishment of a fascist regime in France. The new law authorizes the French Cabinet "to take by decree until November 30, 1939, all appropriate measures to maintain and increase the strength of France." The power to legislate by decree is thus unlimited, for there is no authority in France except Parliament able to decide whether any given decree comes within the scope of the law, and Parliament will be silenced until after November 30. After that date the decrees must be ratified by the Chamber before the end of this year, but will the Chamber then be allowed to meet?

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO ACCEPT THE PRETEXT that Daladier will use his dictatorial powers only for national defense. If that is true, why did he refuse to agree to any limitation? Why did he insist on being given power to dissolve the Communist Party or establish a press censorship unless he intended to use the power? The censorship will probably be applied in the first place to press telegrams, and there will be one more European country where foreign correspondents are prevented from telling the truth. The fact that Daladier has asked for and obtained dictatorial powers certainly does not mean that he will adopt a firm policy toward Germany and Italy. Such a policy would have the support of the very people against whom the powers will primarily be used. Daladier would not have had the support of all the friends of Hitler and Mussolini in the Chamber, as he did, had they believed that a real stand was to be made against the totalitarian aggressors. P. J. Philip, the Paris correspondent of the New York Times, who is exceptionally well informed about the intentions of the French reactionaries and pro-fascists, said in his dispatch Sunday: "Some quarters believe that French diplomatic action is more likely to be directed soon toward mending the Franco-Italian situation than toward assisting Rumania." It is probable that these quarters are right and that new capitulations to Mussolini are to be expected.

Published weekly and copyright, 1939, in the U. S. A. by The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1897, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1897.

BURLINGAME

*

THE NOMINATION OF WILLIAM O. DOUGLAS to fill the vacancy created on the Supreme Court by the retirement of Louis D. Brandeis can hardly fail of confirmation by the Senate and will meet with much approval and little criticism. The Nation in a recent issue expressed some misgivings as to the breadth of his qualifications. It does not question his learning, integrity, or loyalty to the New Deal, nor does it deny that he has on the whole done a good job as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission. We sincerely hope that as justice Mr. Douglas will prove our doubts groundless and show himself a worthy successor to the most consistent progressive ever to sit on the Supreme Court of the United States.

*

WHEN THE "REFORM" COMMITTEE OF THE New York Stock Exchange took over last May, we were given to understand that the bad old days were gone for ever. The Stock Exchange was in future to be governed in the spirit of the securities acts, and its aim would be to provide not a casino but a genuine investment market. Speculation, naturally, could not be completely abolished, but no longer would the speculative tail wag the investment dog. In the past ten months, however, not much visible progress has been made, while the murmurings of brokers against restrictions have been growing louder. Wall Street is arguing that business recovery needs increased investment, which is dependent on broader and more active markets, which in turn can only be created by giving greater scope to speculators. In accordance with these ideas a committee representing sixteen stock exchanges has sent a statement to the SEC suggesting a number of revisions to the securities acts. Some of their proposals, particularly those bearing on the simplification of prospectuses, are worth consideration. But others are inherently vicious, and we are glad that Chairman W. O. Douglas of the SEC has promptly exposed their nature. The committee complained of the vagueness of Section 9-a (2) of the Securities Exchange Act, which aims at eliminating manipulation, particularly by pool operations. Mr. Douglas points out that the alternative wording suggested would call upon the SEC "to foresee and define every conceivable variety of manipulation. Such a procedure might well result in the ceaseless invention of new techniques to evade regulation." Again the stock exchanges want to repeal completely the prohibition against short-term trading by insiders under penalty of paying all profits to the corporation involved. This would be a further encouragement to pool operators, who in the past have been most successful when operating in conjunction with insiders.

*

THE REFUSAL OF THE HOUSE WAYS AND Means Committee to extend the protection of social security to the employees of non-profit organizations, to domestic workers, or to farm laborers comes as a bitter shock. Of all the changes proposed by the Social Security Board, the extension of coverage seemed most likely to be accepted. President Roosevelt has definitely promised such a change on several occasions. The Advisory Council and the Social Security Board were both unanimous in recommending it. It is true that certain technical difficulties are involved in bringing domestic employees and farm labor under the act, but no one is more familiar with these difficulties than the Social Security Board which recommended their inclusion. No technical difficulties exist, however, with respect to the employees of religious, charitable, and educational organizations. Nor has any plausible argument been advanced why such persons, numbering several million, should be denied the rights now granted the majority of American employees as a matter of course. Several churches, it is true, have disgraced the principles they profess by opposing the inclusion of their employees, thus provoking much sardonic comment among hard-boiled Congressmen. But they have failed to show any reason why there should be discrimination against organizations performing public service. It is to be hoped that the protest against the committee's decision will be strong enough to force a reversal on the floor of the House.

*

THERE WAS A MINIMUM OF SUBTLETY IN Congressional handling of the Barkley amendment to the Air Corps Expansion bill. The amendment, which would have prohibited the award of national-defense contracts to industrialists who violate the Wagner Act, was buried by the House-Senate conferees and is unlikely to rise again. The episode merely emphasized for the benefit of latecomers that business men can be as patriotic as anyone, but only if offered a decent rake-off. Conservatives who have been lamenting the President's "alarmism" over Europe suddenly warned that the enemy was at the gates, with the plain implication that this is no time for collective bargaining. Wasn't it clear, they wanted to know, that industrialists couldn't serve their country efficiently if they were harassed by labor laws? Apparently that was perfectly clear, for after a minor skirmish led by Administration supporters the subject was adroitly dropped. It is naive, we concede, to imagine a large-scale arms program which will not ultimately violate many of the amenities of industrial relations, but this performance was as premature as it was clumsy. The projected amendment would merely have empowered the government to discriminate against firms which flout its laws. Under those conditions, it was pretty bluntly indicated, industrialists won't show much school spirit.

* * *

STARTLING NEWS COMES FROM PUERTO RICO —startling for those who have been unaware that that unhappy island was heading straight for disaster. At the close of the present sugar-harvesting season 110,000 workers will be unemployed, and altogether some 750,000 persons will be in need of immediate relief. With only $6,000,000 of relief money in sight, an economic congress of 300 persons, called by bankers, merchants, and industrialists, met in San Juan on March 12 and voted to demand of Congress an immediate referendum as to the future political status of the island. Plainly the most conservative forces called the congress, and they consulted in advance with the reactionary Governor, General Winship. Every effort was made to keep politics out, and there was no mention of statehood or independence in the resolution as passed. Yet when, after nearly twelve hours of discussion, the resolution calling upon the legislature to demand the referendum from Congress came up, so many people were standing and cheering that no formal vote was taken. Thus the chief economic interests have paved the way for a vote which may demand independence or, if not that, in all likelihood, statehood. When Senator Tydings proposed such a referendum two years ago and offered a bill to that effect, no one denounced him so much as the big business men. Congress cannot overlook this new development, for the Administration in Washington well knows that if something is not done soon for Puerto Rico there will be widespread violence, bloodshed, and starvation—providing the Hitler press with another opportunity to jibe at American hypocrisy in Puerto Rico.

* * *

THOSE WHO HAVE FOLLOWED THE PRO-NAZI activities and speeches of Senator Reynolds of North Carolina will not be surprised at his latest exploit. In a speech printed in the Congressional Record of February 1 he quoted the following sentence from an interview which he said Erika Mann had given the New York World-Telegram: "I have no hesitancy in calling for the blood of the sons of American mothers just so I can get even with that government which I despise." The interview was printed in the World-Telegram on January 27. Miss Mann in a letter to that newspaper calls attention to the fact that she made no such statement and that no such statement appeared in the interview. The Senator is guilty of exactly the kind of barefaced whopper used by the Nazis he admires. We wonder whether he and Goebbels had a nice long chat on propaganda technique when the Senator from North Carolina was in Berlin last year.

Munich: Act II

THE tragedy of Czechoslovakia—and Europe—moves rapidly. When the curtain fell at Munich, Hitler, breathing self-determination, was leading away his victim. In the wings stood the faithless friends who had bound and delivered her, attempting to convince each other, and the world, that by her sacrifice peace was saved. After five and a half months the curtain rises again. Hitler's jack-boot now rests upon a corpse. His mask, never well-adjusted, is ripped off; the imperial purple is about his shoulders. In belated horror Chamberlain and Daladier gaze at the "Aggrandizer of the Reich."

Hitler's inclusion of Czechoslovakia within his empire marks the adoption of new tactics and slogans. When he began his career of treaty-breaking his professed aim was to reverse the "crime of Versailles," and he found a road smoothed by the guilty consciences of Britain and France. Next he exploited Wilsonian "self-determination" and under this banner gathered in without opposition Austria and the Sudetenland. Now he turns to an all-embracing theory that can excuse any aggression. By the "law of self-preservation" the Herrenvolk, the superior German people, are entitled to more "living space" and lordship over inferior races such as the Slavs.

In tune with the new theory is a revival of the old imperial tradition, in fact, of two imperial traditions. In addition to assuming the mantle of the Hapsburgs, Hitler looks back to Otto I, who in the tenth century conquered Bohemia for the German crown. This is the basis for the claim in Hitler's proclamation that "for a thousand years Bohemia and Moravia have been part of the living space of the German people." If this is to be a precedent, nearly all Europe comes within the range of Nazi ambitions. Otto's empire included the Netherlands, part of Belgium, France, and Switzerland, nearly all of Italy, and part of Croatia. Addition of the Hapsburg heirlooms would bring in Hungary and large portions of Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia. A sobering thought for Mussolini, whose prospects of compensation in the Mediterranean have probably been postponed once again by the latest Nazi coup! But no matter what his feelings, he is bound fast to the axis. Sink or swim he must stick to Germany.

In the circumstances the Duce must take what comfort he can from the thought that, in a showdown with Britain and France, the strategic position of the fascist powers has been immensely strengthened. The seizure of Czechoslovakia is a long step toward the organization of Southeastern Europe as a war supply base. Since Munich Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia have shown some signs of resistance to the destiny Hitler has decreed for them. The two former have been flirting with Russia, and all have been seeking aid from the west in reducing their economic dependence on the Reich. The fate of the Czechs is intended to be a warning against such impertinent activities.

Poland now is half surrounded by the German army. The Slovak protectorate forms a wedge between it and Hungary for which the precarious link supplied by the Hungarian seizure of Carpatho-Ukraine is quite inadequate compensation. Moreover, that move by Budapest had the benevolent approval of Berlin. Why? Perhaps because disorders in Hungary's new territory—and disorders are easily fomented—would give the Reich an excuse to "protect" not merely Carpatho-Ukraine but the whole of Hungary. Again Hungary's military activities are bringing masses of its troops close to the Rumanian frontier, making incidents possible and arousing the suspicions of Bucharest. Fear of Hungarian irredentism is a method of putting pressure on Rumania to accede to German economic demands—a method already bearing fruit.

HITLER'S LOOT

That is one of the indirect economic consequences of the march to Prague. The immediate results are even more imposing. Of first importance is the loot in gold and foreign currencies which was so quickly and avidly seized. The Reich this year has been hard-pressed for means to pay for vital raw materials. The Austrian plunder has been used up; exports continue to decrease. The new protectorates are self-sufficing so far as food is concerned, and their inclusion in the Reich again gives the Sudetenland access to its natural sources of supply. The industrial equipment of Bohemia and Moravia makes an imposing addition to German resources. The Skoda works are reputed to be the most efficient munitions works in Europe. They equipped the Czech army of one and one-half million and did a huge export business. Of importance also are the Czech steel, machine, airplane, and motor industries. It is probable that the new owners will greatly extend these factories, for strategically they are perfectly placed. Within its mountain ring the Bohemian plain is safer from aerial attack, particularly from the west, than any spot in the old Reich.

Germany's conquest still leaves it short of raw materials. Czechoslovakia has some coal and iron ore, and large timber reserves to supplement the Austrian forests which have been so ruthlessly stripped since Anschluss. But on the whole it was a country which imported raw materials, paying for them with manufactures. It is clear that its foreign markets for the latter will now be much restricted. Consequently when the stolen gold is dissipated, Germany's raw-material problem will be intensified by the necessity of feeding Czech factories. There is one raw material, however, of which Germany is desperately in need, to be found within its new colony. That is labor. There are 200,000 unemployed in Czechoslovakia, and when the army is disbanded there will be another 250,000. With Germany hard-pressed to find enough men for both fields and factories, this pool of labor is regarded greedily. It is said that thousands of agricultural workers will be drafted to German farms, while industrial workers will be employed in extending local production. But how efficient will this slave labor prove? In the long years of oppression under the Hapsburgs, the Czechs acquired great skill in sabotage; it is unlikely that they have wholly forgotten the art.

Now, of course, they come under taskmasters more efficient and more ruthless than the Austrians. There can be no doubt that persecution will be intense. Already the Gestapo has swooped down on Prague and made thousands of arrests. Cultural autonomy is promised, and existing laws are to be maintained "in so far as they do not run counter to the spirit of the German Reich." It is not hard to foresee that these promises will prove worthless. The people who have flocked these past few days to the shrine of St. Wenceslaus, their national hero, will not be easily gleichgeschaltet. And the Nazis will be led to attempt suppression of every manifestation of the national spirit, to follow the same course Mussolini has followed in South Tyrol. It is a task calculated to subdue even Nazi self-confidence.

SELF-PRESERVATION FOR THE DEMOCRACIES

Faced by an open avowal of German ambitions and a great extension of German economic and military strength, are the democracies going to stir at last? The first reactions of the British and French governments were completely spineless. On March 14, when German troops were already crossing the border, Premier Chamberlain told the House of Commons that while he bitterly regretted the German action as something not contemplated at Munich, he would not associate himself with charges of ill-faith. Two days later he adopted a very different tone, for in the interval the cup of British shame, disillusion, and anger had flowed over. In his speech at Birmingham Chamberlain continued to defend Munich, but he denounced Hitler in terms which appeared to mark the end of the "appeasement" policy. Moreover, words have since been followed by deeds. The British ambassador to Berlin has been recalled, the Anglo-German trade parley has been canceled, recognition of Germany's protectorate has been refused, and consultations have been started with other interested powers, including Russia. British alarm has been increased by reports of Nazi pressure on Rumania, whose oil might prove the decisive factor in a war. Russia is equally concerned in the maintenance of Rumanian integrity, and this real coincidence of interests may prove the basis for an Anglo-Soviet understanding of first importance.

We should feel more confident, however, of the ability of democratic Europe to make a stand were it not hampered by tainted leadership. Eleventh-hour conversions are insufficient proof of that courage, conviction, and drive essential for the construction of a determined front against fascism. For those peoples in Europe who value democracy, freedom, civilization itself, the issue is now one of self-preservation. If Hitler's murder of Czechoslovakia can shake them into forcing leadership commensurate with the crisis, it may yet prove a crime fatal to its author. But the time is short.

A New NRA

THERE are only three ways of dealing with a monopoly. One is to break it up. Another is to regulate it. The third is to bring it under government ownership. Experience has shown that though some trusts have been broken up by law—the Standard Oil and tobacco trusts are examples—the operation has been more than nine-tenths illusory and the results have been negligible. The remedy of regulation—whether by administrative commission or the kind of self-regulation with government blessing that we had under the NRA—has proved as ineffective. Few dare suggest the third alternative, for liberals must be as fervent in their denial of "socialistic" ideas as were their British counterparts of 150 years ago in denying any sympathy with regicidal democratic Jacobins. There was a time when American progressives ventured to suggest this solution—William Jennings Bryan did in the case of the railroads—but the terrific clamor of "communism" that has greeted most of the New Deal's reforms has pretty well frightened their successors. Thus in the monopoly inquiry the New Dealers oscillate between the two futilities—solution by another attempt at "trust-busting," and acceptance of monopoly practices under some system of government "supervision."

The older "New Dealers"—most of them were New Dealers before the New Deal—lean toward the first; the younger men toward the latter. Though they are careful to disavow any intention of reviving the NRA, some of these younger New Dealers, notably Leon Henderson and Jerome Frank, seem definitely headed in that direction. "It seems to me that in a given industry of an integrated character," Mr. Frank suggested at one of the recent hearings, "if all the units of that industry could confer with one another and with the government and with the producers of the raw materials (if there be any, if it isn't a raw-material industry and doesn't do its own extracting), with the persons who buy the product, with labor, and with ultimate consumers, and ascertain in a given year what an intelligent price and production schedule would be; in other words, try to ascertain by canvassing the entire situation, by procuring adequate information of the kind that unfortunately we have too little of, just how much of the product, by means of a given reduction of prices could and would be absorbed by the ultimate consumer." Fundamentally, let Mr. Frank deny it as he will, this is the NRA idea all over again.

It is a monument to the hope that springs eternal that Mr. Frank and Mr. Henderson should still lean toward the NRA solution. For both were in Washington during the NRA days and their brave attempts to make the NRA and the similar AAA marketing-code machinery work as they were supposed to work met with the most dismal kind of failure. Mr. Frank was run over by the meat trust while Mr. Henderson and his consumers' advisory counselors were soon reduced to querulous impotence. As Willis J. Ballinger of the (very anti-NRA) Federal Trade Commission said of Mr. Frank and Mr. Henderson and the other idealistic young NRA men, "They put up a tremendous battle on the inside but they got licked." And in our opinion that is the inevitable fate of blue eaglets; the NRA idea is merely the trust sugar-coated—and the sugar coating soon wears off.

Loving Hitler Less

FOR a long time we Americans, in office and out, have enjoyed the luxury of criticizing British and French vacillations in foreign policy without meanwhile developing a recognizable policy of our own. Now at last our chickens have come home to roost. Within a few days the United States will probably have to make up its mind whether or not to join a "stop Hitler" conference with Britain, France, and Russia and a group of lesser, threatened states. The differences of opinion already emerging in Congress reflect similar divisions in the country. Hitler marched not only into Czechoslovakia; he marched into the United States as well. And we are not ready for him.

It is true that our State Department met him with strong words and prompt action. Sumner Welles's statement last week was as forthright as that of Benes himself—and it antedated Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Birmingham by several hours. The refusal of the government to recognize the conquests of Czechoslovakia is in line with recent American practice; apart from its effect abroad, this position will enable Mr. Hurban, the Czechoslovak minister, intrenched in the legation against all comers, to work with other prominent Czechs, including Jan Masaryk and Eduard Benes, for the ultimate restoration of their republic. The decision to jack up our tariff rates on German goods by 25 per cent became a political act through its very timing. In effect it is an official boycott, a gesture of economic warfare, and Germany clearly recognizes it as such. This move was followed by a proposal by Senator Pittman to amend the Neutrality Act to permit the sale of arms on a cash-and-carry basis to nations at war.

So much for Administration measures. The President and his advisers are clearly ready for strong action "short of war." Their line is bolder and more intelligible than it has been at any time. The period of sniping and moralizing seems to be past.

But a stiffer stand in the Administration is certain to be met by stiff resistance. Already the isolationist Senators are voicing their alarm. Borah "assumes" that we will refuse to take part in an anti-Hitler conference. Wheeler, while apparently accepting the cash-and-carry amendment to the Neutrality Act, urges that we "mind our own business." Clark announces that he will fight for a tighter neutrality law with no loopholes for executive discrimination. As war becomes more probable, as the dangers to Europe and the world multiply, we shall see, I am certain, an increasing reluctance in Congress to rush to the rescue.

The public will share that reluctance. It is a thankless and dangerous job we are invited to undertake. If we tackle it as a people and a nation we should do so without illusions. The hour has come that all intelligent people feared: war looms as the probable last resort of powers that refused to move until their own existence was threatened. Democratic Spain is dead—or all but dead—and fascism waits along the undefended southern border of France. Last week Germany gained control not so much of a country as of 1,400 planes, 200 tanks, full equipment for 1,500,000 troops, upward of $100,000,000 in desperately needed gold and foreign exchange, a new supply of labor power, and the finest munitions works on the continent of Europe. And suddenly the statesmen, though admitting no past errors, wake up and wonder. Perhaps betrayal doesn't pay after all. Perhaps "appeasement," at the expense of everyone but yourself, is more costly than you believed.

Of course enlightenment is a good thing. It is fine to have Mr. Chamberlain and M. Daladier learn at last what has been common knowledge in New York and Kamchatka and even London—that Adolf Hitler's promises are nothing more than the small change of diplomatic negotiation, worth whatever he can get for them. It is good that the powers are, at last, aware of the old truth that peace is not to be bought by cowardice and treason or international order built on the destruction of democracy and of the instruments of collective action. All this is good; because the facts of life must be faced even when they spell death.

But is it possible to applaud them without migivings? Is it easy to applaud at all in the bitter knowledge that the awakening has come in all probability too late to avert war but just about in time to wage it? Flanked by the corpses of Spain and Czechoslovakia, the powers now move to "stop Hitler." And they ask the United States to help. Shall we do so? The answer must be based on somber calculation, not enthusiasm. We are faced with an alternative of evils.

The Administration has already chosen. It is supporting Britain and France against the threat implied in Hitler's new drive. The position of the State Department is easy to understand. Without defining its policy, it has generally trailed the British Foreign Office in the past few years. Our embargo against Spain was an integral part of the non-intervention maneuver. Mr. Roosevelt's approval of the British-Italian agreement was used as an indorsement for the Chamberlain policy of appeasement-at-any-price. The President's two notes to Hitler in the days of wrath last fall were a constructive aid to the Nazi drive that has now reached its logical climax. The Administration has on several occasions, it is true, gone farther than the gentlemen at Whitehall in showing displeasure at Nazi Schrecklichkeit. It was to be expected, then, that in the present emergency, when even Neville Chamberlain shows signs of firmness, the President and his advisers would clearly express their willingness to take sides.

Congress and the public are another matter. Pacifists, isolationists, and common-or-garden Republicans will attack the Administration stand. And even those who have urged a positive anti-fascist policy will think twice about commitments in Europe. But in the end, I predict, the general sentiment will favor measures of aid for Britain and France.

It is not that we love Chamberlain and Daladier more but that we love Hitler less. It is not that we trust the governments of Britain and France to create a democratic, peaceful Europe. It is only that we are convinced that a conquest of Europe by Hitler and the subjection of its peoples to the rule of fascism would for many years obliterate even the semblance of human freedom in a large part of the world. We are not—most of us—fanatics who fear a fleet of Nazi planes over New York or the Panama Canal. Rather we fear the gradual crumbling of the economic and political and cultural relationships of men and nations until we all shall be forced, in order to survive, to fit into the framework of a Nazi world.

I believe that this is the present feeling of the average American as he switches on the evening news broadcast. Expressed in terms of policy, it means a change in the Neutrality Law to permit sales of supplies to the non-fascist powers in case of war and a willingness to consult on other possible measures of resistance. This much at least. Whether public sentiment would also support a complete and open rupture of trade and diplomatic relations with the fascist powers, I do not know. I rather doubt it. But such a move would be the logical next step beyond where we now stand.

Further than this we are not likely soon to go. The sympathies of the United States were trampled into the earth of Austria and Spain and Czechoslovakia. They are not likely to be resurrected by Messrs. Daladier and Chamberlain even in their hour of need.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

You Can't Appease Business

BY KENNETH G. CRAWFORD

Washington, March 20

DEVELOPMENTS of the last month in Washington add up to only one conclusion: American business is as unappeasable as Hitler. New Dealers, prodded by John Hanes and Harry Hopkins, have all but turned themselves inside out demonstrating the sincerity of their attempt to give the business community what it wants. But business remains unconvinced. Markets refuse to respond. Either business is what Charlie Curtis told an audience of Iowa farmers they were in the 1928 campaign, "too damned dumb to understand," or it is actually so determined to ruin Roosevelt that it is willing to subordinate profits to principles. Students of business behaviorism discount the second possibility.

The fact is, whether business believes it or not, that Hopkins, Hanes, and company are desperately trying to surrender to Wall Street on something like reasonable terms. Perceiving that the irresistible reactionary swing which started in the 1938 election is still on, the more politically minded of the New Dealers have decided to run with it and, if possible, run fast enough to get out in front and lead it. The warning of Solicitor General Jackson that they will be outdistanced by the Republicans in any such race has not deterred them. As the President's favorite and the man who stands to gain most by refuting Jackson's theory, Hopkins has dashed into the rail position. The President is lagging a few paces, but there is every indication that Hopkins has persuaded him to go along.

The trend is obvious from an examination of post-election events. After the failure of his purge campaign, Roosevelt at first refused to bow to political expediency. Instead, he set about doing what he could to pin down his reforms, strengthen his Cabinet by the Hopkins and Murphy appointments, liberalize federal agencies by such nominations as that of Tom Amlie for the ICC, and refurbish the judiciary by replacing Judge Manton with a Republican and calling Felix Frankfurter to the Supreme Court.

After Hopkins's appointment as Secretary of Commerce and his business-must-have-confidence speech in Iowa, the direction suddenly changed. The President consented to a revamping of business taxes—undistributed-profits, excess-profits, and capital-stock levies included—in favor of a simplified corporation tax. While he turned thumbs down on any reduction in the sum total of revenue, he consented to consider proposals to raze the tax structure he had so laboriously constructed and to abandon his budget-message request for new taxes to produce $400,000,000 a year additional revenue. He also, it appears, encouraged Murphy to revive the often repeated experiment of granting business at least partial immunity from the anti-trust laws.

In another even more important but generally unappreciated gesture to business he instituted a resumption of peace negotiations between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. Coming at a time when the A. F. of L. was riding the crest of the reactionary wave as a part-time ally of the National Association of Manufacturers, and the C. I. O. was feeling the after-effects of political reverses and the recession, this move definitely imperiled the position of the C. I. O., the President's biggest and staunchest supporting unit. Business, which has been harassed by jurisdictional fights, and the A. F. of L., which has been outmaneuvered consistently until now by John Lewis, stand to benefit most from any agreement that can emerge from the conferences.

On top of all this the President gave business definite assurances that there would be no new reforms. He will make good this promise willy-nilly. Even if he wanted to break it, as business contends he has broken previous promises of breathing spells, it would be impossible. There is not the slightest chance for any new reform bill to get through the present Congress, with the possible exception of Senator Wagner's legislation to extend the socialized-medicine frontier a few inches.

But there is one thing more business wants if its spokesmen mean what they say—government economy. Actually, enlightened leaders of business are no more anxious for government economy than are the unemployed, who would be the first to starve by it. They know as well as anyone else that to pull the government purse-strings tight would do again what it did in 1937. This time, indeed, the recession might be a tailspin. With polls of public opinion showing that a majority of voters are attracted by the plausible argument that the government ought to quit throwing its money around and balance the budget, as every prudent family must, it is all right for Pat Harrison, Arthur Vandenberg, and the rest of the Republico-Democrats to talk for political effect about economy. Business would be the first to squawk if it thought they intended to make good.

The realities of the situation clearly indicate not less but more spending. At the very time when he was braying about economy, Harrison was quietly pushing his $100,000,000 educational-aid bill. Vandenberg, meanwhile, was leading the fight for liberalization of the Social Security Act along lines which may boost its cost some $500,000,000. Both the Harrison and Vandenberg bills have a chance for enactment. So have the $500,000,000 public-works bill sponsored by Joe Starnes and the $250,000,000 agricultural-relief bill. It is probable, too, that Congress, after some vigorous kicking, will appropriate the additional $150,000,000 needed for relief.

There is a distinct possibility that acts of the present Congress will throw President Roosevelt's budget as much as one billion further out of balance than it was when it was submitted last January. All this spending, coupled with the announcement of Marriner S. Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, that the credit throttle will be kept open, holds the promise of a greater degree of business recovery in the next two years than anything the country has had under the New Deal. The day-to-day news from Washington emphasizes economy, but the chances for real economy are nil.

Developments in Europe also are bullish despite the immediate adverse market reaction to Hitler's Central European plunderings. Government economists are agreed that conditions now are not comparable with those of 1914, when war news produced a panic and forced exchanges to close. While the outbreak of a general war probably would produce a temporary break in prices, this break would be negligible compared with the 1914 débâcle, and recovery would be quicker if not so exaggerated. War orders from France and Great Britian inevitably would boom domestic industry, particularly if, as is now indicated, the Neutrality Act is repealed or modified.

Whatever the immediate gyrations of the business indices, the long curve between now and election time in 1940 will almost certainly be up. President Roosevelt and the Administration will do all they can to push it in that direction. Therein lies what hope they have for the reelection of Roosevelt or election of the successor he designates. However much business men may want to get rid of President Roosevelt and all his work, they won't pass up a chance to make an honest dollar.

Business will never be appeased so long as Roosevelt is in the White House. But fortunately there is practically no connection between business prosperity and the abstraction known as business confidence. Business has confidence when it sees a chance to make money, lacks confidence when it doesn't. Everything points to a season of unappeased confidence.

Are the Balkans Doomed?

BY ALBERT VITON

THE partition and conquest of Czechoslovakia prove that the spirit of Munich is marching still. For one hundred glorious days—from the beginning of December till the new crisis—Balkan states breathed freely. One after another they began to straighten their backs. There were whispers of British and French support; that the great democracies would take a stand on the Danube; that, above all, the heroic words of Mr. Roosevelt had not been in vain. King Carol of Rumania took a determined stand and crushed German agents boring from within; Yugoslavia and Hungary were not slow to follow his lead. Even Colonel Beck of Poland, first to build a diplomatic bridge to Berlin back in 1934, was compelled to recast his policies. A conference was held at which the slogan "The Balkans for the Balkan Peoples" was heard. Now this trend, unless London and Paris take stronger action to stop Germany than is yet in prospect, is in danger of being reversed.

I was in the Balkans when the tide began turning against the Nazis. The little states around the Great Reich did not embark lightly on the new policy. On the contrary, there was careful analysis; and they certainly did not underestimate the extent of German opposition. In Bucharest, after touring the Balkans, I found that since Munich there had been a furious increase in Nazi activities. German agents frankly admitted that this year was likely to prove decisive in their struggle for hegemony over Europe; they realized the full importance of the Balkans for both peace and war. The grain fields of Rumania and Hungary, the oil of the former and the meat and fats of the latter, the raw materials of Yugoslavia and the tobacco of Greece are vital to the Reich. But developments convinced the Nazis that an economic monopoly was impossible without political control, and they left nothing to chance.

Everywhere organizations of Germanic inhabitants, Rassengenossen, were overhauled and tightened. Neither money nor trouble was spared. The Germans in Czechoslovakia, the Swabians in Hungary, and the Saxons in Rumania were placed under Berlin's direct control. All Rassengenossen were officially directed to keep in constant touch with German consular representatives. Although all political parties had been outlawed in Rumania, the government not only had to close its eyes to the very active Saxon organizations, but even had to permit their unification under leaders designated by Berlin. Spreading anti-Semitism was only a minor part of the duties of the organized Germans. They acted as spies; they fomented trouble; they everywhere formed nuclei of anti-government parties.

That those parties were heavily subsidized has been proved times without number. No denial followed the revelation of a Budapest democratic daily that one of the presses turning out local Nazi propaganda had once belonged to the Social Democratic Vorwärts of Berlin. Many millions of marks as well as highly interesting documents were found when the Hungarian police, acting on a tip, searched an automobile coming from Germany. Leaders of the Rumanian Iron Guard, the Hungarian Arrow Cross, and the various fascist organizations in Czechoslovakia made repeated pilgrimages to Berlin and Munich. Codreanu, leader of the Iron Guard, was confronted at his trial with a draft of a memorandum he had sent to Berlin through the German minister appealing for financial assistance on the ground that "solidarity of interests . . . binds us in an indestructible" manner.

That Berlin would attempt to strike was common knowledge; the question was whose turn would be first. The Hungarian police discovered a complete plan worked out between the Arrow Cross and the German minister. Ammunition had already come from across the border and competent S. S. leader had arrived to direct the putsch. Toward the end of last November the Iron Guard, on instructions from the Reich, launched a widespread campaign of terror to disorganize the government and demoralize the population. Guardists shot and seriously wounded the rector of the University of Cluj; a policeman was killed; the royal residents at Czernowitz and Cluj received letters informing them that they would be "executed between December 1 and 15." Private residences were set on fire, and bombs were thrown in theaters and public buildings and at officials.

The ruthlessness of the Reich and its absolute disregard of the amour propre of other peoples when it was bent on obtaining concessions antagonized public opinion everywhere. A wave of resentment spread through Rumania when an official of the German legation who had been hurriedly recalled upon the disclosure of his relations with the illegal Iron Guard made a triumphant reentry into Bucharest. At the demand of the Reich he was permitted to return to give some farewell parties, which were extraordinarily large. The inhuman treatment of Polish Jews, expelled from their homes without a moment's notice, was profoundly resented in Poland, notwithstanding that country's scant consideration for its own Jewish citizens. As for the Czechs, they found the arrogant bearing of German visitors almost as difficult to bear as the memory of their great national humiliation. "I will close my hotel rather than continue dealing with those Nazi Schweine," a fat citizen of Prague said to me in Budapest.

Nowhere, however, did public opinion take such a sharp anti-Reich turn as in Hungary. The Carpatho-Ukrainian affair convinced everyone that in its ruthless drive for hegemony the Reich made no distinction between friend and foe. I need not go into the merits of the Hungarian and Czech claims for that area. Certainly it was not ethical considerations that prompted Hitler to veto Hungarian ambitions. At the Vienna conference Ribbentrop forced Ciano to agree to an absurd frontier because Germany had plans of its own for the area. When news of Germany's role in the negotiations leaked out, even avowedly pro-Nazi groups and newspapers in Hungary were swept along by the wave of bitterness. So strong was the demand for defiance of the Reich that Erdmannsdorf, the German minister, had to make strong démarches to the Foreign Office; the government organ Uj Magyarsag frankly declared that "Hungary's internal affairs are by no means as much a sovereign internal right as many seem to think." The Imredy Cabinet fell.

What added substance to the general resentment was the way the Reich was using its preponderant economic power. Almost 50 per cent of the total foreign trade of the various Balkan countries is in the hands of Germany. The Reich's share in Bulgaria's export trade grew from 25 per cent in 1930 to 48 per cent during the first eight months of 1938, when it supplied 49 per cent of that country's imports. Hungary sold 11 per cent of its total exports to the Reich in 1933; last year it is estimated that the proportion was about 40 per cent. Preliminary figures for 1938 indicate that the Greater Reich will control about half of Rumania's foreign trade. Yet even these figures do not reveal the full importance of the German trade. Of more significance is the fact that Germany now takes 65 to 70 per cent of all Balkan agricultural exports. More than 70 per cent of Hungary's flour, about 70 per cent of its bacon, about 80 per cent of its fresh fruits, more than 85 per cent of its eggs, went in 1937 to Austria and Germany.

Having achieved this preponderant economic position, the Reich began before long to use its power to impose terms advantageous to itself. Not a Balkan state but has been made to pay for the Reich's valuta difficulties; Berlin began to interfere with their currency policies. Although it paid higher prices than those prevailing on world markets, the prices of its industrial goods also went up. The bait of long-term credits was gradually withdrawn, and the number of articles available for export was drastically curtailed. Some countries discovered that, having piled up huge credits in Berlin, they had to take whatever was offered. Huge shipments of quinine, thermometers, phonograph records, photographic and optical apparatus—and armaments—flooded Balkan markets. People awoke to the German practice of buying goods which could be resold for strong currency in world markets. Greek tobacco was dumped by the Reich in London, and Greece thus prevented from getting valuta, of which it is badly in need, while world prices were undermined. Greece has suffered also from other German tricks. After resorting to all sorts of economies to save enough currency to import about a third of its wheat needs, it discovered that a portion of the home crop had been bought up, of course for blocked marks, and shipped to the Reich. Above all, Balkan industrialists came to realize that Germany was increasingly using its power to undermine local industries. "The Nazis are trying to degrade us to the position of colonies," a Rumanian manufacturer said at the conclusion of a long talk about German practices.

